Mr. George Bemis, of Boston, has appeared in the field once more in a letter to the New York Times, in reply to a challenge from "Historicus," of the London Times, on the old question of "belligerent rights," and brings to light a somewhat remarkable fact. Our readers may remember that one of the grounds on which Lord Russell and "Historicus" defend the English recognition of the Confederates as belligerents is that it was not done until Mr. Lincoln's formal proclamation of a blockade had been received in London; that his proclamation arrived in London on the 3d of May, while the British proclamation of neutrality was not issued until the 13th. Mr. Bemis now announces that, having received the "Blue Book" containing "the correspondence with the United States Government respecting blockade," he finds that the despatch from Lord Lyons, dated April 27, and enclosing printed copies of the President's proclamation, is marked officially, "Received May (fourteenth) 14," showing that Earl Russell had no official notice of the blockade till after the Queen's proclamation had been drawn and issued. Mr. Bemis further points out that the copy of the President's proclamation which "Historicus" says was published in the London Times of May 3 was not an official copy, but a compilation, probably framed on mere rumor, and in many important particulars grossly inaccurate. All this is, of course, strong corroboration of the American case, but we do not know that it increases the legal or moral value of the main fact. The question now is, what is the bearing of the premature recognition of the Confederacy, supposing it to have been premature, on the question of compensation for the damage done by the Confederate cruisers? If it does not affect the question of damages in any way—and judging from Lord Stanley's admissions, it does not seem as if it would—it can hardly be called a profitable subject of discussion, unless it is likely to be taken for a precedent, which nobody, we believe, asserts.

"Historicus," after a career of considerable splendor, considering that it was that of a writer of letters in a daily paper, is slowly but surely coming to grief. He has instructed the English nation so carefully on questions of international law, but has done it with such evident marks of contempt for the understanding of his pupils, that divers unruly persons have risen against him. He has just had a very unpleasant encounter with the Pall Mall Gazette, of the exact nature of which, owing to its suddenness and audacity, he does not yet seem conscious, and which has not only disarranged his wig and torn his gown, but left him with sundry scratches and bruises. The Gazette has, in fact, boldly asserted that "Historicus's" whole theory of the nature of international law is erroneous, and that, therefore, many of his conclusions are worthless, and that his inability to think clearly ought, in spite of his extensive reading, to make him modest—an observation in which we concur with the Gazette, and which we should like to apply to some publicists on this side of the water. It also requests him, in the language of the late Mr. Justice Maule to Sir Cresswell Cresswell, then at the bar, "to remember that his opponents are vertebrate animals," and "that his manner to them would be offensive from God Almighty to a black beetle." After this comes the Daily News, and points out that the claims "Historicus" now makes of having been a friend of the United States all through the war, and his assertion—made in the Times, of all places in the world—that the hostility to it in England was confined "to a small and clamorous minority," must be taken with considerable qualification, inasmuch as he announced very pompously in 1863 that he "sincerely felt a desire not only for a political but moral neutrality in that deplorable strife; that the principles of one party and aims of the other seemed to him alike so indefensible as to leave to the impartial spectator little room for sympathy with either." The fact is, that no matter where his sympathies were, he did render this country considerable service by his steady opposition, at a very dark period of the struggle, to the growing cry amongst a very influential class in England for the recognition of the Confederacy as an independent state. His arguments against this, owing to his great familiarity with precedents and his rather taking rhetoric, were very effective, and really silenced the cry. For this service the North is indebted to him; but it owes him nothing for his sympathy, and the less said about that the better.

The comments of the English press on Mr. Disraeli's accession to the premiership are characteristic and somewhat instructive. One portion of it, including the London Times, dwells on the attainment of such a position by a literary man not simply as something unprecedented, but as something out of the ordinary course of nature, and can hardly refrain from expressing in good set terms the sneers of the Tory squires over it—a piece of self-degradation which fully accounts for much of what is most repulsive in English society. Another portion, which is disposed to rejoice over it, dwells with most complacency on those of Mr. Disraeli's qualities which in the eyes of moralists make his success a doubtful good—his unscrupulousness and thick-skinnedness, for instance. They delight in his determination to win without being too particular about the means, and contrast it exultantly with Mr. Gladstone's tenderness of conscience, and that heat of temper which results from his tenderness of conscience. The discussion the matter has excited is, in fact, anything but pleasant reading, and we may fancy with what scorn a Frenchman of the best class must follow it. Those who blame the English aristocracy for being what they are forget how much the middle class does to make them so. It must not be forgotten that the party in which Mr. Disraeli's rise excites such astonishment has had Lord Malmesbury for Foreign Secretary, Walpole for Home Secretary, and has now Sir John Pakington in the War Office without being in the least ashamed.

Mr. Disraeli is disposed not to meddle with the Irish Church, at least till the "Reformed Parliament" comes into existence, which will not be till next year. Mr. Gladstone, however, is determined to force the matter to an issue, and has introduced a series of resolutions looking to the abolition of the Church establishment, saving private property and the rights of actual holders of livings. It is difficult to avoid thinking that the Church will fare worse in the next Parliament than in this, and that it would be wise for the conservatives to meet the question while they have it within their control. In the present Parliament it might be settled without damage to the English Church; whether this can be done in the next Parliament is more than doubtful.

Our English correspondent, in speaking in his last letter of Disraeli's entrance into public life, fell into an error which he desires us to correct. He made him at that time a friend of O'Connell's. He was, of course, an opponent. Some of our readers will recollect the interchange of compliments between them, paid at the time when Disraeli was making his first attempt at getting into Parliament—the one, on being charged with "O'Connellism," calling the other "a bloody traitor," and the other saying that "for anything he knew Disraeli might be the lineal descendant of the impenitent thief."

We spoke a few weeks ago of the conclusions to which the examinations for certificates which Cambridge University (England) has established for girls, have led the examiners with regard to the comparative capacity of girls and boys. They are of opinion, for instance, that in early life, at least, the female mind is on the whole rather more successful in dealing with mathematical demonstrations than that of boys. The commission appointed to enquire into the condition of English schools, endowed and other, have also made a remarkable contribution to the discussion of the same subject. They say they are of opinion that the learning capacity of boys and girls is about the same; that up to the age when boys begin to prepare specially for their professions, the course of education ought to be the same for both sexes; and that some kind of collegiate training similar to that of the universities ought to be provided for those girls who wish to go on. A movement for this purpose has been begun in England, and a large sum of money has been already raised, for the establishment of a female university, in which girls shall live alone and take care of themselves after the school age, under a certain amount of discipline, as young men now do, for a course of three years. This would fill up a large portion of the time which is now passed in novel-reading, ornamental needle-work, and visits to "young friends," and during which the seeds of so much mental and physical feebleness are sown. The good effect on girls' character of having something to do at this age, and of being forced to do it, can hardly be doubted, and the commissioners produce a good deal of evidence in support of the conclusion that the bodily health would be greatly promoted by it also, study not being in their opinion calculated to produce those blighting effects on the female nervous system which some of the older writers on "Woman's Sphere," "The True Woman," "The Mother and the Wife," and kindred themes have been in the habit of ascribing to it.

The English working-men propose to hold what they call a "National Labor Parliament" in London, in May, at which both laborers and employers will be represented, and all questions in dispute between them be thoroughly discussed, with the view of dispensing with strikes and "lockouts," the frequent recurrence of which the working-men begin to see is exercising a very deleterious effect on English industry. The cause of strikes and lockouts is, however, simply the working-man's ignorance of the conditions under which his employer carries on his business, and his distrust of the employer's statements; and for this there is no remedy, short of some great change in human nature, but the admission of the working-man to some sort of direct participation in the profits and losses, with an owner's or stockholder's right to some knowledge and supervision of what is going on in the business.

In France the three questions of interest under discussion are the new loan of $88,000,000, the contingent of troops for the year (100,000), asked for by the Government under the new law, and the Kervéguen affair about the corruption of the press. We mentioned last week that the accused journals had completely vindicated themselves before the "Jury of Honor." As the charge had been made by M. de Kervéguen publicly in the Chamber, M. Havin, the editor of the Siècle, sought to read the finding of the jury in the same place. But the majority would not hear him. As soon as he appeared in the tribune his voice was drowned by every variety of noise that can be produced without the aid of other instruments than keys, pen-knives, boot-heels, and the human voice. The scene was one of unparalleled excitement and uproar, and what, of course, contributed most to make it disgraceful was that the majority were refusing, in defiance of their own rules and of the decision of the presiding officer, to listen to the answer of two of their own members to an infamous charge which they had heard with perfect composure. M. Havin gave up the attempt in despair, and the opposition felt so outraged by the occurrence and so ashamed of it that they seriously debated the propriety of resigning in a body. M. Granier de Cassagnac, the editor of the Pays, and one of the newspaper bravos of the Empire, has headed the attacks on his brethren of the press, and has asserted, moreover, that he could produce proofs of their corruption which did not appear before the Jury of Honor, if he were not afraid of being sued for libel. Thereupon the editors of the journals named by him—the Revue des Deux Mondes, the Liberté, the Opinion Nationale, Siècle, Débats, and Avenir National have signed a paper authorizing him to print his "proofs," and undertaking not to sue him.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE MAGIC OF CONSTITUTIONS.

THERE is no special reason why the leaders of the majority in Congress should be much concerned about the temporal welfare of the party editors; but nothing can excuse complete or even partial indifference to the welfare of their souls. And yet it is impossible to avoid inferring this indifference from the course of the majority on divers weighty questions. They have, during the past year particularly, whether from want of faith in their own plan of reconstruction, or want of faith in the persistence and principle of the Northern people, started a great number of schemes, of more than usual novelty and even violence, in which the most firmly settled principles of legislation were disregarded, such as the bills directed against the Supreme Court and the bill making Grant a dictator to rule over one-half of the Union, besides others which made less noise and received less support. Whether, when these schemes were started, anybody in Congress seriously expected them to pass, is more than we can say. Undoubtedly, the best men of the majority never did, and by those people out of doors who were unwilling to give up all faith in Congressional wisdom, they were looked on simply as threats intended to scare the South into a readier acquiescence in the reconstruction policy. There was hardly one of them which could stand the test of a serious examination in the light of political science, or of principles of human nature, or American experience, and, in fact, the only merit of some of them was that they flew in the face of all knowledge, reason, and experience; or, in other words, were remarkable displays of "courage."

Now, we have little doubt ourselves that the leaders in both Houses well knew that nothing was ever to come of them, and that, on reaching some stage more or less advanced, they would be dropped. Of the policy of introducing them at all, we have said so much already in these columns that we shall say nothing now. But we do think that those who were acquainted with their nature were bound, in the interest of humanity as well as morality, to put the party newspapers on their guard, and thus prevent them from committing themselves to the thick-and-thin support of measures in which the majority in Congress had no faith whatever. It may be play for Messrs. Stevens and Boutwell to bring in terrible bills which they never intend to pass; but it is death to the poor journalists through the country, whose business it is to crack the bills up, and swear that they are monuments of almost superhuman wisdom, and that, if they are not passed, America's halcyon days are over. The practice of supporting any politician, or set of politicians, through thick and thin, is not to our minds a very elevating or very moral one, even when the politicians are calm, sober men, who always mean what they say, and embark on nothing they have not maturely considered; but it is positively degrading and immoral when the politicians only mean half what they say, and have constantly schemes on foot, to the remote consequences of which they have given no consideration whatever, and which they mean to abandon half-way. Therefore, it is almost wicked of the Republican leaders not to give the party editors a hint to let them know when they "mean business," as the pugilists say, and when they are only shamming. This is exacted of them not only by the regard which every man should feel for the spiritual welfare of his fellows, but by the interest which every politician should feel in the mental condition of his country's journalists. There is nothing a journalist needs so much as a stock of principles with which to test measures brought before the legislature, and dexterity in the testing process. But under the system in vogue during the past year, the regular party journals have had to abandon all resort to this test, and ask themselves, before discussing any bill, simply who brought it in. If the answer was Mr. Stevens or Mr. Boutwell or Mr. Bingham, they at once began to chant its praises, and not only this, but to use all their powers in showing that it was absolutely necessary to the national salvation. Now, nobody can do this sort of thing long without serious injury to his intellectual powers; and when one remembers how much of it has been done, and is done, one cannot think of the consequences of Mr. Stevens's or Mr. Boutwell's death without a shudder. The condition of large numbers of distinguished publicists would, should such a deplorable contingency occur, be really pitiable. That of sheep without a shepherd would be comparatively safe and comfortable.

The case of Alabama furnishes a striking illustration of the justice and pertinence of the foregoing remarks. A vote was taken in that State some weeks ago on the new constitution under the Reconstruction act, which provides that, unless a majority of the registered voters vote on the question of the adoption of the new constitution, the constitution shall not be adopted. The act did not create any exception whatever in favor of cases in which the majority of voters might be prevented from voting by the elements or by violence or intimidation. As it stood, therefore, it was an absolute pledge of the faith of the nation that a vote taken under certain conditions should be valid, that if not taken under such conditions it should not be valid. The vote was accordingly taken in Alabama. For various reasons—force, fraud, ignorance, and bad weather, and bad will—the majority of the registered voters did not vote. The constitution was therefore not adopted. The result was most unfortunate, but it was the result primarily of a Congressional oversight, and there it stood. What was to be done?

Accept it, of course. If Congress does not respect its own legislation, how in the name of common-sense can it expect anybody else to do so? If it attaches no importance to its own pledges, how can it exact or expect good faith of others? The only thing to be done, consistent either with honor or sound policy, was to pass a new law, leaving the result of a vote in the hands of the majority of voters voting, and not of voters on the register, and such a law has now been passed. But it was actually proposed, and a bill introduced for the purpose, lately brought before the House a second time, to admit Alabama under the constitution drawn by the convention, in spite of the fact that it had not been legally adopted by the people; and the only excuse ever offered for this performance was, that "the loyal men of the State demanded it," that "everybody knew" a majority of the people of the State were in favor of the constitution, that the weather was bad on the day of election, that one loyal voter was drowned on his way to the polls, and that thousands were kept away by intimidation. We believe every word of this, but what of it? The law did not say that a majority of the registered votes should not be required if the weather was bad or the creeks full on election day, or if the secessionists kept Union men from the polls by force or fraud. It said that a majority of such voters should be necessary under all circumstances, and it was for Congress to set an example of obedience to it and respect for it. We said at the time that no matter what part the secessionists might have played at the election, or to what devices they may have resorted to secure its failure, it was not for Congress to repay a trick by a trick, or to set an example of contempt for legislation in order to hasten by a few days a result which was considered eventually certain. Some of our contemporaries—we shall not designate them farther than by saying they are the regular party journals—however, insisted upon it that this was the very thing to do, that what Mr. Stevens said and Mr. Boutwell said was absolute truth and wisdom, and that anybody who hesitated about following their lead was a foolish or wicked person. This discreditable farce, in which reason and experience and truth were more grossly outraged than they have been at any time yet during this remarkable crisis, lasted nearly a fortnight. It was put an end to a few days ago by Mr. Stevens gravely announcing that "he was satisfied that to force a vote on this bill and admit the State against our own law would not be doing such justice in legislation as would be expected by the people"—thus leaving his dupes out-of-doors to the unpleasant consciousness that they had eaten dirt for nothing.

We are now of the same opinion with regard to the original Reconstruction bill we have been from the beginning. We believe it to be the best and only true one. We think it is based on sound principles, and that if it fails it will be due to circumstances which no legislation can at once control or provide for. We are in favor of Congress carrying it out as it stands, in spite of the President and the Supreme Court and everybody else. We would have the Republican party, even if the election went against them on it, stand their ground firmly, and appeal from the people this year to the people next year. We would have it to rely on its principles, and not on little dodges and devices like the manipulation of the Supreme Court, or the dilution of the national debt. We would have it wait patiently too, and not trouble itself with producing new measures once a week. There is no necessity for them. If it cannot hold its own without the aid of the schemes by which it has sought to bolster up its reconstruction policy, it cannot hold its own with them.

Moreover, there is no magic in paper constitutions. The admission of Alabama, under this constitution, will not put the Union men of the State in any better position than they are in now. Nay, it will, if the consequence of the admission of the State be the removal of the troops and the remission of the government to the civil authorities, put them in a worse. There may be Union men foolish enough to come to Washington and try to persuade members of Congress that once Alabama has representatives in Congress under the new constitution, all their troubles will be over; but there ought not to be Congressmen foolish enough to believe them. If, as we are told, the secessionists are so fierce and determined that even now, with the State under military rule, they can keep thousands of Union men away from the polls by threats and revolvers and bowie-knives, will the presence of their representatives in the Capitol assuage their malice or diminish their powers of mischief? If a Union man is now afraid to speak his mind or vote as he pleases lest his neighbors should cut his throat, what is there in the transmission of the piece of parchment called the constitution to Washington, and its approval by Congress, to make his life or limbs secure?

The fact is, that if any State in the condition of Alabama finds its way back into the Union now, the loyalists will be just as badly off as ever. They will have all the offices of the State, and the privilege of making speeches in the legislature, and reading the speeches of their Congressmen, but they will go to bed and get up in even greater bodily terror than ever. They will have disfranchised all their enemies, but then, unless the laws of nature have greatly changed, a disfranchised man can shoot or stab or knock one on the head just as effectually as if he had four votes and were eligible to every office in the gift of the people. If anybody wants to know the value of a close Radical government, composed mainly of violent partisans, with the bulk of the white population shut out as "unrepentant rebels," he has only to travel in Tennessee, or, what is safer and more comfortable, read the letters on the condition of that State lately appearing in the Philadelphia Press. He will thus see that the Tennesseean State Government, though it has fulfilled all the principal Radical conditions as far as disfranchisement and the election of loyal men are concerned, has failed to fulfil any of the principal functions of government, and that it offers nobody security for either life or property. There is no use in saying that all this is owing to the wickedness of secessionists. The wickedness of the secessionists is one of the elements of the problem to be solved.

It is safe to assert that what is wanted at the South is not new constitutions and representation in Congress, but time, conciliation, and security. Whatever leads at present, or until the Southerners have lost all hopes of Northern reaction or of Presidential interference, to the withdrawal of military rule, leads to anarchy. One hears a great deal of talk of the danger to liberty, or, at all events, the scandal to free government, of the retention of so many States under military rule. But freedom is in no way so much endangered as by the presence of its form without its substance, by the spectacle of courts without authority, of sheriffs flying from malefactors, of legislators passing laws which nobody regards, of limitations on the franchise which, instead of strengthening the government, simply exasperate its enemies. We should, in the face of such a state of things, have to use the military, and the use of the military after a regular government has been set up is certainly more dangerous than before it has been set up.

THE BATTLE OF THE RAILROADS.

For weeks past column after column of all the daily papers has been filled with the details of the "Great Erie War;" half the judges of half the courts of the city, county, and even of the State have been busy issuing attachments, certiorari writs, mandamuses, orders to show cause, and all sorts of other frightful weapons of offence and defence drawn from the musty arsenals of law; the Legislatures and Senates of two States have hurried with railroad speed and railroad recklessness into passing laws suited to the occasion or to the wants and wishes of whichever party had their sympathy; quiet rural towns of New Jersey have been startled by the din of war; millions of money have been carried out of the city and State to "places of safety;" a large part of the business of the city has been brought to a standstill; hundreds of millions of property have been depreciated five and ten per cent. in one week; the Government of the United States, represented by the Secretary of the Treasury, has had to interfere to prevent a bank panic—and all about what?

The most important and most profitable railroad traffic in the United States is that between New York city and the great West. The advantages of water transportation by way of the great Lakes, although available only in summer, have given a preponderating share of this traffic to the lines of road connecting with the outlets of the great water basins at, or near, Buffalo in the State of New York; and this preponderance they manage by means of other railroad connections to retain at all seasons of the year, in spite of the competition of other lines, whose insufficient wealth, power, influence, and organization do not enable them to reap the fruits of their better location. The great freight business of the West with New York, the East, and even parts of the South is thus done over the lines that connect the eastern end of Lake Erie with New York city. Of these there are two, one running in a south-easterly line through New York State and New Jersey to Jersey City, called the Erie Railroad, and the other called the New York Central Railroad, running from the lake almost due east to Albany, where it divides, as it were, into two branches to connect with New York city, the latter respectively called the Hudson River and the New York and Harlem. Of all the many outrageously mismanaged roads of the United States, the worst managed of all until a few years ago was probably the New York and Harlem, running from Albany to New York a few miles to the east of the Hudson River line. Fraud had conspired with mismanagement to bring the road into disrepute, complicated lawsuits, an unusual number of severe accidents, unsuccessful competition, and a variety of other ailments, brought it very low and to the point of bankruptcy. Up to this time there is nothing uncommon in the history of the Harlem road or different from that of fifty other roads. But now an event occurs which marks an era in the history of railroads generally, and forms the starting point of the great Erie warfare.

Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, a gentleman who had acquired a great fortune by the skill and economy with which he had for many years managed large steamship lines, conceived the idea of applying the same rules of conduct to the Harlem Railroad. He purchased at a comparatively nominal figure a large portion of the Harlem shares, induced his friends to do the same, and at the next shareholders' meeting caused himself and his friends to be elected directors of the company, assuming himself the entire personal management of the road. The result was soon apparent: regularity and order took the place of delays and confusion, economy the place of waste; residents along the line and senders of freight soon perceived the difference, the business of the road rapidly increased and became more profitable, the stock began to pay a regular dividend, has done so ever since, and is now scarcely ever seen in the market.

The continued success and prosperity of the Harlem road depended, however, in a large measure upon the share of the so-called through freight which it might be able to secure. A large part of the great Western trade is brought East to Albany, and taken West from Albany by the New York Central road. The relations of the latter with the Hudson River line were so intimate, and the determination of the Hudson River line to retain this important traffic so great, that only a ruinous reduction of freights on the part of the Harlem road could have caused a portion of the through freight to be secured to it. The policy of ordinary railroad managers would probably have induced Mr. Vanderbilt to attempt the competition by a reduction of freights, and thus to ruin his road in the hope of increasing its income. But his policy was a different one. He adopted the bold measure of himself buying the Hudson River road and settling all disputes about dividing the freight by securing the whole. His own great wealth, further increased by the great addition to the value of the Harlem road, and the wealth of many friends encouraged by former success to join him in any enterprise, made the purchase of the Hudson River road comparatively easy. Its shares were quietly bought in the market until Mr. Vanderbilt and his friends owned the majority of the stock; and at the next subsequent shareholders' meeting these gentlemen elected themselves directors of the road, which thenceforth was submitted to the same system of management which had brought success out of the wrecks of Harlem. Not only was the line worked with the same energy, order, and economy, but an end was put to the injurious competition between the two lines for the freight going to and from Albany over the New York Central; and the Hudson River road, although reasonably well managed before, improved greatly in value and prosperity. This junction of interests, however beneficial to the shareholders of Harlem and Hudson River, was not much relished by the New York Central road, which saw the control of its two principal connections with New York City pass into the hands of one owner, powerful, wealthy, able, and not accustomed to see the interests that he represents sacrificed to any consideration. Whereas formerly the two roads running from Albany to New York submitted to every exaction which the overwhelmingly influential Central chose to demand, now the Central had to submit to dictation, or lose its connection with New York. The struggle was severe and protracted. But finding that nothing was gained by the fight, Mr. Vanderbilt once more adopted the same policy as before, and proceeded to gain possession of the entire line of the New York Central by gradually buying up between himself and his friends the majority of the stock of this important and extensive road, voting himself into the presidency, and assuming the entire and direct control of all its affairs. Many of the old stockholders of the road, seeing the success of Mr. Vanderbilt's management of the other two lines, and dissatisfied with the former direction, which was openly charged with corruption and extravagance, became his warmest supporters, while his former successes had created a host of devoted adherents who saw a certainty of profit in whatever enterprise he might choose to inaugurate. Nor have they so far been disappointed in their expectations, for the Central, like the Hudson and the Harlem, has prospered greatly.

So far the undivided control of this large and immensely important railroad property confided to one able man had proved extremely advantageous to all parties interested, but there is no food like power "to make the appetite grow with what it feeds on." Neither the habits of Mr. Vanderbilt, nor the supposed interests of the roads under his control, make competition bearable. Yet we have seen that for the valuable traffic from the Lakes to New York there are two competitors —the roads controlled by Mr. Vanderbilt on one side and the Erie Railroad on the other. Not only does the Erie compete with the Central by means of its immense capital and organization, but it has the advantage of being, like the Central, almost entirely controlled by one man, whose influence over some of the important Western lines connecting with both the Erie and the Central enables him to divert from the latter to the former a large part of the trade from the West. This state of affairs could produce but one result: a fierce competition, which led to nothing but loss for all parties; and next a determined attempt on the part of Mr. Vanderbilt to end competition in the same way as he had done before, by gaining entire possession of the Erie road, purchasing its shares in the open market. It is this attempt to secure possession of the requisite number of Erie shares that has brought about the most extraordinary of the many extraordinary railroad fights ever witnessed in Wall Street, now familiarly known and likely to pass down into history as the "Great Erie Railroad War."

Any one unfamiliar with Wall Street tactics might think it a very simple thing to buy a certain number of railway shares, provided you are willing to pay the market price for them. And so it would be if no one were interested in preventing you. But in this case many persons were interested in preventing Mr. Vanderbilt from obtaining possession of the Erie road. In the first place, Mr. Daniel Drew, one of the officers of the road, was violently opposed to it. Mr. Drew is, like Mr. Vanderbilt, a gentleman of great ability, shrewdness, experience, and reputed wealth. He is believed to be the largest owner of Erie shares, and has the not over-enviable reputation of having made a fortune by his connection with the line, less through his administration of the road than by his speculations in the stock. Mr. Drew is also believed to be largely interested in some of the Western lines terminating at Buffalo, whose interests are naturally opposed to seeing all their connections with New York concentrated in one hand strong enough to dictate terms to them all. For these reasons Mr. Drew's opposition to Mr. Vanderbilt's scheme assumed from the outset the character of open war, fare. Many unprejudiced New York merchants and powerful Western railroad corporations are ranged on his side, fighting against the scheme of a gigantic monopoly which, destroying all competition, would have it in its power to dictate its own terms and its own price for every piece of freight and for every passenger passing between New York and almost the entire West. All those who suffered in purse, pride, or position by Mr. Vanderbilt's earlier successes (a large and influential number), are likewise in Mr. Drew's camp; while, on the other hand, many old shareholders of Erie, who think that their dividends would have been larger if Mr. Drew had not controlled the road, would be glad to see him ousted from the management, and the same reforms introduced on this road that have advanced the fortunes of Harlem, Hudson River, and New York Central. These are, therefore, fighting on Mr. Vanderbilt's side. Each party has its army of adherents among the brokers, bankers, money-lenders, and speculators, all interested in the success of their party, and thus almost all Wall Street is divided into two hostile camps, respectively commanded by Drew and Vanderbilt.

To make what follows intelligible to persons not familiar with stock operations, it is necessary to explain that even the great wealth of Mr. Vanderbilt and of his numerous rich friends is scarcely great enough to enable him and them to buy outright and pay for the majority of the stock of these different railroad companies, whose united capital exceeds the enormous sum of eighty millions of dollars. Whenever, therefore, any amount of shares has been bought and paid for, they are immediately used as security for loans of further sums of money from banks and other money-lenders, to be employed in purchasing fresh shares, which are again in their turn used as security for still further loans to buy still more shares with. This is not the precise form in which the operation is carried on in Wall Street, but the practical result is as described. Now, when a banker down-town lends money on the security of railroad or other shares, he does not lend anything like the full value of the shares as they sell in the market; on the contrary, if a share of Erie is selling for sixty dollars, a banker will not advance more than forty or forty-five dollars upon it; and if, after he has advanced forty-five dollars upon it, the market price should decline to fifty dollars, he will immediately call in the whole of his loan, or insist upon the borrower's returning him a sufficient part of it to leave the remainder at a figure still much below the market value of the shares which he holds as security. In this way it is easy to see that Mr. Vanderbilt and his friends had to use each lot of Erie shares that they bought as security for loans to buy more shares with, and that the higher the market price of Erie shares, the more money they could borrow upon them and the more fresh shares they could buy. It became thus the interest of the Vanderbilt party to advance, or at least to maintain, the market price of Erie shares. It is equally easy to see not only that, the lower the price of Erie shares, the less money could they borrow on them and the fewer fresh shares could they buy, but also that if the shares went very low, the money borrowed upon them would have to be all returned, and probably the shares themselves sold in the market to repay the loans. Mr. Drew's object is to prevent Mr. Vanderbilt from buying the Erie shares; the lower they sell and the more difficult it is to borrow money on them, the less Mr. Vanderbilt can buy them. Mr. Drew's interest, consequently, is to depress the price of Erie shares and to make money as scarce as possible. It is principally through his success in accomplishing the latter part of his object that the quarrel has acquired so great a notoriety, and is watched with so general and widespread an interest.

Leaving aside details not easily explained within the compass of a newspaper article, the course of the war has been as follows: In order to depress the price of Erie shares, Mr. Drew and his fellow-directors (placed in that position to guard, protect, improve, and increase the value of the property under their care) suddenly, mysteriously, and, it is said, illegally, issued ten millions of dollars of new shares of the Erie Company, and caused them to be sold in the market, producing a sudden over-supply of the shares, depressing the price very materially, causing many frightened holders to sell out, possessing themselves or the company of a very large sum of ready money, and enabling themselves and their friends to buy large numbers of shares at a very low figure. Mr. Vanderbilt and his friends were supposed to have bought at the high prices, and consequently would find it difficult to borrow money on the shares after the heavy fall. But in order to make sure that it would be difficult if not impossible for them to borrow money on Erie or any other shares, other measures were resorted to. Not only, it is said, was all the money borrowed in advance that the Drew party could procure, so as to prevent the Vanderbilt men from borrowing it, but the money obtained from the sale of the ten millions of new stock was, it is said, placed in the Tenth National and other banks in the form of a special deposit, which prevented the banks from using it, as they do all other deposits, to relieve the wants of other borrowers. The issue of new stock was so evidently a measure of doubtful legality that, upon application of some of the old stockholders, an injunction was immediately issued by one of the courts of the city to restrain the directors from issuing further shares, and from using the money obtained from their sale for any of the purposes for which it was pretended to be required, and appointing a receiver to take possession of the road and its property. Then followed what it is scarcely an exaggeration to describe as one of the most disgraceful prostitutions of legal forms ever witnessed, more like the tricks of the noisome creatures that infest the petty police courts, and that plead for prostitutes and thieves, than what should be expected of gentlemen engaged in obtaining or defending their rights in a civil suit in a court of equity in a civilized community. The spectacle was witnessed of half a dozen judges at one and the same time issuing attachments and injunctions against plaintiffs and defendants and against one another; lawyers and judges called out of their beds in the middle of the night, and respectable gentlemen waylaid in the street or hustled into their own doors to serve warrants and attachments upon them; men heretofore considered of good standing and average character evading the laws of the State by stealing away like thieves into a neighboring State, carrying with them millions of money which they hold in trust, if by any honest title; and, again, organized marauding expeditions sent after them in the hope of bringing them back by illegal violence, in order to make them amenable to legal prosecution in this State. It is difficult to state without indignation what an amount of depravity has been developed by these quarrels, but still more difficult to understand or even conceive the dense moral apathy, indifference, nay, the ghastly relish even, with which so much wickedness is generally regarded.

Mr. Drew, and some of his fellow-directors, finding that the Courts of this State were not likely to sanction all his actions, nor leave him his personal freedom, has exiled himself and all the movable property of the Erie road to Jersey City, where, under the protection of a large body of special policemen, he is directing the management of the road, and is applying to the New Jersey Legislature for a charter to make the Erie road a New Jersey corporation, and remove it from the rightful control of the New York State Courts, while, with an assurance almost incredible and a contemptuousness almost undeserved, he is at the very same time trying to obtain from the New York Legislature an act to legalize the illegal issue of new shares. Incredible as it may seem, the prospect at present is that he will succeed in both these schemes. Verily we live in strange times.

THE JERSEY RAILROAD AND THE DWIGHT ACCIDENT.

We published in October, 1866, some severe comments on the way in which the New Jersey Railroad Company regulated, or rather did not regulate, the starting of its trains, apropos of the death of Mr. Theodore Dwight and the treatment received by his daughter, Mrs. Kennedy, when she attempted to leave the train after the accident to her father. A Mr. Rostine Parker, who is a conductor on the road, and was conductor of the train in which the accident occurred, but who was not present at the accident and knew nothing of it till after it was over, took it into his head that our language applied to him, and refusing to seek or accept either explanation or apology, commenced a suit against the Nation for $10,000 damages, with the approbation of his superiors, as we were given to understand, with the view of "making an example" that would cause New York newspapers to be more careful how they spoke of the corporation in question. The case was tried on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of last week, and after hearing all that two conductors, one brakeman, two baggage-masters, and one lantern-boy had to say, besides a scathing exposure by the plaintiff's counsel of the malignity with which the writers for this journal plotted against the mental peace of the Jersey railroad officials, the jury gave a verdict for the defendants after about three minutes' consultation. With this brief mention of our own share in this matter—which is, after all, of no great importance to the public—we take the liberty, by way of completing the picture which the Dwight case afforded of the management of the road, of laying before our readers the fresh information about it afforded by the testimony of the employees of the road in the suit against the Nation, and which was presented to the jury with admirable clearness and force by Judge Slosson, the defendants' counsel. Here we are on firm ground—not hearsay or rumor, but the sworn evidence of the immaculate officials themselves:

1. They swore, in the first place, that there is on the Jersey railroad no code of rules, either written or unwritten, for the regulation of the conduct of employees; that everything connected with the starting of the trains is fixed by "custom," but who fixes the custom does not appear. Each official receives special oral instructions from his superior officer as to what he is to do, but he keeps this tightly locked up in his own breast, so that no third person, and especially no passenger, can ever tell whether he is neglecting his duty or not. For instance, there is no rule as to the warning to be given when trains are started. The only signal given passengers is the call of "All aboard!" by the conductor, but there is no rule as to the number of times or tone of voice in which he shall repeat it. On the evening on which Mr. Dwight was killed, Conductor Parker called "All aboard!" either twice or three times while traversing a platform five hundred feet long, but it was proved that it was not heard in the sleeping-car, and their not hearing it was the subject of comment or complaint by the passengers, showing either that the noise was very great or Conductor Parker's voice very low; in either case the corporation stands condemned. It is their business to make people hear, and not to leave such a matter—involving, as the Dwight case showed, life or death—to the discretion or lungs of one not very careful or thoughtful man.

2. Why do we pronounce him not very careful or thoughtful? Because he swore on the trial that when the rope was first pulled and the train stopped for Mrs. Kennedy to get off, he was in the foremost car of a train of ten, "having a difficulty with a passenger" about his fare; that he "supposed" the rope had been pulled by one of his own men, who had heard him say the passenger should get off if he did not pay his fare; but without enquiry, without having the least knowledge of the reason for which, or the person by whom, the train was stopped, he pulled the rope and started it again. There might have been a man caught in the wheels, away in the rear, for aught he could tell, and the second pull might have smashed him at once.

3. How many persons do the public suppose the Jersey Railroad Company sent in charge of a train of ten cars, containing about 1,000 passengers—a night train, too, and their principal train, going through to Washington—on the night on which Mr. Dwight was killed? One conductor and two brakemen. This is the sworn testimony of the conductor and brakemen. There was thus one brakeman to every five cars. If any accident had happened, and one had been sent back to "flag" the following trains, there would have remained in charge of the whole machine Mr. Conductor Parker and one brakeman. This subtracting process is a simple one, but it may not occur to some of our readers to make it.

4. Mr. Dwight having been thrown down and fatally injured, and his daughter, with her infant in her arms, having been informed of the fact, while the train was running slowly from the station, she begged in her agony to be let off, so as to go back to her father or his remains. The request was one which one would think would not be denied to a human being in a civilized country. But it was denied to her. The brakeman swore on the trial "he had no right" to stop the train, even under such horrible circumstances, without the conductor's permission—the conductor being nine cars away, and it being entirely optional with the brakeman whether he should seek him for the purpose of getting permission or not. So that Mrs. Kennedy would have been carried on in the night, in this state of mind, if there had not happened to be on board, in one of the rear cars, a conductor of the line going to Philadelphia on furlough. He took the responsibility of pulling the rope once more, and the unhappy woman was set down on the track, with her infant, her little boy, and her carpet-bag, and left to find her way back to the station.

5. The brakeman swore he helped her down "as carefully as if she had been his own mother." The defendant, however, had her evidence taken on commission in Virginia, where she is now living, in which she repeats the statement published in the papers at the time of the accident, that the brakeman behaved very roughly to her, swore at her, and told her to get off quick or he would start the train; that her bag was thrown down to her, and she was told, by way of quieting her nerves, we suppose, "to look out for the down train," another train being on the point of starting from the station. Now, we do not know which of these stories the jury believed; we only know that they found for the defendants almost without consultation. We believe Mrs. Kennedy's; and we believe the suggestion made by the plaintiff's counsel on the trial, that her story was due to her excitement, to be simply absurd. When a woman is in great distress she does not naturally fancy that a man who is treating her "as if she was his mother," is swearing at her and behaving like a brute to her. Considering, too, that Mrs. Kennedy is a woman of education and refinement, an attempt to ascribe her account of this transaction to either excitement or bad faith only makes this shocking affair more shocking.

6. The reason why the officials of the train were in such a hurry that they could not stop to let a woman go back to her father's corpse, and why they could not spare a man to accompany her along the track to the station, and at least carry her bag while she carried her infant, and save her from being herself run over, was that the train started six minutes late, and that another train was to start behind them within a few minutes more. Upon this arrangement we offer no comment. The whole affair is about the most disgraceful and repulsive to be found even in railroad annals, and it was made more so by the fact that an official, who has been in the service of this soft-hearted corporation for eleven years, and who, doubtless, did not think Mrs. Kennedy has had much, if anything, to complain of, has had the effrontery to come over here to ask a jury to award him $10,000 for the "wound to his feelings" (his own evidence was actually offered on this point but ruled out) caused by comments on the affair, in which his name was not mentioned, by persons who had never heard of him—he not having been present or anywhere near when the accident occurred—having been applied to him by some passengers and one or two anonymous correspondents.

The New York Times and Springfield Republican, in commenting on the trial, have been led, doubtless by the shortness of the report which appeared in the daily papers, into a misapprehension, which does some injustice to Judge Garvin, who tried the case. The case really did not turn on whether the article was libellous or not, inasmuch as the plaintiff had no difficulty in proving that, if written of him, it was untrue; if untrue, it was clearly libellous, applied to anybody. The whole of the circumstances were presented to the jury; but the point the judge asked them to decide—Was Parker the man who was meant by the article?—was really the only one they needed to decide. His charge was, in fact, perfectly unexceptionable, and was not excepted to, and was perhaps, on the whole, more favorable to the defendant than the plaintiff. Had the person, whoever he may be, to whom our remarks really applied, come forward and charged us with libelling him, then the question of their libellousness would have come up; and could we have shown their truth, as we know we could, we have no doubt the judge would have told the jury to consider in this, a civil action—as they are obliged under the State constitution to consider in criminal prosecutions, and as the legislation of Massachusetts, we believe, as well as of many other States, obliges juries to consider in all cases whatever—whether the alleged libel had been written "with good motives and for laudable ends;" and as long as juries have to make this enquiry in libel cases, we have no fear that the liberty of criticism will ever seriously suffer.

PHOTOGRAPHY IN POLITICS.

It was a little surprising when all of a sudden lately Mr. Chase began to be talked about as a possible Democratic President. Not by one set of people only, but by various kinds of people of both parties. They were of various kinds, but this characteristic they all have in common, that they are not persons with a marked talent for forecasting history. And Mr. Chase's immediate friends might well enough say, as we suppose, that their knowledge of biography is inadequate. And most people would say that their acquaintance with the history of parties in this country seems to be not a familiar or comprehensive one. However, it is by the way merely that we speak of these things; our business now is not with them, nor with the likelihood of Mr. Chase's receiving this or that nomination, nor with his real qualifications for office; we are simply about to say a word or two on a certain "element of availability" which the recent mention of his name suggested to an ingenious writer in one of the daily papers—the Sun. Enumerating the Chief-Justice's strong points as a candidate, the writer refers to the generally-admitted fact that Mr. Chase is a handsome man—a man of fine features, of commanding stature, and of dignified port and presence.

No one will deny, we suppose, the correctness of the assumption at the bottom of this remark—namely, that valid claims to admiration on the score of personal appearance are to men in general pretty powerful reasons for conferring on their possessor places of trust and honor. And whether the writer is far wrong in granting to Mr. Chase this qualification for conciliating the regard of voters, every one may easily see; for the greenbacks of the commonest kind, the one-dollar bills which are in the hands of legal voters universally throughout the country, have on their face Mr. Chase's portrait very well executed.

The statement of this fact leads naturally to the idea which struck us most forcibly in reading the article in the Sun—that in this country the advantages which a handsome candidate—or rather, let us say, a candidate of pleasing or impressive appearance—has over his competitors are much greater to-day than they could have been before the invention of railroads, and almost infinitely greater than they could have been before the invention of photography. The men of the last generation, as they were growing to maturity, had something like a politically valuable idea—an idea valuable as regards campaign purposes—of the personal appearance of the men who founded the republic and the great political parties. As boys they had learned to know the air and shape and countenance and dress of Washington, of John Adams, of Jefferson, of Hamilton, of Monroe and the other original Republicans and Federalists and Democrats and Whigs; for by that time their portraits had been transferred from canvas to the school-geography and history, to every tavern-wall where a framed copy of the Declaration or the Constitution was hung, and to nearly every parlor that boasted an engraving. Of course the idea was far enough, in most cases, from being a true one. Doubtless the painted Washington on the right hand as you enter Harvard Hall, which Josiah Quincy praised as an accurate likeness, is an astonishing rather than a pleasing sight to every young man who before seeing it knew the Father of his Country only from lithographs, or Mr. Bancroft's writings, or the wood cuts at the foot of maps of the United States. But true or not, a very well-defined idea of the faces and figures of the great leaders of their respective parties existed in the minds of our fathers, and no doubt sensibly affected their political faith. As regards their own contemporaries, the case must have been very different. For example, in 1835 Martin Van Buren had not reached the apotheosis of the school-book or the wall-map; Daguerre had not been heard of; illustrated papers were of small circulation, as newspapers without railroads must be; and most of the men who voted for him in the November of that year must have been in ignorance on the question whether Mr. Van Buren was beautiful, or tolerably good-looking, or positively ill-looking. Despite our better illustrated papers and the more plentiful caricatures, the same thing was, to a great extent, true ten or twelve years afterwards, when he was voted for again, and what was true of him was generally true.

The best chance that a public man in those days of oil paintings and no steam had to make himself personally known to his fellow-citizens, was to go upon an occasional tour through the country and deliver addresses—a means of reaching them which obviously must have been very inadequate. A journey from Washington through Philadelphia and New York, with a "banquet," as they used to say, and orations in some of the larger towns, a council with the sachems of Tammany, and a reception of the doctor's degree at Cambridge, was an affair of several weeks' duration, and in all that time the great man was very likely seen by no one who lived more than twenty-five miles from the stage-road over which he made his progress.

It seems, then, as if it must necessarily have happened in those ante-commuting times, times when the best substitute for the pictorial paper was the ill-printed, shockingly illustrated "campaign life," that only a small number of the constituents of a public man holding a national office could have any very vivid idea of how he looked and bore himself, and who could make his face and figure auxiliary to criticism of his public course. Nowadays this is wholly changed. It is little to say that it takes but a few days for a political personage to "swing round the circle" from Washington to Cleveland, and through St. Louis back again, addressing at each station crowds who could travel as far between their breakfast hour and dinner as Andrew Jackson's constituents could travel in a week; that the noted man from Nevada or Wisconsin or California can be put before the country voter in New Hampshire or Connecticut; that railroads cover the land with newspapers. Photography is the more potent agent. It makes familiar, as soon as his name is talked about, the face of every man, however obscurely illustrious, to everybody who cares to look at it. Now, to serve one's country is to have one's picture in shop-windows from Eastport to San Francisco. More voters know Andrew Johnson's features than can read his messages or the reports of his trial, and there is not a foreign potentate or statesman or artist or author or actor or person of any distinction of any sort of whom the poorest man may not now own a better portrait than hundreds or thousands of dollars, paid to genius, would have enabled one to buy a quarter of a century ago.

That thus we are furnished with a very valuable aid to the right judgment of the books or speeches or acts—the works and characters, in short—of the men whom we have to understand as well as we can and criticise, is, of course, beyond question. How precisely, for example, the shrieking face, so to speak, which Ruskin shows in the later photographs, would serve as a frontispiece for his essays on political economy. The most unskilled of students could hardly be much misled by the text of those productions if it were prefaced by that portrait. Another striking example occurs to us, as having lately fallen under our observation, which may properly enough be used, although photography has nothing to do with it: The ordinary pictures of Milton present us with the face of the highly-idealized Puritan of genius. A better picture than the ordinary one, a picture known to all collectors of Miltoniana, while it seems to leave nothing unexplained, explains fully certain passages of the "Paradise Lost," and sheds light not to be despised on such of the prose writings as the poet's admirers are generally silent about. Again, how unjust it is felt to be to charge the extreme urbanity of Clay's manners to a shrewd calculation of the value of urbanity to a Presidential candidate, when one looks at his features and sees that evidently suavity and tact were inbred in him, and that having been born he could not but be courteous and bland. And what man, in the days when we were all believing General McClellan a heaven-born genius, did not feel that his faith had received a severe shock when he first looked at a likeness of him? No one, we fancy, of much discrimination in such matters. Not exactly that it prophesied Harrison's Landing, but it certainly prophesied neither Appomattox nor Atlanta. Then, who that has read Newman's and Mr. Kingsley's controversy does not find in a glance at the portraits of the two men an efficient aid to a righteous determination of their dispute—Newman's face, as full of culture and of a curious mingling of boldness and cautiousness as Emerson's, which it somewhat resembles; Mr. Kingsley's, suggestive of uneasy self-consciousness mainly, and of some other traits not more pleasing. Finally, there is that powerful head of Swift—in Lord Orrery's book we believe it is—which, it has always seemed to us, ought alone to have been enough to prevent Thackeray's taking up with so singularly inadequate a solution of Swift's character as we get in the "English Humorists."

We do no more than cite a few instances at haphazard; there is, of course, no end to the instances that might be cited; but this every one has often done for himself. It seems plain enough that the photograph may be made to play a very useful part in political as well as in other criticism; that, as plainly, its part is going to be—indeed now is—a prominent one; and further, that, by means of it, whatever advantage a handsome candidate may have over an ugly one has been immensely enhanced, and is almost sure to be greater hereafter than it is now even. For the art is constantly improving. As it is to-day, the gulf between beauty and homeliness is not shown in its full dimensions by the contemporary photograph. Antinous's carte would exhibit no more of "Antinous's easy sway" than Soame Jenyns's would, if one of the common run of photographers were to get the head of each fixed in his clamp, and one eye of each fastened "about here" on a wall, and the chin of each, if Mr. Jenyns had a chin, pressed well into the throat, and the elbows of each disposed at an angle invented, we believe, by M. Daguerre in the rudest days of the art. By-and-by, whatever of gracefulness may belong to a sitter will be accurately caught by the operator. And so of coloring also. It will not be very long before the colors of life will be reproduced with exactness in the counterfeit presentment, and we who possess delicately clear complexions will no longer find ourselves put on a mortifying level of shiny white, or some shade of purple, or some hand-made modification of brick-red, along with gentlemen and ladies of all kinds of poor skins—perhaps along with babes in arms whom we know to be mottled. Great advances have already been made as regards both these things, young as the whole business is, and, beyond a doubt, greater advances are to come, until soon photography shall be actually realistic.

What change all this will effect in the lives and in the interrelations of politicians, might be a matter worthy of study.

NATIONAL REPUDIATION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Dear Sir: In order, as I said, to follow the repudiators upon their own ground, we must admit that honor and honesty, faith and truth, are mere "abstractions," unworthy the regard of practical men. The duty of a government to set its citizens an example of good faith must be considered a formula of transcendental ethics beyond the conception even of those who hold that the same government is bound to regulate a citizen's diet and prescribe the market in which he shall buy and sell. The good name of the country abroad is worth nothing; for things outside of us have no more value than things behind us. We have only to enquire, Will repudiation pay, in the most literal sense? Will it be materially profitable to the country?

The first and most obvious argument in the negative is, that it would render impossible or next to impossible the negotiation of future loans, should any emergency arise requiring them. And this argument must not be lightly dismissed as trite or commonplace. There is more in it than meets the eye at first. Suppose any domestic difficulty to occur again, the failure to raise money would ensure the breaking-up of the Federal Government precisely in the way that its enemies, domestic and foreign, have always wished. The secessionist leaders did not insist upon war. On the contrary, many of them expected that no war would take place; and even those who hoped (as I shall always believe that some of them did) for the absorption of the North, or a portion of it, into their new confederacy, were quite willing that the process should take place peaceably. Nor did the Western Europeans desire hostilities that must interrupt their commerce; they would have preferred that their young rival's ruin should be accomplished in some way less troublesome to them. Southern conspirators in the cabinet disarmed our soldiers, sent away our fleets, and so on, in order to disable the Government from making war. Could they have prevented it from borrowing money, their success would have been complete. And this is the position in which any future conspiracy will find the Government after repudiation.

Which is bad enough, but is not all. For at the same time we shall have weakened the patriotic ardor, and therefore the martial efficiency, of a portion of the community. I suppose no man, whatever his political opinions, will deny that there is just now a good deal of discontent and disaffection at the South, and that, consequently, the Southerners would be a less efficient aid to the Government in case of war than the same number of Northerners. Not that we should have to fear any insurrection on their part, but they would be much less earnest and sympathetic in the struggle. What is the cause of this Southern discontent? A feeling of injury. Whether it be justly or unjustly founded is nothing to the purpose, since all such considerations have been by our hypothesis set aside. We have only to note the fact that a feeling of resentment, arising from what they consider injury, impairs their loyalty. Now, something of the same kind would happen to our holders of more or less repudiated bonds in case of a war, especially a civil one. I confess that my own feelings would be very much modified from what they were in 1861. I should say to myself, "When a government not only fails in, but deliberately violates one of, its three fundamental duties (the protection of life, liberty, and property) it has outlived just one-third of its usefulness, and a change might improve it." Possibly my whole theory of government is wrong; possibly my feelings would neither be philosophic nor Christian; I repeat it, we have nothing to do with such "abstract" considerations. The fact is that these or analogous feelings would influence me and nearly all the native bondholders. As to the foreigners, repudiation evidently transforms them at once from friends to enemies.

Perhaps, however, we may here be met with the old Highland answer, "It's a far cry to Loch Awe!" We are so sure that England can't be kicked into a war (just as sure as the Emperor Nicholas was fifteen years ago), and the South is so remarkably well disposed toward the Government, and altogether everything is so quiet all over the world, that any apprehension of war for the next generation or two may be scouted as chimerical. Let us then proceed to another argument.

It is urged that some modified form of repudiation is necessary to relieve national industry. Would it have that effect? Or if there were fewer taxes to pay, might there not also be less to pay them with?

I pass over the probability that there would be much more concealment than formerly in income tax returns (men arguing that, as the Government did not keep faith with them, they were not bound to keep faith with it), since this applies to only a small portion of the bondholders. But there is one consideration applicable to them all, the diminution of their purchasing or consuming power caused by the confiscation of their property. I lose twenty per cent. of my capital; my fellow-bondholder, A., loses ten per cent. of his; B., thirty per cent. of his, and so on. By just so much is diminished our power of purchasing comforts and luxuries, whether articles of foreign production, which contribute directly to the national revenue, or articles of home production, which, under the new system, we may suppose free of excise. There is a partial redistribution of property at the expense of the bondholder, but the national wealth is not increased on the whole. If the cost of production is diminished, so also is the demand, until prices sink to meet it.

Again, putting aside the pecuniary loss of the bondholders, the mere annihilation of a favorite investment must produce much business derangement. Nor, supposing that the West forces repudiation on the East, will the commercial relations of the two sections run the more smoothly for it. The repudiators profess to think that the removal of the debt would lift off all impediments from industry and render business elastic. But might it not have just the contrary effect by frightening capitalists, impeding enterprise, and exciting a general feeling of distrust and insecurity?

Of course the foreign bondholders are not in this category. But is there no set-off in their case? I think there is. That foreign immigration is a material and physical aid to us (once more I must repeat that other than material considerations are set aside) will be universally admitted. Now, repudiation will naturally make us unpopular in the countries where many of our bonds are owned (Germany, for instance), and consequently will diminish the emigration from those countries.

Unfortunately it often happens that an excited partisan is as indifferent to the "vulgar interests" of commerce and finance as a European emperor. To a certain class of politicians (and would they were only to be found in the West!) the prosperity of the country means neither more nor less than the retention of the Republican party in office. That object warrants any sacrifice. What then if advocacy of repudiation should prove one of the surest means of precipitating that party's downfall?

Here, however, a momentary difficulty confronts us. We have started with setting aside all "abstractions," yet we shall now be compelled to speak of principles and moral ideas. There is, however, no contradiction, though there may be an apparent paradox. When I shall use the above words it will not be with the assumption that they represent any actual existences or possess any positive objective signification. They may have no more real meaning than the word "honesty" in the mouth of a repudiator. They may be the merest incarnations of humbug or Barnumbug. I shall merely assume (what indeed could scarcely be denied by any sane man) that certain conventional notions, which we call "principle," "morality," etc., are moving forces and act upon men's minds and influence their actions under certain conditions.

The Democratic party exists, and has for some time existed, chiefly by virtue of its admirable organization. Whatever principles it once possessed it had outlived long before the war, save only devotion to slavery, and when slavery was killed, many of us not unnaturally supposed that the Democratic party was dead too and only waiting to be decently buried. Yet here it is again nearly as vivacious and vigorous as ever. The Republican party has not, and never will have, this organization. It was founded on principles and moral ideas, and cannot afford to part with them. Even its queerest aberrations in different spots—prohibition here, unlimited negro suffrage there—were certainly not dictated by mere considerations of expediency.

The proverb, "Never be dishonest with a rogue," is susceptible of a wider application than the literal one. As a general rule, a virtuous man does not succeed in the practices of a vicious man when he adopts them. (I mean, of course, that a man possessing those qualities of character which we agree to call virtues until Mr. Swinburne or some of his school may succeed in finding a more accurate and satisfactory name for them, is not adapted to succeed in the pursuits of the man possessing certain other qualities which we conventionally call vices.) When, for instance, a Joseph is tempted by change of fortune or locality or any other circumstance to essay the rôle of Don Juan, what a fool he makes of himself and how the women laugh at him! So the Republicans cannot succeed in using Democratic arts and wielding Democratic weapons. During the war everything went wrong with them while they temporized, and it was only by carrying out their original principles that they finally succeeded. Those of them who are silly enough to-day to toady the Fenians never get any Irish votes by it any more than the New York Whigs who were silly enough to toady John Hughes used to get Irish votes in the old time. And they will win no Democratic votes in the West by advocating repudiation, but they will disgust many Republicans in the East. Then the Eastern Democrats, wise in their generation, will persuade numbers of these disgusted ones that their only chance is with the Democratic party, the true guardian of the public credit as well as of the Constitution. (If any one wants to see how plausibly this can be done, let him read the World.) Unless the Republicans can keep their place without repudiation, repudiation will not save them; the Democrats will only come in by a larger majority for it, laughing heartily at the men who put into their opponents' hands the broom with which to sweep themselves out.

Disraeli once said of Sir Robert Peel, that he had found the Whigs bathing and walked off with their clothes. Something of the same kind seems likely to happen now among ourselves; but we may be sure that the old Democratic clothes will not fit the Republican party half so well as its own raiment, manufactured though that be by Laputan tailors on mathematical and "abstract" principles, which "practical" men despise.

Repudiation in any form, total or partial, will not make the country richer; it will not make it stronger in case of foreign or domestic war; it will not relieve or encourage industry; it will not keep the Republican party in power. Where then is its expediency? C. A. BRISTED.

THE BOWDOIN PICTURES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

A friend has forwarded me a copy of the Nation of the 16th ult., containing a notice of the Bowdoin College Gallery of paintings. Allow me to add a word.

That collection was left to the college by the Honorable James Bowdoin at his death, 1811—not given during his lifetime. An unfortunate consequence was that it came without a catalogue, or, at least, with only a list of the names of the paintings. They were collected by Mr. Bowdoin during his service as United States Minister at the court of Spain, and consist chiefly of pictures of the Spanish and Dutch schools. A goodly number are certainly masterpieces, whether the hands from which they came can be verified or not. This is the frequent testimony of artists and connoisseurs, especially of Gilbert Stuart, who visited the gallery more than once, I think, to copy his own pictures of Monroe and Jefferson, which he considered best efforts, and after them preferred to copy than to attempt originals again of the same subjects. Some authors quite certainly ascertained—their names having been deciphered on the pictures or frames—are Snyders, Hondekoeter, Berghem, Salviati, Stella, Wouvermanns (Philip or Peter), and, if memory serves me rightly, Paul Potter. Beside these are the Copley and two Stuarts. Of those attributed to Rubens—and the fact of a Snyders lends probability to a Rubens—the first and chief is the "St. Simeon and Child Jesus," a better than which, it seems to me, does not exist from Rubens's hand in the gallery of the Royal Museum in this city. The "Ceres Presenting Gifts of Fruit to Venus" is certainly Rubens's style. Its companion, "Danaë and the Golden Shower," because it was not thought suitable for exhibition, was unfortunately ordered to be sold by the trustees of the college some years since, and was purchased by an artist in your city for the sum of $600, in whose studio, I understand, it now is held at the price of $3,000 or thereabouts. One of the noblest pictures of the collection is "The Delivery of Peter from Prison," thought by Stuart to be, like "The Continence of Scipio," another of the gems by Nicolas Poussin. It is bold for a mere tyro in art-criticism to differ from the great artist, but I cannot, from what I have seen of Poussin, think so. I cannot detect his style. There is a picture in the gallery of the Royal Museum here, same subject, by Houthorst, of the Netherlands school. In boldness and grandeur of conception it is not to be compared with the Bowdoin picture, but in peculiar tone and color it is precisely the same. I cannot help saying to myself, if Houthorst had been equal to the conception of the picture it were certainly his. Another Bowdoin picture, senselessly styled "The Irish Wake," resembles very much the work of Van Steenwyk the younger as he is represented in the gallery here. It is a beautiful bit of interior architecture by candlelight.

It is proposed at Brunswick, and ought to have been done before this, to gather all that can be ascertained about the pictures, both from themselves and from those persons—connections of the Bowdoin family or otherwise—who may know anything about them. Meanwhile, whether much or little is true concerning them, it is highly desirable that they be visited by artists and art-critics, and put to the test of the strictest scrutiny.

TRUMBULL'S M'FINGAL.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In the Nation for Feb. 20 you say: "Still, as a part of the literature of the country, it is necessary to take account of Trumbull's 'M'Fingal;'" and, further, you say, in substance, that some familiar quotations from his "M'Fingal" will keep his name alive, and be attributed to Butler.

It seems to me that his name would be better kept alive, and justice to both parties be preserved, by rescuing a few of the familiar quotations from the English author and giving them to the American. Can you give me space to record three or four of these from "M'Fingal?"

The hero is represented as being remarkably able and loud in town-meeting speeches, but

> "So much injured more his side,
> The stronger arg'ments he apply'd;
> As old war elephants dismay'd,
> Trode down the troops they came to aid;
> And h rt their o n side more in battle,
> Than less and ordinary cattle."

And again:

> "As some muskets so contrive it,
> As oft to miss the mark they drive at;
> And though well aimed at duck or plover,
> Bear wide and kick their owners over."

It was another peculiar feature in the character of M'Fingal, that he inherited from his Scottish ancestors the gift of second sight:

> "Nor only saw he all that was,
> But much that never came to pass;
> Whereby old prophets far outwent he,
> Though former days produced a plenty;
> For any man with half an eye,
> What is before him may espy;
> But optics sharp it needs, I ween,
> To see what is not to be seen."

J. C. M.

[In saying what we said we referred more particularly to one quotation from M'Fingal which is commonly attributed to Butler:

> "No man e'er felt the halter draw
> With good opinion of the law."

The couplet may be found in the Third Canto of M'Fingal, and is better known than any of the rest of the poem.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Roberts Brothers announce a volume of essays by A. Bronson Alcott. It is to be called "Tablets." Other works to be issued by the same house are a novel entitled "The Pretty Widow," by C. H. Ross; "The Earthly Paradise," by the author of "Jason;" "The Little Bohemian," a translation from the French of Sauvage, with designs by Frolich; and "The Voyage of Mademoiselle Lile Round the World," with designs by the same hand.——The Dutch novel, of which we spoke the other week as the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of the Netherlands, which exposes the horrid cruelties of the Dutch in the East Indies, "Max Havelaar," is to be published, that is, the English translation of it is to be republished by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. Another republication by this firm is "Discipline, and other Sermons," by Charles Kingsley. And they add to their set of Swedenborg's works "Angelic Wisdom concerning Divine Providence."——The Catholic Publication Society will publish in addition to their books mentioned last week a new edition of J. A. Moehler's very well-known work on "Symbolism," B. A. Robertson, translator. The work has long been only obtainable on payment of too high a price.——Virtue & Yorston will issue a translation by R. M. Phillimore of Bishop Dupanloup's "Studious Women," and of Juvenal's "Satires," by T. H. S. Escott. Other announcements by Virtue & Yorston are of Mr. Staunton's "Great Schools of England;" of Edgar H. Rand's "Dates and Events;" of two novels, "True of Heart," and "All for Greed;" and of Andrew Steinmetz's "Philosophical and Other Instruments," etc.——Among Carleton's announcements we see named a new novel by Mr. John Esten Cooke with the title of "Fairfax."——Myers & Chandler to their announcements of legal works add "Equia, a tale of Modern Rome," and the "American Stud Book," by Mr. S. D. Bruce.

—It will be recollected that some weeks ago a meeting was held in this city to consider the subject of an international copyright law. A committee was then appointed, with Mr. George P. Putnam at the head of it, and Mr. James Parton as secretary. This committee now calls a second meeting, to be held in the rooms of the New York Historical Society on the evening of Thursday the 9th of April, and publishers, authors, artists, and other persons interested are invited to attend, and are further invited, in case they cannot be present in person, to write out their views upon the subject, and forward the papers to Mr. Putnam at the address named above. The committee also put forth this memorial to Congress:

"We, the undersigned, concerned in the production, manufacture, and sale of books, periodicals, designs, and objects of art request the early attention of your honorable bodies to the subject of International Copyright. We respectfully solicit the passage of a bill such as, in the judgment of Congress, may best secure the rights of authors, artists, and designers to control and derive profit from the multiplication of copies of their works in countries other than their own."

To this memorial signatures are requested. The intending memorialist may address Mr. Putnam, and it is desired that, if he be an author, he should give the titles of his principal works. His address also should be sent with his signature.

—We have received advance-sheets of a "Catalogue of a Magnificent Private Library" which Mr. Bouton is on the point of publishing. It forms a handsome volume, excellently printed on thick paper, and the work of preparing it has evidently been done with more than ordinary pains. Errors, typographical and other, were occasionally discernible as we gave the catalogue a pretty careful perusal, but it deserves to be called one of our handsomest and best American books of its kind. It contains the title-pages of about a thousand separate lots, with appended descriptions and remarks, sometimes critical, but generally bibliographical merely. Of the collection itself we have once before spoken, but of course not in such a way that all the treasures which it includes were referred to. It is not amiss, then, to speak now of a few of them, for it will be a long time before book-buyers will find gathered together in one place so many of the gems which are the desire of the book-buyer. First we notice, as we go through the list, a Baskerville "Addison," a copy quite free from stains, in four royal octavo volumes. Its near neighbor is a copy of the most sumptuous of all the editions of "L'Imitation de Jésus Christ," silver clasped and mounted without, and within rich in containing not only "The Imitation" itself, but a history of illumination, and in being ornamented with specimens of illumination selected from three hundred of the best manuscripts of many countries. Three hundred dollars is demanded for it. We have mentioned before this, we believe, Béranger's own copy of his "Chansons," with the supplementary ones written in the author's hand. writing, and, together with his manuscript corrections of a previous edition, bound up with the printed poems. The work is in three duodecimo volumes, illustrated profusely, and is priced at a hundred and twenty dollars. "The Bible and Holy Scriptures, translated according to the Ebrue and Greke, and conferred with the best Translations in diuers Langages," is a perfect copy of the first edition of the "Breeches Bible." As being of this first and rarest edition—and splendid in new morocco—the price set on it is one hundred and seventy-five dollars. The Bible of bibliomaniacs—the complete works of Thomas Frognall Dibdin—is in the collection, and is here more complete and desirable than any ever offered for sale in America. For the fifty-seven volumes twenty-five hundred dollars are asked. "The 'Literary Reminiscences' (2 vols. imp. 8vo) is so scarce," says Mr. Bouton, "that a gentleman of this city has had an unlimited commission to purchase a copy in the hands of an agent in Europe for the last ten years which remains unexecuted to this day." Another lot consists of the complete works of Montesquieu, of La Fontaine, and of Racine, and the "Lettres écrites à un Provincial" of Pascal, twenty-two volumes in all, royal octavo, bound by Capé in crushed crimson levant, and very rich in hundreds of inserted plates—proofs, most of them, and most of them proofs before letters—the price of the set being five hundred and fifty dollars. We omit mention of many fine works in order to get in the names of the "Harleian Miscellany" ($160); "Chapman's Homer," complete, with all its frontispieces ($135); "Hollingshead's Chronicles," black-letter, a large copy of the edition of 1586-7, with the usually suppressed matter ($125); "Travels in North America" of Maximilian, Prince of Wied (translated), with a folio Atlas ($120); "Paradise Lost," first edition ($100); "Sir Thomas More's Works," black-letter edition of 1557 ($165); Nichols's "Literary Anecdotes" and "Literary History of the Eighteenth Century," together seventeen volumes ($175); "Memoires Complètes et Authentiques du Duc de Saint Simon," in twenty volumes, profusely illustrated ($450); "Don Quixote," translated by Mary Smirke, and so profusely illustrated with inserted plates and original drawings, the work of Westall (in water-colors), Smirke, and many more, that it is valued at $800. We close with the mention of a magnificent volume, "La Touraine, Histoire et Monuments," by Abbé J. J. Bouvasse. It was the contribution of Capé, the great binder, to the World's Fair of 1862, and as a specimen of binding it is worth a short journey to see it.

—The Galaxy, which Messrs. W. C. & F. P. Church have managed successfully since its first establishment, has been bought by Messrs. Sheldon & Co., and will hereafter be published in the name of that firm, although it will still remain in the editorial hands of the Messrs. Church. It is intended to make it one-half larger than it is at present, and two new departments will be added to it—namely, a department of literary criticism, in which American and foreign books will get attention, and a department in which will be discussed social and public topics of current interest. Each number is, moreover, to contain three or four full-page illustrations and some smaller ones, from designs by Hennessy, Winslow Homer, Gaston Fay, Henry Fenn, and others; and Mr. W. J. Linton will do a part of the engraving. The system of having articles signed will be adhered to, and the Galaxy will, as heretofore, shun party politics and sectarian theology.

—A very useful work for reference is Dr. Ludwig Hahn's "Two Years of Prussian-German Policy" ("Zwei Jahre preussisch-deutscher Politik. 1866-1867"), a work of upwards of six hundred pages, just published in Berlin. It attempts to exhibit the various steps in the progress of the Prussian Government towards the national aim, by the aid of official and semi-official documents of all sorts—speeches from the throne, and army orders, declarations of ministers, and the utterances of their organs. The first of the six chapters treats of the German crisis prior to the breaking out of the war, including the differences in regard to Schleswig-Holstein. Then follow the various events which resulted in the present Confederation, and the final chapter deals with the relations of Prussia and the North-German Bund to Southern Germany. The Weser Zeitung quotes from this compilation Count Eulenburg's explanation of the seeming inconsistency between Bismark's belief in a liberal form of government as being the most desirable, and his more or less despotic practice. "Only a wholly complete state," said the Prime Minister on one occasion, "can indulge in the luxury of a liberal government;" that is, in order to govern a state liberally, says Count Eulenburg, you must first have a state. Whatever, therefore, has seemed and may still seem arbitrary in Bismark's management, is to be attributed to his desire to make Germany "fertig"—ready for a purely constitutional government without apprehension from neighboring empires.

—With the exception of Count de Kératry's, the works relating to the Mexican Empire are noticeably weak and unsatisfactory. Of Continental publications the Countess Kollonitz's is most highly spoken of, both for the author's keenness of observation and for her literary style. Eduard Deutsch has published at Brünn a worthless panegyric on Maximilian under the title of "Recollections." A much longer and more pretentious work is that from the press of Hoffmann, at Stuttgart, "Authentische Enthüllungen über die letzten Ereignisse in Mexico" (Authentic disclosures concerning the final events of Maximilian's reign in Mexico), by Wilhelm von Montlong. It is divided into two parts, the first being a connected account of what happened after the fall of Matamoras; the second is composed of documents in Spanish and German, which have no other value than as showing that the withdrawal of the French left a great many of the inhabitants in a very uncomfortable position. The author tells some curious stories of the mode in which the French obtained the plebiscitum which was used to decoy Maximilian to the throne. Marshal Fazaine is charged with the secret order, supplementary to the October decree which he extorted from the Emperor, which decreed death to any Mexican who should be caught with arms; and he is also accused of having assured the Mexicans, in at least one instance, that Napoleon did not mean to force the imperial rule upon them—in proof of which he asked them to point out whom they would like for President. Von Montlong's testimony is discredited for several reasons, although what he says of the French may be perfectly true. In the first place, he was a protégé of Father Fisher, one of Maximilian's counsellors, who got him a position as captain on the staff of General Marquez; and as he accompanied that chief when despatched by the besieged Emperor from Queretaro, he could not have been an eye-witness of the very last scenes of the reign. His patron, moreover, it now appears, was sent by his parents when a boy to a house of reformation, from which he had to be discharged on account of his pre-eminent depravity, though that has not prevented his since becoming a good Jesuit; and intimacy with him seems to have contaminated von Montlong to such a degree that, as is alleged, the letters of Father Fisher and the Minister of the Interior which he prints as his authority for publishing this narrative, were given him (as their dates show) when he was employed in quite another sort of composition, and probably had no relation whatever to the present undertaking.

THE GERMAN SETTLERS OF NEW YORK.*

THE advance sheets of a portion of this work were noticed in the Nation of January 3d. It has now reached a second edition.

The emigration from Germany to this country was the fruit of the havoc made by thirty years of internecine and foreign war. It is told that the very heart of the ancient dominion was at one time infested by hordes of starving beggars who waylaid and murdered the traveller, not that they might rob him of his gold, but that they might devour his flesh. Even this was but a prelude to the systematic ruin of the country by Turenne, Melac, and Montclos, when, on grounds of political expediency, Heidelberg and Mannheim were consigned to the flames, and the French king was made infamous by the devastation of the Palatinate.

In all this there was reason enough for flight, yet, to the honor of the German people, the exodus did not ensue from material sufferings only, but received its final impulse from a higher motive. In the days of the Reformation, the Electors-Palatine, after embracing Lutheranism, and then reverting to the Church of Rome, had landed on the Reformed persuasion, proclaiming throughout these tergiversations the maxim, "cujus regio, ejus religio," as an argument for expecting their subjects to follow them in every change of conviction; but they had stopped short of persecution by actual violence. In 1685 the succession devolved once more upon a Catholic, and in 1690 the Elector, John William, inaugurated a system of compulsory reconversion to the ancient faith. The protests of the surrounding "evangelical" sovereigns effected nothing better than promises, broken to the hope. The winter of 1708-9, in which "the bird froze in the air," supervening upon these grievances, brought on a crisis, which led to the departure of some 13,000 "Palatines" in 1709.

The torments of the people were not confined to matters of religion—three hundred petty despots then tyrannized over the shreds and patches of Germany, under the guidance and instruction of French adventurers, who regarded statesmanship as the art of keeping up a princely household, modelled after that of the "Grand Monarque" at Versailles. As these publicans and tax-gatherers continued to eat out the vitals of society, the people gradually ranged themselves into the two great hostile camps of governed and governors, German and French, vulgar and genteel, between which warfare has raged ever since. At first the victory of the French party was absolute. The common people withdrew from all participation in public life. Those who did not go abroad directed the energies of their minds to religious mysticism, to the profundities of metaphysics, or to the struggle for their daily bread. A very small fraction of the population did actually quit their country; but the project of emigration haunted the minds of all of them, and started into action upon every discouragement or disappointment.

"But these things," says our author, "are changing, and with them the migration of large masses of the people is destined to cease. The great events of 1866 have restored the foundation of German unity and the national superstructure is in rapid progress of erection. That accomplished,

* "History of German Emigration in America. Vol. I. By Frederick Kapp." New York: E. Steiger. 1867. 8vo. pp. 410.
["Geschichte der Deutschen im Staate New-York, bis zum Anfange des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts. Von Frederick Kapp." New-York: Verlag von E. Steiger, 1867.]

the German will cease to discard his country at every ripple of the fickle tide of fortune, but will cleave to the fatherland through good report and evil report, and contribute actively to its welfare."

From this cardinal doctrine of the book we must dissent. The freedom and welfare of a country furnish as many motives to emigration as its poverty or its bondage. As instances, we need not cite Holland or Switzerland, having examples nearer home, in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, and Pennsylvania. Liberty involves at once liberty to increase, and liberty to quit a crowded neighborhood in search of an uncrowded; and where that liberty is enjoyed it will be exercised. Nor will Germany suffer by the process, any more than does Massachusetts. It is not to the interest of a community to retain a citizen who might better his fortunes if permitted to depart.

If Mr. Kapp is mistaken on this point, there are two reasons for regretting the error into which he has fallen. One is, that it gives his narrative, to use his own expression, "a sombre background," to wit, "the godless and unrighteous sovereignty-swindle of German potentates," upon which, as the moving cause of emigration, the moral of his book is made to turn. If such a coloring is appropriate, the history of the United States of America is a record of misfortunes; for the emigration of the European masses is a chief thread and sinew of that history. What our author thinks of the future of this country is not disclosed; the subject is but twice mentioned; and with barely words enough to show that the Great Republic does not occupy the same position, in his estimation, with the "pirate-principalities" he loves to satirize. "A man," he says, "can no more have two fatherlands than two fathers. Emigration, for the individual, is national death. He who will be a German must remain in Germany, or return there." And he speaks of the Germans in Germany as "our" people.

In thus passing by our country and its fortunes in silence, Mr. Kapp gives us the second and chief cause of complaint, for he impairs the value of his book as a contribution to American statesmanship. European politicians may value the instructions it contains, but it would have been reasonable to expect that a similar service rendered to American citizens would have been more keenly appreciated, and from the nature of the subject more fruitful of results. "The modern emigration," he says (meaning the emigration which has been going on since 1815), "is not within the scope of my work, because unfinished, and, therefore, not adapted to historical treatment." A very good principle, for the historian; because contemporary history is immensely difficult to write, and sure to become obsolete, almost as soon as written; but then it is so useful while it lasts! Where the voter of the present day can derive no hint from the troubles of the Palatinate in 1709, he can take a thousand from the contemplation of the administration of Andrew Johnson.

The poor exiles who fled from the Palatinate to avoid being made Catholics by compulsion, took refuge on Livingston Manor, on the Hudson, and afterwards in the lowlands of the Schoharie, without a thought of reacting upon the power that drove them forth. But from the drafts of history there is no exemption; and the children of these fugitives, stationed midway between the garrisons of the Hudson and of the St. Lawrence, formed the outposts which protected the former, first against the inroads of his most Christian Majesty, and then against the subjugating efforts of the British ministry. With unerring instinct they sustained the cause of self-government against the despotism of France and against the metropolism of England. In after-times they espoused the same principle in opposition to the federation of Adams and Hamilton and the usurpations of the Southern oligarchy. They have produced individuals not inferior to the best men of the land of their adoption. Peter Minnewit founded the New Netherland; Jacob Leisler struggled against the first usurpations of the colonial aristocracy; Weiser preserved the peace between the colonists and the red men; Zenger vindicated the liberty of the press; Herkheimer made the first good fight of the War of Independence, and cut off the relief of Burgoyne at Oriskany. But while individuals among them were good, the mass of them was better adapted to its historic purpose than the mass of any emigration before or since. Patience, perseverance, industry, economy, thrift, moderation, chastity, family affections, tolerance, and integrity—what better becomes the colonist? While the French settlers, assimilating with the savages and taking their daughters to wife, sank into barbarism, the German immigrants made considerable headway in training the Indian to the ways of good husbandry. This wave of German immigration entering the continent in the gap left open by the arms of British colinization, has driven slavery out of the central belt of the republic, and occupies in its own right the vast valley in which our future centres. Content—aye, eager to borrow names, words, and forms from others—it has supplied, from its own resources, men, labor, sincerity, and wealth. Most of the distinguished men of the country bear English names, but very many have been nursed at the breasts of German mothers, or reared or launched in life upon the fruits of a German ancestor's toil. Nevertheless, the position of the German immigrant was at all times subordinate, and necessarily so. While the political institutions of the country continue to be of English origin, they will be administered by English hands. Even had these institutions been capable of displacement, the Germans brought no traditions with which to supplant them. They came here as "non-political animals"—in the very teeth of Aristotle's definition of the human race. What they retained was their language and their religious rites, including a very small modicum of literature, devotional in its character. The Revolutionary struggle united them in a common cause with their Yankee brethren, and resulted in a greater frequency of intercourse, which carried the English language to the firesides of the German settlers and gradually obliterated all distinctions. The disastrous issue of Shays's rebellion, bringing an influx of some ten thousand New Englanders into the Mohawk Valley precipitated this transfusion. The present inhabitants of that once German territory are so little informed of the origin of their ancestors that they commonly believe them to have come from Holland. "Old chronicles tell of cities and landscapes buried fathom-deep beneath the waves, and the story goes, that of a stilly evening their tenements may still be traced, and even their belfries heard to murmur echoes of their long silent peals. Such, to the German student, are the German settlements recorded in these pages."

But a few pages of the work are occupied with these reflections. The narrative and the execution were evidently the favorite portion of the author's task, and it is not easy to praise them too highly. All of Mr. Kapp's books are exceedingly readable, but in this respect the present greatly surpasses the best of its predecessors. There is a variety in the contents of the various chapters, which not only could not be looked for in the biography of any individual, however gifted and versatile, but of which even history scarcely admits. In fact, the subject of this work is not so much historical as it is pre-historical—it may well be termed legendary—and not the less so that its sagas rest upon irrefragable evidence. In the fortunes of Minnewit Usselinx, and Gustavus Adolphus, we read an epic fraught with the grand images of cosmopolitan statesmanship. In Leisler we behold a civic tragedy which spontaneously assumes dramatic form. Zenger's story concentrates all the points of the revolutions of England and France. Old Conrad Weiser is a Ulysses in his wanderings, and his son is a Ulysses in camp and council. The Moravians at Shekomeko supply the materials for an idyl worthy of Bernardin de St. Pierre, and Oriskany is a battle-piece which a greater than Vernet might be proud to transfer to canvass. The landscapes of the Schoharie and the Mohawk start living from the page, and the growth of an agricultural settlement in the backwoods from the poverty in which seven men own a house in common to the profusion which leads a freebooter to boast that he carried off thirty thousand dollars' worth of cattle from two or three farm-yards, is traced with a vividness to which our American literature, with so much occasion for that species of description, has hitherto been all but a stranger.

"The settlements here described are," to use Mr. Kapp's words, "Robinsonades on a large scale." They display the growth of a civilized community in its development out of the extremes of poverty to comfort and thrift—from life at the sufferance of the powers that be to political independence. It presents a microcosm of American life as a specimen of the manner in which the whole continent was settled. "In Germany," Mr. Kapp says at the end of the eleventh chapter, "the peasant's toil was the exaction of the taskmaster; instead of being quickened with thought, it was made to be as unintelligent as possible. In America his labor was not only spontaneous, but involved the constant exercise of his keenest wits. There he was assimilated to the beast of burden; here he was elevated to as high a position as society offered or acknowledged. He prospered by his toil; but what availed him more than material wealth was the almost Promethean sense of self-reliance, which, often rude and repulsive in its forms but always ennobling in its spirit, characterizes the country, and repels the assumption of book-learned or conventional superiority with the words of the poet: 'The earth is mine, and stands too firm for thee, and eke my cabin, not thy handiwork, my hearth, whose fires kindle thine evil eye. Who stood my stead against the Titan's rage; who rescued me from death and slavery? Warm, holy heart within, 'twas thou alone!' The stout heart of the freeman overcomes the elements, and conquers the moral world."

The origin, object, and plan of this work are fully stated in an ample and well-written, though somewhat pretentious, preface. On assuming the pastorship of a church in 1820, the author purchased about two thousand volumes, the contents of which he arranged under separate heads in alphabetical order, adding references as important books came under his notice. Receiving almost daily additions for over forty years, the catalogue became a book which, after his retirement from professional life, the author endeavored to render complete. In its form he regards it as unique, being widely different in design from all other "bibliothecas." The "absolute need of an aid like this" is evident from the vast extent of theology, "the most voluminous of all the sciences," there being in the English language alone, as Dr. Malcom supposes, "a quarter of a million of religious books," and the reader can easily imagine what immense negative service is done the theological student by presenting to him, after successive eliminations by time and criticism, only about a tithe of them. The aim was not to preserve books from more or less merited oblivion, but to furnish reference to what is still both "valuable and accessible," without hiding "meritorious authors in a crowd," wasting the student's time in search, or amassing curious but useless references for effect. Omission was, therefore, no less important than collection, and probably required no less care and labor. The Fathers, chiefly from the respect due to antiquity, are constantly referred to, and "the succession of sacred literature" is preserved. Titles, to save space and expense, are abridged, not without care and reflection. Kindred heads are referred to each other. The date of the first publication of only few books is given, it being almost impossible to do it consistently, and less desirable in this branch of literature than in any other, as "theology has a positive basis in Revelation, and he who, in any age, writes well on sacred subjects, writes for all ages." Observations on the comparative value of the books are not numerous, and the untrustworthiness of such notices is illustrated in the preface by some very amusing, glaringly contradictory "utterances of well-known men in regard to well-known books."

* "Theological Index. References to the Principal Works in every department of Religious Literature. By Howard Malcom, D.D., LL.D." Boston: Gould & Lincoln. 1868.

The "Index" is alphabetical as to topics, with writers annexed—the heads, to the number of two thousand, being multiplied so as to comprehend the widest range—and embraces "nearly seventy thousand citations alphabetically arranged under two thousand heads," and also (if the ten pages taken at random and examined by us are a fair specimen) over two thousand errata. They are generally of the class called typographical; but we suspect that their origin could be traced farther back than the printer. Exegetische, for example, is about half the time exigetische, Edinburgh uniformly wants its final h, Fraser's Magazine is always Frazier's; such errors as De serpiente seductore, Clavis universali, Clavis Biblicum, Hervey's Theoron and Aspasi, for Theron and Aspasio, meet the eye on almost every page, and often many times on a page. Then there are other marks of carelessness, e. g., on p. 146. One book is referred to under two successive titles as "Dietelmair, Historia Dogmatis," etc., and "Dietelmayer, Hist. dogmatis de descensu." The different capitalization—"Dogmatis" and "dogmatis"—is very characteristic. We have not been able to discover on what principle initial capitals are distributed in the German titles; the nouns certainly get very few of them. These are not solitary errors picked out with careful scrutiny; they recur on every page, and it is plain that, much as the work may assist scholars, it will assist no one in forming scholarly habits. In fact, though it is a hard thing to say, we fear the execution of the work must be called slovenly. It is discreditable to American scholarship that a book so good should not be better.

So far we have spoken of what was merely disagreeable in the "Index;" we now come to some features which lessen its usefulness. In more than half the references the authors' Christian names are not given even by initials, e. g., "Appleton's Works." What Appleton? In Sabin's Dictionary the Appletons fill seven pages. It might save some time spent in searching catalogues if "Jes." had been added, for which there was plenty of room, and the saving of time would be considerable to those using libraries which have only card catalogues. Another reference (p. 236) is to "Illyrici Opera," and again (p. 149) to "Illyrici Clavis Scripturæ Sacræ. 1764." A student would need to search long in most catalogues to find this under the letter I. We suppose—but on this point it becomes us to speak with diffidence, lest we should be mistaken while "seeming to know more than the author," a piece of presumption against which Dr. Malcom warns his critics—we suppose that he means Matthias Flacius, the Illyrian (Illyricus), who will be found in quite another part of the alphabet.

Under none of the heads referring to Jews, as "Judaism," "History of the Jews," "Jewish Antiquities," "Present Condition of the Jews," "Hebrew Language," "Rabbinical Literature," etc., is there any mention of the greatest living or lately deceased writers of that nation; of Rapoport, Geiger, Zunz, Luzzato, Philippson, Grätz, or Frankel, whose writings are standard works on the same subjects, while numerous worthless treatises and periodicals are referred to. No student of philosophy will admire the impartiality or the classifying judgment of the author, when looking for "Pantheism" he finds himself referred to "Atheism," and under this head finds a very short and very motley series of writers pro, including Spinoza, Leroux, Harriet Martineau, and Mirabeau, with the following note attached: "Several of these writers are by some ranked as Deists!" No Hebraist will be satisfied with six Hebrew titles (pp. 260, 261) among seventy thousand citations, of which six two are misprinted: tudim for turim, yomeph for yoseph.

We have left ourselves little space in which to speak of the notes. We must, however, quote Dr. Malcom's remarks upon them, premising that his sentences are not often so badly constructed. "Observations on the comparative value of books are sparingly introduced, preferring to omit works of small merit, if there are good ones on that topic, not too rare, except when it seemed well to put the reader on his guard." Perhaps it was not worth while to swell the work with the contradictory judgments of critics, but notes indicating the view which an author takes, or the manner in which he treats his subject, are very valuable, and much information can be conveyed in a line or two of fine type, a space-saving device which Dr. Malcom has not adopted. He has given enough of such notes to make us wish for more.

Let us not be understood to condemn the book wholly because we point out some defects in its execution. It will be very useful. Every theological student may be grateful for its publication. Every library used by scholars ought to possess it. It fills an empty place in bibliography. With all its deficiencies it is the best book of its kind that we have. It is indeed in many respects inferior to Walch, Winer, Danz, but the latest of these was published in 1843; and undoubtedly Darling's index of subjects would be vastly superior to Dr. Malcom's, but Darling is dead, and his children may never publish their father's work, although it was promised at the time of his death. We should not perhaps have insisted so strongly on the faults of the present work had not Dr. Malcom appeared in his preface so thoroughly satisfied with his own work and cast down his gauntlet to the critics. "I do not presume," he says, "that my book will incur no censures but such as it deserves. Some will find fault for the sake of seeming to know more than the author, and some for the love of fault-finding. Some out of ignorance or lack of reflection will condemn real excellences, and some will judge me by a standard which cannot be reached." Of course absolute freedom from error is out of the question, but a very much higher standard than Dr. Malcom has aimed at has been reached by scores of bibliographers. Not to speak of French manuals and German hand-books, in our own country Abbot's "Bibliography of a Future Life" is an admirable example of great and judicious condensation, combined with all attainable accuracy. We hope, however, that the "Index" will sell well and that its success will encourage some more industrious person to make it better in a future edition.

THE MAGAZINES FOR APRIL.

The magazines for the coming month offer rather less than the usual quantity of good light reading, and no really striking articles, light or heavy. Mrs. Davis keeps on with "Dallas Galbraith" in Lippincott's, and brings back George Laddoun into her story, which very well sustains its interest as it proceeds. Mr. J. T. McKay writes a little tale, "Ranlock Branch," ill put together, but made much better than the common run of its class by the vigorous and spirited way in which is told the incident for the sake of which it was really written—the furious night-journey in a locomotive engine, undertaken by a young girl in order to bring up a squad of police to the protection of her lover. Another agreeable article in this number—the best yet of Lippincott's—is an anonymous writer's description of a visit to Cuba. "La Reina de las Antillas," he entitles his account, which is so full of glowing praises that no doubt before this time next year, he will have considerably increased the number of American visitors to his paradise of cobalt skies, and emerald-green waves, and the delicious tonic of mountain air, and magnificent scenery, and laziness, and wine at a nominal price, and the "Ponche de Guarapo." The latter is a beverage which adds twenty-four hours to the life of the consumer for every drink of it that he takes. It is as well, then, to quote the receipt for making it: An egg being beaten up, there is added to it "sufficient brandy;" upon these mingled ingredients is poured sugar-cane juice boiling-hot from the mill; finally, the whole mixture is poured backwards and forwards until it foams, and one has a "Ponche de Guarapo" which, besides its effect of lengthening life, makes of one a giant, and, furthermore, induces sweet slumbers. "From the Bridge of Sighs" is a poem, by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. A husband, an invalid apparently, watches with a sick-hearted sort of calmness his unfaithful wife, in company with her lover, plotting his death. The verses are not without power, and the familiar situation is looked at from a rather uncommon point of view, but, as is usual with Mrs. Howe, the author makes the reader do some puzzling out before she gets done with him, marring all the effect of her work by slovenliness, or, rather, want of certainty in the handling. The other pieces of poetry are "Wings," and "An Interlude," and of prose articles we have "Womanhood and Chivalry in America;" "Quotation Marks," which chats about famous plagiarisms; "Common Schools in New Jersey;" Professor Dickson's "Correlation of Forces;" "Opium and Opium-Eating," which professes to be a word of warning from a former slave of the drug, but is too general, and reads as if it were a made-up story; "The Old Volunteer," a somewhat humorous sketch, by Mrs. M. H. Eastman; an article by the Honorable Amasa Walker, in which he deprecates the adoption of the line of policy which the House and Senate, since his article was written, have resolved upon in regard to the removal of the internal revenue tax; and, finally, a good letter from Louis Blanc, who predicts speedy war in Europe, and gives reasons for thinking that France, Austria, Russia, Prussia, and Italy all mean fighting very soon. This list of articles, it will be seen, indicates a well-chosen variety of reading matter, and, on the whole, the articles very well keep the promise of the table of contents. "The Monthly Gossip" continues to be full of literary intelligence of value.

We find in Putnam's for April a brief account of a morning at St. Alban's Church in this city; an essay by Mr. J. S. C. Abbott—who speaks of "the insane adventure" of Garibaldi, and of "Louis Napoleon, ever anxious to avoid war," who replies to Garibaldi by saying, "No; let us not settle it brutally by iron and by blood;" "A Paper on Paper," a sort of cyclopædia-of-useful-knowledge article by Professor Schele de Vere; a pleasant article by Mr. Duyckinck on "New Netherland Two Hundred Years Ago;" a short story by Mrs. Stoddard, and some verses entitled "Exile," worse than the story, by the same author; a neat little exposition by Mr. E. S Gould, in a page or two of dialogue, of the folly of talking, as Mr. Greeley talks, about "instant resumption," and three or four other articles. The best thing in the magazine is, we should say, an account of the manner in which "The Poor Girls of New York"—nobody knows how many thousand of them, fifty thousand, perhaps—earn their living. It is by Mr. Wirt Sikes, who probably understands the subject as well as any man in New York—any man, at all events, who writes—and who tells a sad story in a straightforward way. It is understood that Mr. Sikes has for a long time made himself personally familiar with the wretchedness and squalor in which so many of our fellow-citizens live and die. Charles W. Elliott writes very readably about Yeddo, but gives the Japanese an astonishingly good character—too good a character, possibly: "Children are never beaten," he says; "parents never lose their tempers," and so on, with a faith of his own or a faith in other people's faith that is remarkable in a very high degree. The next time he writes on this subject he has our authority for saying that there are no fathers or mothers in any part of the empire, and that the children, born and reared abroad, never go home to live.

The Galaxy has a clever description of Sheridan's battle at Fisher's Hill, which contains this new historical anecdote, for the truth of which Mr. James F. Fitts is authority:

"As evening approached, upon the day of the fight, Sheridan had entirely completed his dispositions, and had his army in hand to his entire satisfaction. His intention was not, however, to attack that night, probably esteeming it best to await the dawn of another morning; and he had withdrawn a little way to the rear, where headquarters had been hastily established, intending to rest a little, when a curious coincidence changed his plans, and sent him forward that night to victory. An aide rode up with the announcement:

"'General Crook sends his compliments, sir, and says he is in position. He 'd like to have you know, sir, that his men are in capital spirits.'

"'Glad of it,' said Sheridan. 'Tell him to stay where he is.'

"In less than three minutes up came another aide with another message:

"'General Wright's compliments, General. He is ready to attack any minute, and the men are rather anxious for it. They were never in better spirits.'

"'Good, again!' responded Sheridan. 'Tell the general he will hear from me in good time.'

"And hardly had he uttered the words when aide number three came up at a gallop.

"'General Emory sends his compliments, General. He told me to say to you that the enemy has developed nothing but a weak picket on his left. The corps is in excellent spirits.'

"'Well, now, by George!' exclaimed Sheridan. 'If the whole army is in such good trim and temper for the work, why delay it? We won't, as sure as my name 's Phil Sheridan! You, sir,' to the last aide, 'ride back to General Emory rapidly, and tell him to attack at once vigorously with his whole force! Major, take the same order to General Wright. Captain, the same to Crook. Mount, gentlemen, mount. We 'll have that hill before another hour.

"And we did."

This month's number contains also more of "Words and their Uses," by Mr. Grant White, who talks very satisfactorily of a number of instances of misuse and right use of words; a description of the Scilly Isles by Mr. W. H. Alden; something about magazine-making by the editor; a little gossip about woman as a consumer of tobacco, in which the author declares that snuff-dipping is invading this State, and has already reached some members of the respectable classes; an able essay, by Prof. John Norton Pomeroy, which lucidly states the intention and the action of the founders in apportioning the powers of our Government among the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary, and argues against the present tendency of the people to permit Congress to draw all the power into its hands. Another solid article is on "The Lowlands of the Mississippi," by Mr. H. L. Abbot; and the editor has a sensible word to say about the trial which young Mr. Tyng brought on himself.

Doctor S. Weir Mitchell, in this month's Atlantic, writes a disquisition which, we dare say, will be fascinating reading to most readers, on "The Poison of the Rattlesnake." Dr. Mitchell is a recognized authority on this subject; there is none higher; and his paper is full of information which will be new to almost all readers. It is information not only about the horrible animal itself, but about the effect of the venom in destroying life, its constitution, and the means of curing its victim. It occurs to us that an amusing fabulous natural history of the rattlesnake might be made by some of the Northern men or women now working among the negroes in the South, for these latter are full of legends about this "longe creeple" which "stan' all one as a piece of clever calico" in appearance, which has been repeatedly observed in conflict with his mortal and usually victorious foe, the "brack snake," which is killed by the "breff of de cow," which permits the traveller to walk "close by he head," but invariably strikes at any one who goes by his tail, which easily "fling hese'f" ten and fifteen feet, which is very wise and very proud, which, if his mate is killed, haunts the spot in thirst of vengeance, and which is in many ways a very strange and admirable worm. Another piece of good reading in the April Atlantic is Mr. James's last love story, "A Most Extraordinary Case." It is very good, in Mr. James's peculiar manner. We have besides still another one of those songs of Doctor Holmes's for the class of '29; an article by Mr. Parton called "Our Roman Catholic Friends," in the preparation of which he seems to have underrated the amount of knowledge that is current in regard to his subject; the second part of "Free Missouri," by Mr. Richardson; the third part of "Doctor Molke's Friends," Doctor Hayes's entertaining narrative; one of Mr. Whipple's critical articles, "Spenser" being the title of it; some poetry seasonable, on "April," by Miss M. R. Hudson, and several critical notices.

In Hours at Home there are parts of two novels—"Camille," by the Countess de Gasparin, and Miss Yonge's "Chaplet of Pearls." These will both find satisfied readers, and ought to find them, for they are more than average novels, so far as we can judge from reading a few chapters of each. The author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family" is another of this month's contributors, Messrs. Scribner & Co. having secured her services; and another is James Greenwood, who, in "'Picking Up' a Living," furnishes the best of the series of articles which he is under agreement to write for Hours at Home. It is an amusing, not merely amusing, description of some of the London Arabs, to call them so, who gather offal, and sweep steps, and cut withes for dealers in water-cresses, and steal green leaves with which to line fruit-baskets, and so pick up, by very small bits at a time, what may be called a living. Mr. G. M. Towle goes on with his description of Brittany; Professor Wells gives a curious account of a German doctor established at the Burmese Court; Mr. J. D. Sherwood's "Knobs of Travel"—European travel—is continued; and there are one or two short stories and some essays fairly good.

The Catholic World, which, it may be said in general, has a more masculine tone than any of the other magazines—a tone as if it expected to make itself acceptable to the male intellect rather than to the female taste—is this month somewhat unusually robust and hard-headed. It must be for Catholic women, though, that it talks after the fashion of this statement, which occurs in a review of the "Life" of the late Doctor Doyle: "The Peninsular war ensued, in which the Portuguese, aided by the English under Wellington, drove out the irreligious soldiers of the Empire." The writer surely cannot mean that a heretic could lend any help in a conflict between the Catholic faith and Atheism. "The Church Review and Victor Cousin" is an able attack on the philosopher, a defence of the Catholic World for having attacked him once before, and an attack on the Church Review for having since defended him and attacked the Catholic World. The article is very vigorous. We have besides in this April number an essay on "The Unity of the Human Race," translated from the French; a review of Meehan's "O'Neill and O'Donnell in Exile;" some well-put remarks to which most people will assent, or have assented, on the crisis in the Episcopal Church; and a sombre, satirical piece, a translation, entitled "How our History will be told in the Year 3000," which is severe on the military tendencies of the day, as shown in the invention of needle-guns, and so on, much as the wits of a couple of hundred years ago used to be so triumphantly severe on gunpowder and, implicitly, recommend head-hammers and disembowelling-knives, and bows-and-arrows, and hot pitch. One or two heavy stories, one or two shorter and lighter, and one, or a part of one, by Erckmann-Chatrian; some poetry; some miscellaneous articles; and some good, sound book-notices make up the rest of the number, which we believe to be the best number of the Catholic World yet issued.

GALE'S UPPER MISSISSIPPI.*

Mr. Gale has given us a book worth much, and yet not as good as a little more care and labor might have made it. Freed from its many crudities and some bad grammar, and basing its conclusions on more perfect data, it would have been—trustworthy and valuable, we were about to say; more trustworthy and valuable is what we will say. For the student, to whom it might be of great use as a guide to fuller study, it should give authorities in foot-notes. They are omitted, the author says, to economize space, but there are more than a score of pages uselessly filled with such matter as President Johnson's proclamation and the verbose details of Indian treaties. Still, here are gathered from many sources and put in quite readable shape a large number of valuable facts concerning the supposed ante-aboriginal mound-builders, the various Indian tribes, and the early white settlements and progress of civilization in the Upper Mississippi Valley, which includes all of the United States between the Alleghany and Rocky Mountains and north of the mouth of the Ohio. Of the twenty chapters, one is given to the extinct mound-builders, thirteen to the history and present condition of the Indian tribes, and six to the history of the North-western States. The special value of the book is in the second part, which, indeed occupies the larger number of pages. The facts given concerning the progress of civilization in the so-called North-west are interesting, but are more within common reach, and are not complete.

Of the ancient mound-builders no one knows anything definitely beyond the facts regarding the number, character, and distribution of the monuments they have left. And when Mr. Gale estimates their number at twelve millions—which is about the same as the present population of this region—we must use his own words against him and say, "This is based on two suppositions entirely without evidence."

In his compact history of the Northern Indian tribes (he does not treat of those whose original home was the Gulf States), he has done good service. No one before him has traced the history of these tribes down to the present time, or done it with such kindly hopefulness. Not that Mr. Gale indulges in any rose-colored views, but his studies show him, as they will others, that the Indian still lives, in spite of wars, removals, small-pox, whiskey, and destiny. Sometimes, indeed, a whole tribe has been obliterated by war or disease, but again there are others who have gathered up their fragments, and have within a century grown from nothing into nations. The Hurons and Ojibwas are illustrations of each of these classes. As the Indian question is now forcing its way to a more careful consideration than it has had in times past, we recommend the work as a hand-book. It is not perfect; we hope it will be improved or give way to something better, but at present it is the only work of the kind. Let us remark that when it is revised we ought to have better cuts and with appropriate subjects. Isaac Jogues is not the best representative of Western missionary laborers, and no more is Alfred Brunson; nor is Stephen A. Douglas the "head man" of our Western civilization.

The author groups the various tribes in confederacies, "not," as he says, "from any knowledge that they were the same people or associated in government, but solely on account of their associations and similarity in customs and languages." This would be a proper and convenient principle of grouping, proper enough and certainly convenient, but it ought to be consistently obeyed. Mr. Gale makes a Winnebago confederacy which includes the Mandans and Osages and excludes the Dakotas. Now, all these tribes are closely related in language and customs; they really belong to one family, which it is very proper to call the Dakotan family. He, moreover, credits the absurd story that the Winnebago language cannot be reduced to writing. This was long ago done for the Dakota and Osage, which are cognate languages, and there are published vocabularies of the Winnebago also. The truth of the matter is, this story is utterly without foundation; it was set on foot by those who for a quarter of a century have been trying, unsuccessfully, to force English education on the Winnebagos.

Mr. Gale gives, as the proximate causes of the Sioux outbreak of 1862—(1) the general dissatisfaction of the Indians with the treaty, and the efforts for civilization, stimulated by whiskey-sellers and traders; (2) the delay in the annual payment; (3) the want of a military guard on the frontier; and (4) the general influence of the war. To these causes should be added the reactionary influence of their heathen religion, aroused to desperation in self-defence. It is a significant fact, though Mr. Gale does not mention it, that after the decisive battle of Wood Lake, many of the defeated Indians openly renounced the gods who had there failed them.

The sketch of Catholic missions is very fair, but the corresponding sketch of Protestant missions is not so successful. It is, indeed, a much more difficult subject to treat thoroughly, because there have been so many different Protestant organizations at work in the field that it is hard to gather all the records. And Mr. Gale seems to have been content with what came easily to hand. Thus, after giving undue prominence to the Methodist missions in the North, he goes beyond his own limits to speak of their missions among the Southern tribes, and of them only. Probably because these statistics were at hand; and it might have cost a letter to some missionary house to get the figures which he should have got. But if it were his intention to give a full view of Methodist missions, he should have added the account of the labors of the Rev. Colonel Chivington at Sand Creek, a preacher of that denomination recognized and approved by his brethren. The Indians need missions and missionary labor greatly, but they need more that the Christianity of this country should be so renovated and awakened as to protect them against corruption and oppression on the part of the Christian white men with whom they are brought into contact.

The Romance of Charity. By John De Liefde. (London: Strahan. New York: George Routledge & Sons. 1867).—Into this one handsome little volume, with a changed title, Mr. De Liefde has compressed the substance of his "Six Months among the Charities of Europe," in two volumes, which was noticed in the Nation of April 19, 1866. The result is a work more exactly corresponding to its promise, and, if not so full of instruction to those who make social science a study, freer from certain defects, and better calculated to awaken general interest in the most remarkable philanthropic movements of the day. One need only read the opening chapter—on the Rauhe Haus at Horn—to be transported to a realm of Christian activity which seems rather the imagining of a clever enthusiast than actual human experience, with its houses and lands, its families and brotherhoods and candidats and patrons, and all the wonderful machinery of the founder, Dr. Wichern. And the American reader will not quit this realm without some valuable reflections, and, in spite of his distrust of German centralization, some candid admissions relative to the reformatories which he had hitherto prided himself were unsurpassed in the world.

Ohio in the War: Her Statesmen, Her Generals and Soldiers. By Whitelaw Reid. In two volumes. (Cincinnati: Moore, Wilstach & Baldwin. 1868).—This work is a monument of industry and patience. In two huge volumes of a thousand pages each, are given a history of the State of Ohio during the war, the lives of the generals and public men who are natives of that State or peculiarly identified with it, and a sketch of its regiments and other military organizations, with numerous maps and illustrations and more than a hundred portraits. The author is otherwise known as "Agate," of the Cincinnati Gazette. Though the size of the book, and the short time employed in its preparation, are sufficient reasons for regarding it with suspicion, the reader soon discovers that that feeling is out of place. It appears to be a surprisingly good book, and this impression is strengthened in proportion as acquaintance with it increases.

The interest and value of the second volume are mostly local. Its contents are the rosters of every regiment and company furnished to the National service by the State of Ohio during the war, followed, in each case, by a short record of service. It contains a table which shows at a glance the leading facts concerning the formation, term of service, losses, commanders, and muster-out of all the principal volunteer organizations of the State. Aside from the information contained in the rosters, it is professedly devoted to the men in the ranks, and special mention of officers is not habitually made in it, even of the commanders of regiments. It is sufficient to say of this part of the work, that it seems to be well done. Of course, one finds in it more or less glorification of particular commands, but that is natural enough, and we notice no instances of anything excessive in this direction. Indeed the book, as a whole, deserves high praise for its candor and moderation, and these qualities are frequently exhibited in cases in which an ardent State pride would have led not a few men to consider a little suppressio veri quite excusable.

The first volume has a different and far higher value, and is an interesting book for every student of the late war. No military library in America is complete without it. The last few years have proved Ohio to be both a mother and a nurse of lions, for Grant, Sherman, Rosecrans, McPherson, Gillmore, McDowell, Buell, Custer, Weitzel, Crook, and Griffin were born there, and Sheridan, if not born there, as he probably was, was certainly reared there from early infancy, and a long list of other gallant and accomplished general officers may be claimed as children of that State. A sketch of the life of every Ohio officer who obtained the title of general, by commission or brevet, in the war of secession, has been obtained by the indefatigable industry of Mr. Reid, and the biographies of the more eminent occupy from twenty-five to seventy-five pages each. A careful reading of a large part of them justifies us in pronouncing that the work is extremely well done. We find evidence of a high degree of fitness for the task, and of much fidelity in its performance. Copious materials have been collected, and they have been used in an excellent spirit. Instead of feeling distrust excited by blind enthusiasm and continuous encomiums, the reader is frequently and most favorably impressed by evidences of fairness and a judicious critical spirit. A straightforward honesty is a prominent characteristic of the book. There is plenty of detail, much new information, and an abundant but not excessive use of anecdote, though some of the stories about the early life of one and another general are perhaps fitter for the columns of an illustrated paper than for such a book.

It is true of many persons who made a name in the late war, and of not a few interesting events, that information in regard to them is not accessible in any convenient form, but must be sought in old newspapers, rebellion records, voluminous reports, and the crude masses of testimony contained in the eight volumes of the Report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War. It is a most attractive feature of this book that it gives, with good arrangement and compactness, carefully collected and carefully digested information, that supplies the want in a multitude of cases. Of this, the chapter on Morgan's Raid may be mentioned in especial illustration, and Mr. Reid's sketch of the life, character, and military history of McDowell is a composition that deserves high praise. In general, it may be stated that this work goes far toward being a complete biographical dictionary of the late war, and that it is a remarkable instance of a great enterprise successfully carried out.

A Manual of Anglo-Saxon for Beginners. By Samuel M. Shute. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt.)—Mr. Shute admits candidly that his Manual is not original. The introduction, in so far as it follows Mr. Marsh, Mr. Latham, Mr. Wright, or the Edinburgh Review, is excellent. The syntax is that of Professor Klepstein's grammar in a mutilated form. Of prosody the author has but little to say, and, therefore, can do but little harm or good. The extracts would have been more useful if the compiler had not departed from the established English usages of Anglo-Saxon orthography. But it is especially with the etymology that we are concerned at present. This is based upon Heyne's "Kurtze Laut und Flexionslehre der altgermanischen Sprachstämme." Now, whatever may be the advantages of this system, it has disadvantages that cannot be overlooked. The nouns (substantive?) are divided into the vowel declension and the N (or consonant) declension. We admit that no division of substantives can be better than that into nomina pura and nomina impura, as they are styled in the classical languages, the former containing all substantives of which the characteristic is an essential vowel; the latter, all those of which the characteristic is a consonant or an unessential vowel. The Anglo-Saxon nomina pura are called by Professor Rask the simple order, the nomina impura the complex order, while in Professor Grimm's system the former fall under the head of weak, the latter of strong substantives. This division is both natural and philological, and is the one adopted not only by the ablest German philologists, but also by the latest English classical grammarians. In the Saxon there are substantives which exactly correspond to the nomina pura, simple or weak substantives, and others which answer to the nomina impura, complex or strong substantives. The Saxon "steorra" answers to the Latin mensa; the Saxon "smiδ" to the Latin urbs. Steorra, therefore, and substantives whose characteristic is an essential vowel, naturally belong to the vowel declension, while smiδ, and substantives whose characteristic is a consonant or an unessential vowel, equally belong to the consonant declension. Hence, at first sight it might appear that Mr. Shute follows this very natural and scientific division. But a glance at his work shows us that this is not the case. His N (or consonant) declension contains all those substantives which end in an essential vowel: thus steorra belongs to the N declension, as also Tunge and Eare, so he completely disguises the most marked and patent characteristic of this order of substantives, calling that a consonant declension which is by the ablest philologists styled the vowel declension. The same line of argument might, if space permitted, be applied to his so-called vowel declension. The result of adopting such a plan as this is not simply to complicate that which is simple in itself; it involves a more serious disadvantage. The student who has studied the classical and Teutonic languages in a scientific manner can very easily master the Saxon if presented in an uniform and simple system. And when the time shall arrive that the study of Saxon shall precede or be taken up simultaneously with the study of Latin and Greek, such an uniformity of system as we have pointed out will greatly facilitate the acquisition of all these languages. We have not space to show the unnecessary confusion which follows the manner in which the verb is treated, nor to point out the illogical intermixture of etymology and syntax which we meet with under the respective heads of prepositions, conjunctions, and interjections. We have said sufficient to show that the "Manual of Anglo-Saxon" is ill-adapted to the wants of students generally, and especially of those for whom it is professedly written, viz., beginners.

A CHARMING BOOK BY MADAME MICHELET.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

BOSTON,

Have recently Published,

The Story of my Childhood.

BY MADAME J. MICHELET.

Translated from the French by MARY FRAZIER CURTIS.

12mo, cloth, $1 25.

This spirited translation of a delightful book has received favorable commendation from the highest critical authorities in America. The following extracts will show the estimation in which it is held:

"This is an exquisite specimen of descriptive narrative, rendered into English as easy and plastic as the French of the original. It is a photograph of intense sympathies and delicate grace of thought."—Atlantic Monthly.

"This little story is so delightfully told that one might quote with pleasure from almost every page. One reading by no means exhausts its resources as a pleasure-giver. It is so simple, so graceful, it reproduces with such delicately vivid strokes the peculiar charm of French domestic life, that one lingers over its pages with renewed delight. . . . . The book is translated into very easy and flexible English, which retains the spirit of the original as well as its substance."—N. Y. Nation.

"The peculiar charm of this book seems to be that it has all the youthful freshness of thought and experience which belongs to the period of life it is intended mainly to represent. . . . . No one can read it without a feeling of deep interest, nor close the book without respect and admiration."—N. Y. Round Table.

"Among the more pretentious books with which the season inundates the booksellers' counters, this charming little story may escape the attention it deserves. . . . The local descriptions in this pleasant book are very graphic and graceful, the household life full of color, and all the experiences of a French girl of good parentage in a picturesque though provincial region, from infancy to her first communion, and so on to ripe maidenhood, are narrated with frank and animated relish."—N. Y. Times.

"One of the most charming books we have recently seen is 'The Story of My Childhood;' in which is narrated with charming naiveté and simplicity the story of a life which, growing amid the solemn surroundings of a chateau at Montauban and repressed by the severity of a methodical and disciplinary mother, became introspective and emotional in the highest degree. No one can read this book without being the better for its perusal."—Albany Evening Journal.

"We have read this volume with an interest which we could scarcely have supposed would be excited by any mere relation of the incidents and experiences of childhood. We can heartily recommend it as equally well adapted to the perusal of old and young alike."—Boston Courier.

THE KIRBY.

In presenting to the public our KIRBY HARVESTER for 1868, we would call particular attention to the many improvements we have made since last season.

Our Reel Self-Rake, which last year was considered by farmers the best in the market, has been very much improved by the addition of an extremely simple contrivance for regulating the size of the bundles, so that it now works to perfection, and cannot fail to please all who try it.

Our new Grooved Finger-Bar is a great improvement. The Bar is rolled in such a shape as to render it light and very strong. The guards are very firmly attached by one bolt. There is a long grooved piece attached firmly for the head of the cutter-bar to slide in, so there is assured a perfect freedom of motion at this important point, where, in nearly all other machines, breakages are constantly occurring.

Relying on these and many other improvements, we have no hesitation in saying that the KIRBY for 1868 is the most perfect combined Mower and Reaper in the world, and it is not only best as a combined machine, but the best Mower singly as well as the best Reaper singly.

The number we shall manufacture this year will be limited to 5,000. Consequently, all farmers who desire a KIRBY for the next harvest should apply at once to one of our agents.

The Week.

THE bill for admitting Alabama, the bill exempting most manufactures from internal revenue taxes, and the business of impeachment have been the principal matters before Congress during the week just passed. Besides these, there was some little excitement over the resolution to regulate the tariff for freight and passengers going over the Pacific Railroad, and incidentally to the tax-exemption bill there was a good deal of discussion of the laws intended to prevent whiskey-frauds. As for the railroad resolution, the House listened willingly to the reading of the rule which forbids a member's voting on any matter in the settlement of which he has an immediate pecuniary interest, and then speedily referred the resolution to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. This was not done, however, till after Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, had made the House listen to plain talk as to how the corporations are preying on the public and buying their representatives. In sixteen years, he said, during which he had served in the House, he had never witnessed a scene like that when in June, 1864, under the lead of Mr. Price, of Iowa, and Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, and under the eyes of a crowd of male and female lobbyists who swarmed in the very seats of members, the House passed the amended Pacific Railroad bill of 1864. As regards the whiskey question, neither House nor Senate shows any disposition to alter the law imposing the two-dollar tax. They agree in making more and more severe the penalties to be inflicted on persons violating the law. After several committees of conference the two Houses have brought the two nearly identical bills which they passed in regard to the tax on manufactures to a form which both can accept. It is not materially different from what it was when we mentioned it last week. The tax is taken from all but four or five articles. In the matter of the admission of Alabama, the House has come to a conclusion which differs decidedly and much for the better from the conclusion reached by Mr. Farnsworth and the Committee on Reconstruction. The committee reported a bill which met with favor from the extreme Radicals, and which was entirely the same with that once before brought forward. Mr. Spalding brought forward as a substitute a new bill, and succeeded in getting it passed. The Senate, on Thursday, passed over the President's veto—32 to 9—the bill regulating the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in certain cases. The debate was a strong one, and turned not on the message, but on the merits of the McArdle case. On Friday the House, by a vote of 112 to 34, also passed the bill over the veto. On Thursday, too, the Senate ratified the treaty with North Germany relative to the rights of naturalized American citizens when in the country of their birth. On Monday the House resolved that the resolution passed by the New Jersey Legislature relative to the withdrawing of New Jersey's ratification of the pending Constitutional Amendment was couched in scandalous and insulting language, and should be returned to that body. On the same day Mr. Butler made the opening speech for the prosecution in the President's trial. On Tuesday the trial went on. Some unimportant witnesses were heard, and, after discussion, the Senate decided that the right of primary decision, subject to the Senate's revision of all questions of law and evidence, lies with the presiding officer.

Since the New Hampshire election Democrats no longer talk of carrying Connecticut by a majority of four or five thousand. The Republicans, on the other hand, grow more and more confident of making such gains as shall overcome Mr. English's majority of 987 and give them the State. A change of less than fifty-three hundredths of one per cent. on the total vote of last year would be sufficient to fulfil their predictions—that is to say, if, out of the 94,154 men who went to the polls last year, 494 who then voted with the Democrats should on Monday next vote with the Republicans, Mr. English will be defeated. The Republican hope that this will be so, is supported by many probable reasons. To begin with, the negro suffrage question does not enter directly into this spring's contest. Then, last year the desire of the working-men for an eight-hour law enured to the benefit of Mr. English; this year that question, too, may be said to be out of the way. For last winter the Republican Legislature and the Democratic Governor united with cheerful unanimity and with the utmost gravity in making an eight-hour law—worth considerably less than the ink used in engrossing it—the credit of which is to be divided between the two parties about equally. Furthermore, the Republicans are not this year, as they were last, weighted with Mr. P. T. Barnum, who, in his Congressional district, ran some hundreds—267—"behind his ticket," and whose name undoubtedly hurt the Republican party throughout the State. And Mr. Jewell has shown his ability to draw out in his own district (senatorial) a vote about as much heavier than the strict party vote as Mr. Barnum's in Litchfield and Fairfield was lighter than that. Again, Mr. Johnson in April, 1867, seemed to have before him two years of power; now he seems to have but a few weeks, and surely has so few months that his pleasure as regards their votes may safely be disregarded by the gentlemen who hold offices—a class not to be left unconsidered in a State where for two years majorities have been between five hundred and a thousand. Finally, it is believed by more than nine hundred men in a thousand in Connecticut as elsewhere that Grant is almost sure to be the next President; in other words, that the Republicans are going to carry the country next fall, and election results in April will no doubt be appreciably affected by what is believed of results in November. Certainly, however, the fight is a hard one and victory will be glorious rather than overwhelming. The Democrats have hidden away Mr. C. C. Burr, Mr. H. C. Dean, and Mr. "Brick" Pomeroy, and have put forward men of the character of Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Seymour, Mr. S. J. Tilden, Mr. Doolittle, and Mr. Hendricks. The Republican speakers, with General Sickles and Mr. Harriman at the head of them, have been numerous, good, and indefatigably active. But in endeavoring to calculate the chances of the struggle, it is proper to bear in mind that there is an element, operative for the one side and the other, the influence of which outsiders can only guess at beforehand, and can hardly judge of fully even by its effects recorded in the election returns. A heavy expenditure of money is going on; there is probably an active manufacture of voters—a branch of business in which the Democrats, holding as they do the large towns, have the advantage of their opponents—and, generally, recourse is had to every possible electioneering trick.

The new Alabama bill is very much better than the one it displaced, and is good in itself. It declares the constitution formed by the late convention the fundamental and organic law for a State government, but for a State government that shall be merely provisional. This temporary government is to be in the hands of the officers elected at the late election, and the new governor may, if he likes, convene the legislature which was chosen at the same time with himself. We do not know why the government thus formed is not as fairly representative of the people of Alabama, and of as high origin, as the provisional government, set up by Mr. Johnson, which has held power since 1865. The legislature is empowered to resubmit the just defeated constitution to the registered voters, a majority of whom shall be a sufficient number to ratify it. The legislature may submit it unamended; but of course it will be submitted with amendments, and probably with amendments that will make it acceptable to many who voted against it before or did not vote at all. When it is thus ratified and the legislature shall have ratified the pending amendment to the Constitution of the United States, it may be presented to Congress for approval. Meantime Alabama remains, as now, under military rule—a fact on which we look with satisfaction.

The bill depriving the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction in habeas corpus cases has been passed over the President's veto and is now a law. There has been a good deal of raving about its unconstitutionality by people who understand the matter perfectly well, and who have probably imposed on a good many of those who do not. For the benefit of the latter, we may explain that by the act of 1789, which gave the Federal courts the power of issuing writs of habeas corpus, there was no right of appeal to the Supreme Court. An act of 1867 did give this right, with the view of providing more effectual protection for the blacks and Unionists at the South, in cases arising under the Civil Rights bill, or against prosecutions arising out of acts committed during the war. McCardle having been arrested by the military authorities at Vicksburg under the Reconstruction Act, applied for a habeas corpus to the United States Circuit Court in Mississippi, which remanded him, after a hearing, into custody. He accordingly appealed under the Act of 1867, and Congress, fearing that this would bring the constitutionality of the Reconstruction Act under review in the Supreme Court, and being of the opinion that the Supreme Court has no right to review it, very properly avoided a possible collision by taking from the court the appellate jurisdiction in cases of this kind which last year they conferred on it. The objection to the proceeding is that it is legislation with a view to a particular case, and not legislation based on a general principle, but the case is of such a nature that this objection is reduced to a minimum. Compared to the plan of increasing the number of judges, or of fixing the number necessary to deliver a judgment, this bill may be called absolutely free from objection, as it leaves the independence and dignity of the court unimpaired.

General Butler has written a letter to a friend, explaining and defending his course with regard to the national finances. He says he proposed his plan because he saw that the Democratic party was going to propose to issue $2,000,000 in greenbacks to pay off the bonds, and that, therefore, he advocated a "counter-proposition" to pay them off in the greenbacks already in existence, which "should take all seeming or actual wrong"—we use his own words—"from the public debt." He advocates this, he says, "in the interest of his constituents and of the Republican party, because nine-tenths of all the bonds were held east of a meridian drawn through Lake Ontario, and three-fourths of all the votes on which the party must rely were west of that meridian, where there were no bonds." In this last sentence, the cat jumps out of the bag—as the popular saying is. The desire of taking "the actual or seeming wrong" from the public debt has really had no more to do with the Butler-Sherman-Stevens "counter-proposition," than the desire of christianizing the Jews. General Butler knows perfectly well that there is no "actual wrong" in the public debt, and the way to take "seeming wrong" from it, or from anything else, is to enlighten those who think they see the wrong where it does not exist, not by falling in with their delusion, as if they were hypochondriacs. The "counter-proposition" is, in fact, as we intimated last week, a base bid on the part of some Republicans for the votes of base or ignorant men, and the special pleading of the Butlers and Shermans is simply a feeble attempt to disguise its real nature. Some of the leaders act as if they thought that when a good citizen meets a band of rioters on their way to burn a man's house, his duty is, not to remonstrate with them, or oppose them, or call the police, but to put himself at their head, and superintend the execution of the crime, representing it as perfectly justifiable, taking care to deprive it as far as possible of all features of unusual atrocity, such as the roasting of the family or the destruction of valuable papers.

The bemuddling influence of the negro on the white mind was always one of the most striking features of the anti-slavery agitation, but during that agitation it was mostly exemplified in the case of pro-slavery writers and voters. Since emancipation, although he still retains his old power of confounding his enemies, as any one may see who reads many of the arguments against negro suffrage, he seems no longer to spare his friends, and they are accordingly using him as a disguise for a good many odd things. Wendell Phillips has established, for instance, his own idea of what constitutes friendliness to the negro, as an absolute standard of morality in public men; anybody who does not come up to it, he holds as irredeemably bad. So General Butler, whenever he wants to put a good face on a doubtful transaction, refers, with perfect simplicity, to his share in emancipation, as making all his other performances right; just as the enemies of the negro, with equal simplicity, sought to justify Governor Eyre's Jamaica massacres by alleging that he had walked round the Gulf of Carpentaria in Australia. At the close of the letter to which we have referred in the foregoing paragraph, General Butler shows that inasmuch as he advocated emancipation one year before it took place, the arming of the blacks in 1862, three years before the Government resorted to it, and impartial suffrage in 1866, one year before the party took it up, nothing that people now say against his financial views can be of much consequence, or, as he expresses it, "premature clamor about them is but little annoyance." One sees, in fact, in the working of his mind, the working of the process by which political parties, started in defence of principle, gradually decline, and as they decline use their earlier goodness to cover over and excuse their later baseness, just as the Democratic party during the latter years of its existence strengthened its support of slavery by recalling its exertions on behalf of poor whites. What gives a touch of the comical to General Butler's case is that such a man as General Schouler was turned out of office in Massachusetts by the Governor little over a year ago, for expressing doubts as to whether General Butler was a fit person to represent a Massachusetts constituency. We suggested at the time—if our readers will pardon the recollection—that it would be well to wait and see how General Butler turned out, before dismissing General Schouler.

The Chicago Tribune maintains we are wrong in supposing that repudiation is the almost universal sentiment of the West, and declares that the heresy is confined to Indiana and Ohio, and that even in these States it is declining every day. We can only say that we are very glad to hear it, and that we have little doubt that the Tribune knows more about it than we do, but we must also observe that our opinions about it have not been based either on our own knowledge or observation, but on those of very well-informed persons. The Tribune also twits us in an ill-natured manner upon the fact that Messrs. Butler and Stevens, the arch-repudiators, have their bright home "in the midst of the glorious sunrise," and suggests that, this being the case, we have no business to throw all the blame of the repudiation cry on the West. Our answer to this is, while acknowledging with sorrow the claims of the East on both these gentlemen, that they make no secret of the fact that they prepared their scheme of "redeeming the public debt with irredeemable shinplasters" expressly for the Western market; and in order that there might be no mistake about it, General Butler has drawn a "meridian," as he tells us in a pleasing letter lately published in Boston, "through Lake Ontario," on the western side of which he says he can get no votes for his party without the aid of his peculiar financial views. With this explanation we leave the matter between him and the Chicago Tribune, simply observing that a politician who takes astronomical observations preparatory to a Presidential campaign is not a man to be treated lightly.

General Butler has made the opening speech in the impeachment trial. It lasted five hours, and was read from printed slips, a circumstance which, as the Tribune correspondent well remarks, "detracted merely from the thrilling effect it might otherwise have had." We learn from the same authority that "the speech was one of the best efforts ever put forth in the United States, even in the palmiest days of the oratory of the Republic." There was one passage in it which, however, we are glad we did not hear—that on the New Orleans riots—inasmuch as, according to the correspondent, the orator "ground it out between his teeth like the screeching of a hundred saws, commingled with rumbling of an artillery carriage across a rugged pavement." When he made his "allusion to all our woes coming from the acting President," he "concentrated it with an exquisite touch of mingled pathos and sarcasm," we are also told, showing that the general's "allusions" are more formidable than other men's propositions. Finally, said he, speaking of the "acting President" aforesaid, "I throw round him the mercy of my silence," uttering these words "in a cruelly severe tone of contemptuous irony." We leave it to the reader to imagine what must be "the contemptuous irony" of a speaker whose invective sounds like the commingled screeching of a hundred circular saws and the rumbling of one gun-carriage on a bad pavement.

The speech itself, as it appears in print, without the aid of the general's tones, is both carefully prepared and able. It is all argument; or, at least, as close an approach to mere argument as is necessary, till he gets to the last charge, that of bad language—what canon lawyers call "brawling"—in the speeches delivered at the West, and here he belabors the President without mercy, and, on the whole, in language not unjustifiably strong; but too strong to be very effective before any calmer or more critical audience than a jury. The substance of the speech is so familiar to the public that it would be a waste of space to reproduce it, particularly as Mr. Wilson's summing up at the close will be the speech of the occasion, and that which will either make or mar the managers' case.

We regret much to find that some of our remarks last week on the judicial proceedings in the "Erie war" have been taken to convey an imputation against the professional conduct of the counsel acting for Mr. Drew. Nothing was further from our intention. We did say of the proceedings that they resembled those of a police court rather than a court of equity, but we spoke of this as part of a deplorable state of things for which the public, and not the counsel, are primarily responsible. We certainly did not desire to cast any censure on any individuals. As long as the courts of this city are in the condition they are in, the most high-minded men must either abandon the field altogether, and leave the administration of justice wholly in the hands of the very dregs of society, or else fight the devil with his own weapons. Against those who have stomach for such encounters we certainly have no word of reproach or discouragement to utter; but we shall never cease, we trust, to look on the spectacle as a shame and scandal, and to consider the indifference with which the public regards it as a symptom of deep-seated moral disease.

We regret to learn, from the London Spectator, usually a well-informed paper, that in Connecticut, if a man does anything unusual, he is waited upon by the selectmen, who require him either to conform to the customs of his neighbors, or else quit the State. We may as well say, however, for the comfort of any eccentric Englishman like Mr. Speke, who seeks greater freedom from conventionality, that owing to the growth of population and the hilly nature of a large portion of the State, the facilities for eluding the selectmen in Connecticut are now greatly increased, and by watching his opportunity a man may, in practice, do almost anything he pleases not positively criminal. In fact, the inhabitants enjoy in their own houses an amount of liberty almost amounting to license, and, owing to the growing roughness of manners, the selectmen are chary about meddling with them. A writer in the Quarterly Review assured its readers, in 1861, that he knew of a case in Boston in which a man having put up an unusually fine lamp over his front door, a "committee" of the citizens waited on him, and compelled him to take it down, on the ground that he was giving himself airs. We are enabled to state that a great change has occurred in Boston also in this respect, and that whatever the case may have been in 1861, a "committee" which now troubled itself about other people's lamps and furniture would, if the person on whom they called was a small or delicate man, certainly be taken charge of by the police, and would find an opportunity of indulging their love of simplicity in the lock-up.

The French press bill has passed the Corps Législatif with one dissenting voice—that of old M. Berryer, the father of the French bar—a legitimist in politics, but nevertheless perhaps the "noblest Roman of them all." Of the other Liberals, three, MM. Jules Favre, Picard, and Marie, abstained from voting; the remainder voted aye, in the belief that the measure, though in most respects disagreeably repressive, full of snares and traps, and subjecting French journalists to a régime such as no others in the civilized world live under, is nevertheless an important step in advance, and as such had better be accepted Its advantage over the law as it previously existed lies in the fact, as we have before mentioned, that it takes the press from under the arbitrary control of the minister, and makes it responsible to the courts—the lower courts, to be sure, and perhaps subservient courts—but still courts, places in which a man is heard before he is condemned and in which his offence must be revealed to the world. Then, also, it enables anybody who pleases to establish a newspaper, on depositing a certain amount of caution-money, without asking the minister's permission. But it retains the stamp duty, which constitutes, perhaps, the greatest obstacle to anything like enterprise on the part of French newspaper publishers. The stamp is not like the English stamp under the old law, required simply for each copy of the paper, no matter of what size or shape. It is required for each sheet of a certain size. So that if French newspapers were to increase their size to eight pages, or, in other words, to present their readers with the same amount of printed matter as our morning papers, they would have to pay double stamp duty—that is, increase their price to a point that would seriously diminish their circulation, without putting a cent in their owners' pockets. At present, therefore, they must, in order to live, devote a large portion of their very limited space to advertisements, and cut down their news and editorial comments to a point which makes them, whether judged by the American or English standard, mere simulacra of newspapers.

Not only is the French press the most shackled in Europe, more so even than that of Russia, but the land of Montaigne, of Descartes, of Pascal, of La Bruyère, of Voltaire, is that in which the sayings of the foreign press strike most terror into the Government. All foreign newspapers are examined carefully before they are allowed to leave the post-office, and if anything objectionable is discovered they are confiscated. Of many, not over ten per cent. of the numbers reach the subscribers; and that this is a real grievance may be guessed from the fact that there are 105 German, 112 Italian, 170 American (United States), and 265 English periodicals regularly mailed to France. Some foreign papers are absolutely prohibited, and anybody found with them in his possession is liable to prosecution. A M. Greppo was the other day sent to jail for a month because he had in his pocket the Etoile Belge, which is on the prohibited list, a fact of which, however, he was entirely ignorant. It is now announced, though, that hereafter no foreign paper will be stopped on account of anything which, if it had appeared in a French paper, would not amount to a misdemeanor, and be liable to prosecution.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

GOOD SENSE ABOUT RECONSTRUCTION.

The House has done what we have no doubt ninety-nine out of every hundred thinking men in the country hoped it would do, in rejecting Mr. Farnsworth's wild plan of bringing Alabama into the Union, under a constitution which had not been adopted in compliance with the terms of the Reconstruction Act, and in sending the whole question back to the people of Alabama, by declaring the legislature elected under this constitution a good provisional government, and empowering it to submit the constitution once more to its constituents, to be accepted or rejected by a majority of those voting, providing for the admission of the State to the Union when the constitution shall have been so ratified, and when the legislature shall have adopted the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The debate was remarkable in bringing out something far better and more thoughtful than the stereotyped party harangues on the guilt of the rebellion, the depravity of the rebels, and the "inalienable rights" of man. Mr. Bingham, in particular, made a very able speech, in which he acknowledged frankly what members of Congress for a year or two have seemed somewhat afraid to do, that an important portion of the science of politics was drawn from human experience, that human experience was profitable for doctrine, for reproof, and for instruction, and that legislation with no better basis than theories concocted by stump orators or excited humanitarians was not safe legislation, was not legislation on which men who believed God to have had some important purpose to serve in furnishing men with their reason, could expect to succeed. When, for instance, we hear a gentleman talking this way—we quote from Mr. Bingham's speech—we know he has the facts before him and is arguing from them, and has that just estimate of the complexity of all political problems which is after all the mark which distinguishes the statesman from the demagogue or enthusiast—and we listen, if not with entire concurrence, always with respect:

"It was the right of the people to alter or amend their constitution, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, and they could not be deprived of that right. The American system would be a total failure if the people could not be trusted with that right. There was no colorable excuse for attempting to engraft such a provision on the statute-book. I cannot, he said, shut my eyes to the great fact that this Government was built by white men upon ideas, if not instincts, that were peculiar to the race; that the predominating element is still the same, and that there is no reason to expect that in the long future it will ever put on any other complexion. In saying this, I would not be understood to disparage the political rights of any race that fate or fortune have cast upon our shores, whether it be the docile African, or the other and more turbulent one that comes by ship loads, with its Old-World ideas and its anti-republican instincts in church and state, to fill the ranks and feed the wasting reservoir of the so-called American Democracy. We have them both to deal with, as we had the Spaniard and the Frenchman, and have now the Mexican and the Indian, and, under the new purchase of the President and the Senate, if ratified here—which God forbid!—the Esquimaux, or mongrels of the Polar Sea, and must do the best we can to incorporate and assimilate, if we can, those heterogenous elements, by educating them into a love of order and a just appreciation of the rights of man."

And again:

"It is no easy task to construct a friendly Republican State with hostile elements so formidable to be dealt with.

"He is but an apprentice in political science who thinks it can be done either in a hurry or without the co operation of a clear majority of the people. No good thing, no machine, certainly, of a construction so delicate or complex as the organization of a State, was ever perfected in a hurry. We can afford to wait. I warn gentlemen, we cannot afford to commit an error."

Mr. Dawes of Massachusetts also made a confession which is worth noting:

"He confessed that he had undergone some change of view in the year that he had been here touching the idea of representation in these two branches; he had, in times past, struggled to secure representation even to single districts as the armies of the United States cleared out the rebellious element; but he was satisfied now that instead of representation in Congress being the first thing it should be the last thing. The State should be first built up; individual and personal rights secured; the damage done by the rebellion repaired, and stability and security made certain. Representation should follow and grow out of that security, and not be the means of bringing about the security itself. It should be the last thing, and not the first."

Now, we sympathize thoroughly with those who fear—as Mr. Farnsworth and Mr. Stevens fear—that once the Southern States are released from the control of the Federal Government, the weaker of the two races into which their population is unfortunately divided, will go to the wall. We acknowledge, too, that the difficulty is not the ordinary one, which has so often been witnessed in history, of reconciling two political parties which have imbrued their hands in each other's blood, or even that greater one of reconciling two hostile races which fortune has placed side by side, and between which a difference of language or religion, in addition to that of origin, has developed hate and bitterness. It is the greatest difficulty of all—the greatest ever presented to a statesman—that of putting two races on an equality before the law in a democratic republic: the one being proud, brave, energetic, and full of ancestral pride—the other meek and mild, and completely wanting in those historical claims to respect and consideration which all the other great races of the world possess; being also different in color, and being freedmen who owe their freedom to the arms of a power which their masters looked on as a foreign enemy. We have said that there is no parallel in history for this problem; we might go further, and say that it would be difficult for a speculative politician to construct out of the materials which the actual state of human society affords an imaginary problem of greater difficulty and complexity.

But the problem, difficult as it is, differs from others not in kind, but in degree, and it has therefore to be solved, if soluble it be, by precisely the same principles on which we now deal with all other social and political difficulties; principles, let us add, which America has had the honor of adopting first, and to the use of which European countries are slowly but surely coming. What the case needs is not a different treatment; but more care, more patience, and more time in the use of the same treatment. The Southern disease is simple enough; it consists in the fierceness, the lawlessness, and prejudices of the whites; the ignorance, want of experience, and meekness of the blacks; or, in other words, defects of character on the part of the people. Now, the American remedy for these things is education and justice. Granting that the Southern whites are mostly rebels in heart; that they are "malignant" and "unrepentant" rebels—and Mr. Stevens and Parson Brownlow are constantly assuring us that they are—we ask whether, after three thousand years of experiment, and after a close study of human nature in all ages and all climates, and under a great variety of conditions, there has been found any efficient mode of changing men's hearts—that is, changing their feelings and giving a new direction to their sympathies—except kindness and teaching? Was an unrepentant man ever made really repentant by abuse and penal treatment? Did any government ever win the attachment of any large body of men by wholesale disfranchisement or confiscation, or the infliction of disabilities of any kind? If not a single case of the kind can be produced—as we know there cannot—all arguments in favor of penal measures against the Southern whites drawn from their malignity or perverseness go far to refute themselves by being merely stated. Moreover, apart from the testimony of experience, the Stevens method of dealing with the Southern States is opposed to those principles of human nature of which Christianity has been slowly but surely securing the recognition, and which are at last becoming the basis of legislation in all civilized countries. First amongst those principles stands the great one, that, to get the most out of men, to bring into play their highest moral or intellectual qualities, you must educate and persuade, you must touch their hearts and convince their reason. This principle has actually been applied to the organization of armies even by powers which are afraid to trust it in the ordinary operations of government, and its complete triumph over the old principle of fear on some of the great battle-fields of recent times we look on as one of the most striking illustrations ever afforded of the value for practical purposes of theorizing even upon a subject so dim, shadowy, and hard to grasp as the nature of man.

The plan of simple coercion on which one school of radicals are disposed to rely for the settlement of the Southern difficulty—that is, of giving one-half the population the right of forcing the other into "repentance," by depriving them of political rights, and abusing them roundly from the stump and in the newspapers, is being tried in Tennessee, and Mr. Bingham intimates that it is there a success, because there there are whites on both sides of the line, and not as there would be perhaps in other States, only blacks on one side and only whites on the other. We shall not argue this point, because our ideas of "government" differ so widely from those of anybody who is satisfied with the state of things in Tennessee that no agreement as to facts would be of any use in the controversy. The mere presence of a violent partisan like Parson Brownlow in the gubernatorial chair, as a reward for his sufferings, is to us in itself a proof that every sound principle of reconstruction, in the highest sense of the word, has been violated in reorganizing the State government; and as to the condition of the interior of the State, if that be "government," we feel about it as the Irishman felt about riding in a sedan chair, who having been put into one which had no bottom or seat, and having had to keep up with the bearers by the use of his own legs, replied, on being asked how he liked it, "that if it was not for the name of the thing he would as soon walk." If Tennessee be under a "regular government," we should, were we an inhabitant of the State, if it were not for the name of the thing, as soon have anarchy.

Moreover, we do not share Mr. Stevens's or Mr. Farnsworth's faith, as we intimated last week, in paper constitutions. There is one class of loyalists at the South, and they have a host of sympathizers at the North, who seem to fancy, that if they can only be allowed to draw a constitution in their own way, and get a certain number of votes in its favor, and get Congress to admit the State under it, all their troubles will be over; the "unrepentant rebels" will repent, the malignant grow meek and good-natured, and the "belchers of treason" take to singing "Rally round the flag." They get double-leaded leading articles in the same sense into the Tribune and Independent occasionally, but then we feel sure very few sober men fall victims to their delusion. Even the most ardent politicians of this school will acknowledge to you, privately, that as far as bringing the Southerners to reason or creating security for the life and property of loyal men goes, the admission of the States to the Union will of itself be of about as much value as the swallowing of the constitution by the Reconstruction Committee, macerated in hot water. The reliance of one section of Radicals on the effect of well-written constitutions on Southern society and on the unregenerate rebel heart is, in fact, a kind of superstition not far removed from fetish-worship.

The agencies, and the only agencies, that will do much for Southern society are time and education. Both Mr. Bingham and Mr. Dawes, in mentioning these in the late debate, went to the heart of the matter. The wisest legislation cannot materially quicken the transformation; hasty or unwise legislation may indefinitely retard it. The whites have to learn, what is for them one of the hardest of lessons, that the blacks are their fellow-citizens, that they are protected by the law, and that their wishes must be consulted and respected. No denunciations of treason at the North and no number of acts of Congress can materially advance this process. Giving the blacks the suffrage, or declaring the suffrage to be an "inalienable right," will not do it either. It must come partly through mental and moral development, partly through constant familiarity with the fact that the blacks are protected; that when a white man injures one, the same legal consequences follow as if he had injured another white. How much of the security in which we live here at the North we owe to this habit of mind on the part of evil-doers, and how little, after all, to the direct fear of a particular penalty, few people consider. Moreover, the blacks have to become familiar with the fact that they have rights, and that they live under law and not under individual will, and to form the habits both of self-confidence and self-restraint that come from this consciousness. They have to learn the use of legal process and of political power; have to find out their precise relation to the rest of the community—many of them even the nature of civil society—and to ascertain the extent of their own political capacity. Until all this has been done with as near an approach to completeness as the chaotic condition in which the war left Southern society, and the weaknesses and imperfections of human nature, will permit, there will be no real reconstruction, although every State in the Union were represented in Congress, and every man, woman, and child at the South voted three times a day.

Now, it is because we believe military rule—that horrible thing which so many of our political sages are constantly denouncing—in the form in which it exists at present in the South—that is, prescribed and regulated by law, confined within fixed limits, exercised under responsibility to a deliberative body, and acting mainly in aid of the civil authorities—supplies this education both to blacks and whites better than anything else can supply it, as nothing else can supply it—that we have been opposed to all haste in the matter of "bringing back the States to the Union," as it is called. Nothing is lost by delay as long as the country knows that Congress has said its last word, and drawn up its last plan, because during the delay the educational process is going on, schools are springing up, habits of obedience to law spreading, the passions of the war subsiding. What has made delay pernicious has been the uncertainty as to the end which the action of the more violent members of the House have infused into it, the want of confidence in the Northern people, which they have shown by their shower of bills and reports, every one of which seemed to be framed with the view of showing that they had no faith in the Reconstruction Act themselves, and did not believe anybody else had. The last action of Congress with regard to Alabama shows that the reign of sobermindedness is returning. The State has been handed over to a loyal legislature, which has the military force at its back, and can in peace and quietness and at its leisure submit the new constitution to the people, and make such amendments to it as seem necessary. We trust sincerely that those amendments will all be in the direction of amnesty and oblivion for the mass of Southerners, and that the Unionists—great though their wrongs and sufferings may have been—will give up the senseless attempt to win men's good-will or cause them to repent of their hostility by acts of proscription which, if they are ever executed, must be executed by brute force, and which, if the needful amount of brute force be not forthcoming, must prove simply bits of irritation applied to a powerful enemy by persons whose very lives are in his hands, and whom, come what will, they have to acknowledge as a neighbor and fellow-citizen.

SIMPLE JUSTICE.

Are born Americans to have less protection from the Republic than naturalized Americans?

When Fritz Butterbrodt, a native of Posen, but for years back a voter in New York, goes to Prussia to visit his relatives, and is there made a victim of conscription, the Hon. N. P. Banks rises to the question with just fury, the Hon. George Bancroft flies to Berlin grasping the thunderbolts of the American eagle, and presently a message returns through the ocean cable that hereafter Fritz Butterbrodt's citizenship shall be respected.

But when fifteen hundred Americans are similarly served in England, Congress sees no cause for interference. We do not refer to Fenians. Nearly if not quite all of these sufferers are children of our soil; they are persons, moreover, of whom the nation pretends to be more or less proud; finally, to crown the outrage, many of them are women. Yet to the number of fifteen hundred they have been seized by foreign hands, forced into alien uniforms, and obliged to serve for the good of strangers. For these abused fellow-citizens we demand simple justice.

The injury done to them appears the more atrocious when it is considered that the mere product of American invention—the mere wood-and-iron result of the Yankee mechanical faculty—has been protected in all civilized lands by our legislation and diplomacy. The American machinist can secure his patent in England; he can secure it in France, Spain, Germany, Sweden, and Russia; he is as safe everywhere from robbery as if he were a native of every soil. Yet fifteen hundred respectable Americans have been forced to serve in foreign ranks without provoking a resolution from Congress or a proclamation from the President.

Fifteen hundred American works have been "pirated" abroad, and sold for the benefit of foreign populations, without returning a dollar to the American author, or the American publisher, or the American type-setter, or the American paper-maker.

More than simple justice has been accorded to the inventor of a machine. Ideas are usually admitted to be the common property of the race; and the ideas by which a publisher, a shipper, a grocer, a gardener carries on his business belong to society at large; he may devise new channels for his industry, but he cannot prevent others from following in his track. In like manner, the author makes no claim to an exclusive proprietorship of the ideas which he lays before the public. As free gifts, to be discussed, adopted, and promulgated at the pleasure of every one, the world receives the theory of gravitation from Sir Isaac Newton and the law of universal evolution from Herbert Spencer. Every man can write or speak of them as he pleases, and draw from them without charge what profit he may. There is no more copyright or patent-right upon them than there is upon the conception of sending a ship to Japan after tea, or of employing female clerks in a grocery, or of keeping mercantile books by double-entry.

The law of copyright is not founded (as Mr. Carey would have us believe) on the supposition that ideas are property, but on the truth that the expression of them, the dress in which they are presented, is property. This alone is unquestionably the result of the author's labor, and this alone, therefore, is his. You may seize upon every statement, deduction, conclusion, or simile which he offers, and so long as you do not copy his form, his arrangement of chapters, paragraphs, sentences, and words, you are safe from prosecution, however you may incur the charge of plagiarism. In the single case of the mechanical inventor has statute law gone beyond common law to establish property in ideas. This is the patent-right—a bounty on one beneficent exercise of intellect—a conception beyond the grasp of barbarians—a necessity of a great mechanical age—a giant step in progress. And, strange to say, patent-right has become international; Europe admits that our inventors may own and sell their ideas on her soil; the world pays willing tribute to American mechanics.

Such being the case with the inventor, how fares it with the author? He has produced not so much ideas as expressions of ideas. He has made a history, an essay, a school-book, a dictionary, a novel, a poem; and because he has put forth a form which did not exist before, he claims it as his own; he does not claim the marble in which he has wrought, but the statue which he has designed; in short, he claims his style. His claim has been allowed by the human sense of justice, or, in other words, by common law. But in order that his right may not wrong society, in order that his property may not remain perpetually in his family, in order that the race may benefit somewhat (perhaps unjustly) at the expense of the individual, statute law has stepped in with its so-called copyright and has limited the author's claim. This point must be distinctly understood. Copyright laws do not establish the author's right in his work; on the contrary, they in some measure take away from it; they limit it to a period of years. Society has acted here as it has in the law of entail—it has cut down the rights of the individual for the supposed good of the mass; the copyright law is an act of limitation.

At the same time it fully recognizes the natural right of the author; it fully recognizes the fact that his book, his form of expression, the result of his labor, is his property; it punishes trespassers upon this property precisely as it punishes trespassers upon other property. Our copyright law is a penal code, and regards those who violate it as thieves. If an American prints, without the writer's consent, a book to which property has been proved under this law, he not only forfeits to the injured proprietor every copy so produced, but subjects himself to a fine of fifty cents for each printed sheet which is found in his possession. It is precisely because the act is a penal one, and is therefore strictly construed, that the plunderer is not liable for the number of sheets which he has had, but only for those which are discovered in his hands or on his premises. It is also because the act is a penal one that the fine is divided between the two parties offended, the state and the author. It is important to note the penal nature of this statute because it shows how unreservedly society recognizes the property of the author in his book. The man who is proved to have taken it without leave is, in the emphatic small caps and exclamation points of Mrs. Proudie, "A CONVICTED THIEF!!"

Such is the difference between patent-right and copyright. The patent-right is a bounty to the inventor; it is the establishment by statute of a property which does not exist in nature; it is the ownership of an idea, granted for the encouragement of men who can fecundate ideas. The copyright, on the contrary, is a limitation of a species of natural property which otherwise would remain for ever in the hands of its creator and of his legal heirs. If you violate patent-right you are punished by damages. If you violate copyright, you are punished penally, as a thief. But, strange to say, the first has become international, while the second has not. The legislative and executive branches of our government have seen to it that the claims of our inventors shall be respected in foreign lands, but have neglected to enforce the rights of our authors. The consequence is that fifteen hundred American books have been reprinted abroad, without returning a dollar to those who created them. The consequence is that an English publisher can, with impunity, commit that same violation of the rights of natural property for which an American publisher would be tried under a penal statute and punished as a criminal. The consequence is that, while Samuel Colt, the inventor of a weapon of death, has left to his widow and orphans a vast fortune, drawn in large measure from foreign lands, Nathaniel Hawthorne, an author who has enriched the language and the soul of the whole English race, has left to his widow and orphans what may in comparison be styled a beggarly pittance.

Some of the American advocates of an International Copyright Law are likely to do the cause harm by resting their claim on an imperfect theory and resorting to such arguments as the following: "The interests of the country demand an American literature; this an international copyright law would secure, by raising the price of foreign books, and thus enabling American books to compete with them."

The opponents of the law reply: "We feel no need of an American literature as long as we can get good books from other countries. You cannot promise that your American books will ever be superior to the foreign, and you must admit that, for a time, they will be inferior. It is more for the interest of the country that we should have the works of the accomplished writers of Europe at a very cheap rate, than that we should be forced to pay more for their works or put up with literature which is now, and must be for some time to come, provincial."

"But," say the advocates, "consider the advantage of having a body of intelligent literary men amongst us."

"Well," answer the opponents, "so far as such a body exerts an influence by writing books, it has no more effect than foreign authors would have. As to its personal influence on the world around it, we don't believe it will begin to compensate for the loss suffered by the vast majority of us who do not come in contact with authors, if books become more costly."

Another opponent says: "It is better that our literature should be mixed and that we should read the books of all nations. We have a large body of American literature already, large enough in proportion to the foreign element."

Another says: "Authors are well enough paid. The market is overstocked now." In reply to which Mr. Parton demonstrates that a lady in Hartford does not pay the income tax she would if we had an international copyright; to which Mr. Carey answers by exhibiting a list of authors with large incomes. Again, authors talk of protecting American literature as if this were a question of protection or free trade; and many a free-trader is provoked to the declaration, "No copyright for me. I am for free trade in everything."

Thus the indifferent voter, and it is he that we wish to influence, sees presented to him a question involved in a maze of discussion, through which he does not care to work his way. He concludes very naturally that it is a question of interest, and that the interests of readers, of the world at large, are opposed to the interests of authors; and then he justifies himself in this opinion by remarking the immense amount of paper and ink devoted to it. Whatever may be the end of such a controversy, it serves to complicate a simple question and to introduce irrelevant considerations—a process of which Mr. Carey's pamphlet affords several striking illustrations; we might say it affords nothing else. He speaks of the deplorable results of English centralization in increasing the weight of reaping machines, which must be a source of profound sorrow to the English farmer, to say nothing of the possible feelings of his cattle. He tells us that America, un-centralized, has four dental colleges, while centralized Europe has none, a fact which, if generally known, might lead to a large immigration of foreigners with defective teeth, and a consequent rise in the price of spoon-victuals and aliment requiring but little mastication. But what have these matters to do with copyright? And how can a mind overwhelmed by such startling disclosures as these proceed to the calm consideration of a question of right?

Again, when authors come forward as the champions of international copyright, with appeals to American patriotism and expressions of deep solicitude for the best interests of the country, urging a measure the most direct effect of which is to be an increase in the price of books, "the country" is very apt to think that authors are not precisely the disinterested and high-minded body upon which it would like to make itself dependent for mental and moral culture.

Would it not be better for authors to stop asking for protection as for a favor, or trying to buy it by promises of gain to the country? They can take their stand on the ground of right and justice; then they can retort on Mr. Carey his own "Fais ce que doy, advienne que pourra;" the hostile free trader they can answer with Mr. Reade's "Free trade is free buying and selling, not free stealing." They may believe that what they urge is for the interest of the country; and if they had no better argument they might fall back on that; but they have a better argument, one simple, easily understood, and which needs only to be understood to convince. As to the interest of the country, that will show for itself in time, and all that need be said of it now is, that it is not for the interest of a country to do injustice.

Authors ought not, in short, to stand like beggars, hat in hand, asking for alms; not to talk about an infant literature requiring protection, as if they were babies applying to Congress for nurses; but to assert their right, and aim at a law which shall recognize their property in their books to be permanent and subject to no conditions. As Mr. Carey justly observes:

"It will, perhaps, be said that the treaty contains a proviso that the author shall sell his copyright to an American publisher, or shall himself cause his book to be republished here . . . . . Admit that such limitations be found in the treaty, by what right are they there? The basis of such a treaty is the absolute right of an author to his book; and if this be admitted, with what show of consistency or justice can we undertake to dictate to him whether he shall sell or retain it—print it here or abroad? With none, as I think."

MISERRIMUS.

GIVEN up through all the unserviceable day,
O'er the ship's side that moves not in her place,
To lean and look and languidly to trace,
On the slow glass of the receding bay,
The troubled image of a troubled face;
Or, with vague longing, up and down to pace
The narrow deck, and of the far-away
Swift ships that glisten with momentary spray,
Ask what avails a little larger space
Of insufficient ocean,—this is he
Whose stranded life, too careful to be free,
No dreams deliver and all thoughts betray
To hate the calm that holds him in delay,
To doubt the wind that calls him to the sea.

ROBERT WEEKS.

THE GREAT DRESS QUESTION.

WE spoke last week of the failure of Mr. Adams to appear at the recent Queen's "Drawing Room" in London, owing to what the London Times calls "unavoidable circumstances," which means, we believe, the want of anything to wear, or, rather, his inability, owing to the action of Congress last year, to wear a suitable, or, at all events, what he considers a suitable, costume. Mr. Sumner, who introduced the joint resolution of last session prohibiting court-dress on such occasions, and to whose share in the affair we referred, has since sent us Executive Document No. 31, presented to the Thirty-sixth Congress, in 1860, by Mr. Buchanan, containing "the instructions and correspondence relative to the uniform or costume of persons in the diplomatic or consular service," being, in fact, an official history of this great controversy, and Mr. Sumner probably means this piece of courtesy to cover a mild rebuke of the somewhat irreverent tone in which we have dealt with the matter. At all events, we are willing to receive it as such, and have accordingly studied No. 31 with great diligence, and with such ability as we possess, for the purpose of getting, if possible, some fresh light on a question with which we confess our unfitness to deal adequately, but with which our position compels us to deal somehow.

What costume was worn at court by American ministers prior to 1817, we confess we do not know. At the dawn of history, which in this case is the year above-mentioned, they were found to be in the habit of making their appearance in the following guise, upon which, however, in the absence of an engraved plate, and owing to a certain want of imagination in matters of clothes, we pass no opinion of our own:

"A blue coat, lined with white silk; straight standing cape, embroidered with gold, single-breasted, straight or, round button-hole, slightly embroidered. Buttons plain, or, if they can be had, with the artillerists' eagle stamped upon them, i. e., an eagle flying, with a wreath in its mouth, grasping lightning in one of its talons. Cuffs embroidered in the manner of the cape; white cassimere breeches; gold knee-buckles; white silk stockings; and gold or gilt shoe-buckles. A three-cornered chapeau-bras, not so large as those used by the French, nor so small as those of the English. A black cockade, to which lately an eagle has been attached. Sword, etc., corresponding."

We ought to add that we have consulted some ladies on the subject, and are able to state, on their authority, that gentlemen "got up" in this way for a festive occasion would present, if not an imposing, a very pleasing appearance. By "the medium style" of the cocked hat—neither so large as that used by the French, nor so small as that worn by the English—they were particularly struck.

When Andrew Jackson became President, however, he came to the conclusion that this costume was too gorgeous, and he prescribed and rather strongly recommended the following, as being cheaper and better "adapted to the simplicity of our institutions":

"A black coat, with a gold star on each side of the collar near its termination; the under-clothes to be black or white, at the option of the wearer; a three-cornered chapeau de bras, with a black cockade and gold eagle; and a steel-mounted sword with white scabbard."

This is a great falling-off in the matter of splendor, but we do not venture to find fault with it. In fact we cannot, owing to the mental defect abovementioned, for the life of us tell in which of these dresses an American minister would look best, but we have no doubt a man of the right sort would look well in either, and had we been in charge of the Department of State, we honestly confess we should have allowed ministers to wear whichever of the two best suited their purse or complexion. If anybody will take the trouble to compare the two costumes article by article, he will see that their comparison involves a good many knotty points which Secretaries of State are not always competent to decide; such questions, for instance, as the relative merits of "white cassimere breeches," and simply black or white "under clothes" in lieu of the breeches. Nobody, we venture to assert, is fit to pass on such question who has not enjoyed the opportunity of submitting it to experiment or observation.

Things were in this condition, however, some ministers probably wearing one costume, others the other, when Mr. Marcy launched the famous circular of 1853, recommending ministers to confine themselves when appearing at court to the "simple dress of an American citizen." The "simple dress of an American citizen" is, of course, a very vague term inasmuch as it includes all varieties of costume from full evening dress down to shirt sleeves and homespun pantaloons, but then the circular was only a recommendation, and it left every minister free to exercise his own discretion. It produced a terrible uproar in Europe, however. Mr. Sanford wrote from Paris that as soon as he saw the news in the newspapers he determined to go to court in "citizen's dress," and informed M. Drouyn de Lhuys of the fact, and explained to him the whole theory of the change but was assured by him that it would "not affect injuriously the relations of the two countries." Mr. Seibels sent his thanks and rejoicings from Brussels. Mr. Daniel prepared the Court of Turin for his transformation, and it received the news with perfect fortitude. At Berlin there was trouble. The King hearing that Mr. Vroom was coming down on him in the character of a "simple citizen," became cantankerous, and Mr. Vroom had "to procure a plain and simple dress." At Stockholm, too, Mr. Schroeder had to succumb to the antiquated prejudices of the King. At the Hague, however, Mr. Belmont made a noble stand, and carried his point. The King received him in the simple dress of the citizen, but trouble was expected with the Queen-mother, who was very punctilious and apt to be rude, but Mr. Belmont faced even her, and she had to give way. Now some people might possibly suppose that Mr. Belmont lost favor at court by this step. Nothing of the kind. The friends of virtue will peruse with emotion his own account of what happened after he had appeared in the national costume:

"I, as well as my family, have been treated with the utmost courtesy, on all occasions, by every member of the royal family, and at the last ball of the Casino, one of a series of entertainments somewhat similar to the Washington Assembly balls, which are attended by the whole court, I was honored by an invitation of the Queen to dance a quadrille with her, which was not the less gratifying for happening on a more public occasion than the ordinary court balls and for my being the only member of the diplomatic corps similarly honored that evening."

We are all in the habit of thinking of Benjamin Franklin's appearance in the colonial costume of the period at the court of Versailles, as the representative of the rising republic, as a proud moment for America; but we confess we cannot help doubting whether the spectacle of the Honorable Auguste Belmont dancing a quadrille, in a thoroughly republican frame of mind, as our representative, in citizen's clothes, with the Queen of the Netherlands, was not, on the whole, a prouder and more gratifying one.

At Paris, however, things did not go smoothly after Mr. Mason's arrival in 1854. Mr. Sanford, the chargé d'affaires, was, as we have said, from the outset a fanatical champion of plain clothes. Mr. Mason, however, took to court dress, to Mr. Sanford's great disgust, who looked on his chief's weakness as both a national disgrace and a slur on him personally. He accordingly indignantly resigned his office on the ground that Mr. Mason was going to court in "a coat embroidered with gilt tinsel, a sword, and cocked hat, the invention of a Dutch tailor in Paris, borrowed chiefly from the livery of a subordinate attaché of legation of one of the petty powers of the Continent." Mr. Mason, however, defended himself in a long despatch, in which he called his clothes "a simple uniform dress."

In London Mr. Buchanan, too, was involved in serious difficulties in consequence of the circular, and had several consultations with Sir Edward Cust, the master of the ceremonies. Sir Edward urged him to appear at court in some sort of costume, and not to present himself in the clothes he wore on the street. "After due reflection," Mr. Buchanan "determined neither to wear gold lace nor embroidery." Here he drew the line; all else was open to negotiation and compromise. He was anxious to please the Queen and yet to "wear something in character with our democratic institutions," and what that thing ought to be puzzled him sorely. While cudgelling his brains, a suggestion was made to him which we must allow him to describe himself:

"It was then suggested to me, from a quarter which I do not feel at liberty to mention, that I might assume the civil dress worn by General Washington; but after examining Stewart's portrait at the house of a friend, I came to the conclusion that it would not be proper for me to adopt this costume. I observed: 'Fashions had so changed since the days of Washington, that if I were to put on his dress and appear in it before the chief magistrate of my own country at one of his receptions, I should render myself a subject of ridicule for life. Besides, it would be considered presumption in me to affect the style of dress of the Father of his Country.'

"It was in this unsettled state of the question, and before I had adopted any style of dress, that Parliament was opened."

Of this idea we can only say that we think Mr. Buchanan was a little too hasty in rejecting it. It is not yet too late for some of our diplomatists abroad to take it up, and if any prominent one will do so, and will present himself at any public ceremonial in Europe dressed out in imitation of "the Father of his Country," we think we can safely promise that there are plenty of his fellow-citizens who will not allow either distance or expense to prevent them from being there to see. There are some sights which no man laying claim to cultivation or knowledge of the world can afford to miss, and this would certainly be one of them.

The last letter in the correspondence comes from the pen of the indefatigable Mr. Sanford, who, being at Derby, Connecticut, in 1860, and hearing that Mr. Faulkner was going to Paris, and, fearing from his sorrowful experience with Mr. Mason that Mr. Faulkner would do something dreadful in clothes if not checked in time, addressed to Mr. Cass a long and able disquisition on "diplomatic apparel," earnestly begging of him to put Faulkner under bonds before his departure, and giving the following sad account of the state of things at our legations abroad at that time:

"Some of our ministers abroad conform to the instructions of June 1, 1853; some of them consult their individual notions as to the kind of dress most becoming themselves, personally. One, to my knowledge, has the constellation of our confederacy embroidered in thirty-odd emblematic stars on the collar of his coat; another adopted the uniform of the United States army; another that of a municipal councillor of Paris, viz.: a black velvet dress with rich silk embroidery. One functionary had all his buttons fashioned after the national shield, with spread-eagle attachment; and I hear of another proposing to have a gorgeous suit manufactured out of the star-spangled banner. Now, sir, imagine the spectacle of these American representatives of diverse fancies and tastes assembled together! Nothing save a fancy ball at Musard's or a burlesque first-of-April parade of eccentric tatterdemalions would equal it. Is it just to this country, its institutions, and people, that they be thus represented?"

When we had done with Document No. 31, the question which first suggested itself to us was whether we had ever seen so much rubbish in print before, in a paper laying claim to a serious character. We decided that we had not, and we doubt if any of our readers have. The next question was, what earthly harm would have resulted from letting the American ministers abroad go on wearing the star on their black coat and the small sword, which the [Jackson] administration prescribed or recommended? What interest would have suffered from allowing American ambassadors at court ceremonies to carry about them a cheap and not obtrusive sign that they are ambassadors and not court servants or rowdies? None that we know of, or that any one else knows of. What has been gained for republicanism or for the United States by the squabbles and perplexities recorded for our humiliation in the pamphlet before us? Nothing in the world. Nobody thinks any the more highly of either of them. Europeans are not fools, and a protest on behalf of republican simplicity against monarchical glare, offered by a minister's dressing like a waiter when he is followed to court by a swarm of his countrymen and countrywomen bespangled with diamonds, laden with every other sort of finery money can procure, and famous all over the Continent for the recklessness of their extravagance, simply affords the court circles and the general public materials for a great laugh both at the minister and his principles.

The imaginations of some people—and Mr. Marcy was apparently amongst the number—were fired by the "hit" which Franklin made in his gray woollen stockings and thick shoes at the French court; but they forget that it was Franklin's legs the stockings covered, and they forget, too, that he was the first real Republican that the French court had ever seen. To reproduce all the reasons why Franklin was so great a success would, in fact, be a biography of himself and a history of his time in both hemispheres. The reasons why that success cannot be repeated now, no matter what resolutions Congress may pass, could be stated in much shorter compass, if they had to be stated at all.

The French have a saying, full of that small, social wisdom in which the French excel: "La simplicité est charmante, mais il n'y a rien de si difficile," which is strikingly applicable to this matter of "diplomatic apparel." Simplicity lies in the character, and not in the clothes. You cannot order a supply of simplicity at your tailor's. You cannot persuade people that you are simple in your tastes or habits by wearing this or not wearing that. Many a man wears shabby or plain clothes through sheer affectation or love of display. Moreover, you cannot cultivate simplicity for simplicity's sake. You can no more secure it by direct pursuit than you can reach the principle of life by vivisection. It has to come indirectly, as the consequence or accompaniment of other and greater things. The aim of those who occupy themselves with the figure our ambassadors cut abroad should be to provide such men for the service that it shall make no difference what they wear; and the reason why we find this fuss about their clothes so repulsive is not that we like court-dress or any other foppery, but that we believe that those who are most clamorous for their appearance in "citizen's dress" are those who care least what kind of men the dress covers. We venture to say that if anybody will look into the matter he will find that hardly anybody who attaches much importance to our Ministers' appearance in black broadcloth takes much interest in the reform of the Civil service, or in having the country represented abroad by its best men. We do not include Mr. Sumner in this category. It has been our melancholy duty on various occasions to refuse to accept his judgment as final on divers weighty questions, but we are by no means ignorant of what the country owes him for his services on the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, or of the zeal, knowledge, and good sense he has brought to the treatment of a class of questions about which, as a general rule, senators know and care too little. And we acknowledge with great pleasure that since the Republican party came into power, the nation has been represented abroad more respectably and efficiently than it has been before in many a long year. But even under that party there have been, and are, as everybody knows who has lived in any of the foreign capitals, great scandals and abuses, which make this effort after simplicity in dress simply ridiculous. There is no more reason why our foreign ministers should not wear an appropriate uniform than why officers in the army and navy should not, and the attempt to persuade the people that there is some principle involved in the matter is simply due on the part of several of those engaged in it to a desire to turn public attention away from the inside of a very dirty platter by a prodigious scrubbing of the outside.

THE "PEOPLE'S READINGS."

MODERN "society," where the people to any considerable degree compose it, creates peculiar needs, and of the needs thus created none is greater than that of popular recreations which will combine amusement with instruction, and both with cheapness. Amusement alone soon becomes enervating and perhaps becomes coarse. Instruction alone is almost of necessity pedantic and uninviting. Refined amusement is expensive, because it can be furnished only by artists who must be paid well. Agreeable instruction is expensive, because only first-rate men can give it, and they cannot afford to give it for nothing. Cheap concerts are very "cheap" indeed. Cheap theatres it would be an economy to get rid of at a handsome price. Even the "minstrels" cost too much for the classes who should be reached, and give them scarcely anything they ought to have. But the world is full of books which all might read with delight as well as profit, and there is no lack of men and women to read them aloud, in an interesting manner, to a large assemblage of people. Twenty years ago, Mr. Matthew Davenport Hill, in a charge delivered to the grand jury in Birmingham, England, suggested that some entertaining book like "Robinson Crusoe" be read by instalments, on a certain evening of every week, in some hall, school-room, or private apartment, to such an audience as would come in from the streets and tenement-houses and places of idleness, exposure, or temptation. Let the reading, he said, occupy half an hour, and be illustrated with maps or drawings, if these could be obtained; if not, let the reading be given alone. Let as much vivacity be thrown into the reading as possible, as much variety of facial and vocal expression; let hard words be explained or omitted, and let the local and historical allusions be made clear. These little expedients would engage attention; the interest of the story would win upon the listeners, and secure very nearly the same audience for a succession of nights. How far this hint of Mr. Hill's had influence in originating the popular readings in England that have excited so much interest and been productive of no inconsiderable good, we do not know. It would seem that those who have begun to inaugurate the People's Readings in New York have never come across it.

The intelligent classes in this country, who can read themselves, have little occasion for public readings, and will give little patronage to them. They have books, novels, histories, magazines, papers in abundance, and at prices they can easily enough afford. Such of them as have the means attend lectures or theatres, or find diversion in social and political gatherings. Those who can appreciate the higher literature and enjoy the higher kind of elocution, will, if their purses allow, delight in Mrs. Kemble's grand readings of Shakespeare.

But these, and all such fine artistic performances, are for the cultivated who have leisure to indulge their poetic taste. The "people," the working people, the dull, toil-worn people, the passionate, the tempted, the solitary, the vagabond, the ignorant and stupid, who either cannot read or do not care to, who must be interested, excited, fascinated before they can be held, would not attend such readings if they could have them for nothing. The only public readings that are patronized at all with us are readings of a high order of merit, which demand superior talent. We except from this remark the readings of Mr. Dickens, which owed their popularity to the man and his works, in a great measure also to his histrionic powers, not in the least to his skill as an elocutionist, which was of the feeblest description. Cultivated people went in crowds to hear Mr. Dickens because they admired his writings, because he had immense fame, because it was the fashion to go, and because the entertainment was made very select by being made very expensive. The readings themselves would, in most parts, be enjoyed heartily by any audience that could be collected from the streets. In fact, such an audience would probably be more delighted by the performance than were many of those who paid ten dollars to hear it. The humor, the wit, the drollery, the grimace, the fun, the pathos, the description, the dramatic interest of the story, the reality of the personages introduced, the air of common humanity about the whole exhibition, the smell of the ground, the absence in the reader of art or the affectation of art, all combined would be irresistible among Bohemians and newsboys. If Mr. Dickens would read for ten cents a head in Baxter Street or in the Cooper Union, none but the unwashed being admitted, he would empty the dance-houses and theatres and grog-geries in a trice. But, unhappily, those who can make fortunes by their reading will not read for nothing; and they who are willing to read for nothing are people whose performances will not draw. The thing aimed at, therefore, should be the reading of productions that will draw by people who will not. The reader must select for his audience pieces that cannot fail to excite as well as instruct—at all events, to deeply interest them. For the most part, these will be narrative pieces, tales longer or shorter, biographies of noted men and women, descriptions of famous places, dialogues, kindling poems, and themes that lie near the listener's hearts, lyrics of heroism. Sir Walter Scott's novels furnish admirable reading. You may open Dickens anywhere and find the very thing desired; or his own arrangements might be used. Douglas Jerrold abounds in chapters full of meat. A few of his novelettes are inimitable. There are thrilling stories illustrating the evils of intemperance, of vagabondage, lying, stealing, thriftlessness, unchastity, evil companionship, that could not be effectively read without moving the roughest audience. Is poetry needed? Take Hood almost anywhere; the "Bridge of Sighs," "Miss Kilmansegg." Take Brownell; but take not the Brownings or Tennyson or Wordsworth or Poe.

Mr. Frobisher and his colleagues mean well, no doubt. They are zealous, and they cannot be ambitious of much money-making. But, speaking frankly, and in a matter like this we have no right to speak otherwise, they seem not to have the idea that they read to people who can and do to some extent read for themselves; they read pieces which only the intelligent and the partially cultivated can enjoy, and they read in a way that is not calculated to impress rude or simple minds. Some allowance must of course be made for persons trying a novel experiment; but the allowance can hardly go so far as to excuse a want of appreciation of the thing to be accomplished, or of the essential means necessary for its accomplishment. Their selections are too numerous to begin with; they allow of no continuous interest, of no culminating effect. Each demands a separate effort, touches a distinct string, excites an individual emotion; and when the whole is over nothing is carried away. The successive blows neutralize each other.

Then, again, the pieces are not in themselves attractive to the audiences they should wish to reach. Admirably suited for the exhibition of rhetorical graces where these exist; requiring, in fact, unusual accomplishment in voice and expression to make them intelligible sometimes, they have no more aptness for the people than a composition by Wagner or Spohr. On the opening night every piece was an elocutionary study, which invited criticism, but which failed to keep awake those who could not criticise. They taught nothing; they suggested nothing; they excited no feeling; they drew neither tears nor smiles. Listening to them was an effort. This mistake will perhaps be corrected, if the experiment continues long enough to make timely correction possible. But unless radically corrected, by the substitution of a different plan, the readings will interest no class in the community. The cultivated will not attend them, for they are not good enough; the uncultivated will not, for they are not on their plane. Besides all this, the rhetoric is too ambitious, more so than its quality warrants. The art of concealing art is less thought of than the art of displaying art. It is declamatory and turgid to a degree that causes an uncomfortable sensation at times to the sensitive listener. It was all declamation where, in truth, there should be no declamation at all; where declamation is sadly out of place. People like declamation in an orator or in an actor, but not in a reader. The reading for the people should be simple, sincere, earnest, full of warmth and sympathy, wholly self-forgetful on the reader's part. The more culture and training the better, provided they are not conspicuous. Two years ago there was a proposition to ask Edwin Booth to read to the people of the lower quarters of the city. But Mr. Booth is an actor. He would read nothing but plays. And he would not, it is likely, read them in an agreeable or impressive manner. The dialogue would embarrass him and his audience; while his theatrical training would make his delivery affected. His peculiar excellence as a player would spoil him for this duty. If we are to have readings for the people which the people will listen to, they must be given by "unprofessional" readers; by persons who have warm hearts, sound minds, a feeling for the people's tastes and capacities, and sufficient skill to interpret good, wholesome, racy literature. They must be given gratuitously, or nearly so, in such halls as can be procured directly among the people for whom they are designed. They must be continuous and even. Let them be relieved by an occasional song—no fantasias on the piano, executed by professors; let them be varied by bright dramatic scenes, charades, tableaux. Such things may tell on the ignorant, the stupid, and the animal. They have been useful in England; they may be useful here. But they must be done in the spirit of reform, in the spirit of humanity; not in the spirit of ambitious display. They must rely on their own merit, not on great names or on newspapers; and they must be carried on, as good things always are carried on, by patience and sacrifice. In such an enterprise nothing like vanity should be allowed to appear. The performers should seem and be unconscious of their merit as elocutionists, if they possess it. If they are not, their listeners will not even be entertained, and improvement will be wholly out of the question. They who have undertaken this excellent work in England have been actuated by no love of notoriety or passion for display or greed of gain, but by a sincere desire to benefit their fellow-men by improving their leisure hours and counteracting the vicious influences that abuse them so generally now. A purpose like that will raise up readers sufficiently well qualified for their homely task, and will call in audiences capable of thanking them.

ENGLAND.—TWO DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

LONDON, March 13, 1868.

I WAS present last night in the strangers' gallery of the House of Commons during the adjourned debate upon Ireland, and perhaps a short account of what I heard may be of interest as illustrating the present state of English feeling with regard to that interminable difficulty. The previous debate had been of the dreariest character. Mr. Maguire opened the subject in a speech of pure Irish fluency, rising at times into eloquence, but perhaps oftener losing itself in rather vague declamation. Lord Mayo, the Irish Secretary, replied by three mortal hours of statistics, proving, what I think is generally admitted, that there is a slow but tolerably steady progress in the material prosperity of the country, and stating the Government policy, if policy it can be called. The second night's debate was of considerably greater interest, and some of the acknowledged lights of the House of Commons defended their different positions. The chief speakers were Mr. Horsman and Mr. Lowe, from the Adullamite camp; Mr. Mill and Mr. Thos. Hughes, of the decided Liberals; and Mr. Gathorne Hardy, as representative of the Government view of affairs. Considered as a display of oratory, the debate would probably have made little impression upon a stranger. None of the members I have named, unless Mr. Lowe be an exception, can at all compete in genuine eloquence with Mr. Bright or Mr. Gladstone, or some other speakers of inferior reputation. The House was never thoroughly roused to enthusiasm; no ringing outburst of cheers greeted even the heaviest blows struck on either side; and no Homeric peals of laughter testified to one of the undeniable good things destined to become commonplaces of newspaper quotation. Yet I should perhaps qualify this assertion, by admitting that Mr. Lowe came very near the borders of eloquence, if he did not actually cross them. Mr. Lowe's fate as an orator has been curious. For many years he remained in obscurity on the back benches, oppressed partly by the disadvantage which a supposed connection with the Times is apt to inflict upon members. The House apparently shrinks from a man who, to open attacks upon his antagonists, is able to add a supplementary and anonymous assault in the columns of a newspaper. At any rate, Mr. Lowe was comparatively neglected, until he took the House by storm in the early debates on the Reform bill. He had then the advantage which a man always gains for a time by speaking against his party. The Tories welcomed him as an unexpected deserter to their ranks, and the Liberals showed a warmth which, at worst, was better than indifference. Indeed, no one can approach Mr. Lowe in polished, vigorous epigrams, which are not the less keen because they generally proceed from a rather narrow view of the subject. As periodical writing, his speeches would be almost incomparable essays—clear, pointed, and pithy to the last degree. As speeches, they are defective; because they never rise above the regions of keen logic into an appeal to the high emotions of his audience, and because they are jerked out in a loud, monotonous voice, with total absence of gesture. His manner reminds one of a wooden catapult discharging heavy bolts with tremendous power, but with an almost mechanical precision. Mr. Mill, against whom his assault was directed, has, in one respect, an equal talent. His sentences are even more perfectly formed; and if they never present the same epigrammatic brilliance, they often show a curious felicity of argument which sometimes produces almost the effect of wit. The readiness with which he meets the arguments of his adversaries and the skill with which he retorts upon their weakest places would be admirable but for one thing. The eloquence of Demosthenes or Cicero or Edmund Burke would fall flat if it came from Mr. Mill's lips; because you could n't hear it. The House of Commons has been judiciously built of such proportions that if it were crammed to the uttermost it would hardly hold 500 out of 658 members, and its acoustic qualities are good. Yet Mr. Mill's voice is scarcely able to fill this moderately-sized room; and though with painful attention I could pick up the sense of the first half of his speech, the remainder passed by me as a feeble murmur, in which I could sometimes catch—rather by instinct than by the help of my ears—the word "landlords." It is some credit to the House of Commons that, although Mr. Mill spoke under these disadvantages and attacked the strongest prejudices of his audience, he was listened to with respect and attention. Between Mr. Lowe and Mr. Mill there was an interval principally filled by Mr. Thomas Hughes; and I regret to say that, highly as I respect Mr. Hughes, I cannot think that nature ever meant him for an orator. His manner is bad, marked by that desperate clinging to the insignificant words of a sentence, to the "ors" and "ands," which we may remark in men unable to launch out boldly with a flow of rhetoric. His matter was, I fear, not very superior; though he put it forward in the face of an almost empty house with a gallantry worthy of the author of "Tom Brown." In short, Mr. Hughes has become one of those unfortunate beings known as "dinner-bells." He speaks at the time—from seven to nine—which the House of Commons dedicates to the great ceremony of dining, and when only a few languid sentinels, as it were, are left to keep up the semblance of an occupation of the benches.

The debate was concluded for the evening by Mr. Gathorne Hardy—a gentleman who gives to the House of Commons precisely what it likes. He has a fine flow of the most admirable commonplace; he speaks the very sense (if it is not perverting that word) of the thick rows of country gentlemen behind him, with a fluency, indeed, of which few of them are capable, with an occasional sparkle of fair average wit, and with a really courteous bearing towards his opponents. With these qualifications he is admirably qualified for the duty he had to discharge of pouring oil upon the troubled waters; and he made things pleasant so effectively, and looked so prosperous and genial and plausible, that in his presence we could hardly believe that there was such a thing as an oppressed tenant in Ireland or a Fenian in the world. The very sight of Mr. Hardy, one would say, if he could have been transported as he stood to the wilds of Connaught, would have been enough to make tenants happy, to throw Orangemen and Fenians into each other's arms, and to frighten the spirit of discord into the Atlantic.

And now, what light was thrown upon the Irish question? The answer, I am afraid, is really that which was given in the Times of this morning, namely—that the Irish question will have to wait till another Parliament. The policy of the Government, as Mr. Horsman said, is threefold: in regard to the Church, it is to do nothing; in regard to the land, to put off doing anything; and in regard to education, to do worse than nothing. Every Liberal speaker denounced the Irish Church—Mr. Lowe with special vigor and decision. Mr. Hardy, however, cries confiscation! and talks fluently about compacts made at the Union. It seems that the injustice was so firmly established by that arrangement that no future generation is to be allowed to redress it. The Liberal party, indeed, are becoming so firmly united upon this point that I hope it will before long disappear. Meanwhile, Government staved off the evil day by the admirable device of a commission. Commissions are very useful things in their way, but in the case of a grievance all the circumstances of which are matters of perfect notoriety, they are chiefly useful for wasting time. The same excellent device is again to be applied to the land question; and here, it cannot be denied, the chances of delay are infinitely greater In fact, I see no prospect of any decided legislation at all. The Liberals are split into innumerable fractions. Mr. Hughes gave a long essay last night upon tenant-right; Mr. Mill proposed his plan for handing over the land to the tenants; Mr. Lowe vigorously denounced any alteration. In doing so he not only called out the cheers of the country gentlemen, delighted to have a philosopher to fight their battles and justify their apathy, as against Mr. Mill, but undoubtedly carried with him a section of his own party Other members said vaguely that something must be done, but objected to every special proposal, and, to say the truth, this is the prevalent opinion in England. We ought to get out of this Slough of Despond, but to every new guide we reply: "You, at least, are taking us the wrong way." The one positive proposal of the Government was retrograde, and has excited such general disapprobation that it can hardly have much chance of success. The best thing which England has done for Ireland is undoubtedly the educational system, which is probably superior to anything in this country. The Queen's Colleges, which are at the head of the system, are unsectarian, or "Godless" institutions, as their enemies call them, but have flourished in spite of the disapproval of the ultramontane hierarchy. It is now proposed to give a charter to a Roman Catholic university, although the body so called has failed to attract the higher classes. This attempt to go back from the unsectarian principle is probably, as Mr. Lowe described it, another specimen of the pyrotechnical devices of Government—a brilliant object thrown up to distract attention, but destined, when that work is done, to relapse into utter obscurity. The debate will be resumed to-night, and we shall hear whether such speakers as Mr. Bright, Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Disraeli can throw any additional light upon the subject; but I think it will be safe to foretell the final result of a policy made up of procrastinating and feeble attempts to buy the support of the extreme Catholic party by inadequate concessions to their worst prejudices. In other words, Ireland will be once more told to call again to-morrow—or the day after.

Another interesting Parliamentary debate has taken place on the Alabama question. The party which is in favor of accepting arbitration has, I think, grown stronger; and there is a decided feeling that in some way or other the present hitch in the proceedings may be surmounted. Lord Stanley is evidently of opinion that we really owe some compensation for the Alabama depredations; and the difference as to considering the question of our recognition of Southern belligerency seems to be less as it is more closely examined. I imagine that no great concession would be necessary to bring about a satisfactory reference of the dispute.

To turn to a different subject, I see in the last number of the Nation which I have received some remarks about the experience of Cambridge in regard to female education. A further examination has been lately held, and the results are still to the general effect that girls are as capable of education in every sense as boys. There is, however, one difference. The mathematical examiners say that in this occasion the girls were distinctly inferior, although on most subjects they were better prepared, and showed a smaller percentage of failure than the boys. The experiment has as yet been tried on too small a scale to give satisfactory results; but, in spite of the assertion about mathematics—the only one telling against the girls—there is no doubt that it is, on the whole, highly favorable to the cause of feminine education. A plan is now being discussed for founding a college for women. In spite of some weakness in details, I think it promises to do much for the cause. Upon this, and upon some other interesting facts which have been brought out by a late commission appointed to enquire into middle-class education (of which Mr. Fraser was the American representative), I hope to write more fully in my next.

RUSSIAN RAILROADS AND THE RUSSIAN PRESS.

St. Petersburg, March 1, 1868.

American newspapers print frequent telegrams and letters which represent that Russia is endeavoring to force a crisis in the East in aid of certain designs that she has in that direction. Many of the facts which are stated in proof of the imminence of war are very apocryphal, and I am quite convinced by what I have seen and heard here and in Moscow that Russia has no intention nor desire to engage in any war. She could be forced into a war, but at present would not willingly begin one. The tone of all the Russian journals is very peaceful. The Eastern question, it is true, occupies much of their attention, and as much space is given to letters from Constantinople as to those from Paris. But this is in part owing to proximity. It is also owing to the genuine sympathy that is felt with the ill-treated Christians of Crete and Bulgaria.* Perhaps in no Church is the feeling of brotherhood among the members so strong as in the Greek Church, and the Russians are exceedingly religious. This sympathy is expressed with the greatest freedom and openness by everybody in society, and by all the journals—and the press is as free as in France. But I have seen nowhere and heard nowhere any proposition to aid the Christians of Turkey by arms. All desire that the Government should act as their champion against Turkey and with the Western Powers, in all ways which are consistent with peace; and great satisfaction is felt at the manner in which the Government has endeavored to impress on the Sultan and the great Powers the sufferings of the Christian races in Turkey.

At present Russia is in no condition to make war. It is deeply in debt; it is just recovering from the exhaustion of the Crimean campaign, and a great war would ruin its growing manufactures and any chance of commercial prosperity. This winter many provinces are suffering severely from famine, consequent on the bad harvests of several years. In Finland the distress has been the most severe, but has been in some measure relieved by contributions. Lately, however, grain has become scarce and people are dying of hunger in the Baltic provinces and in White-Russia—that part next to Poland. In the government of Viatka there is much distress, and even in the governments of Vladimir and Riazan, which are on the lines of railway. The Emperor has just appointed a commission, with the Czarowitz at its head, to receive and distribute contributions, making himself a large gift to the fund.

But perhaps the best reason why Russia does not wish to go to war at present is the condition of its railway system. All recent wars have shown how railways can facilitate campaigns by the rapid transportation of troops, but the Crimean war showed Russia how necessary railways were to protect her frontiers and to supply her army with food. In the last few years railways have been projected and pushed in every direction. The Government has usually taken the initiative, and then has made over the road to a private company. At present the Nikolai road, from St. Petersburg to Moscow, is the only one in operation belonging to the Government, and this is about to be sold, the proposals for purchase being now under consideration. So far, all the new railways have been commercial successes, and the stock of one or two is above par.

The two great railways in operation are the Nikolai road, just mentioned, and the road from St. Petersburg to Moscow, with its connection from Wilna to the Prussian frontier. This is the only channel in winter for Russian trade. A third railway, of great commercial importance and invaluable in case of war, is the Southern road, from Moscow to Odessa. This is now open from Moscow to Tula, the Birmingham and Sheffield of Russia. From Tula to Orel and from Orel to Kursk the rails are laid and in order, but the stations are not completed. They are to be ready in June. From Kursk to Kiev the road is entirely graded, the rails are partly laid, and some of the bridges and stations completed. This section is to be opened in August. From Kiev to Balta no rails are yet laid, but this work will be begun in March. The foundations of the bridges are built, and the iron-work on the spot. This section, it is thought, will be opened in September, but that is very doubtful. From Balta to Odessa the road is open. The entire route is 1,048 miles; the distance open is 243 miles. Until this road is finished it is impossible in the present state of the Russian highways—which are much out of repair—for troops to pass with sufficient rapidity to the south of Russia to protect it against invasion, or to send army supplies enough to keep such troops in fighting condition. Branches are to connect Odessa with Kishinev, in Bessarabia, and with the Galician frontier. Another great railway is to connect this Southern road with Riga. It is completed from Riga to Smolensk, 297 miles, cutting the Warsaw road at Dwinaburg, and will connect with the Southern road at Orel 320 miles beyond Smolensk. From Riga a road has been authorized to Libau, a port open nearly all the winter, but little or nothing has been done on it.

To the south-east, the road from Moscow to Voronezh is now open, 365 miles in length, with a branch road of eighty miles to Mozhansk. This branch is to be continued to Pensa. The main road is to be prolonged eastward to Saratov on the Volga, and southward to Taganrog on the Sea of Azof. Some forty-five miles at the southern extremity are done. A branch is also to connect it with the southern road at Orel. Another road is in construction from Kursk on the southern road through Kharkov to Taganrog. One branch of this will run south through Ekaterinoslav and the Crimea to Balaklava; and another through Poltava and Olviopol to Balta. It is completed from Balta to Olviopol; from Olviopol to Elizabetgrad will be opened in the summer. The rest will not be ready for two years. There is a small line open connecting the Don and the Volga at Tsaritsin, fifty miles long.

To the eastward, there is a short road of forty-four miles from Moscow to the Troitsa monastery, which is to be continued to Yaroslav. The road from Moscow to Nizhni-Novgorod, 265 miles, has been open for two years, and a double track is now being laid part of the distance. A road is projected from Perm through the Ural to Tumen, to connect the basins of the Kama and the Obi and also another from Viatka to Krasnoborsk on the Dwina. On the former work is to be begun in the spring; it is very doubtful if the latter is ever begun.

At the north, beside the short railroads which connect St. Petersburg with the environs, there is one in Finland of sixty-eight miles from Helsingfors to Tavastehuus. Preliminary surveys are being made of a road from Helsingfors to St. Petersburg; and the road on the south of the Gulf from St. Petersburg to Revel will be pushed forward as rapidly as possible.

The Polish frontier is tolerably well protected by a road from Warsaw to the Austrian frontier near Cracow, and to the Prussian frontier near Thorn. Besides these there runs a road directly east from Warsaw 130 miles to Brest-Litovski, on the boundary between Poland and Russia proper. Poland is just the place where there would be most danger to Russia in a war at this time. The populace of the cities is not yet so quieted but that it might again rise and give much trouble.

In a recent article the Moscow Gazette declared that the western frontier was not safe against a successful invasion without the creation of a new secondary line of fortresses, and the construction of a railway from

* Considering the condition of the Polish Catholics, this Russian sympathy for the "ill-treated Christians" of Turkey is somewhat trying to the world at large.—Ed. Nation.

Brest-Litovski through Smolensk to Moscow. Since then this road has been authorized, the capital has been partly subscribed, and surveys are to be begun in the spring. It will be over 550 miles long.

The railway from Cracow to Czernowitz, extending the whole length of Galicia, is, a Moscow paper says, "as good as an army of observation posted there of 200,000 men," and will continue so until it is met by the road from Balta to Kamenetz-Podolsk and Volotchirsk; but of this there is no prospect for two years.

There are railways proposed even in the Caucasus—one from Tiflis to Poti on the Black Sea, and another from Tiflis to Baku on the Caspian. Work on the former, 193 miles long, has commenced already. The other has only been surveyed.

To sum up the whole, there are in Russia in actual operation 3,492 miles of railway; 2,300 miles more are actually in process of construction. For more than 3,000 miles more charters have been granted, and surveys are, or are about to be, made. But it will be two years before the extremities of the empire are connected with each other and with the food-growing districts.

I am unable to learn anything of the fortifications at Kertch, which the Nation of Jan. 16 says are building. The present naval station is at Nikolaiev. The fleet in the Sea of Azof and the Black Sea does not exceed the force prescribed by the treaty of Paris, and no large vessels of war are building there. I have heard the hope several times expressed, that in case of war vessels could be bought cheaply in America.

Perhaps the growing independence of the press has been twisted by French journalists into an indication of a desire for war. A newspaper may now discuss most subjects with much freedom; but too severe criticism of governmental acts, abuse of foreign sovereigns, or articles contrary to religion and good morals, would subject the paper to a warning. After three warnings the publication is suspended for some time. The Golos (Voice) of St. Petersburg was recently warned for an article on the Emperor Napoleon which was thought to go beyond the bounds of fair criticism; and the Moskva of Moscow has been suspended for four months for violent articles on the ministry in regard to the proposed reforms in the tariff. During the attempt of Garibaldi on Rome, the journals of all shades were, without restraint from the Government, very free in expressing their sympathy with Italy, and their hope that France would be forced to succumb. The very incident of the warning of the Golos, by the protests it called forth, showed the independence of the unofficial Russian newspapers and the existence of a public opinion. Now the reconstruction of Austria is freely and intelligently criticised, quite as freely as a similar subject would be in America. This is individuality of opinion; but the journalists of Western Europe will not believe so; they still talk of a mot d'ordre, and if any paper speaks boldly of the situation and of the duties of Russia, they regard it as immediate proof of the warlike attitude of the Russian Government.

The Moscow Gazette was recently reproached by the Journal de St. Pétersbourg for giving rise to such misinterpretations, by the freedom of its remarks on European politics, as great importance is attached to whatever it says. M. Katkof, in last Tuesday's paper, indignantly replies that his opinions are his own, and he refuses to be bound by the Journal de St. Pétersbourg, or any one else, as to their justice or to the fitness of expressing them; that he holds himself responsible to the Government if he goes beyond the law, and that he is not to blame if ignorant persons draw wrong conclusions from the words of his paper.

Correspondence.

THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Dear Sir: If your strictures upon the "Annals of the Christian Commission," in your issue of March 12, affected only myself, I should not trouble you with any complaint of them. But the book will be regarded by the public, so far as it is regarded at all, as an official document of the Commission, and I am not willing that any serious misapprehensions which are capable of ready explanation shall affect the good name of the society. There are two or three such misapprehensions in your article, which, with your permission, I will endeavor to correct as briefly as possible.

1. I do not think the early weakness of the Christian Commission or the smallness of its work can be fairly attributed to "bad management." It is true that there were several months of discouraging effort on the part of its promoters before "the people were brought to a perception of the importance of the work proposed." (Mr. Morrison's "inventory" of the Commission's effects was written in July, 1862, not 1863, as your types unintentionally say.) But there were sufficient reasons for this in the circumstances of the case—in the excitement and uncertainty which pervaded the public mind, affecting alike the Government and the people. Such hindrances are common in the beginning of similar movements, and the philanthropic societies to which our war gave rise shared this almost universal experience. The Sanitary Commission, as its history clearly shows, had like difficulties at the outset of its work, and its period of depression was even longer than in the case of the Christian Commission. The character of the men first associated with the Sanitary Commission, and the wisdom of its plans, ought to have secured to it without delay, one might think, national position and influence. Only this would have been contrary to rational expectation, as taught by the previous history of such enterprises. And so for fifteen months they had to encounter all sorts of "rebuffs" and embarrassments. The earlier chapters of Mr. Stillé's history, and the chapters contributed by Dr. Bellows and Mr. Strong, are very instructive reading upon this point. Mr. Strong writes that in November, 1861 (five months after its organization), "the Commission was as yet hardly known to the people." Its seventh session, held at Washington, Dec. 3, 1861, "was thought likely to be its last." During February, 1862, "its members inclined daily more and more to the opinion that their work must soon be abandoned," for they saw the work "growing larger and more costly every day," with "no corresponding increase in the means to support it." In the following month "telegrams and letters" from the headquarters of the Commission in Washington to the members of the Finance Committee in New York, stating that the army had commenced a forward movement, that a great battle seemed at hand, and that ten thousand dollars should be raised for the Commission at once, brought back the response, "Capitalists have done enough; no more money can be raised in New York." This response was "disheartening" and "chilling," and on its receipt "a motion to disband was anxiously discussed at Washington;" but acting like noble and patriotic men, as the commissioners were, it was "unanimously negatived." The same question was again considered, a fortnight later, in New York, and again negatived. It was not until July, 1862, that "the Commission had learned how much suffering the people could remedy, and what service the people could render the national cause through its agency." Summing up the case, Mr. Strong says: "The financial infancy of the Commission ended in September, 1862. For fifteen months it had lived from hand to mouth. It had been more than once on the point of death from inanition." This state of "infancy" ended by the receipt from California of the magnificent sum of $100,000—unexpected and unprecedented—not sent directly to the Commission, but placed at the disposal of President Lincoln by the Mayor of San Francisco, and by the President, at the suggestion of Surgeon-General Hammond, turned over to the Commission. Dr. Bellows says that "this hundred thousand dollars, with all it implied, was the making and the saving of the United States Sanitary Commission." It was received October 14, 1862. This "arrested universal attention;" it "excited emulation and was at once imitated;" and it "fastened the eyes and the confidence of the wavering upon the Commission." The receipts at once rose from a monthly average during the preceding quarter of $23,263 32, to a monthly average during the quarter following of $161,841 52, an increase of almost sevenfold. It would be the very opposite of just to say that this trying experience of the Sanitary Commission was due to "bad management." It would only be just to say that its successful issue out of its trials was due to its wise management and to its adaptation, thus made manifest, to the pressing needs of the army and nation. A similar judgment must be accorded, in all fairness, and upon quite similar grounds, to the Christian Commission.

2. You speak of the distribution of stores by the Christian Commission as "illegitimate work," as "precisely identical with the work of the Sanitary Commission," and as costing much more than its "legitimate work." It is doubtless true that such distribution, to the extent ultimately reached, was "not distinctly intended at first" by the Christian Commission. Nor was it any more distinctly intended at first by the Sanitary Commission. Both Commissions set themselves to minister to the comfort and efficiency of the army—the one having in view a certain specific object, being a "Commission of Enquiry and Advice in respect to the Sanitary Interests of the United States Forces;" the other having for its specific object to "promote the spiritual and temporal welfare" of the soldiers. Both soon learned the great value of "stores" as auxiliaries to their main purposes, and did not hesitate to use them to the utmost of their ability according to the demand. In both cases the distribution of stores was in a sense "subordinate," and yet in both the money value of the stores was greater than for all other parts of the work. Mr. Stillé, in the history of the Sanitary Commission, frequently calls attention to the fact that the Commission "had for its main design a preventive service," and that "at the outset the intention was not to concern itself with supplying" the wants of the soldiers by its own direct ministrations as a relief agency. He speaks of the "popular error" of looking upon the Commission as "only a relief association upon a grand scale," which "quite overshadowed in popular estimation its original purpose, if not the exclusive and peculiar work which it proposed to engage in." The Commission, however, "never departed from the true scientific idea and conception of a preventive system, and always regarded the relief system, vast as was the place occupied by it in the war, as inferior in the importance of its results," etc. Dr. Bellows and Mr. Strong speak in the same way, the latter saying that the original purpose of the Commission was "mainly scientific and advisory," and that by the exigencies of the service it was "somehow compelled to go beyond its original programme of scientific investigation and advice." Now, the cash receipts of the Sanitary Commission were, in round numbers, $5,000,000. Of this sum more than $3,800,000 were expended in the "relief" and supply" departments, which were aside from "the original programme," and less than $350,000 for preventive "inspection and advice." It would certainly be most unfair to add to the above the $15,000,000 given to the Sanitary Commission in "stores" of various kinds, and then say that less than two per cent. of its gross revenues were bestowed upon its "legitimate" work, while ninety-four per cent. went for "illegitimate" objects; yet the principle you apply to the Christian Commission would require such division. It would be much better, because it would be true, to say that both Commissions held to their "original programmes," and found that in carrying these out, and adapting them to the changing needs of the army, they could relieve untold suffering and administer unspeakable comfort, there being still left a vast residue of pain and want that all the agencies were insufficient to remove.

3. I cannot admit that the "Annals of the Christian Commission" is justly chargeable with "illiberality" towards the Sanitary Commission. I can most heartily endorse your statement, making only the necessary enlargement, that the Sanitary and Christian Commissions are "fixtures of the American mind," and that no one can omit mention of them on proper occasion, "in an account of the agencies that have latterly ameliorated war," without himself suffering by the omission. Neither of these Commissions has an historical parallel except in the other, and they will be so regarded in the future. In my introductory "Glance Backward," which you are pleased to speak of as "useless," I refer to those agencies which were in operation previous to our own war. There was no opportunity for speaking of either Commission except in an incidental way, and both are thus mentioned. In the first chapter of the Annals I sketch the "Preliminary movements" to the organization of the Christian Commission. In this chapter there is, of course, scarcely a reference to the Christian Commission, for it was not yet organized, but there is a statement of the principal facts concerning the organization of the Sanitary Commission, with names and dates. The statement is necessarily brief, but more was hardly practicable with the limited space at command, nor could more be needful when the Commission itself was publishing a full history of its operations. I set myself the task of writing the Annals of one Commission, and not to giving an adequate account of other agencies. There are between twenty and thirty references by name in my book to the Sanitary Commission. I do not think that one of them has the slightest color of "illiberality" or unkind feeling. I have no such feeling, and am very sure that it is neither expressed nor implied in anything I have written.

Respectfully yours,

LEMUEL MOSS.

ANGLO-SAXON DECLENSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

A writer in the Nation of March 26, criticising Professor Shute's "Manual of Anglo-Saxon," objects to the terms "Vowel-Declension" and "N-Declension" as used in that work, asserting that the former should be called "Consonant-Declension" and the latter "Vowel-Declension." Permit one of your readers to say a word in defence of Professor Shute's nomenclature. It is founded, not on the forms of the nominative singular (which are often specially affected by phonetic changes), but on the forms of the stem, the common basis of the whole case-inflection. Thus in the N-Declension, n is the final letter of the stem. In the nominative singular this n is lost, as in nama, "name," heorte, "heart;" but it appears almost everywhere else, as in the genitive singular naman, heortan, genitive plural namena, heortena, etc. (Compare the Latin sermo, ratio, in which the final n of the stem, though lost in the nom. sing., appears in the gen. sermonis, rationis.) So, too, in the Vowel-Declension, the final vowel of the stem (unless it was originally long) was generally lost in the nom. sing., as in fisc, "fish," dæd, "deed," lust, "lust." That in these words the stem actually ended in a vowel, is a fact generally recognized: it is clearly apparent in the Gothic accusative plural fiskans, dēdins, lustuns, where we see the common case-ending ns applied to the stems fiska, dēdi, lustu. (Compare the Latin vir and animal, of which the stems, viro and animali, lose their final o and i in the nom. sing.) But if the final stem-vowel was originally long, it was not wholly lost in the Anglo-Saxon nom. sing.: thus gifu, "gift," Gothic giba, originally gibā.

If these simple statements are correct—and it is believed that they represent the accepted views of the best living philologists—then Professor Shute's two declensions, with the names he gives them, are in accordance with the actual system of Teutonic formation and inflection. It is true that this arrangement makes no provision for stems ending in other consonants than n, as stems in r and in nd; but in Anglo-Saxon these are either so few in number, or so little distinguished in their inflection, that their peculiarities may be treated, properly enough, in an elementary book as mere anomalies.

LITERARY.

WE have but little to add to former announcements. "Old Deccan Days," which we mention elsewhere, is to be republished by Messrs. J. B Lippincott & Co. The same house will issue "Odontalgia, commonly called Toothache: Its Causes, Symptoms, and Cure," by S. Parsons Shaw; "Horace Wilde," a novel, by Mrs. M. Jeanie Mallary; a book of selections from various authors, entitled "The Garland;" "The Divine Teacher: being the Recorded Sayings of Our Lord Jesus Christ during His Ministry on Earth;" and the Honorable John Bigelow's edition of "The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin." It is edited from the original manuscript just as it came from Franklin's own hand. He wrote it at the solicitation of his friend, M. Le Veillard, and in 1789 gave to that gentleman a copy of all of it that was then finished. The original remained in his own possession, and passed at his death to his grandson, William Temple Franklin, who undertook a life of his grandfather for a London house. For the convenience of the printer—so goes the Le Veillard family tradition—Temple Franklin exchanged the autograph sketch for the copy then in the hands of Madame Le Veillard, then a widow. From her it descended to her daughter; from her daughter to a M. De Senarmont, a cousin of the daughter; from him to his grandson M. P. De Senarmont, who transferred it to Mr. Bigelow, the American Minister. Mr. Bigelow, collating it with the edition that had appeared in the London life, found that no less than twelve hundred separate changes had been made in the text—of what character and how serious he does not say—and that the last eight pages of the work, second in value to no other part of it, had been omitted entirely.

—Iowa is a State of which one hears comparatively little, but that little is almost wholly good. We observe that the Superintendent of Public Instruction, in his report for the past year, compares Massachusetts in 1864 with Iowa in 1867, during which years the number of persons between five and twenty-one years of age was 362,466 and 372,939, respectively—nearly enough equal for the superintendent's purpose. The respective appropriations for schools were at those dates, $1,568,833 and $2,069,597; and the total amount paid per capita on the population named, $4 33 and $5 55. The ratio of the amount paid for the support of common schools to the taxable property of the State was, in Massachusetts, $0.00172, in Iowa, $0.00808. We do not vouch for these figures, but the emulation is worthy of remark. The Iowa School Journal, from which we take them, has as usual, under the head of "School Law Decisions," several reported cases of litigation concerning school-property, the sites of school-houses, etc., which we do not at present recall in the school journals of any other State. This does not, we presume, indicate a greater amount of wrangling over these familiar subjects of difference in country places—where the problem of ascertaining the "centre" is as difficult, often, as to find the centre of the universe—but only, perhaps, a peculiar mode of settlement and a very useful way of putting them on record, considering the needs of a growing and still youthful State.

—A connected history of printing machines, says the Proof Sheet, from Guttemberg's time to our own, could not fail to be interesting. A good history would, of course, go further back than Guttemberg's day. As De Quincey pointed out—we think he first pointed it out, though the remark is credited to Whately—the ancients had invented printing, and it is probable that the Germans would have been saved the trouble of reinventing it had the ancients been able to make paper or some cheap substitute for paper. And it is altogether likely that before Rome was, the Chinese had movable types or blocks and machines for using them. To furnish material for the work wished for in case any one chooses to attempt it, the Proof Reader gathers from authentic sources some facts about the invention of the rotary press. The success of cheap papers publishing large editions demanded in the printing press greater speed than could be attained by the "single cylinder," which was the first advance from the hand-press. Hoe's "double cylinder" or "pony" was invented, and being capable of making five thousand impressions an hour, it soon superseded the "single cylinder." At that time England had four-feeder presses, capable of doing the same work, but they required not only four feeders, as the name indicates, but thicker and more expensive paper than our penny papers could afford to use. So the attempt to use them in the office of the Courier and Enquirer failed. The circulation of cheap journals increasing, something faster than the "pony" was required. A "railway press" was produced by Messrs. Hoe, which may be described as a circular track, round the circumference of which travelled a "form," which passed in its course under six impression cylinders, each of which presented a sheet to the types. It worked but badly in practice, and was soon given up. In 1842 the same inventors made a machine in which the type-bed was stationary, and several impression cylinders, fastened by the ends to two parallel endless chains, rolled over the form, then passed under it, then over it again, and so on, the cylinders, of course, revolving on their axes. As they went under the form they took sheets from "feed-boards," and as they finished their passage over the types these sheets were delivered in a pile at the end of the machine. At the point of each cylinder were two inking rollers. Next came a variation of the "railway press" called the "planetarian press," which, however, was not successful, and which we mention because in the endeavor to overcome a vital defect in it by the use of a type-bed concave instead of flat, the idea was suggested to Colonel Richard Hoe of making the "form" convex, and revolving it with all its type set. The idea of turning a form of type upside down, and whirling it round more than a hundred times a minute seemed laughable to the printers. Hoe went on, however, and did it; at least he whirled it round a hundred times in a minute, and the problem of a rotary press was solved. This was in 1846. In 1847 the Public Ledger of Philadelphia was printed on the new machine, and in 1849 Colonel Hoe sold the eighth specimen of it to the publishers of La Patrie, in Paris, in the office of which journal it is still in use. The credit of conceiving the idea of type placed on a cylinder is probably due, it is said, to William Nicholson, of London, who took out a patent so long ago as 1790 for a hand-worked machine, the essential principle of which is identical with that of the Hoe press.

—We spoke a week or so ago of Barrère's fabulous Vengeur. We omitted to mention that besides De Quincey, Hamerton, and Thackeray, Carlyle was troubled by the glorious heroism of the crew, and that he took pains to investigate the case with thoroughness, and in his "French Revolution" ascribes the invention to Barrère's desire to soothe the people's wrath on account of Lord Howe's victory. And subsequently, says the Pall Mall Gazette, M. A. Jal, the historiographer of the French navy, honorably came forward and set the matter finally at rest, by publishing from the naval archives the official despatch of the captain, who no more perished than the rest of the ship's company, but was peaceably dining aboard the Culloden when the ship sunk, quietly and without shouting of any kind. And as for Barrère's invention of the phrase, "A nation of shopkeepers," in the report which he made to the Convention on that occasion, a correspondent calls our attention to the fact that John Adams had previously coined the term. Samuel Adams, probably, he means. He is said to have used it in "an oration purporting to have been delivered at the State House in Philadelphia, August 1, 1776," and published at the same city, in the same year. Mr. Wells, in his life of Adams, says that no American edition of the oration has ever been seen, but that four copies of a London issue are known to be in existence, and that there was a German edition. (Vide Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations," 14th page of "Addenda.") But this does not, perhaps, deprive Barrère of the credit of the invention. It certainly is not at all improbable that he may have read a translation of Adams's speech, and, eighteen years afterwards, used a striking expression borrowed from it. On the other hand, the haughty Barrère, out of the depth of a soul far above buttons, may have evolved the reproachful designation for mercantile Albion by an independent process. So far as priority of use goes, neither he nor Mr. Adams would seem to have any claim to the authorship of it. Josiah Tucker, who was Dean of Gloucester in the latter half of the last century, is set down by Mr. Bartlett as having said in 1766, ten years before Adams's speech, that "what is true of a shopkeeper is true of a shopkeeping nation." But whether Barrère, or an Englishman, or an American invented the phrase in question, it is beyond doubt that the rest of the famous report is the Frenchman's. It will please him, if sublunary lies can interest him in his present abode, to see what they are doing in the Parisian Théâtre du Châtelet. The management have had in preparation for a long time a grand spectacular drama, the final tableau of which represents the Vengeur sinking, and every man and boy aboard her crying "Vive la République." Perhaps our readers know that the French official censor refuses to approve or condemn a theatrical piece till the scenery is provided and it has been rehearsed and the manager can show precisely how he intends to put it before the eyes as well as into the ears of the people. The managers grumble, of course, but, of course, have to submit. As the scene of the new melodrama is laid in Republican times, it was with difficulty that the manager could get permission to produce it at all, and he was in danger of seeing his money lost, and, with it, months of labor. The censor would have no Statue of Liberty; the Marseillaise and the Ça Ira were peremptorily forbidden, and it was declared emphatically that "Vive la République" should never be shouted on the boards of any French theatre. After weeks of negotiation it was decided that the Cancan might be substituted for the Carmagnole, that the statue of Ceres must take the place of the Goddess of Liberty, and that in the final tableau the heroic crew must sink to the music of "Partant pour la Syrie," and with energetic cries of "Vive l'Empereur." These anachronisms plunged the souls of the managers and the authors into desolate despair. "But there was then no Emperor; there was then no Queen Hortense!" So the censor, susceptible to ideas, permits that instead of "Vive l'Empereur," the crew shall shout "Vive la France," and that if the authors like they may put "Chapeau de Marguerite," or some other non-political air, in place of the anachronistic composition of Hortense. Worn out, the authors at last appealed from the censor to Marshal Vaillant, and now the Vengeur goes down nightly as in the gospel according to M. Barrère. This concession provokes surprise in Paris, for eternal vigilance is the price of some sorts of "liberty" as well as others, and the mild rule of Louis Napoleon has not hitherto dispensed with the precautions the censor sought to impose.

MR. BEECHER'S NOVEL.*

If our memory serves us, it was a week or ten days after the first Bull Run that the Waverley Magazine or some other family paper first brought out the young man who, looking nobly in his uniform, marches haughtily out of the town at the head of his company, without having said good-by. At the same time appeared the young woman, equally haughty, who does not say good-by either, but whose heart stands still whenever the evening paper comes, who makes things for the Sanitary Commission, and then by-and-by travels to the front, going up and down in the hospitals, and walking to and fro in them, pallid but firm, until towards the close of the war a familiar form, reduced to skin and bone, is borne into her ward to be tended. Since then he and she have made the staple of many hundreds of stories. We do not apologize for speaking disrespectfully of them; the men and women who write these things are not they who did them. It is after the pattern of such tales that "Norwood," so far as it is a novel merely, is constructed. Rose Wentworth and Alice Cathcart and Barton Cathcart and Frank Esel and Tom Heywood and other principal personages, on whose doings the plot turns, and on whom the book, as a novel, depends for existence, are the average heroes and heroines of the magazine war-tales, doing in all faithfulness the old duty of their kind. And the plot is this: The year of the war finds the people above-mentioned at Norwood, a Massachusetts village, engaged in loving or being loved. The men at once go into the army to be brave soldiers, and the women soon go into the hospital as devoted nurses. One of the men turns rebel—against his better judgment, for he cannot help respecting the North after becoming acquainted with it; he is killed, and the nurse who loves him dies of a broken heart. Of the other men who may be called heroes, one becomes a colonel in the Federal army, and the other, the hero, rapidly gets promotion, becomes a general, is badly wounded, is nursed by the heroine, recovers, and marries her. For they say

* "Norwood; or, Village Life in New England. By Henry Ward Beecher." New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1868. 12mo, pp. xi., 549.

to each other, "Why was my letter never answered?" or words to that effect; and then, "What letter?" and so on, and thus discover that the hero was not cold nor the heroine proud, and that if it had not been for that unfortunate, not to say conventional, piece of correspondence they might have lived happily ever afterwards a good while before they actually did.

"Norwood" as a novel, then, a man is to blame for liking; unless indeed he has formed a habit of liking Norwoods. And as a picture of "Village Life in New England"—to quote the second title—it seems to us also open to exception. Village life in any part of New England within our knowledge, is not very well depicted on canvases where the figures most prominent are gigantic, half-witted negroes closely allied to nature, stranded old sailors addicted to "chaffing" their pastors with subtlety of humor, young ladies of the highest culture, blooded Southern gentlemen studying law and political economy, landscape painters, poetical and philosophical and religious doctors who sit beneath the elms in summer and amid books in winter, discoursing on the deepest themes, sceptical lawyers and learned clergymen who cannot see God in the beautiful flowers, but only in the abstractions of Calvinism. A very little of these things goes a very great way in the real life of most New England villages. And then again, the real life in New England towns of five or six thousand inhabitants has its bad and mean side, which, to be sure, no writer need dwell upon unless he likes, which, if he chooses, he need not touch upon at all, but which nevertheless exists, and which not the novelist, but only the sketch-writer or the romancer, can properly forget. In "Norwood" there is surely too much of the rose tint for reality; saints of a comfortable kind, and other people, who, on the whole, are to be respected and loved, are almost the only people of whom we get a glimpse, and quite the only ones of whom we get more than a glimpse. "Sketches of Village Life in New England" would seem to be a better title than the one the author has used. For we should not say that in painting anything which he has selected for representation Mr. Beecher has not been reasonably true to nature. On the contrary, we are disposed to take for correct all that he has given us, and some of his figures we recognize as excellently well done. But certainly he did arbitrarily select; and apparently his principle of selection was to take the agreeable and good and to leave everything else.

As a gallery of Yankee portraits—portraits, at any rate, of Yankees of the period when Mr. Beecher and we were younger than we are now—"Norwood" appears to us a success. Deacon Marble we know; and we felicitate ourselves on having known Hiram Beers when he was engaged in agricultural pursuits under an alias, and in a different part of the State; and nobody ever lived in Massachusetts without knowing at least the germs of several Agate Bissells and the living image of Mrs. Marble, and somebody very like Mr. Chandler, and somebody of whom Mr. Turfmould is hardly a caricature. We know so well the originals of these characters, especially of the best of them, Hiram, that we can hardly tell how much of the total impression to which his book gave rise is due to Mr. Beecher's skill and how much to our own previous knowledge; but this reservation being made, we have no hesitation in saying to the reader that Mr. Beecher stands high among the dozen or so of prose writers who have attempted to delineate the Yankee. He is better than Dr. Holland, or Mr. Mitchell, or Judge Haliburton, or Doctor Holmes—except as the father of "the young man John"—or Mr. De Forest, or Mr. Chamberlain; and he seems to us to have caught the spirit of New England life fully as well as Mrs. Stowe. Mr. Trowbridge, in his limited range, appears to us better. Readers who only know him on other ground would hardly believe how marvellously acute an eye he has for the New England character in its meanest and most sordid aspects. The griping, hard-cider-drinking, weather-beaten, wiry old reprobate, who half-starves his lean cows on a lean farm, who is always recalcitrant as regards his town-tax, who works his sallow wife to death, whose sons grow up to join the engine company, whose impudent daughter comes to grief, who puts "the old man" into the poor-house, who is litigious to the last degree, who never misses a town-meeting—this sadly demoralized child of the Puritans, his countenance, his speech, his habits of thought, his conduct of life, Mr. Trowbridge has at his fingers' ends. Mr. Trowbridge we speak of at greater length partly because he is, perhaps, less known than his merits deserve, and partly because in his writings may be found one side of ordinary New England life which is not to be found in "Norwood."

When one has found fault with "Norwood" as a badly constructed novel with a well-worn plot, with a too well-known prig for a hero and an equally well-known bit of perfection for a heroine; and has praised it for containing some excellent sketches of New England character, he has put his finger on its most obvious defect, indeed its confessed defect, and on its most striking merit—artistically speaking, its greatest merit. But, when this has been done, the larger part of the work will still remain uncriticised. For the sketches of character and the slender thread of a story are embedded in a mass of brief essays on scores of subjects—on the influence of the New England Sabbath; on the art of dressing a tea-table with flowers and tinted leaves; on the duty of a Christian as regards indulging himself in green houses and other means of culture; on Pre-Raphaelitism in art; on the value to the preacher and student of Christianity of a right use of natural objects; on the progress of a soul from doubt to faith; on the origin of Gothic architecture; on the difference between the Northern and Southern character, and the like. Of these little disquisitions most are very sound and useful, if all are not new.

Of course, there is also much of the happy imagery in which Mr. Beecher's sermons abound, and many of that kind of sayings which the natural and professional orator so almost inevitably gets into the way of uttering, and which, when uttered by the living voice, seem beautiful and wise, but are perceived to be devoid of meaning when coolly examined. This, for example, in the worst manner of the platform and pulpit, occurs in a description of a man in love:

"Is the soul confused? Why not, when the divine spirit, rolling clear across the aerial ocean, breaks upon the heart's shore with all the mystery of heaven. Is it strange that uncertain lights dim the eye, if above the head of him that truly loves hover clouds of saintly spirits?"

This, on the other hand, is well said and quite worth the attention of gushing writers: "A gentleman should have feeling, but should hide it. People of much sentiment are like fountains whose overflow keeps a disagreeable puddle around them." There are a great many such strokes. We close with a brief extract, the first we come upon, which illustrates pretty well Mr. Beecher's usual way of employing figurative language, and seems to us to exhibit also that quality which, after all, is what pleases most and has been most effective in his sermons and his writings and his public life—his ready, warm, loving sympathy with his fellows, his kindliness, in the true sense of that word. "Norwood" is full of it, and no one, we should say, will lay down the book without finding himself softer-hearted than when he took it up. Apply to it Marcus Aurelius's rule for considering of things and it will be easy to find fault with it as to manner; and the matter of it will not be thought of high value; but the purpose of it, if we judge that by its influence for good, will have to be praised and the writer will receive our thanks.

But this is our extract, evidently too hastily written:

"We smile at names. We weigh them in the scale of the ear for sweetness or smoothness; we cull some, we reject others. We laugh at men's odd and awkward names, and quite justly too, it may be; since capricious whims and vagrant fancies, or mere carelessness, so often select them. But sometimes a name is a history. It is like a pictured vase. We see the figures without thinking in what furnace those colors were fastened, and by what fire the glazing was fused. Is there any history or record of the heart more touching and simple than that of old? 'And it came to pass as Rachael's soul was departing, for she died, that she called his name Ben-oni—Son of my sorrow.'"

A HISTORY OF COFFEE.*

MR. WELTER'S monograph seems to be more the work of love than of labor. It does not pretend to be exhaustive. It was written, as the author acknowledges, in rural retirement, "far from rich libraries and great commercial centres." But his authorities—from Prosp. Alpinus ("De Plantis Ægypti." Venice. 1592), Pietro della Valle ("Viaggi." Rome. 1658), and Silv. Dufour ("Traitez nouveaux et curieux du café . . . ." Lyons. 1685), down to C. Ritter, Schouw, Alph. de Candolle, Payen, Moleschott, Von Bibra, A. Chevallier, L. Marchand, Liebig, and Reichenbach—if not very numerous are well chosen, and he has succeeded in making his book, in almost all its parts, both amusing and instructive. To ourselves, who happen to share the author's fondness for coffee, it is doubly interesting, but we can boldly recommend to all friends of French literature this history of a plant not less noble but more innocent than the vine.

Not to Arabia Felix, though it long enjoyed the reputation, but to the southern parts of Abyssinia—Kaffa, Enarea, and Shoa—belongs the honor of being the native home of the coffee-tree, which is, however, to be found in a wild state also in other parts of equatorial Africa, as far west as the Senegal and the Gulf of Guinea. Its popular name it may have derived from the mountainous land of Kaffa, in which it is said to abound, thriving in vast forests. Its scientific name (Coffea arabica, L.) it owes to the country which first began its cultivation. The Southern Abyssinians and their neighbors, the Gallas—the Ethiopians of the ancients—have probably used its fruit—so important to the Gallas on their frequent migrations—from times immemorial and in various ways. It was during a journey through the Ethiopian regions west of the Red Sea that a celebrated sheikh of Yemen and mufti of Aden, Shehab-eddin-Dhabani, who flourished in the latter half of the fifteenth century, for the first time tasted coffee, which, for various qualities, and chiefly for its preventing somnolency and heaviness, he found so admirable that he afterwards zealously promoted its propagation in his own country, principally with the object of aiding pious dervishes in spending their nights in prayers without drowsiness. His piety and learning made his advice and example effective. The various uses of the coffee-bean were readily appreciated by the people of Yemen, the cultivation of the tree was soon afterwards begun, and the rich soil of that region proved to be so well adapted to it that the product of its plantations, the coffee of Mocha, has to this day remained unrivalled.

From Aden coffee was introduced into other parts of Arabia, and from Mecca and Medina it easily spread into Egypt. In Mecca as well as in Cairo it soon became an aid to devotion, a means of grace, but also an article of luxury and finally of necessity. Coffee-houses were established, in which not prayers but amusements of every kind—chess-playing, gambling, and even dancing—were the order of the day and of the night. But the pious continued to drink coffee during their vigils in the very chapels of their mosques. It was in one of these chapels that Khaïr-Beg, a governor of Mecca, and just previously installed there by the Sultan of Egypt, surprised a noisy night-party of worshipping Moslems engaged in drinking no less than praying. Ignorant and brutal as he was, he could not be persuaded that the beverage before him was not intoxicating, but rather the reverse of it, and, enraged by the scandal, he with his foot overturned the boiling and drinking utensils, and swore by the beard of the Prophet that he would in future severely punish all similar profanations. Next day he convoked the doctors of the Koran together with the magistrates of the town, consulted also two famous Persian physicians, who gave a humbugging reply, silenced objections by the bastinado, and finally prohibited coffee altogether. But his decree was reversed by the Sultan of Egypt, who was fond of coffee himself, and could base his decisions on the authority of divines superior to those of Mecca. The anti-prohibitionists of the holy city were afterwards rejoiced by the bloody fall of Khaïr-Beg and the death, also, of his Persian medical advisers, which events were regarded as a manifest declaration of Allah in favor of coffee. This was now rapidly spread by the pilgrims to the Kaaba all over the Moslem world, especially as it was their habit to wear in their turbans, as relics, twigs of the coffee-trees of Mecca until they withered and fell off. The coffee-house gradually became an "institution." Its use was sanctioned by the Turkish Sultan Selim I., who conquered Egypt; vainly assailed in Cairo by fanatical preachers; ineffectually prohibited in the holy cities by Solyman the Magnificent, at the instigation of a favorite and bigoted wife; and even during the reign of that monarch introduced into Constantinople itself, the first kahva-kahns being founded, in 1554, by two Syrians of Aleppo and Damascus. Their splendid and luxurious establishments proved an extraordinary success, and were soon followed by numberless others in every style; but in the subsequent reigns, excesses and frivolities connected with these turbulent haunts of more or less refined idleness made them objectionable not only to the guardians of the Islam, but also to the government of the sultans, whose lives and actions were there passed in review and more or less justly criticised. They were, therefore, occasionally closed, and often subjected to restrictions, surveillance of the police, and special imposts. On the whole, however, coffee triumphed all over the East, its use becoming almost as general as that of milk or water, the poets of Arabia, Persia, and Turkey singing its praises, and only the recent sect of the Wahabees abstaining from it from motives of religious puritanism. Enormous quantities were exported yearly from Yemen, following the routes of the pilgrims not only to the Euphrates and the Tigris, the Bosphorus and the Gulf of Persia, but also to the Indus and the Oxus, the Niger and the Senegal. To most Mohammedans coffee by itself is what wine, brandy, beer, tea, and coffee together are to the occidental Christian.

In Western Europe the use of coffee became known about a hundred years after its introduction in Arabia. Leopold Rauwolf, of Augsburg, who in 1575 became acquainted with it in Aleppo, was the first to describe it in the relation of his journey through Turkey in Asia, published in 1582. The celebrated Italian botanist, Alpinus, director of the botanical garden of Padua, the most ancient in Europe, followed with a description of the coffee-tree in his "Plants of Egypt," a country which he had visited in 1580. Bacon, too, mentions coffee in his writings, but vaguely and inaccurately, though his contemporaries, Edw. Terry, who accompanied, in 1615, Sir Thomas Roe on his mission to the Great Mogul, in his relation of the journey, and Robert Burton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy," show themselves familiar with the qualities of coffee and its use by the Orientals. Pietro della Valle speaks of it quite extensively in his third letter, dated Constantinople, February 15, 1615. He finds in it the nepenthes of the "Odyssey," that banisher of grief and sorrow which Helen brought from Egypt, while others, like the English travellers, George Sandys and Thomas Herbert, contemporaries of Della Valle, discovered in it the famous black broth of the Spartans! an opinion which had still to be refuted as late as 1775 by Richard Chandler.

Rome, Venice, and Padua were probably among the first cities of Western Europe into which coffee was introduced, thanks to Della Valle, to Alpinus, and his disciple and commentator, Veslingius. The spread of coffee was slower in Italy than in France, England, or Holland. In France, Marseilles was the first port which it entered, about the middle of the seventeenth century. A coffee-house was opened in 1671, and this first example met with ready imitation in the various towns of the south. The friends of the Levantine traveller, Jean Thévenot, were the first who drank coffee in Paris, where it soon became more widely known through the hospitality of Solyman-Aga, the envoy extraordinary of Sultan Mohammed IV. The first coffee-house in the French capital was a small establishment kept by an American, but it took some time before undertakings of this kind proved successful. The Oriental beverage, however, continued to become more and more fashionable, in spite of attacks by physicians and prejudices of every kind. Madame de Sévigné's antipathy against it has become almost historical, though our author proves that famous saying attributed to her—famous as a doubly false prediction—"Racine passera comme le café," never to have been uttered by her, it being but a counterfeit mot, made up by La Harpe after a passage in Voltaire's "Age of Louis XIV." Even as late as 1711, Madame d'Orléans, the mother of the regent, wrote to her sister, the Countess-Palatine, warning her against the terrible effects of coffee, "the Duchess of Hanau having died of it after horrible sufferings." The court of Versailles remaining neutral, however, the coffee-houses soon became the general resorts of the wits of the time, of the idle, and of the curious. Describing the age of the regency, Michelet says: "Paris devient un grand café . . . . . jamais la France ne causa plus et mieux." Voltaire and Fontenelle quite freely partook of the "boisson intellectuelle," designated by others as a "slow poison," which, if they died of it, killed the former at the age of eighty-four and the latter at the age of a hundred.

In Germany Vienna probably had the first coffee-house, established by a Polish warrior, Kocinski, who, having greatly distinguished himself under John Sobieski in the great battle which delivered that capital, in 1683, from its Turkish besiegers, received in reward of his valor a part of the large stock of coffee found in the tents of the Grand Vizier, Kara Mustapha. An exclusive privilege, granted him by the Emperor Leopold I., the excellence of the coffee, and his own renown, procured him numberless customers, each of whom he uniformly addressed as Herzensbruder, under which appellation he was himself much talked of, in life and after death, by the thankful people of Vienna. The first coffee-house of Leipsic, established by Joseph Lehmann, still exists as the Arabian Coffee-Tree Restaurant, in the Fleischergasse, with its old sign given it, in 1718, by the Elector Augustus the Strong, who there drank his first cup of coffee. Frederick the Great imposed a heavy duty on coffee as an article of luxury which drained his exhausted realm of a great deal of money, and in a rescript to complainants reminded his subjects that "His majesty the king was nourished in his youth on beer-soup, which is much healthier than coffee."

In England the first coffee-house is believed to have been established at Oxford, in 1651, by a Jew named Jacob, who afterwards opened a similar establishment at Holborn. The use of coffee spread so rapidly that as early as 1660 it became an object of taxation by Parliament, and in 1686, if we may believe the naturalist John Ray, the number of coffee-houses in London at least equalled that of similar establishments in the great Mussulman city of Cairo. Physicians, brewers, Puritans, and witty pamphleteers in vain warned, clamored, preached, and wrote against the exotic heathen beverage, its temples—the "penny universities"—and its votaries. Even the "Women's Petition against Coffee," of 1674, a virulent diatribe, had no more effect than the vehement satires, "A Cup of Coffee, or Coffee in its Colors," and "A Broadside against Coffee," which preceded it. Coffee swept everything before it. In 1685, as Macaulay informs us in his chapter on the state of England in that year, the coffee-houses were already "the chief organs through which the public opinion of the metropolis vented itself. . . . . Every man of the upper or middle class went daily to his coffee-house to learn the news and to discuss it. Every coffee-house had one or more orators to whose eloquence the crowd listened with admiration, and who soon became, what the journalists of our own time have been called, a fourth estate of the realm. . . . . Foreigners remarked that the coffee house was that which especially distinguished London from all other cities; that the coffee-house was the Londoner's home, and that those who wished to find a gentleman commonly asked not whether he lived in Fleet Street or Chancery Lane, but whether he frequented the Grecian or the Rainbow. Nobody was excluded from these places who laid down his penny at the bar. Yet every rank and profession, and every shade of religious and political opinion, had its own headquarters. . . . . There were Puritan coffee-houses, where no oath was heard, and where lank-haired men discussed election and reprobation through their noses; Jew coffee-houses, where dark-eyed money-changers from Venice and Amsterdam greeted each other; and Popish coffee houses, where, as good Protestants believed, Jesuits" . . . But why should we repeat in our limited space what good Protestants only believed? We therefore refer our more curious readers for this and many more curious details to Macaulay himself. But we must also hasten to conclude the extracts from our less pretentious French historian. We shall add only a few words on the spread of the coffee-plant over the globe.

The Dutch East India Company, which, about the middle of the sixteenth century, commenced carrying on a lucrative traffic with the coasts of Yemen, not only supplied with coffee the Mohammedans of India and the Sunda Isles, but, in 1690, also transplanted into Java a number of coffee-plants from Mocha and Aden. The island of Java enriched Holland with its own new product, and also became the great nursery for Ceylon and other countries then belonging to the Dutch, including Surinam in South America. The botanical garden of Amsterdam, which received from the same island some young plants, became another nursery, which, by supplying Louis XIV.'s "jardin royal des plantes," subsequently created rival plantations in the island of Bourbon, in Martinique, Guadeloupe, St. Domingo, and other West India isles. In Jamaica we discover the first plantations in 1730; in Cuba, Porto Rico, Central America, and in the South American possessions of Spain, as well as in Brazil, at a much later period. The English coffee plantations of Hindostan are even of earlier date than those of Jamaica. Recently the cultivation of the coffee-plant has penetrated also to the Sandwich Isles and other island groups of the Pacific.

Annual of Scientific Discovery; or, Year-Book of Facts in Science and Art for 1868, etc. Edited by Samuel Kneeland, A.M., M.D. (Boston: Gould & Lincoln. 1868.)—This valuable compilation is too well known to need more than the announcement of its appearance in due course. The year 1867 was not signalized by any remarkable discovery in any of the domains of science, but will be memorable for the Paris Exposition of the material progress of the chief peoples of the earth. It appears to us that if the present digest is deficient in anything, it is in presenting pretty fully the admirable applications of science to the arts, and the aids afforded in return by the arts to science, in which the Exposition abounded. We should suppose there could have been no lack of material for this, even in the English language, and certainly none if foreign sources had been diligently searched. The person of average ingenuity, however, will find, as it is enough to stimulate him to further inventions, and enough (in spite of the editor's sifting) to exercise his discrimination upon. For this collection resembles a good deal the cases in the Patent Office at Washington, in which one may again perceive a resemblance to the processes of nature—few realizations amid a profusion of possibilities. Many achievements are here noted which will never fructify, and many facts which time will prove to be falsehoods. Of the latter, not unimportant is the endorsement given to Liebig's artificial food for infants, which some late experiments in France, under good auspices, have shown to be fatally unfit for use; and in France, where the population increases none too fast, this preparation is likely to be proscribed altogether.

The Spirit of Seventy-Six; or, The Coming Woman. A prophetic drama, followed by "A Change of Base" and "Doctor Mondschein." (Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1868.)—A good cause passes through many stages on its way from unpopularity to success; and when, having survived odium and persecution, and met and vanquished the arguments which it has extorted, it reaches the epoch of good-natured opposition, of burlesque and caricature without malice, and satire without a sting, it may know that the beginning of the end is at hand. In this view we have doubly relished the first of the three little comedies above-named, which foreshadows the consequences of female suffrage in a State like Massachusetts, where, as Carberry learns to his horror, there are two hundred thousand more women than men. The play hinges upon the absurdities of a female assessor, a female judge of the Supreme Court, and a female politician, and the ludicrous aspects of a state of society in which women make proposals of marriage to men, and every bachelor is exposed to two hundred thousand offers, more or less. These ideas are carried out with a great deal of humor, and appear to be well adapted for representation. The play has caused a marked sensation in Boston, where it has been acted by some of the élite for the benefit of the Cretans. "A Change of Base" is a slighter production, showing what came of one of those messages to a soldier which it was the fashion in Sanitary Commission times for young ladies to wrap up in socks for the army. Miss Flora Fayaway engages herself to a "Complete Letter-writer," alias Hezekiah Tarbox, from Skowhegan, Maine, but is saved by evident incompatibility, a maiden companion, and her cousin Captain Dashwood "Doctor Mondschein," a homœopathic physician, by being confounded with the dance called "the German," is made to figure as a supposed poisoner, and in consequence to swallow his own dilutions by the jealous Mr. Backbay. All these plays abound in local allusions, but they will find favor wherever read or acted.

The Week.

LITTLE but impeachment has engaged the attention of Congress for the week just passed, but that has been well attended to, and the trial moves faster than most people expected. We spoke last week of the decision rendered by the Senate on the question whether the Chief-Justice presided in the trial merely as a substitute for the Vice-President or whether he came into the Senate clothed with some of the powers that belong to him as Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court. The latter was the view that Mr. Chase took, and the Senate, for the sake of peace, we imagine, gave him his way. On Wednesday, Mr. Sumner, who had been strenuous in endeavoring to prevent what he considered an arrogant assumption of power, and who was not satisfied with the Senate's decision, returned to the charge, and moved that the Senate should declare that there is no authority in the Constitution for a Chief-Justice's voting in case of a tie vote. By nays 27 to ayes 21 the motion was defeated. The rest of the day was spent in the examination of witnesses, and in arguments by Mr. Stanbery, Mr. Butler, Mr. Curtis, and Mr. Bingham on the admissibility of evidence tending to show by means of the acts and words of General Thomas the criminal intent of Mr. Johnson—the General's co-conspirator, as the managers contended; his subordinate officer, as the counsel urged. The arguments were forcible and acute on both sides—more so than on any other day of the trial, so far as it has yet gone. The Senate admitted the evidence. On Thursday and Friday and Saturday the trial proceeded, and the prosecution got in all its evidence. On the last-mentioned day the President's counsel asked for and obtained a delay until to-day. The House adjourned from Saturday until yesterday. The bill exempting most manufactures from internal revenue tax has received the President's signature and become law. On Monday and Tuesday the House was not in session; the Senate's time was profitably spent on various things not of special interest or importance.

The case for the prosecution has brought out little with which the public was not already familiar except Mr. Johnson's telegram to Governor Parsons, of Alabama—perhaps the least defensible of Mr. Johnson's compositions—advising the Legislature of that State not to adopt the Constitutional Amendment, and a letter to Mr. McCulloch informing him that he had suspended Mr. Stanton under the Tenure-of-Office Act. Both these things are undoubtedly very damaging to the defendant; the letter to Mr. McCulloch, in fact, seems to dispose completely of Mr. Johnson's allegation that he violated the act for the purpose of testing its validity; at all events, there is little doubt that it will be looked upon by the Senate, and would be looked upon by a jury, as disposing of it. The telegram to Governor Parsons was, to say the least, a piece of great indecency. General Butler's article covering the bad language at the West has turned out better than anybody expected, except, perhaps, the General himself, and, we are bound to admit, has considerably strengthened the managers' case. The Emory charge has not been strengthened by the evidence, and is as feeble as possible. The case for the prosecution has been extremely well managed, General Butler bearing the burden of it and displaying all his peculiar talent both in the examination of witnesses and the argument of interlocutory points; and though we have little doubt the evidence has disappointed most people, the impression that the trial will result in a conviction has, we think, grown stronger during the week. Chief-Justice Chase has shown admirable tact and temper under somewhat trying circumstances, and, we hope, has abated the suspicions with which some of the extreme Radicals were disposed to regard him at the outset. The Democratic Senators vote always together, both on points of order and points of law, and always in a sense favorable to the President. A small body of Republicans have done the same thing on the other side, but the mass seem to be really acting on their oaths and with complete indifference to party obligations. Chief-Justice Chase's claim to vote received the heaviest blow from Mr. Sumner, who opposed it in a very neat and forcible argument, bristling with very pointed precedents. The President's case will probably be mainly new to the public, and therefore probably more interesting to most readers than that of the prosecution has been.

There was one difficulty about the applicability of English precedents to the question of the Chief-Justice's right to vote which Mr. Sumner overlooked. It is true that the presiding officer of the House of Lords does not vote, unless he is a member of the House. But then, being a member of the House means something more than having a seat in it. Its members belong to a separate order in the state and in society. The House of Lords, therefore, is not simply a legislative body as the Senate is; and the voting of a person who was not a member of it would be something more than participation in its legislative or judicial action; it would be participation in the privileges of a distinct order of persons not legally responsible to the country. In short, the House of Lords is organized on a totally different theory from the Senate. There is one other question on which we should have been glad to have had Mr. Sumner say something—and that is, if "presiding" at impeachment trials means simply putting the question and keeping order, what can be the object of the framers of the Constitution in assigning the Chief-Justice to the work? Would not the ordinary president of the Senate have done it just as well? What room for partiality is there in the discharge of such duties? Can it be that, when the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court was chosen for this service, it was not intended that his legal knowledge and his high character should be in any way brought into play in the conduct of the proceedings? Is it wise or decorous to call away the first judge in the country from his post for whole weeks at a time, to do what Mr. Colfax or Mr. Banks can do just as well?

The Republicans on Monday last failed to elect their candidate for Governor of Connecticut, but they may claim to have carried the State, for they have largely increased their majority in the Legislature, and the Legislature bestows the great prize of the contest—the seat in the United States Senate for the long term. Mr. Dixon will undoubtedly be ousted. On the gubernatorial vote the majority against the Republicans is increased from about a thousand to about fifteen hundred on the heaviest total vote ever cast in the State—about 99,000. Mr. English's gains were made in the larger towns. In Bridgeport he this year gained 207 on last year's majority; in Hartford he gained 160; and in New Haven he gained no less than 453. As to the last-named city, Mr. English there increases by no less than one-fourth a majority which was itself so large as to excite the gravest suspicions, and there is perfect proof that this year frauds were at least attempted there. We may as well confess to a belief that the 450, more or less, new Democratic voters in that city make us think of those 350 other Democratic voters whose names, on the protest of the Republican registrars, were last week stricken from the voting-list. While the Democratic gains are heavy in the large towns, where "colonizing" is possible, the Republicans have made gains in the small towns and rural districts. Thus the Legislature is more Republican than it was last year, and for this reason the party—which, speaking roughly, is a rural party, as the Democratic is an urban party—will not go into the Presidential campaign with any feeling of discouragement. When every town and city in the United States is voting on the same day, and "colonists" and "repeaters" are needed at home, and each State is reduced for its voters to its own citizens, the Republicans of Connecticut will probably be able to give a better account of themselves than they gave on Monday, when, as the World says, "the voice of the people" (in the Sixth Ward of Hartford and Fifth Ward of New Haven) "that daunted the bloated tyrants of an hour in March, damns them in April."

The meaning of the Connecticut election is always somewhat difficult to get at, owing to the evenness with which the votes are divided between the two great parties. Very little things are sufficient to turn the scale either way, so that the State is not very valuable as an indicator. The settling of accounts about the matter between the daily papers the day after election, is, however, always amusing, if not instructive. This year there are fewer defaulters and heavy losses than usual, owing to the extreme caution with which the subject was approached by all. The New York Times, strange to say, committed itself more freely than any, and has now to answer for having said that the result of the election would give some means of judging of Grant's prospects. The Tribune was for a wonder prudent, and consequently has this time avoided trouble and humiliation. Nobody of course doubts the fervency of its Republicanism, but we venture to ask, now that all is over, whether such announcements as that which it so ostentatiously made a few days ago, that it was "the duty" of the High Court of Impeachment to be guided in its judicial decisions by "the opinion of the general of our armies," help the Republican party anywhere, or are likely to help General Grant? We hear a great deal of talk continually about the "impolicy" of "criticising" the party—that is, of pointing out its failures and shortcomings and vices. We wish that some of the zeal which is expended on the suppression of this sort of thing were occasionally directed to preventing the utterance of stark nonsense, or worse, by its professed organs. There is no party in this country strong enough, and there never will be one in our time strong enough, to go before the American people with such doctrines about the Senate and the Judiciary as the Tribune and Independent are gratuitously introducing into this controversy. Let us add that whenever any such party appears, Hobbes's state of nature will not be very far off, and all good men will owe it to their wives and children to barricade their doors, and stock their cellars with provisions and water.

On Monday, voting went on in Michigan and Ohio as well as in Connecticut, and on Tuesday Wisconsin elected Republican Supreme Court Judges by a majority about the same as last year's. In Michigan the vote was on the adoption of a new constitution. It was provided that two propositions should be offered separately—whether there should be annual or biennial sessions of the Legislature, and whether or not the Legislature should pass a compulsory total abstinence law. The question of negro suffrage it was decided not to submit separately. It has caused the rejection of the new constitution by a majority of not far from 10,000 in a State where last year the Republican majority was about 24,000, in 1866 about 29,000, and for years preceding very heavy. It must not, however, be forgotten how very few years it is, how few months, indeed, since North-western Republicans talked under their breath when the possibility of a negro's casting a ballot was mentioned. Probably, taking the party throughout the country, four-fifths of its members would vote for the Michigan amendment, and the four-fifths will be nine-tenths in no long time. In Ohio, the elections of Monday were municipal and not general. There are gains and losses for both sides, and the result is without significance.

The Tribune has informed us during the past week, in leaded type, that "General Grant has announced it as his opinion that the only hope of peace for the country is the success of the pending impeachment trial;" and it adds, "When the general of our armies entertains this conviction, there is no room for doubt as to the duty of the Senate." As there is every reason to believe that General Grant has never made any such announcement, and that if he had done so he would be the last man to expect the Senate to be influenced by his opinion in the conduct of a judicial proceeding, this story ought not, and we feel sure will not, be allowed to reflect any discredit on him, and in fact, per se, is not worth notice. But it throws some additional light on the view entertained by the Tribune and Independent of the nature of the tribunal which they have in their minds when they talk of the "High Court of Impeachment." Our readers may remember that the Tribune announced some weeks ago as well-settled doctrine that the decision of this court on the constitutionality of a law—that is, its interpretation of the written instrument called the "constitution"—was binding on the Supreme Court in all cases, and that the judges of the Supreme Court might be impeached and deposed for disregarding it. With the view of ascertaining what rules of interpretation were to be followed in impeachment cases, we looked into the Independent, which belongs to the same school as the Tribune, but generally goes deeper into the philosophy of these questions, and there found that the Senate ought to be guided to a greater or less degree by letters received from "citizens" in various parts of the country; that in Johnson's case, the law and facts being both well known to everybody, the citizens ought to "burden the mails" with letters demanding his conviction, besides keeping up "unceasing prayer" for the same result. The Tribune now goes one step further, and informs us that the "High Court" aforesaid ought also to be guided in the discharge of its judicial duties by the opinions of the general of our armies. It is safe to say that, under these doctrines, if the Senate should adopt them, we shall witness feats of hermeneutics which will put the German commentators to the blush; and we shall have a court which will possess the great merit of absolute novelty. There has been nothing even resembling it since the heathen Oracles were silenced. The presence of the Chief-Justice in his robes, the examination of witnesses, the arguments of counsel, and the citation of precedents, are on this theory all parts of a piece of imposture intended to delude the ignorant.

Another bit of information about Grant has been supplied by Wendell Phillips, who announces that "his drunkenness in the streets of Washington is not denied." The main reasons why charges of this kind, made by persons of Mr. Phillips's school, are not denied, is, first, that the public does not pay much attention to them; and, secondly, that those who make the charges would be the last to take any notice of the denials. But the readiness and frequency with which such charges are made against private character, and the impunity which attends the making of them, and the small amount of sympathy which anybody receives who shows any restiveness under them, are not pleasant to witness. There is a considerable body of agitators engaged in the service of the negro and several other good causes, whose whole stock-in-trade is made up of extravagance and personal abuse. These two things serve them in lieu of history, political economy, jurisprudence, logic, and metaphysics, "wit, eloquence, and poesy," and every other species of mental furniture that a respectable agitator ought to have; and what makes their performances all the more repulsive is, that they set up to be moral politicians par excellence. Wendell Phillips has better weapons in his private armory, but he seems to have a chivalrous repugnance to being any better equipped than those whom he leads.

The Washington correspondents are not showing that impartiality in the distribution of titles amongst the impeachment managers which we have urged upon them. Mr. Boutwell has already been dubbed the "Cold and Classical Demosthenes of the House," and both Messrs. Stevens and Butler have also been provided for. We hoped that in the next distribution something would be done for Messrs. Bingham and Wilson; but Mr. Boutwell is again the lucky man. He has received two fresh appellations, either of which would make an ordinary person happy: "The Black-haired Energy of this Impeachment" and "The Steady Wind Blowing Aft." Hole-in-the-Day, The-Man-that's-Afraid-of-His-Horse, and The-Man-that-Walks-under-the-Ground, the distinguished Pawnee braves, had better look after their names during the present crisis, or they may wake up some fine morning and find them gone.

The accounts of the operations of the "Kuklux Klan," the secret organization which has been formed by the Southern "Conservatives" for the purpose of making the South unpleasant for Yankees and negroes—or, to put the matter more plainly, for the purpose of breaking up the Radical organization at the South—are anything but pleasant reading. There are various stories as to the origin of the "Klan," but this is a matter of small importance. What is certain is, that it has established a reign of terror in Tennessee and Georgia, and is spreading into other States. Though the number of well-authenticated outrages committed by it may seem small, they have been of such a nature as to inspire deep apprehension in all the Unionists, black and white. A leading and highly respectable Radical has just been murdered by it in Georgia, and, what is worse, the newspapers applaud its operations. General Meade is taking measures to put it down in Georgia, the most effective of which is making the district in which an outrage is committed pecuniarily responsible for it. We venture to say this will produce much more satisfactory results than the direct pursuit of the members of the "Klan" with soldiers. The success of the "Klan" in Tennessee, of which the papers furnish full and horrible accounts, is a remarkable illustration of the value of the doctrines which have been preached so much during the last year about the efficacy of constitution-making, disfranchisement, and the sending of loyal men to Congress for the "regeneration" and pacification of the South. If these doctrines were sound, Tennessee ought now to be rapidly growing into a perfect garden of delight, for it fulfilled all the required conditions of "regeneration" over a year ago, and has for its governor the most truculent Unionist that ever wept over the flag or cursed a rebel; but the melancholy truth is that it is being barbarized by the absence of law or any signs of law.

There is not the least reason why intelligent American people, men and women, should not choose their own styles of dress as well as the enslaved French. Milton speaks of Custom as "the most cruel and unrelenting of all tyrants," but does not deny the possibility of trepanning Custom's head and putting some sound sense in it. Our republican theory of government will never be realized until the women of the nation are baptized into the idea, scorn receptions and fashion, take hold of higher education and politics and help man to get what he cannot get alone—a just and stable government. These, Mrs. Cady Stanton says, are the views of glorious old Mr. Wade on the woman question. Perhaps they are. But we had very explicit accounts from a press writer of Mr. Wade's views on the working-man question, taken down in short-hand as the words left Mr. Wade's lips, and it afterwards turned out that the correspondent and the whole party travelling with Mr. Wade had grossly misunderstood him. Indeed, Mr. Wade declared still further that the correspondent had grossly misrepresented him. However, Mrs. Stanton may be correct, and may be uncontradicted. The Courrier des Etats-Unis seems to think so, for it attacks Mr. Wade with violence—a violence called out probably by his slighting mention of the French. It stigmatizes him as an unveracious man, as a man of the Puritans, "with the hat ever on the head but when he speaks to you of his Bible," as a "Cameronian," as an illiterate person, and one addicted to profanity, as turbulent, cross-tempered, and so on. It is unmeasured abuse, but of an amusing kind, being only half in earnest after all. But Mrs. Stanton's praise is all in earnest, and "future Presidents" and other aspirants for honors will do well to flee from her as a new peril in politics.

There is little news of importance from Europe, except that of the defeat of the Disraeli ministry in the House of Commons on the Irish Church question. The probable consequences of this, as regards the State Church both in England and Ireland, we have discussed elsewhere. The consequences to the Disraeli ministry it is more difficult to forecast, owing to the peculiar mental and moral constitution of its leader. Under ordinary circumstances, he would doubtless appeal to the country by dissolving Parliament. He is not likely to do this on the present occasion for two reasons. One is, that the country would be almost certain to sustain the opposition if it was appealed to, as it would be in case of a dissolution now, on the single question of the Irish Church. The other is, that there will be a dissolution in due course next year under the Recent Reform act, so that to force members to go to the trouble and expense of another election now would be looked on as a pecuniary penalty inflicted on the House for its failure to support the ministry, and would, therefore, be as unpopular amongst Mr. Disraeli's followers as amongst his foes. There is little doubt that he would like to repeat the "little game" of last year, refuse to resign, throw the whole responsibility on the House of Commons, and set himself to work to carry out its will without regard to his own convictions in the matter of the Irish Church, as he did in the matter of Parliamentary reform. But it is tolerably certain that this mode of sticking in office is no longer available. Most of those who followed his lead about the Reform Bill are somewhat ashamed of their course and ashamed of their leader. Moreover, the circumstance that he was once "a gentleman of the press," that he has risen under "the cold shade of aristocracy," and is not ashamed of his origin, as well as the other affecting particulars of his career, do not wear well as political forces. Goldwin Smith, in what would have been a very effective, if it had not been a very ferocious, attack on him, has really laid bare the arts by which he has risen, and they are not arts of which "gentlemen of the press" need feel particularly proud. It is true that, like Burke, "at every step in his life he has been traversed and opposed," that "at every turnpike he has been obliged to show his passport," but it is not true that "all his arts have been manly arts."

In France, the only incident of much importance has been the issue of a pamphlet, either from the Imperial pen or that of somebody in the "Cabinet particulier," entitled, "Les Titres de la Dynastie Napoléonienne," which contains an account of the various popular votes, or "plébiscites," as it is now the fashion to call them in Europe, taken in France on the claims of the Bonapartes to the Imperial power, showing that their authority has been again and again confirmed by overwhelming majorities. The pamphlet, as it only repeats what everybody knew already, would have little importance, if it were not considered to be put forward as a counterblast to the gale of discontent and distrust which is just now blowing against the Imperial dynasty, and which the conscription under the new law is aggravating seriously, having already produced serious disturbances in the south, and which the Emperor's advancing years and growing physical infirmity render doubly alarming. His immediate followers, who owe their all to his rise, are anxious to meet the crisis by increased repression, but he himself is said, either through loss of nerve or growing love of peace and quiet, to be more inclined to conciliation than he has ever been. One indication of the continued ascendancy of the "Mamelukes," however, is the promotion of the Chief of Police to be what is called "Director-General of Public Security," a new office with great police power, and independent of the Ministry of the Interior.

NATIONAL DEBT IN EUROPE.

IN speaking some weeks ago of the degradation that would follow any attempt to evade the full payment of the national debt according to the understanding on which it was contracted, we expressed the opinion that, if the United States followed the advice of the repudiators, its companions in disgrace in the money markets of the world would be Turkey, Spain, and Greece only, and that it would not enjoy the society and sympathy of any first-class powers. We are now, however, enabled to state, for the consolation of the repudiators, that it seems likely that Austria and Italy will, before long, to use General Butler's elegant phrase, "take all seeming or actual wrong from their debt" by clapping a heavy income-tax on the interest paid to the public creditors. We cannot say that either of these powers stands high amongst the nations of the world. The first is a decayed trickster and bully, which is not, correctly speaking, entitled to be called a nation at all, but is a conglomeration of races, built up in the Middle Ages and projected into the modern world, rather as a relic of things long passed away than as a living political organization, with an honor and aspirations of its own. Italy, too, has not much to boast of as a nation either in the past or present. It has struggled into independence by foreign aid, and, thus far, has not shown its ability to hold its own single-handed against any of its neighbors, and is beset by internal difficulties such as most other countries have taken centuries to overcome, and which it would certainly not reflect any great discredit on Italian statesmen to be foiled by.

There is no denying that Austria at least enjoys the style and title of a first-class power, and Italy, if in the second rank, may be said to stand at the very head of it, inasmuch as her population and the size of her army would, were she united and organized, place her in the first rank. Therefore, there is some consolation in the fact that both governments are said to be about to tax the interest on their bonds—Austria to the tune of ten per cent., and Italy of about eight. The thing is a flagrant breach of faith, for the simple reason that their creditors are nearly all foreigners, and that the loans were all raised in London, Paris, and Amsterdam, in return for bonds like our own, bearing a certain annual interest, or, in other words, for fixed annuities; but the takers certainly never undertook to share the fortunes of the Austrian empire or Italian kingdom, or to take the chance of their taxation being light or heavy, or their finances well or ill managed. Of course, the class of persons who buy government securities which are already subjected to taxation, or which are well known to be liable to it, have nothing to complain of, be they native or foreigners, as long as the burden is inflicted on all kinds of income equally. They know their risks before they take them. But when a government says to a foreigner, Lend us one hundred dollars, and we will pay you six dollars a year for it as long as we keep it, and pay you off at the end of twenty years, or pay you fifteen dollars a year for twenty years, and then be quits—and after he has advanced the money, and the bargain has been closed, and old men and widows and orphans have settled down into dependence on it, it suddenly turns round and says that it finds itself rather straitened, and has determined to retain sixty cents a year out of the six dollars by way of interest, it is simply guilty of what in a private individual is called swindling. Yet this is what the Italians and Austrians talk of doing.

The reason they talk of doing it is not that they are ignorant of the nature of the transaction they propose. They understand it perfectly well, and discuss the matter both in the Parliament and Reichsrath with all the moaning and groaning which become honorable men. But the fact is, that money they must have, and money is not to be had in any other way. The alternative presented to them, they say, is death or cheating, and the public creditor, they say, surely cannot hesitate between total loss and partial loss. Ever since Louis Napoleon ascended the French throne, the increase of armaments which his existence has everywhere made necessary, has driven all European governments into borrowing, and, unluckily for them, they for many years found borrowing easy. The thirty-five years of peace between Waterloo and the coup d'état were a period of extraordinary prosperity, and the accumulation of capital which took place during these years in England, Holland, Belgium, and France, as the result of the rapid growth of commerce and manufactures in all these countries, was enormous. The consequence was, that when Europe settled down after the establishment of the Empire, governments found that they had only to stretch out their hands, in all the great markets, in order to have their treasury filled, and they certainly have not failed to improve their opportunities. There has not been one of them, except England and Prussia, which has not gone on ever since making a deficit every year regularly, and filling it with a loan. The increase in the sum total of their debts has consequently been something frightful. Even Turkey has found the means of borrowing, and Spain has given some signs not of honesty, but of reviving hope and unabated impudence, and the Southern Confederacy began to borrow before it was three months in existence.

Things have gone on swimmingly until now. The interest has been regularly paid by the aid of fresh loans, and the ingenuity of the human race has been taxed, as it never has been taxed before, for the invention and production of fresh instruments of destruction. Ease in borrowing begot and stimulated ease in spending; and the confidence and extravagance of the governments seemed to communicate itself to all fields of enterprise, till the crash came at last in 1866, after the battle of Sadowa, and now no government has a chance of a loan on any foreign market. To use Mr. Goschen's words, in his article, "Two per Cent.," in a late number of the Edinburgh Review, "capital has struck" against all kinds of investments. The loan markets were closed to ministers of finance. Capitalists have begun to see that the only result of their confidence and liberality has been to provide their debtors with enormous fleets and armies, with which they are now waiting to fly at each other's throats, with a fair prospect of destroying what is left of their substance.

The means to which Austria and Italy are resorting to get out of their difficulties is, however, a striking illustration of the growth of public morality and of governmental power and organization. Five hundred years ago, a monarch who found himself short, and unable to pay his creditors, either adulterated the coinage, or increased its nominal value by proclamation or legal enactment. These were the only modes of cheating creditors then in use, as obligations having a long period to run were, for obvious reasons, unknown. The burden of taxation he could not increase, because, in his easiest times, he raised every cent on which he could lay hands. Nowadays, however, there is no government in the world that would dare to resort to this device; there is probably no public man in Europe who would venture to propose it, well knowing the ridicule and opprobrium of which he would make himself the object. The nearest approach made to it in our day is the Western proposal to pay the public debt in greenbacks, but the advocates of this scheme are blinded to its real nature by the fact that the new greenback they would issue for the purpose would, to the natural eye, be precisely the same thing as the greenback which they every day see passing as good money. Governments, therefore, either raise forced loans, by the issue of legal-tender paper, or they clap on taxation where they promised not to tax, or where people never expected them to tax. They do as Spain and Greece have done—refuse to meet their liabilities on the simple plea of want of funds, and inability to raise them. Either plan shows some progress in morality; and the amount that may be realized, or rather saved, by clapping on an income-tax, is a striking evidence of the progress of society both in wealth and confidence, inasmuch as it shows the amount of money which people in our day put in the power of governments without any tangible pledge or security.

With regard to the future, the Duc de Broglie, in a recent article in the Revue des Deux Mondes, pointed out what he considers a source of insecurity with regard to all diplomatic engagements, from which many European economists fear there will flow, for a while at least, similar insecurity with regard to all financial engagements contracted by governments. His theory is that heretofore the monarch, or at least a very small knot of statesmen, in every European country, represented the nation, and to all intents and purposes were the nation, and thought of themselves as the nation. Moreover, their successors, with their power, inherited their traditions and reputation, and regarded all their engagements very much in the light of their own engagements, and, if they violated them, had to incur personal odium, and vindicate their conduct before a small and therefore powerful circle of their fellows. Now all this is changed or changing. Statesmen are, owing to the rise of democracy, becoming more and more nearly the agents of the people, and do not pretend to do more than execute the popular will.

Now the people, these financiers say, are as yet too new to the work of government, and too unfamiliar with the idea of national responsibility, to be very particular about breaking pecuniary engagements which they find inconvenient. The shame of the breach of faith, too, has to be distributed amongst so many persons, that no individual feels it sufficiently keenly to rouse him into any decided action against a course from which he derives material benefit; and therefore, it is said, we may confidently look for a period both of great extravagance and widespread repudiation, until the democracy, having got settled firmly in its seat, begins to respect itself, and learns to reverence its own plighted faith. Any sign of moral weakness on this point in this country strengthens these apprehensions; but judging from the effect produced by the discussions of the last two months, we cannot help feeling that the democracy on this side of the water will show that the morality of the masses, when applied to public affairs, is not only as good as that of oligarchies, but vastly better.

THE FALL OF THE IRISH CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT.

The vote in the House of Commons on Mr. Gladstone's resolutions providing for the abolition of the Irish Church Establishment, do not ensure its immediate abolition, nor do they even ensure its being finally and completely dealt with by the present Parliament. They simply put a stop to any fresh appointments to livings in the gift of the Government, or to the appointment of bishops to any sees that may hereafter become vacant. In fact, it is not at all likely that even the reformed Parliament will put it out of existence at once. The plan adopted will probably be to dispose of the various livings as they become vacant by the death of the actual incumbents—thus avoiding all perplexing questions of compensation. But where the livings are the property of private individuals—which, we believe, in Ireland is rare—or of corporations like Trinity College, Dublin, which holds a great number of them, compensation will of course have to be made on some fixed scale. The effects of the change on the spiritual condition of the people will be small. In districts in which the establishment really supplies a popular demand, the worshippers will be able to maintain the church and clergyman by their voluntary contributions, with diminished dignity perhaps, but still with quite as great efficiency as now. Dissent in Ireland is practically extinct, though thirty years ago both Methodism and Congregationalism may be said to have flourished. In a very large portion of the country, however, Protestantism will totally disappear with the downfall of the Church, and the handful of Protestant worshippers be left without any religious ministrations whatever. Whether they will suffer by this is, however, more than doubtful, as the ministers paid by the state to instruct congregations of this size are very rarely of much value from a spiritual point of view. In fact, the Irish clergy, except in Dublin and one or two other large cities, have themselves been for long years a standing illustration of the badness of the system to which they belong. What with their want of intelligent society, their unfortunate relations with their Catholic neighbors, who look on them as the outposts of a foreign army, their close connections with the Protestant gentry, whose relations with their Catholic neighbors are nearly as bad, and the demoralizing influence of a false position, they may be said to have done nothing for religion, and little or nothing for learning. A more deplorable history than theirs, considering what the state has done for them, from a literary point of view, no body of clergy in Europe has to show. The Irish bishoprics, too, have, when not given to Englishmen, been generally bestowed as rewards for political service of a low order rendered by the appointee's relatives. One or two great houses may be said to have had bishoprics in the family. In fact, taken for all in all, a viler abuse, one with fewer redeeming traits, fewer historical claims to the sympathy or consideration of any intelligent human being, than the Irish Church, has never fallen before the reformer's axe.

Its downfall is undoubtedly the indirect result of the war in this country; and that this should be one of the results of the war is another singular illustration of the reactionary influence of this country on the history of England. The success of the Revolution undoubtedly prevented a serious change in the form of the English Government under George III. The success of republican institutions had much to do with rousing and keeping alive the discontent which ended in the passage of the Reform Bill and the triumph of Catholic Emancipation in 1830–2. It is now certain that the success or failure of the renewed struggle for an extension of the franchise, which began after the repeal of the corn-laws and continued very freely during the ensuing ten years, turned on the result of the rebellion here. Had the rebellion ended in a disruption of the Union, and a consequent breakup of the North into one or more confederacies, there is hardly a doubt that no change in the distribution of the franchise in England would have been made, at least during the lifetime of this generation, and it was the secret consciousness of its bearing on English affairs which excited the interest with which Englishmen watched the struggle—an interest such as they have never shown in any foreign conflict since the contest of the Dutch with Philip II. and Louis XIV., when England was believed to be looked on by the Pope and his vassals as a choice morsel to be devoured last. The war here bred the Fenians, and the Fenians, to the eternal disgrace of English statesmen, have secured for Irish affairs a kind and degree of attention such as they have never before received from English legislators.

It is difficult to believe, however, that the effect of the abolition of the Irish Church will be confined to Ireland. In abolishing it, two important principles which have long formed the subject of controversy are conceded. One is, that church property has not the rights or incidents of private property, and may be disposed of by the legislature on general considerations of expediency. The other is, that the maintenance of a state church which is not the church of the majority, is not justifiable. Now, the last of these principles, placed in the hands of the reformed Parliament, must lead—and one might almost venture to say before long—to some serious state-meddling with the English Church itself. Owing to a variety of circumstances, the hold of that Church on the country of late years has been seriously weakened. In the first place, the feeling of the uselessness of all ecclesiastical establishments has greatly increased under the influence of the general growth of political radicalism, which the writings of "the philosophers," as they are now called—meaning Mill, Goldwin Smith, and their followers—have of late years done so much to promote, even amongst the middle classes. In the next place, the religious revival, or—as this is a technical phrase already appropriated by a very different phenomenon—the increasing interest in religious questions which the growth of political radicalism has done much to promote, has made a serious rent in the Church itself. The Broad Churchmen have, during the last ten years, been becoming more and more heterodox, and while increasing, if anything, in earnestness, have embraced and are proclaiming opinions on such questions as the atonement and future punishment, which they insist upon holding, and have successfully vindicated their legal right to hold, within the pale of the Church, and they have almost, if not quite, succeeded in taking possession of Oxford University.

This, combined with their own natural tendencies, has driven the High Churchmen into still more advanced positions, and they now make pretensions and have adopted ceremonies which have secured for them the character, as well as the name, of a new sect. The Ritualists of to-day, in fact, are as far in advance of the High Churchmen of twenty years ago as the latter were then in advance of the Low Churchmen, and the gulf between them and the Broad Churchmen is perhaps wider than any that has ever divided men belonging to the same religious organization. A feeble attempt is now being made to restrain the former within limits satisfactory to the public, by the appointment of a commission of enquiry, which has recommended the bestowal on the bishop of the power of controlling clergymen in their use of forms without appeal. But this will hardly be very effective, for two reasons: Some of the bishops are Ritualists themselves; others will be too timid to push the Ritualists to the wall lest it should precipitate what everybody now begins to fear is at hand—a complete schism.

In the meantime, the effect of the conflict on the general public mind is very injurious to the Establishment. It is getting the country into the habit of looking at the clergy as foolish and quarrelsome persons whom Parliament and the courts will have to take in hand, and is exposing them every day to the contemptuous denunciations of the secular press—even to those of papers like the Spectator, which make an open profession of strong religious feeling. Moreover, it is completing that alienation of the body of the people which began with the rise of Nonconformity more than two centuries ago, and which, under one form or other, and with varying degrees of force, has ever since been sapping the foundations of the Establishment. The accounts one hears at present of the effect of Ritualism in driving away from the parish church in large districts all but a few farmers who are in some way under obligations to the clergymen, and sending them to the dissenting chapels, or keeping them at home on Sundays, are very striking. Moreover, the growth of the sacerdotal character amongst the clergy, which Ritualism promotes, increases their intolerance of temper and manner, thus widening the breach of feeling between the clergy and the people which the social position and training of the former have always created, and which has been one of the curses of the Church and of the country. And—though this is, of course, a minor cause of irritation—those of the clergy who are justices of the peace administer the law, especially under obnoxious acts, with more than usual stringency—a circumstance which can be readily accounted for by certain features in clerical education which we have not time to discuss here—which, when commented on by the press as it is now, fans the flame of popular dislike.

It is hardly possible, therefore, that the English Church, with all these causes of dissolution at work within it, can long escape disagreeable overhauling at the hands of the reformed Parliament, particularly as the very first work that Parliament will be called on to do will be the abolition of the sister Establishment in Ireland. The strength of the English Establishment lies almost wholly now in the fact that it is property—a fact which, in the days when men were hanged for petty theft, was sufficient in England to cover almost any abuse, but which has of late years lost a great deal of its strength. Still, when one remembers the enormous sums invested in Church livings—the number of scions and dependents of wealthy families that hold them—and the close alliance of the landed gentry with the Church, as a political institution and moneyed corporation, one cannot look for any change without a desperate struggle, and perhaps a protracted one.

THE LAW OF POPULATION.

The last number of the Quarterly Journal of Psychological Medicine and Medical Jurisprudence contains an article, by Dr. Nathan Allen, on the "Law of Population," in which he repeats at considerable length the opinions on the same subject which made so much stir when produced by him before the Social Science Association some time ago in Boston. He gives the various theories of population propounded by Matthews, Sadler, Doubleday, Herbert Spencer, Richards, and others, and pronounces them all erroneous, for the somewhat singular reason that they are "so variable and contradictory." He then brings forward his own law, which, though not thrown into a formula, as it ought to be, is, as nearly as we can make out, that where women are properly trained, they will be healthy, and will marry and bear children in such numbers that population will increase; that where they are not properly trained, and are consequently not healthy, they will marry as much as usual, but will have few or no children, and population will decrease.

He has deduced this law "from the evidences of the ill health of New England women, as gathered from travellers, miscellaneous writers, newspapers, journals, and medical books and physicians," coupled with the decline going on, as he believes, from his own examination of certain town registers, in the size of New England families; and he fortifies his position by an elaborate exposition of the condition of the female frame in health, and the departures from this standard which are discoverable in the physical condition of the average New England women of our day. This departure he ascribes to the faultiness of the present style of dress, to the abstinence of American women from household labor, to their general neglect of exercise, and, finally, to over-cultivation of their minds both during their school-days and afterwards:

"Nowhere else," he exclaims, "is female education carried to such an extent as in New England. It is true there have been at former periods, and are at the present day, among the European nations, women distinguished for a profound knowledge of books, of the sciences, and for learning generally; but with no nation or people upon the globe can so large a number of highly educated young women be found as in New England. Now this education seems a noble, a grand, a magnificent thing for the female; but in obtaining it what are the effects upon her physical system, and what are to be the results upon posterity?

"The nervous temperament becomes altogether too predominant, the brain and nervous system are cultivated in undue proportion to other parts of the body. There is an excessive activity of the brain, a kind of precociousness in its development, a smartness and a brilliancy in the mental training and character of our girls, that can nowhere else be found. It is a growth too much like that of plants reared in a hothouse, that cannot bear outside exposure."

Now, the apparent difference in the fertility of the native and foreign-born women in New England is a difference which is observed in all countries between the women of an educated, thoughtful, prudent, and somewhat fastidious race and those of a comparatively ignorant, unreflecting, improvident, and coarsely-bred one. The lower a race or class stands in the scale the faster it breeds, provided its food is sufficient to maintain a low state of health. This may not be universally true, but it has been observed in such a number of cases that Dr. Allen's theory, that the native New Englanders have fewer children than the Germans or Irish around them because their physical condition is inferior and their mental culture higher, is shown to be nearly worthless. The women of the Irish or English aristocracy are not noted for their bad health, and yet their families cannot be compared to those of English hinds or to those of Irish laborers during the potato period. There are certain cantons of Switzerland in which the women are as strong and ignorant as Dr. Allen could desire, and in which population has remained stationary for generations, owing to the simple fact that few parents have more than two children. We have rarely seen stronger or more robust-looking women than those of the Saxons of Transylvania, and they are as stupid as any friend of humanity need wish to see, and yet the population of the colony has not increased for over a century, and it is now declining rapidly, while the wretched Slovacks and Wallachians around them are breeding like rabbits. Ever since the Revolution the population of France—not in Paris simply, but in the country districts—has increased but very slowly if at all—very slowly, indeed, compared with the days when grass-fed peasants reared their swarms of brats to cover the roads with beggars, and whiten the battle-fields of the Low Countries with their bones. Dr. Allen notices this circumstance himself. "One hundred years ago," he says, "the birth-rate of France was equal to that of any of the nations in Europe, but since the present century commenced, the number of births has been every year approximating nearer and nearer to that of the deaths." "Fifty years ago the average number of children to each married woman in France was five; it was afterwards reduced to four, and now to three in the rural districts and provinces, and to only two in Paris and other cities." "What can be the causes of such a change?" he then asks, and answers that "he can allude to only a few of them." As a matter of fact, however, he "alludes" to one only, and that one is a pure assumption of his own, set up apparently to support his theory about the population of New England, viz., "that the French women"—whom he pronounces very like the New England women—"are very much given to the enjoyments of society, to amusements and light literature," and "have tried to make domestic labor and household duties as easy as possible."

If Dr. Allen had gone about his work in the right way, he would have asked himself whether, about the time that the size of French families began to diminish, any great change occurred in the social condition of the people; and, having thus put himself on the right scent, a very little reading would have shown him that about fifty years ago the French were suddenly raised from a condition of abject misery into one of comparative comfort and independence; that their food and clothing were greatly improved; their intelligence greatly stimulated by their relief from feudal burdens; that the standard of living has ever since been steadily rising amongst them, and the proportion of the national wealth to population steadily increasing. He would then have asked himself whether this has not had something to do with the decline in the size of French families; whether the various careful students of French society who have discussed the subject have been totally mistaken in thinking that this and the great standing armies combined have had everything to do with it; and he would then in his enumeration of causes probably have "alluded to" the French Revolution, and said nothing, or next to nothing, about the French women's love of "amusements and light literature," and their devotion "to fashion in dress."

In fact, judging from Dr. Allen's "allusion" to the case of France as one of his proofs, we are afraid he knows very little about French women. If he did, he would certainly not charge the mass of them with such devotion to "amusements or light literature," or dress, as to cause them to neglect their children, or not wish to have children. Out of Paris there are probably no more careful, painstaking, and economical mothers in the world. The women of the provinces are devoted to their children with a devotion such as is certainly very rare either in England or America. They take an amount of pains with their education, and make exertions to provide them with a dowry or a good start in life, such as are seen in no other country. So far from being extravagant in their dressing, they are models of simplicity, of neatness, and of good taste, which American women, who go to France, would do well to copy, but don't. Moreover, we venture to say that more marriages are due in France to the desire of having children, and fewer to the desire for companionship merely, than in any other European country; and that the relations between parents and children, and especially between children and their mother, are nowhere marked by greater tenderness, sympathy, and intimacy. In fact, it is as well established as anything of the kind can be, that the great cause of the falling off in the French population has been the growth of a feeling of responsibility about children, about their education and their career. We admit this feeling may readily become morbid, and we think in France it is becoming morbid, and, of course, there is a considerable admixture of simple selfishness in it, but it has always been sadly deficient amongst the Anglo-Saxon race, and, we honestly confess, we should like to see it in greater measure amongst those Irish and German breeders in Massachusetts to whose performances Dr. Allen points with so much satisfaction. Let us add that, as the world grows in moral and religious culture, this feeling of responsibility is sure to increase, and, wherever it increases, men and women will hesitate more and more about charging themselves with the burden of large families, no matter what the state of their health may be. We are certainly not able to say in what way the demands of their moral and physical nature are eventually to be reconciled. That they will be reconciled somehow we do not doubt, but we can say with certainty that God never intended people to bring human beings into the world to whose physical, mental, and moral training they were unable to pay proper attention, and for whose happiness they were unable to make reasonable provision.

What Dr. Allen says about the effects of over-cultivation in the health of New England women must also be taken with great caution. On this point he talks with just the same looseness and want of exact knowledge as about the character and habits of French women. There are no statistics to show what is the effect of book-learning on women's brain. What has been said about it thus far is all guesswork, and Dr. Allen seems to guess with more than common wildness. He has heard of girls being overworked at school and falling into bad health afterwards, and he has probably known cases in which married women of a literary turn had no children; but how much their devotion to literature had to do with it, or whether it had anything whatever to do with it, he had not, and could not have, any means of knowing; and yet he has no hesitation in making in a professedly scientific essay such extravagant assertions as this: "In the whole range of history very few instances can be cited where a married woman distinguished for talent and devoted to literary pursuits had a large, or even medium-sized, family of children." To expose the fallacy and inaccuracy of this would require, easy as it would be, more space and a deeper descent into details than we can here afford. He uses, too, the phrase "higher education" evidently without attaching any exact meaning to it, just as many newspaper writers use the phrases "ripe scholar" and "accomplished gentleman." There are very few "highly educated" women in the absolute sense of the term either in Massachusetts or anywhere else—not, we venture to say, one in every thousand. Women are usually spoken of as "highly educated" in comparison with other women, but in order to know what this means or form an idea whether "high education" has injured woman physically, we must know what the standard by which they are judged is. Many women are called "highly educated" because they speak French, play on the piano, and are familiar with "the use of the globes;" but Dr. Allen will have some trouble in persuading us that this kind of learning impairs women's vitality.

The fact is, that the absence of all machinery for the supply to women of a really "high education," and the absence of all motive for devoting themselves to severe brain labor, has left us without any means of judging what the effect of deep and protracted mental labor on women as a class would be. As matters stand, we have no means of forming any conclusion on the subject worth the notice of a scientific man. On the other hand, abundant materials exist for forming a conclusion of true value as to the effects on female health of the want of mental training of any kind, of the want of any absorbing pursuits, or of all incentive to strenuous and protracted effort, with its attendant nervous strain, and we venture to say if Dr. Allen will go to work in this field he will produce results of considerable importance. Within the area of our own observation, which has been of about average extent, we have known many demonstrable cases of women made delicate from want of anything particular to do, but we have never known one in which the constitution was injured by hard study. We presume most of our readers have had the same experience.

Dr. Allen's theory with regard to the effect of mental culture on women's physical condition would, if true, open up a very gloomy future, because it would show that, in order to prevent the extinction of the human race, one half of it will have to be kept from exerting their highest powers. We do not think that any doctrine should be repudiated because it is disagreeable; but this one is not only disagreeable, but, as we believe, has no foundation in facts. We know that cultivation has not diminished the physical powers of men. The male portion of the species, in fact, seems to gain in physical endurance as it gains in intelligence. The educated man, taken from the college or the counting-house, is found in our day to bear even the exhausting demands of service in the ranks in time of war more readily than the peasant from the plough. The officer, too, in nine cases out of ten, bears fatigue, cold, and hunger better than the private, and although the sudden and prodigious demands made on human energies by the recent improvements in transportation and other communication are bearing hard on the present generation, and slightly increasing the number of cases of nervous disease, this strain will hardly last very long. Society will adjust itself to the railroad and the telegraph, and the social pulse will gradually fall and enable men to live more healthily. In fact, modern history is full of proof that the human brain adapts itself to circumstances; that it does not outgrow the rest of the body, but carries it along with it, and makes it a sharer in all its triumphs; and that we may fairly count on the ability of the muscular and nervous systems to answer in the long run all the demands made on them by the understanding.

If this be true of men, we think we may confidently predict that it will be found true of women also, and that we may call on them to do with their brains everything of which the Almighty has made their brains capable, without the least fear that any function of the body, and particularly the most important one of all, will in the long run suffer thereby. We no more believe that He intended women to be kept uncultivated in order that they might bear children than He intended laborers to be kept ignorant that they might dig and delve more effectively, and yet this last doctrine was for centuries firmly held by persons as wise as Dr. Allen. It may be safely said that in all that regards the preservation of the species and its moral and material improvement, if each individual will do his own duty, the general result will be perfectly satisfactory. As Mr. Austin has well remarked, the sentiment of love is one of the strongest and most valuable of the social bonds; but it is, nevertheless, not necessary that every time a lover kisses his sweetheart he should do so with an eye to the general weal.

ITALIAN LIBRARIES.

INTIMATELY connected with the question of general education is the question of the maintenance of public libraries, whose florid existence under the old dynasties was generously and permanently secured. To go no further back in our researches, and to allow them no wider range, than Florentine libraries in the grand-ducal times, we find that one and all were maintained with decency, not to say affluence. The Palatina alone cost the state 40,000 francs; the Magliabecchiana, idem; the minors were proportionately fostered. In these days, with an Italian parliament sitting in the capital, the entire sum allotted to the National Library (the Palatina and Magliabecchiana united) is 16,000 francs, of which 8,000 go in wages, keeping the building in order, etc., 7,000 in subscriptions to serial publications, so that but 1,000 francs—two hundred dollars—remain for the purchase of books! This fact, commented on by moderate as well as radical papers, has caused the public to ask, "Who 's to blame?" This time it is impossible to cause "the responsibility to ascend," as the phrase goes, to either Government or King. The libraries are regulated by the municipal authorities, and, if they were to vote the enormous sums that go in official fireworks and illuminations to the library, the current literature of Europe might be purchased—and if in reality their funds do not suffice, they could appeal to Parliament, who, for shame's sake, would vote a subsidy. The question raised has led me to turn to the volume published by Natoli on Italian libraries, and, assuredly, if numbers of works count, Italy is ahead of all the nations in the world.

The first library was founded in Italy by Cassiodorus, minister of Theodoric, King of the Goths, at Squillace. It contains the ancient authors of the sixth century. From this first library to that of the manuscripts preserved by the churches, especially at Milan, Lucca, and Vercelli, in the ninth and tenth centuries, to the celebrated ones of Montecasino, Bobbio Pomposa, Nonantola, founded in the eighth, ninth, and tenth centuries, to the libraries of the Renaissance in the fourteenth, chief among which was that of St. Mark, in Venice, founded by Petrarch by the gift of his own books in 1362, that of the Dukes of Urbino (fifteenth century), those of the Medici in the Vatican (sixteenth century), down to our own time, the number of libraries has increased to 210, of which 164 are public. The total number of volumes contained in them is 4,149,281, whereas Great Britain possesses but 1,771,493. Among these, theological and religious works figure largely, modern books bear but a small proportion, and foreign works are almost excluded. This anomaly is explained by the fact that up to 1860 Italy had left her libraries in the exclusive keeping of the priests, who shared their custody with police commissaries. Since 1860, it is true that the purchase of theological works may be said to have ceased, and what works have been added are scientific and literary; but alas! these have been few indeed, owing to two causes: 1st, That the men who superintend the public libraries spend such sums as they have at their disposal in the acquisition of rare editions oftener than they ought; 2d, That Italy, or rather her legislators, lavish in all else, are parsimonious in all that relates to intellectual pursuits; and while the British Museum has an annual sum of $50,000, the Berlin Library $100,000, the Paris Bibliothèque Impériale $30,000, the entire sum spent in Italy for her 164 public libraries is $153,264, the larger portion of which sum goes in the repairs of buildings, pay of servants, handsome bindings, etc.

As a statistical curiosity, we may observe that the average of readers from September to April is 551,194; from May to October, 386,276; that the annual average of books demanded is 989,000, of which 262,000 are works on fine arts, 183,528 on mathematics and natural science, 70,537 philosophical, 194,000 legal, 10,179 encyclopædic, and but 54,491 "sacred" works—which figures prove that the study of "sacred things" is at a great discount in Italy. The province of Campania is the most studious; next comes Lombardy, then Piedmont, then Sicily; Tuscany, richer in libraries than any other province—Tuscany, which claims to be the Athens of Italy, has fewer students than any other portion of the peninsula. All the libraries are rich, of course, in manuscripts and incunabula, or editions of the fourth century, the rarest editions of succeeding ages, and in autographic works. The Montecasino Library (sixth century) contains 800 volumes of manuscripts of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, 100 diplomas and Papal bulls dating from the year 744, and 45,000 of the most ancient records. The Lorenziana, of Florence, founded by Cosmo il Vecchio, contains, among other gems of illuminated manuscripts, a prayer-book in four volumes, illuminated by Bartolomeo and Giov. di Antonio; a New Testament, with 37 miniatures, by Filippo Torelli; a parchment missal, illuminated by the brothers Gherardo and Monte del Faro; and a diary by Ottavante degli Ottavanti. Among its manuscripts we find Justinian's Pandects (sixteenth century), a Virgil (of the fourth), the Amiatura Bible (of the sixth), Tacitus (ninth), Æschylus and Sophocles (eleventh), Cicero's Letters (of the twelfth), and the copy of both these by Petrarch; a Greek Bible, of the ninth; a Homer, of the tenth; a Boccaccio, copied from the original, by Mannelli; the autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini; Petrarch's original letters; one hundred manuscript copies of the Divina Commedia, etc., etc.

The National Library includes the Magliabecchiana and the Palatina, united in 1862; the former possesses 9,000 manuscripts, the latter 3,000, forming the collection of Galileo and his school. I must not be tempted into a description of the treasures of either—of gems which look dull enough on paper, but whose very names would make a bibliomaniac's mouth water. What is more to the purpose of the general public is to know that the library is being gradually reduced to serviceable order; that the attendants are civil; the reading-room warm, airy, and well lighted, and that the authors' catalogue is well-nigh completed. Only in the British Museum Library is perfection yet attained in this respect; there you have but to know "what's your subject," and the object-catalogue gives you a list of all the books that treat of it, while the authors' catalogue gives you date, edition, and place in the library; and, as England owes all this to an Italian—Panizzi, of Modena—there is no reason to doubt that his countrymen may achieve the same result at home, if only the sinews of war be furnished. One very convenient system for borrowers, but very injurious to the general preservation of the library, is that of allowing readers to take books home; true, each has to furnish the name of a respectable referee, but the librarian tells me that no end of books get lost, while I have verified frequently the absence of valuable maps and plates. Still, taken as a whole, the capital has brought no greater boon to students than the National Library in the splendid halls of the Uffizi.

Reluctantly I must also slur over the National Library of Milan, with its 1,916 fourth-century volumes; its 913 Aldine editions; its fourteenth-century novel, "Jehosaphat in India," illuminated by Bons, Duchess of Savoy, when she came as bride of Galeazzo Visconti; its entire collection of the engravings of the Cabinet du Roy au Louvre, many by Albert Dürer; its six autograph letters of Galileo, its Fra Paolo Sarpi manuscripts, etc.

The Ambrosiana, also in Milan, boasts of 1,035 fourth-century volumes; a Virgil, printed in Venice, 1470; Valdarser's Decameron, 1471; a Virgil with marginal notes by Petrarch—and grieves over the theft of a volume full of writings and drawings by Leonardo da Vinci by the "Liberators" in 1796.

Modena has her Palatina, with 67 of the rarest Eastern manuscripts, her Latin and Greek parchments.

Cesena boasts of her Malatestiana, and the store set by that city on her antique gems may be guessed by the casket in which she keeps them. She possesses 344 of the rarest parchment manuscripts, some of the ninth century exquisitely illuminated, and many gorgeously bound in gold and set with jewels, and keeps them in a special hall, in the form of a basilica. The three naves are separated by columns of Grecian marble; between the columns of the side aisles are plutei or reading desks, of the finest ancient workmanship, 29 on each side, and the manuscripts are chained to the desk after the custom of those times when, before the invention of printing, each volume cost on the average, $116. On either side the desks is the escutcheon of the Malatesta family, and the crest and name of Novello Malatesta, who founded the library, is cut in marble on the pavement in various places.

Space forbids me to even touch on the Trinità of Cava dei Tirreni, on the Ventimiliana of Catania, on the famous University Library of Bologna, on the Nazionale of Parma, the Nazionale of Naples, the Comunale of Palermo, the Universitaria of Pisa. Each city of Italy possesses its own library, and all that relates to the local history, ancient and modern, may be found therein—a valuable fact this for the historian who, from the separate life-history of the "hundred cities," shall set himself to the gigantic test of compiling the history of united Italy. Something of this kind, by the way, has been effected by the wayward, wondrous, gifted Ferrari, who, in order to complete his "Guelphs and Ghibellines," travelled from city to city, and made notes of the origin, stories, manners, and customs of each.

Of the Vatican Library Mr. Murray gives all necessary information. Of St. Mark's we have as yet no precise information, but from the few days I spent there last year I should say that for contemporary literature, home and foreign, it beats all the other libraries put together. Of German books there is naturally an ample supply, and every book that I asked for in English I found.

FRANKLIN'S COURT DRESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

In your remarks upon the costumes of our foreign ministers—"the great dress question"—you very naturally refer to the well-known fact that Franklin, while representing this country at the Court of Versailles, appeared before the King at a drawing-room, or whatever the occasion may be called, in the dress of a private citizen instead of a court dress, which the etiquette of the court required.

A great deal has been said about that circumstance, and I imagine it has had no little influence upon the minds of our Secretaries of State and other public men when dealing with the question of dress.

Are all the facts and circumstances of that case known? How came Dr. Franklin, who had had much experience of court etiquette, who, we have reason to believe, was particular in the matter of dress, and who, up to that time, had conformed to the etiquette of the courts where he appeared, to appear at court at that time in citizen's dress? Is the subject spoken of in any contemporary letters from Paris? I think not. The subject of dress had not, at that time, attracted any attention in this country. Our public men had been reared under a regal government; were accustomed to court manners, court usages, and court dresses—Dr. Franklin among the rest—and they did not look upon such things as we do now. General Washington, even, established something like court manners and court etiquette—a "Republican Court," as Griswold calls it—which, at that time, seemed quite proper to the American people.

But to return to Dr. Franklin: I think there must have been some special reason why he appeared at court at that time in citizen's dress, and the circumstances which I am about to relate, if not entirely true, may have much truth in them. In June, 1824, I was in this city for the first time, and here became acquainted with Col. Lee (Henry, I think his name was), son of Gen. Lee, of Alexandria—known in the Revolution as "Light-Horse Harry"—and brother of Gen. Lee, late commander-in-chief of the rebel armies. In the course of a long walk which I took with Col. Lee and Col. Gilbert C. Russell, of Alabama, Col. Lee spoke of Washington and many Revolutionary characters, of whom he told us interesting personal anecdotes. Among others of whom he spoke was Dr. Franklin. He said that Dr. Franklin had been given a vast deal of credit which did not belong to him in reference to his appearing at court in citizen's dress. He said that was an accident, and was never designed; and that Dr. Franklin, who was very particular in his dress, was one of the last men who would designedly attempt to appear at court except in the usual court dress. He said the Doctor had ordered a court dress, which he was to wear on a certain evening when he was to be presented to the King. It had been arranged that the Minister was to call for the Doctor at a certain hour, and take him to the court; that he called punctually at, or a little before, the time, and found Dr. Franklin in great anxiety, as his court dress had not been sent to him. The Doctor had sent for it, and only got a promise that it should be sent in a few minutes. But minute after minute passed, and each seemed an hour; still no dress came, till the Minister finally said he could wait no longer; but kindly suggested that Dr. Franklin should go in his citizen's dress. The Doctor enquired if he thought he would be received in such a dress? His reply, characteristic of French politeness, was, "Dr. Franklin will be received at court in any dress." After some hesitation, the Minister agreeing to take the responsibility and explain the case to the King, Dr. Franklin consented to go. He was received by the King as Dr. Franklin should be received in any garb, and by the ladies of the court especially, with whom he was always a great favorite, with éclat, attracting more attention probably than any other individual present. Had Dr. Franklin designed to set at naught the etiquette of the court, and be presented in citizen's dress, it is more than doubtful whether the Minister would have presented him in such a dress, or the King would have received him. His court dress not being finished in time was an accident which French politeness excused, and even turned to a pleasant incident.

If these circumstances are true, and I have related them as they were related to me, Dr. Franklin's case cannot properly be quoted or considered as a precedent for others, but stands by itself, as different from all others as Dr. Franklin himself was different from our present diplomatists.

N. SARGENT.

WASHINGTON, April 6, 1868.

[If this story be correct, it will ruin the Anti-Court Dress party in this country. Franklin's example was all it ever had to stand upon, and this gone, it will have to turn its attention to hair-cutting or cookery.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. announce "Ante-Bellum: Southern Life as it Was," by Mary Lennox; "Daisy," by the author of "The Wide, Wide World;" republications of Folkestone Williams's "Lives of the English Cardinals;" "The Hermits," by the Rev. Mr. Charles Kingsley; and an American "Treatise on Rural Architecture," compiled by Lieutenant-Commander Richard M. Meade, of the United States Navy.——G. W. Carleton & Co. have in press a book called "Behind the Scenes," by Mrs. Elizabeth Keckley, who is said to have been a confidential servant of Mrs. Jefferson Davis while Mr. Davis was preparing rebellion, and to have been afterwards Mrs. Abraham Lincoln's modiste. Messrs. Carleton & Co. say that they can produce "unimpeachable references in regard to the character, ability, and standing" of Mrs. Keckley. Miss Adah Menken's "Poems" are claimed by Messrs. Carleton, and the same firm will publish Mrs. E. O. Smith's "Heart of the Cook Books," "Cousin Paul," "An American novel" by "Jessie Glenn," and a translation—a decent one, let us hope, or else one that will be superseded by a decent one from some other publisher—of Renan's "Contemporaneous Questions."——J. Munsell has in press, for subscribers only, a work that will be of much interest to students of American Revolutionary history. It is "The Life and Journals of Major-General Riedesel," translated from the German by W. L. Stone. It contains numerous letters, now first printed in English, from Heath, Burgoyne, Gates, and Washington, throws new light on many passages of our history, and is full of descriptions, by the General, of American manners and character. Mr. Munsell seems to think that these will be peculiarly interesting, as being the observations of "so distinguished an individual." The friends of the dignity of history will see the force of this remark. Really, the Hessian baron, living for many months among the people, a prisoner on parole in various parts of the country, and being a man of sense and reasonably impartial between the contending parties, was well qualified to say something worth hearing about the men and the life of the colonies. The work is published for subscribers only, and will be in two volumes. It is proper to recollect here Mr. Stone's recent translation of Madame Riedesel's "Memoirs and Letters," a work never before his time properly translated, and long out of print. Another book that Mr. Munsell announces is "Some Materials to serve for a brief Memoir of John Daly Burk (author of a 'History of Virginia'), with a Sketch of his only Child, Judge John Junius Burk." Burk was an Irish refugee, who fled from prosecution for an attempted rescue of a prisoner and came over here to Virginia, and was then by-and-by killed in a duel. His history of his adopted home was published in Petersburg in 1805. The memoir is one of a contemplated series of biographies of notable Americans whose personal history is not very well known to the public. One among such men is the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, the author of "The Simple Cobbler of Agawam," and the compiler of the "Massachusetts Body of Liberties," the first code of laws established in New England. Mr. John Ward Dean, the genealogist and antiquarian, is the writer of the life. Still another forthcoming production of the Albany press is "The Fairfaxes of England and America in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries," including letters from or to Bryan, Lord Fairfax, Colonel George William Fairfax, and their father, William Fairfax, the neighbors and friends of Washington.——Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger, of Philadelphia, announce, without announcing its author's name, a book entitled "Vulgarisms, and other Errors of Speech; including a Chapter on Taste, and one containing Examples of Bad Taste."——McCalla & Stavely, of Philadelphia, announce a "Manual of Ecclesiastical History," by the Rev. Dr. C. M. Butler, Professor in the Divinity School in West Philadelphia, a work in two volumes.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton will publish in the course of this month the "Sketch of the Official Life of the late Governor Andrew," by his former military secretary and close personal friend, Col. A. G. Browne, Jr., which originally appeared in the January number of the North American Review. This reprint is greatly enlarged and improved by additional original matter, and by the insertion of letters and documents now for the first time presented to the public, and with it is also printed the valedictory address of the Governor on the reconstruction of the South. It forms a book of over three hundred pages, which is dedicated, by permission, to General Grant, who, it is known, was in close personal and political sympathy with the late Governor.

—Dr. Hammond's Psychological Quarterly for April is one of the most interesting numbers yet issued. It opens with an unnecessarily long article by Dr. Nathan Allen, of Lowell, on the "Law of Human Increase; or, Population based on Physiology and Psychology." It seems to us much more pretentious than is warranted, and we have not gained much light from reading it. It restates and reaffirms the author's well-known belief in the decrease of the native New England population, and, so far as we can make out, is a protest against a high intellectual activity among the women of the present day. Neither do we learn much from another promising title: "Education Anterior to Birth." Mr. Simon Stern makes remarks on Dr. Storer's paper on the "Law of Rape," and expresses regret that the latter should have confounded in the same guilt and condemned to the same punishment the man who forces and the man who only seduces. The editor describes an interesting "Case of Epilepsy due to Cerebral Anæmia." Dr. Roberts Bartholow discusses very lucidly the question of "Aphasia," and reports three new cases in favor of the doctrine of Broca.

Dr. Chas. F. Taylor, in what is both by its length and its merit the pièce de résistance of this number, treats of "Carnomania"—a new name for an obscure because multiform disease, in which, as the writer contends, it is not, as commonly supposed, the mind which is diseased, but the flesh, which makes a false report to the mind. The typical case is the bed-ridden woman—"carnomania" is oftenest seen in women—whom all her friends believe to be shamming the invalid for the sake of supposed pleasure in confinement, and whose limbs are, in fact, perfectly sound, or spine or other part free from all disease. What such a person wants is not will but confidence, and this she cannot have so long as she heeds only the impression transmitted by the "insane" member. The great number of these unhappy cases, several of which are detailed by Dr. Taylor, makes his conclusions of especial value, strengthened as they are by his successful treatment. The appendices of the Quarterly are, as usual, full of profitable reading.

—To gratify a very reasonable curiosity, Mr. Brady has photographed in single group the Impeachment managers, with unusual (for groups, not for Mr. Brady) success. Mr. Butler is seated on the extreme left of the picture, his countenance marked chiefly by great energy and resolution, traces of which are visible also in the face of his neighbor, Mr. Stevens—the dead ash of a great fire. Next to them is seated Mr. Williams, apparently a well-to-do gentleman, who, perhaps, would not be picked out as a politician. Mr. Bingham is, or seems to be, the handsomest of the party, his features exhibiting culture and geniality, while his nervous temperament is somewhat concealed by the shadows of the photograph. He is the only one whose expression is not decidedly grave. Behind these elders stand the three youngest prosecutors. On the right is Mr. Logan, with a rather ordinary face and much military aplomb and self-confidence. In the centre, a shade the tallest, and the only evidently Eastern man, is Mr. Boutwell, his head inclined a little forward, his eyes raised above their level, and looking not into space, but at an abstraction—as palpable to him as the chandelier above him—and his whole air pleasantly significant of modesty and earnestness. Last of all is Mr. Wilson, his shock of light or gray hair contrasting with his short black beard—the extremes of a "long head," suggestive of judgment and of self-restraint or of reserved strength. If we were believers in phrenology and were asked to name the most striking quality revealed by his portrait, we should say it was reverence—e più non dimandare. Taken together, the managers are creditable specimens of the people whose cause they are conducting. They are, of course, all lawyers by education, and it is a curious fact that though not all born in the States which they represent in Congress, the seven of them still represent in effect not more than seven States. Messrs. Williams, Boutwell, and Logan were born in and are Representatives of Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Illinois respectively. But Mr. Stevens was born in Vermont, and General Butler in New Hampshire, while Mr. Wilson was born in Ohio, and Mr. Bingham in Pennsylvania. Mr. Stevens is the veteran, born in 1793, and thirteen years older than his colleague, Mr. Williams. Mr. Wilson is the youngest, born in 1828.

—Mrs. M. C. Ferguson, an Irish lady, the wife of Professor Ferguson, who wrote for Blackwood's the lyric entitled "The Forging of the Anchor," has written a work which she calls "The Story of the Irish before the Conquest." For the erudition of the book it is reasonable to suppose that she is indebted, in part at least, to her husband, who has lately been appointed Keeper of the Records for Ireland. The legendary period of Irish history is glorified in it. It is a book that will please Mr. Matthew Arnold, whose own "Study of Celtic Literature" would put one into something like the proper mood for reading the true Irish minstrelsy, and might well be read by way of preface. Publishers—a certain percentage of publishers, at any rate—know their own business; but we should imagine that sound and instructive as Mr. Arnold's book is in its treatment of the main subject—the part which the Celtic element has played in British literature—interspersed as it is with valuable criticisms of modern authors; readable and pleasing as it necessarily is, having been written by Mr. Arnold when not too "vivacious," "The Study of Celtic Literature" might be profitably republished in America. Humphreys' "History of Printing," a beautiful book, of which only 300 (numbered) copies were printed, is to appear in a new edition which will be cheaper than the first impression, but inferior in value and beauty as in price. An English bibliographical work has just appeared, and may be found at Scribner & Welford's, which will be found entertaining to the general reader. It is, of course, not complete, but, till a better takes its place, may serve as a companion to Mr. Wheeler's little dictionary of the "Noted Names of Fiction." Its title is as follows: "Hand-Book of Fictitious Names: A Guide to Authors, chiefly of a recent day, who have written under assumed names, and to Literary Forgers, Impostors, Plagiarists, and Imitators." A work belonging to the same branch of learning is one mentioned by Mr. Welford in his last London letter—Mr. W. C. Hazlitt's "Bibliography of the Popular Poetical and Dramatic Literature of Great Britain, from the Invention of Printing to the Restoration in 1660." Hundreds of unique, or nearly unique, volumes Mr. Hazlitt claims he has in this book set down and described for the first time. The same accomplished student of books is now engaged on a new work about Charles and Mary Lamb, for the preparation of which he has the advantage of being in possession of his grandfather's correspondence, to say nothing of other new and important matter. Another work connected both by its nature and by its subject with these just mentioned is one not spoken of by the Book-Buyer—Mr. Alexander Ireland's "List of the Writings of William Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt." Mr. Ireland began by preparing for his own use a complete list of the works of two of his favorite authors, arranging them chronologically, and indicating their contents. Having made the list, he printed it for the use of his friends. Barry Cornwall's memoir of Lamb appearing, and Hunt and Hazlitt being in that work brought forward as intimate friends and companions of Lamb, Mr. Ireland added a catalogue of Lamb's works to the other catalogue, and added also an essay on the three authors, and a selection of such magazine, review, and newspaper criticisms on them as the critics of those days used to purvey for an audience less intelligent and more brutal than the reading public of to-day. When finished, the book seemed to its readers so valuable that Mr. Ireland was solicited to publish it, and has done so.

—For several years the chambers of commerce of the United Kingdom, led by that of Edinburgh, at the head of which is Mr. George Harrison, have been urging the English Government to take control of the British telegraphs and work them in combination with the post-office. These are the reasons in favor of the project: The public is badly served by the telegraphic system now in vogue; there are not more than one thousand places in the kingdom that are in connection with the wires; the charges are not only too high, but are capricious; charges for delivery are piled on charges for transmission; there is no telling into what a message will be transformed by muddle-headed clerks, and there is nothing like the same certainty in delivery of a telegram that there is in delivery of a letter; the business of the country as imperatively demands that the state should serve the people in the matter of telegrams as that it should undertake the carrying of letters; the experiment desired has been tried in Belgium and Switzerland with the best results, for in both these countries the telegraph may be said to be brought to every man's door, the messages may be sent very cheaply and yet with decided profit to the Government, and a telegram is as sure to reach the person to whom it is addressed as a letter is. The two English administrations preceding the present have committed themselves in favor of the plan, and the present administration also favors it and is about to bring in a bill which will no doubt receive the assent of Parliament. Central telegraphing offices will be opened at each of the ten district offices of London and in the chief offices of all the principal towns; the sorting and receiving offices everywhere will be subordinate stations, and each group of these will be connected with the central district station, which in turn will be put in communication with the more important of the other central offices. Pillar posts and all post-offices not stations for transmission of telegrams, will be offices for deposit of them, and a man may deposit his telegram as a letter and prepay it for transmission and free delivery by special messenger within the town delivery of the terminal office in towns, or within a radius of one mile from the terminal offices in the country. If the person addressed does not live within the limits above-mentioned an additional charge of 6d. per double mile (going and returning) will be made for the services of a special messenger. The charge for simple transmission and delivery as above-described will be one shilling for twenty words, and sixpence for every ten words additional, sent between any two places in Great Britain or Ireland. Thus 10,000 post-offices and 20,000 postmen will at once become available for the collection and delivery of telegrams; the telegraphic system will be worked with greater economy than before, by better officials, and with vastly increased power, and no one who knows the effect on the finances of the postal department of lowering the rates of the postage can doubt that an immense increase in the number of telegrams will at once follow the adoption of the scheme. As a case in point Parisian experience may be cited; on the reduction of the charge for a message from one franc to half a franc the number of messages was multiplied ten fold in the course of six months. It is observed that, foreseeing the coming evil, the English companies are no longer pleading for prolonged existence on the ground that they have been performing a great public service at a very small profit, but are now in the mind to confess to handsome revenues. The Government is to buy the lines.

—The romance of travel is excellently illustrated by the journey into Thibet recently made by a pundit whom the English Government sent into that country. His researches and the story of his wanderings have not been officially made public as yet, for it is intended to send him out again, and to let his name be known or to tell fully what he did and where he went would endanger his future success. To a newspaper correspondent, however, not much is sacred. A letter-writer in the London Times, who seems to have met the pundit after his return, and to have listened while he told his adventures in a manner like that of "the old translations of Herodotus or Marco Polo," has given some of the facts antecedent to the journey and a brief statement of some of the results attained. The man is a native of a semi-Thibetan province, and belonged to a class to which the jealous Chinese have always allowed the privilege of trading in the upper basin of the Sutlej. The work laid out for him by his English employers was to make a route survey of the Brahmapootra and of the great road, 800 miles long, from the Manasarowar Lake to Lassa or H'Lassa or Lhasa, the Thibetan capital—a region almost unexplored, and, now that the Nile has given up its secret, the part of the world which perhaps most needs investigation. The pundit was, with much labor, instructed in the art of surveying and making astronomical observations, and then in company with another dispatched on his way. His companion made only an attempt at entering Thibet. For when the two crossed the frontier they were turned back by the Chinese officials, and one of them, being known to the governor of Kirong, thought it wise to desist. The other, however, did not give up. Returning to Nepaul he set out again, at first travelling in the service of a Bhoot merchant, afterwards with a party of traders, with a servant of the Maharajah and with various other companions, and making observations as he best could. His compass and field notes were concealed by an ingenious device of his patron, Captain Montgomerie, R.E., in a "manichuska" or Buddhist prayer-wheel; any error in counting his paces he prevented by the use of his rosary—and all the more easily because no Buddhist will interrupt another while the beads are in use; for latitude observations he carried quicksilver hidden in the wooden bowl which all Bhooteeas sling at their waist; his sextants, thermometers, chronometers, and so on, were kept in a box with a false bottom, and he was enabled to read the sextant at night by the aid of a bull's-eye lantern, until one of the monks—with whom that country abounds to a very remarkable degree—at the monastery of Tadum "annexed" the last-named article. His observations have been tested by Captain Montgomerie, and he has been pronounced a most trustworthy observer. The results obtained are an elaborate route survey of 1,200 miles from Khatmandu to Tadum, and from Lhasa to Gartokh; the fixing of the course of the Brahmapootra from its source to the point where it is joined by the Lhasa, and a determination of the altitudes of thirty-three points by observation of the temperature of boiling water. In brief, he has made the only exploration of which there is any knowledge among Europeans of the high level tracts in which the Brahmapootra takes its rise, and which is drained by the northern affluents of that river. We have hardly space to give any of the more popular sort of information which he collected in his eighteen months of journeying. This, however, is too curious to be omitted: The government couriers in Thibet are required, when bearing despatches, to travel continuously night and day. They never, even when making a trip of 800 miles in length, stop longer than to change horses or to eat. An 800 mile journey they have been known to accomplish in twenty-one or twenty-two days. It is no wonder that they reach the end of their road with cracked lips, haggard faces, and bloodshot eyes, for their only sleep has been what they could catch in the saddle, and they have been in active exercise with but the briefest intervals of rest for something like 500 successive hours. What is the need of so great haste we are not told; doubtless, it is a tradition of the Chinese civil service. In default of others one might almost find a sufficient reason in this fact, that their clothes are sealed over the breast—the despatches probably being put into the bosom. As no one may break the seal except him to whom the messenger is sent, the unhappy postman cannot undress or wash himself while on his way, and his flesh at the end of a long journey "is eaten into large raws" by vermin. Evidently it is only natural that he should not spare the spur.

—Byron's ghost is lively this year. It has extorted the poet's autobiography from the Countess Guiccioli, and it has brought about in a queer manner the discovery of some new letters of his in an out-of-the-way place. Readers of Mr. Howells's "Venetian Life" will remember the pleasant account of his visit to the Armenian Convent of Machitarists on San Lazaro Island, in the lagoons of Venice. Hither Lord Byron had preceded him, in the days when he was the solitary horseman of that city, and had a notion of learning the languages of the Orient; and here many of his later letters were preserved. For a long time, however, they were mislaid. Recently a pet ape of the monks, escaping from his master, took refuge on the top of a bookcase. Followed by one of the brethren and seized from below, he caught up a dusty roll of yellow letters and launched it at the head of his pursuer. The roll was opened, and the Byron correspondence disclosed. It is to be presumed that the ape was forgiven, and that the letters will be published in due time. We have no hint as to the nature of them.

—A history of the rise and spread of associations for rescuing the lives of shipwrecked men, and an account of the present Deutsche Gesellschaft zur Rettung Schiffbrüchiger, are to be found in a German work, "Das Rettungswesen zur See," by Dr. H. A. Schumacher, general secretary of the society just named. Description is also given of the life-saving apparatus employed in various countries, and a greater diversity, of course within certain limits, than would be supposed is exhibited. A distressing shipwreck off Shields, on the coast of England, in 1789, was the occasion of the first organization for preventing like wholesale destruction in sight of shore and help. But these were purely local at the different ports, and lacking both in means and in system. They sufficed, however, till 1849, when the Royal National Life-Boat Institution was founded, supported by contributions from all parts of the kingdom, and the British example was presently followed by America, Holland, Denmark, and later by Germany, Sweden, Russia, France, and Spain. On the German coasts of the North Sea and Baltic last year, 615 out of 706 persons were saved from drowning, and a fifth of them would inevitably have perished but for the boats, rockets, guns, and other appliances brought to their relief. They were taken from the wrecks of 128 vessels.

A SOUTH AMERICAN STATESMAN.*

Few lives recorded in history, of warriors or statesmen, have been as eventful and checkered as the life of the Venezuelan warrior and statesman, José Antonio Paez. Of that eventful career, which embraces half a century of military or political activity, interrupted only by about a decade of exile, he now, for a third time an exile among us, publishes a detailed account, which is not only, as it could hardly fail to be, an interesting narrative of memorable events, but also a valuable contribution to the history of the great struggles of this continent. The introduction to the first volume of this "Autobiography," which is now before us, and which embraces the earlier half of the author's life (1790–1829), is dated (New York) the 19th of April, 1867, the fifty-seventh anniversary of the rising of the capital of Venezuela to strike for liberty and self-rule. Paez, then an illiterate llanero of the plain of Apure, the overseer of a cattle-farm, became one of the earliest, most undaunted, and most successful champions of the popular cause. Of aboriginal descent, but trained to hard service by a cruel negro slave; early inured to brave with stoic heroism the wild beasts, the scorching heat, the alternate droughts and floods of his tropical llano; a perfect master of the horse, the lasso, and the lance; followed with enthusiasm by men similar in birth, habits, and character, but accustomed to yield to his superior mind and will; alternately chasing and fleeing the Spaniards across the immense wilds to the west of the Orinoco—he soon became the foe most feared by the Spanish tyrants; remained constantly in the field when terror or despair had disarmed all around; joined Bolivar in the liberating campaign of 1813; fought and conquered when "the Liberator" fled (1814); placed himself under his banners on his return (1817); saved the shattered remnants of his forces in 1818; refused to supplant him at the demand of the army; guarded the plain when Bolivar crossed the Andes (1819); was by him, on the battle-field, proclaimed the hero of Carabobo—a victory which sealed the independence of Colombia (1821); received the chief command of the department of Venezuela; besieged and reduced Puerto Cabello (1823); and, after a period of peace not undisturbed by plots and attempts of various kinds, during which he zealously exerted himself to cultivate both his mind and his state, he finally rose to the highest dignity in the gift of his countrymen, at the moment when the Colombian confederation was dissolved and Venezuela proclaimed an independent republic (1830). This consummation is to open the narrative of the second volume, which, if completing the work, must bring us the history of Paez's first and second presidential terms, ending respectively in 1835 and 1843; his first dictatorship in 1846, during the civil war of that year; his flight before Monagas (1848), and subsequent attempt to overthrow the arbitrary sway of that president; his surrender at Coro (1849), imprisonment and banishment (1850); his first return from exile on the fall of the younger Monagas, in 1858; his speedy return to the United States; his recall to Venezuela by President Tovar, who entrusted him with the chief command of the army (1861); the military insurrection in his favor, against Tovar's successor, Gual; and, finally, his second dictatorship and his death-grapple with the revolted Federalists under Falcon, which ended, in 1863, with the victory of the latter chief, and closed, perhaps not finally, the long political career of Paez.

His character and activity, chiefly as displayed in that earlier period, our readers may allow us to sketch here in the words of the great German historian of the "Nineteenth Century,"* Gervinus, of whose work the exhaustive narrative of the South American struggles forms some of the richest chapters. It reflects equal credit on the writer and the subject of that sketch that its traits find their confirmation in the characteristics of the Venezuelan, as unostentatiously, but unmistakably, developed in his own plainer pages:

"A native of the region of Araure, he had even in his boyhood given proofs of courage and decision, and, as a youth, while serving on a farm, of skill and devotion to duty. On the outbreak of the revolution he entered the militia of Barinas, was for a while a prisoner of the Spaniards, and, after recovering his freedom, everywhere and daily more distinguished himself by his intrepidity and boldness, as well as by admirable skill in using his knowledge of the localities, and in dealing with the llaneros. He was superior to all these men of force in bodily strength, in valor, and in genuine courage, a courage sometimes cold and prudent, and sometimes almost wildly vehement; but his intercourse with them was plain and modest, cordial and familiar, in natural equality. Even the refractory he chose to subdue in single combats rather than by ordered chastisements; he vied with his companions in gymnastic sports, in throwing the lasso, in managing the horse; he shared their food, their drink, their privations; he played with them on their musical instruments, and danced their dances, and won the applause of all when representing the drunkard in the marri-marri; he partook in their jokes, and, on a holiday, when custom demanded it, he would perform the horse-race through knee-deep mud, without sparing either himself or others. This won him the blind attachment of the best sons of the plain. . . . As each of these cavaliers had trained his horse for every exertion on every whim, so also this leader his horsemen. His mere presence inspired them with the most confident courage, and renewed their vigor for almost incredible exertions. His own, as well as their common deeds, even in the time when they occurred, assumed, instead of the historical, the mythical garb. Those stories were on everybody's lips—how he chased away the Spanish foot, here with the prairie-fire, and there with wild oxen; how, when astray in the pursuit and alone, amid hostile squads, he entirely dispersed the fugitives by shouting loud words of command as if standing at the head of his cavalry; how he captured, through his swimming horsemen, four or six gunboats—soon multiplied by the legend into sixty—amidst the floods of the Apure; how, in the terrific shock of his assaulting horse, he would slay twoscore of the foe with his own lance, and then sink exhausted in epileptic fits! This exuberance of daring recklessness prevented him not from fully appreciating the discipline and moral courage of the Europeans, from becoming a devoted friend to his British allies, or adopting from them many a civil or military custom, without, however, becoming faithless to the simple habits of his ancestors. Even when invested with the highest dignity in the state, he was glad to regale his friends at his rural estate, Trinidad, with dinners in the plainest llanero style, in pious remembrance of his origin. This clinging to ancient habits and customs, as well as to the unschooled simplicity of condition, this mode of companionship in-arms, and this fatalistic daring, remind one of the early conquerors, the Pizarros and Almagros, who, however high they rose in external honors, remained plain and simple, agreeably to their descent. Like them, Paez struggled up to the highest merits and dignities, by far the most conspicuous of the many self-made men of color, who, from overseers of cattle-farms like him, worked themselves up to be generals; who, descended from the formerly down-trodden zambo, mulatto, or mestizo races, but now lifted up by the exalting nature of the events of time, rose to views and aims, knowledge and actions, such as we look for only among the most advanced classes of mankind. And how much nobler than those ancient conquerors, how much purer than most of his contemporaries, appears this Paez in his moral as well as civil qualities—he who, free from selfishness and greediness, uncorrupted by false ambition, untouched by ill-will or envy, stands alone unmaligned among his otherwise envious countrymen, without a single enemy among so many otherwise indignant foreigners, all without an exception his extollers and admirers! It was amiability united with an exuberance of force, modesty coupled with merit, mildness joined with the warrior's sagacity and courage, that won him undivided affection; this reckless soldier had never been an advocate of war to the knife; the military dictatorship never divested him of his regard for law and order. That, like Victoria in New Spain, he was not intellectually too eminent, and not to be dreaded on that score, may also have contributed no little to disarm the envious. To penetrate vast combinations with profound insight, that gift so rare among men of his race, was not given to him. Impulsive and unsuspecting as he was, he stumbled into many an inconsistency. At one time he was a centralist, and at another a federalist; at one time a hater of anarchy, and again an advocate of the right of revolution. From the same cause he also became guilty of many a hasty action, easily becoming the tool of advisers, and sometimes of bad ones. But in all such cases his better nature soon recovered itself, and then he would not hesitate, even as the first man in the state, publicly to acknowledge his faults in frank repentance."

This last statement finds a vivid illustration in the "Autobiography" (ch. xviii.), where in introductory remarks to the events of Valencia, in 1826, by which Paez was forced, for the first time, into a revolutionary attitude toward the federal Government of Colombia, he repeats what he on a solemn occasion told the Venezuelans: "I have committed a thousand errors, the painful feeling of which has been mitigated by the indulgence of my countrymen, but the events of 1826 . . . . . still fill my heart with keen sorrow and regret" (amargura i repentimiento). Once more "sacrificing his pride on the altar of justice," he pleads guilty to errors of judgment, so natural in a herdsman of the llanos suddenly called to deal with "revolutions and the complicated science of politics," and only protests the rectitude of his "heart and will." This partial self-vindication, which, ten years ago, when Gervinus wrote his parallel of Paez and Bolivar, seems to have been entirely superfluous, is now a main object, we believe, of the "Autobiography" before us, having been made necessary by the events of 1861-1863, in consequence of which the hero of Carabobo has long lost the glorious immunity from envy and detraction. "Tempora mutantur," sigh his friends. "Quantum mutatus ab illo!" maliciously exclaim his enemies.

With this object in view, Paez has made his work an historical biography rather than a book of memoirs. He omits almost all that concerns the man, and relates minutely all that belongs to the history of the soldier and statesman, frequently substantiating his narrative by extracts, letters, and public documents. He writes for his countrymen, and only of his part in things known to them. Of men and events not belonging to his own sphere, even of the earthquake of Caracas, in spite of its general political bearing, there is no mention. Bolivar's march over the Andes, the most wonderful feat, perhaps, in the annals of this continent, is hardly alluded to. Miranda is nowhere spoken of. The simultaneous war scenes of Peru, Ecuador, or Bolivia do not even loom up in the background.

But in spite of these defects of the book for the general foreign reader, we know of few works of the same kind that are more interesting. The unadorned simplicity of the narrative, its freshness and variety, the warmth of feeling that breathes through it, the almost antique character of the combats described, the absence of exaggerations, the symmetry of the whole—in spite of numerous digressions—the frank and kind tone of the political remarks, the interest constantly kept alive in the cause and in the central figure—all these together make it highly attractive. Little artistic skill or scholarship is displayed, but enough of both to convince the reader that the former llanero, having laid aside his lance, has well employed his time with books, and in learning to use the pen. His more elaborate digressions on the coast defences of Venezuela, on the Monroe doctrine, on the liberation of Cuba, etc., evince study and mature thought. His occasional remarks, as on slavery, show an early liberalism and generous sympathies. Of the many episodes, however, none is, perhaps, more interesting or touching than the following, which we may be permitted to quote in conclusion, as at the same time characteristic of the narrative, its principal figure, and the bloody revolutionary drama it unfolds:

"Among the royalist prisoners was the commander, Vincente Peña, captured by one of our soldiers while trying to swim across the river. Brought before me, he said:

"'Commander, I do not ask you to spare my life—I neither ought nor desire to do it. The only favor I beg for is permission to take leave of my señora.'

"'We are no murderers,' I replied. 'If we do our best to destroy the enemy on the battle-field, we are generous to the vanquished.'

"The defiance and serenity of the man, who well knew what awaited him in that time of war to the knife, made me intensely interested in him. I endeavored to win him over to our cause, representing to him how wrong he had been in his choice of party—being himself an American—and warmly speaking of the service his valor and undaunted spirit could render in the defence of the principles and sacred cause of our common country. But he repeatedly and firmly protested that he looked upon life with the greatest contempt, but regarded it as glorious to die for the cause of his king, which he believed to be the juster. It was impossible for me to allow the sacrifice of so valiant a soldier. I, therefore, against the usage of that time, sent him with the other prisoners to Pore, recommending him more especially for mercy. Among many eminent patriots whom that place united in itself were Señor Mendez and Dr. Yanez, who made long and strenuous efforts to convert Peña, though with little effect at the beginning. In the end, however, unable to resist the powerful influence of those men, who were as eloquent as self-sacrificing for their country, he decided to fight under the flag of independence.

"The government of Pore sent him back to our camp, where I received him with the greatest joy; but President Serrano, then established in Guasdalito, would not believe that Peña accompanied us in good faith, and afraid lest he should escape to inform the Spaniards of the critical condition in which we then were, ordered me peremptorily to have him put to death.

* "Geschichte des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts seit den Wiener Verträgen." Vol. III., pp. 305-308.

All my efforts to persuade Serrano of Peña's sincerity were useless. Finally I had to obey, and made the necessary dispositions for his execution. But when he was conducted to the fatal spot, I could not resist the desire to save him, and, assuming all the responsibilities of the case, I commanded the suspension of the order.

"Peña remained impassible.

"I returned to Serrano's house, and asked and begged and implored him with fresh fervor to grant me the life of that brave man. Serrano showed himself inflexible. Only after great exertions, and having pledged myself personally to answer for the good behavior of my protégé, I succeeded in saving his life at the last moment."

The subsequent brilliant services of Peña in the cause of freedom fully justified and rewarded the faith and humanity of Paez.

SIEGE ARTILLERY AT RICHMOND.*

This handsome book contains No. 14 of the series of "Professional Papers of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army," published by authority of the Secretary of War. Its author was graduated at West Point the year 1854, with the second rank in a class in which General Robert E. Lee's son, G. W. Custis Lee, was first, General Huger third, and General Howard fourth. In January, 1863, he was appointed colonel of the First Regiment of Connecticut Volunteer Artillery, and from that time till it was mustered out of service in September, 1865, the regiment remained under his command. It constituted the basis of an artillery brigade which sometimes exceeded an aggregate of thirty-five hundred men. From the opening of the campaign of 1864 to the capitulation of Lee, the siege artillery brigade, under the command of General Abbot, served all the heavy guns in front of Richmond and Petersburg, and its extensive operations were turned to excellent account in developing the theory of the aim.

General Abbot begins with a statement of the record of the First Connecticut Artillery and a full description of its organization. His first chapter treats of mortars, including their beds, platforms, and projectiles, precautions to be observed in the use of mortars, and the character, effect, and importance of vertical fire. The second chapter treats of smooth-bore guns, the projectiles used in them, the precision of their fire, and of experiments with the 15-inch gun, and contains an elaborate analysis of the problem of rebound and of the deductions obtained from the study of the elements of observed trajectories. The third chapter is devoted to rifled guns, the projectiles and fuses used for them, their precision and penetration. The fourth chapter treats of earthworks, obstacles, shelter from projectiles, magazines, and boyaux.

The appendix contains reports by different officers upon the siege train of 1862, which was put in use before Yorktown, upon siege guns with the army on the march, and on the ordnance department of the siege train of 1864–5. The book ends with six plates, which give numerous representations of United States and Confederate siege and field rifle projectiles and fuses, and also contain a considerable number of miscellaneous diagrams. The curious reader may derive much entertainment from the use of these plates in connection with the text, particularly from the readiness with which he may thus form some idea of the characteristics of the Whitworth, Blakely, Brooke, Armstrong, Schenkl, Hotchkiss, Parrott, Dyer, and Sawyer inventions.

Although this book is a scientific paper, and a part of it is caviare to all but accomplished mathematicians, there is so much interesting matter scattered through it by way of illustration, that it is agreeable reading for any one who has a taste for books on military subjects. Statements of the effect of vertical fire and the penetration of rifle projectiles are made to attract and hold the attention by the mention of incidents in the sieges of Yorktown and of Petersburg. The organization of the siege of the latter place is made more real to us when we read, not, as is usually the case, of corps and major-generals, but of the manner in which the batteries were posted, protected, approached, and supplied through the front of seventeen miles which they covered. The description of the effect of mortar fire is not limited to the material damage it may work, but extends to its influence on the imagination and nerves of men. The rules which should govern the posting of batteries and the concentration of their fire are impressed upon the mind by references to what was attended to and what was neglected at Dutch Gap and at other places. The efficacy of spherical case is illustrated by an account of the silencing by its use of a formidable battery of the enemy at the explosion of the mine. It is laid down that the mortar is not only useful, if well served, in land operations, but that it is rapidly becoming essential to harbor defence, especially when monitors are used in the attack, and this proposition is supported by a statement of the consequences to Fort Fisher of the want of this fire. A striking example of the value of the howitzer for defending positions is found in the repulse of an assault made on Redoubt Dutton, on our Bermuda front, in June, 1865. The superiority is claimed for the system of defensive lines adopted by our engineers in the siege of Petersburg, and the results of the Confederate attack on the defences of Hare Hill and the capture and recapture of Fort Steadman, on the one hand, and of our successful attack, a week later, near Fort Mahone, on the other, are adduced in proof. In little more than a page a most concise and soldierly description of the Fort Steadman affair is given.

More might be said to show that there is much that is interesting in this work, but its interest to the general reader is the smallest part of its value. It is interesting because it is written by a man who knows all about his subject, and who is at once an accomplished scholar and an accomplished soldier. With rare opportunities for personal observation and for directing and systematizing the observations of numerous competent subordinates, he combined entire scientific fitness and zealous interest. His treatise is full of practical and theoretical information, which cannot but be of great value to our artillerists and engineers. His tables of the consolidated results of firing, both in target practice and actual service, are far in advance of any others known in this country, and the author claims that he has presented tables of practice never before attempted in actual service. He has also prepared tables showing the probable ranges and accuracy of fire of some of the artillery now in use. By the application of the higher mathematics to the results of careful and extended observations he has made an analysis of the problem of ricochet on water, and has thus framed certain formulæ which he believes to be correct in principle, and between which and the observations he found an accordance which exceeded his expectations, and which he judges sufficient to establish the claim of the formulæ to the possession of practical value. He claims that they are useful in the solution of some of the most perplexing problems now offered to the Corps of Engineers—for instance, the degree to which the efficiency of ricochet fire is sacrificed in proportion as the guns are raised above the water. His performance of his task is such that his work is attracting the respectful attention of educated soldiers, and it will probably long hold a high place among scientific military treatises.

THE MASTERY OF LANGUAGES.*

Any American who has travelled on the continent of Europe and witnessed the frequent discomfiture of his countrymen in their attempted use of foreign tongues, or who has found himself at the mercy of valets-de-place and interpreters, simply because he could not pronounce the language of the country of his sojourn, will appreciate the value of a work that points out the means by which adult persons, not specially apt in linguistic acquirements, may in a comparatively brief period secure fluency and precision in the use of other languages than their vernacular.

Mr. Prendergast does not pretend to have discovered a "royal road to learning;" he does not claim to teach French or German perfectly "in three weeks without a master;" he does not offer a premium for superficial effort. On the contrary, he requires honest, faithful work of his disciples, but aims so to direct their energies that no force or time shall be wasted or misapplied.

The initial point in his argument is the combating of the idea so widely acquiesced in as to have become almost a truism, that young children have a greater power of acquiring foreign languages than adults. He then proceeds to analyze the child's process, and to show that adults, if they will condescend to imitate the children, may as far surpass them in the acquisition of language as they excel them in general development and maturity. "If it be true," says the author, "that a great increase of power results from the development of our faculties by education, whence arises the supposed inability of adults to compete with children in respect to the employment of idiomatic forms of speech? There is one very obvious reason which outweighs everything that can be put in the balance against it. It is because we do not pursue the same course they do. Let us, therefore, track them closely; for if we tread in their footsteps we must be in the right path, and the result will show that we have not lost the aptitude of childhood. The most notable characteristic of the child's process is that he speaks fluently and idiomatically with a very small number of words." Therefore, "every foreign language should be epitomized for a beginner by the framing of a set of strictly practical sentences, embodying two hundred of the most useful words, and comprising all the most difficult constructions."

Mr. Prendergast's theory is thus seen to be in direct contradiction to the practice most in vogue among language-teachers, of beginning with the simplest forms of speech and advancing towards the most difficult. He brings the sheer force of memory to the attack of involved constructions in the very outset, and comes off victorious because he attempts to conquer but a small number of words at each effort. A cardinal principle of the process he recommends is the complete mastery of every step undertaken, no advance being allowed except after the attainment of absolute fluency in what has gone before. The study of grammar is not permitted. The pupil is not even suffered to look ahead in his book, lest he should clog his memory with half-remembered, disconnected words, which are worse than useless. Our author makes much of the idea advanced by certain writers on linguistic science, that language is not made up of words, but of sentences. Hence he prohibits the use of the former except as they are grouped into the latter.

The manuals for French and German, prepared evidently with great labor and in strict conformity with the theories of the treatise, invite to a most novel course of study.

The first step, for example, in the German manual is the mastery of the following sentence :

"Da er, der junge Freund des reichen Mannes dem Diener den Brief nicht hat geben wollen, so werden Sie mir ihn gleich holen lassen müssen."

"Since the young friend of the rich man would not give the letter to the servant, you will be obliged to send for it for me directly."

This the author divides into three parts, making each division the subject of two lessons, and each lesson to consist of five distinct sentences; using, however, in the thirty thus formed no words save those found in the original sentence. These subdivisions are to be taken in regular order, memorized and repeated until they can be uttered with the same fluency and ease as their corresponding English sentences. Then, and not till then, is the learner permitted to advance to the second sentence, which is dissected and to be memorized in like manner with the first. The manual contains eighteen such sentences, from which by divisions and modifications the author has derived six hundred and twenty, grouping them into one hundred and twenty-four lessons. Only about two hundred words are used in all these combinations, and yet so carefully have they been prepared that they illustrate every construction commonly used in German. It is claimed by the author that one who faithfully pursues his method, with a competent living guide as to pronunciation, will in a few weeks be able to converse fluently and idiomatically, within a limited range of course, and will possess a complete series of illustrations of the rules of the grammar, which he may then study with safety, profit, and pleasure.

The "Mastery System" is not to be understood as affording the student all that is necessary to a perfect acquaintance with a foreign tongue. It proposes only to lay the foundation; but to do this with absolute thoroughness and success. One of its most important and attractive features is the ready confidence it inspires in the student in the use of what has been acquired, be this ever so little. No doubt existing in the mind of the learner as to the correctness of the forms of speech he has at his command, he uses them with far more freedom than would be the case were he to depend on sentences of his own construction, be his knowledge of the rules of grammar never so perfect.

We do not hesitate to venture the opinion, that if Mr. Prendergast's works can be brought to the attention of teachers in this country, they will effect a great change in the methods of teaching foreign languages. For it was our good fortune to put the "Mastery System" to the test last summer while spending some time in Germany. Its practicability and value were, we may say, fully proved, and we were satisfied of its very great superiority over any of the methods of studying German commonly recommended, so far as these are known to us.

Landmarks of History. Part III. Modern History. By Miss Yonge. Edited by Edith L. Chase. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1868.)—"This little book," says the Preface, "aims at no originality of views nor at revelations of new facts. It is a mere compilation of the more memorable events recorded in standard histories." It should rather say, of the more sensational facts, anecdotes, and sayings collected by historical compilers more or less regardless of authenticity, probability, or good sense. It tells how Gustavus Adolphus (whose sudden death is still wrapt in mystery) first told the marauding Croats said to have killed him, "I am the King of Sweden;" then said, "I seal with my blood my religion and the liberties of Germany;" then exclaimed, "My poor Queen!" and then "with one cry on his Maker's name . . . expired, under five wounds given after his fall." It tells us how poor little Louis XVII., "on the 8th of June, as he lay stretched on his bed . . . opened his large blue eyes in ecstasy, and cried: 'The music is so fine;' then, with a start of joy, 'I hear my mother's voice among them!'" and "for more than an hour he lay listening to that music, lost to all sense of pain," etc., etc. It gives us in exact lines the order to Spinola to take Breda, and, in verses, Suwaroff's report to Catharine II.: "Glory to God, Glory to you, Tutukay is taken, And I am there." Thus it is certainly not "a mere record of dates, names, and events." If it were, it would probably give us also such dates, names, and events as the 4th of July, 1776, Jefferson, Adams, Gates, Greene, Pulaski, Arnold, André, Boston harbor, Lexington, Bunker Hill, Trenton, Saratoga, surrender of Yorktown, etc., etc., which it does not, though it—incidentally—mentions George Washington in connection with Lafayette, and Benjamin Franklin in connection with the French Court, fans, bracelets, and wigs—probably "in the hope of letting history fulfil its true purpose, namely, of being a great lesson in principle." Contempt for dates, in the service of principle, is probably the reason that made the author choose her headings of "parts" in this loose prospective and retrospective way: "Gustavus Adolphus, 1630–1635" (Gustavus died in 1632); "The Siege of Vienna, 1679–1687" (it took place only in 1683); "Charles XII. in Turkey, 1709–1715" (Charles returned from Turkey in 1714); "Latter years of Peter the Great, 1715–1730" (Peter died in 1725); "War of the Austrian Succession, 1740–1746" (it terminated in 1748); "The National Assembly, 1786–1792" (it opened in 1789); "Napoleon in Italy, 1795–1798" (Bonaparte went there in 1796 and returned in 1797). Contempt for names makes her call the same princes, promiscuously, François and Francis, Francis and Franz, Charles and Carlos, Ferdinand and Fernando, Friedrich and Frederick, in an amusing manner; and makes her spell historical names of towns without pedantic accuracy, thus—Wittemburg or Wittemberg, Hamburgh, Konigsburg. Contempt for events makes her tell the story—perhaps not apt to be a lesson of principle—of the second and third partitions of Poland, in 1793 and 1795, and of the two wars preceding them, in the following wonderfully combined and concise narrative, without a date:

"Catherine proceeded to summon Leopold of Austria and Frederick William of Prussia to make another division of Poland, saying the former had been but child's play. They were not unwilling, and the poor craven Stanislaus scarcely attempted resistance to the final destruction of his kingdom. A brave gentleman named Thaddeus Kosiusko, collected his countrymen, and made a gallant stand against the enemies, who closed in on all sides, but it was too late; Suwaroff was sent against him with an overwhelming force, and at Prague made him prisoner, desperately wounded. Stanislaus was sent to Grodno, where he died, despised and forgotten."

To which let us be allowed to add the following remarks: Leopold did not take part in either of the two partitions, dying early in 1792, before the first took place. Frederic William, during the lifetime of Leopold, refused to join Catharine, and only much later betrayed the Poles. Kosciuszko (or Kosciusko, but never without a c) collected his countrymen only in the war followed by the third partition; in the war of 1792 he fought under Poniatowski, the nephew of King Stanislaus. There is no Prague in Poland; the suburb of Warsaw, stormed by Suwaroff, is called Praga. Kosciuszko was not made a prisoner at Praga, but weeks before at Maciejowice, not by Suwaroff, but by Fersen, and not desperately wounded. Stanislaus died not in Grodno, but in St. Petersburg, and but too well remembered.—With all of which we do not mean to say that the book is not likely to impart a great deal of historical information, and that, too, in a pleasant, perhaps also moralizing, way, to readers who have not access to more carefully-written compendia of universal history.

Lady Alice; or, The New Una. A Novel. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.)—Lady Alice Stuart, the daughter of the Duke of Lennox, who, of course, Mr. Huntingdon says, must not be confounded with the head of the house of Lennox-Richmond, was to have been married on the 12th of January, 1842. Thus, as everybody knows, the wedding would have taken place just one month before Septuagesima Sunday, so the honeymoon would have fallen wholly within the festive season of Epiphany, and the three weeks of preparation and Quadragesima would have been all available for religious exercises. But there are pitches of happiness that are not to be reached in this vale, and the new Una was not married in 1842 nor in the season of Epiphany. On the other hand, her wedding day fell, if we are not mistaken, some time in the Trinity season, for it came in June when it did come, and it did not come for several years. For somewhere within the octave of Christmas in the year above mentioned, she was abducted by a heavy villain in the employ of a noble marquis, was carried to sea, was wonderfully preserved from harms, took mysterious oaths not to communicate with her family unless the noble lord permitted her to do so, wore male attire, lived an artist's life in Rome, much as Cecil Dreeme did in New York, and in various ways of being, acting, and suffering became the most unaccountable person in the whole range of false fiction.

We have no intention of trying to do so much as sketch her story, and the almost equally dizzying story of her various high-born and exorbitantly wealthy and genteel connections—kings, queens, dukes, countesses, marchionesses, and so on. As regards his plot the author is beyond us entirely, and we are as a child before him. This we know, however, that "Lady Alice" is a most genteel Puseyite novel, the hero of which, a man of the most powerful mind, of the most extraordinary personal beauty, of unspotted purity, who reads illuminated Persian volumes, has never known a day's illness, and is cousin to the queen, is converted from Romanism to Anglo-Catholicism of the most æsthetical sort. The heroine, for her part, had from birth peculiar advantages in the way of reredosses, magnificent canopied sedilias, albs, stoles, piscinas, and other things which enabled her and her chaplain, the Honorable and Rev. Herbert Courtenay, to attack the hero with an assurance of success that an ordinary member of Convocation could no more have felt than a mere Protestant could. The book was first published some twenty years ago, we believe, and, doubtless, it is to the present activity of the Ritualists that we owe its reappearance now. We should not be disposed to regret the publication of the new edition if "Lady Alice" was only a very feeble ritualistic novel singularly involved in plot, destitute of force of argument, and extremely unnatural as regards its characters. There is something amusing in its absurdity in these respects. And to almost all those persons who are in such a position that its religious views would touch them at all and lead them astray, it would probably be enough to say that the author, in converting his imaginary Romanist to Puseyism, actually converted himself to Romanism and soon "went over." But this fault we find with him, that in order to induce his readers to swallow his doctrine, he made up the most of his book of scenes that G. W. M. Reynolds might envy. What with its sensuousness and sensationalism, and the Oriental magnificence of its upholstery work and its peculiar Puseyism, the novel strikes one as having been produced by the joint efforts of "Ouida," Reynolds, Miss Evans, E. Z. C. Judson, and a youthful Ritualist whose clothes were too much for his brain.

Stella. By Elbridge Jefferson Cutler. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1868.)—Of the great number of books in verse that come into our hands we let most go unnoticed, for most are so bad that it would be not possible to praise them, and yet so little likely to be of sufficient influence to do harm to anybody that the duty of condemning them cannot be said to be imposed upon us. "Stella" is one of fifty poetical works before us, and the only one, we believe, not worthless. It is a gracefully told story of a young girl's unfortunate passion for a young man who could give her in return only respect and brotherly affection. As if this were not sufficiently embarrassing to the hero, it happens that he is the intimate friend of the lady's brother, a friend, too, of her parents, and that they know that he is aware of her love and their knowledge of it. Naturally the father, mother, and brother begin to look on him with some coldness, and the situation becomes an awkward one for all parties. Still he cannot love her. The war breaking out he enters the army, whereupon Stella shortly dies. So much for the picture. It has a sort of frame which we may describe thus:—The soldier sits in the room of a friend of his, conversing. The room is described as adorned with statuary and with pictures by Brown, Stillman, and Kensett, to each of whom a discriminating compliment is paid by Mr. Cutler in passing. The friend asks the soldier why he does not marry, and by way of reason the latter relates the somewhat sentimental tale which we have given above. It is a reason that wears an air of improbability, we should say. It might have come well enough from the friend in answer to the question propounded, for he says of himself:

> "I, loving quiet more than storm, > Content to praise while they perform," and was probably not quite robust enough in mind, body, or soul; but it is hardly to be believed that the soldier—

> "He, one of those keen souls who crave
> A cause to serve, a land to save"— should not have had more sense and less excessive tenderness. The versification of the story is smooth, and something more than nearly smooth; it has a simple and appropriate melody that falls pleasantly upon the ear. It is far better finished than planned, we think, and the sort of morbid sentimentality that pervades it we find not much to our taste; but, as we have said, it is superior to most of the new poems we see, and is evidently the work, or the play, of a man of cultivation.

Anthracite and Health. By George Derby, M.D. (Boston: A. Williams & Co. 1868.)—The object of this pamphlet—originally a paper read before the "Boston Society for Medical Improvement"—is to explain the reason of the well-known difference between the sensations caused by a wood and by a hard-coal fire respectively, and to what product of the combustion of coal are due its depressing and painful effects upon the system—headache, languor, difficult respiration, nervous derangement, etc. Dr. Derby considers one by one the common theories on this subject, and finds them all insufficient. The cause is not, as he fairly proves, a dryness attributed to the supposed capacity of red-hot iron to withdraw moisture from the air; for the hygrometer placed in houses warmed in various ways shows the mean humidity of those having hot-air furnaces to be greatest, besides that dry air may be as wholesome as moist. Neither is it the abstraction of oxygen by the same agent, which is inappreciable; nor the charring of the particles of dust, which, by destroying minute organisms, may be presumed to be rather beneficial than otherwise. Nor is it, at least in any considerable degree, carbonic acid gas, whose action is now known to be not poisonous to the lungs, but rather obstructive. But it is, in the author's opinion, carbonic oxide—which is carbonic acid relieved of a part of its oxygen on its way to the surface of the coals—that so injuriously affects the health; so insidiously also, since it is a colorless and odorless gas. We are, happily, preserved from inhaling all the carbonic oxide that is produced in our grates, stoves, and furnaces. Most of it escapes through the flues, but too much directly and indirectly from the fires themselves. We know, for instance, by the sense of smell, that sulphurous acid gas and other volatile matters thus escape, and it is reasonable to infer that, when the draught is insufficient, or the flue obstructed, or the stove joints separated, carbonic oxide may accompany them. Cast-iron, too, is often imperfect in structure, and liable to be permeated by gases; and recent investigations leave no doubt that even flawless iron and other metals, when raised to a dull heat, "permit the passage of gases directly through their substance." Our last defence, therefore, against the enemy is thus taken away, with no immediate prospect of assistance from science. We can, it is true, resort to steam or hot-water pipes, or wood-furnaces; but these have their drawbacks of expense and inconvenience, and afford no remedy to the great host of coal-consumers. Ventilation might do something for us if the demand for it were anything more than a sentiment, and the possession of it regarded as anything more than a luxury. Dr. Derby suggests illuminating gas as among the future means of heating dwellings, and undoubtedly there is to be a progress, both in heating and lighting, away from the clumsy processes which we now endure. For light we may reasonably look to electricity, if not for heat as well.

To know our peril is the first step to deliverance from it, and for this we are certainly greatly indebted to Dr. Derby. His pamphlet deserves the widest circulation.

The Law Register (1868). Prepared from Official Returns by John Livingston, of the New York Bar. (New York: Merchants' Union Law Company. 1868.)—This book, well and favorably known to the legal profession, will be found useful not only to the lawyer, but to the world of business men. It purports to contain in Part First a list of all the lawyers in the United States and the Territories. Part Second, which begins p. 525, gives what is called the Official Register of each of the States and Territories—that is to say, a list of the executive officers, the judges, the justices, the other judicial, county, and municipal officers, boards, and commissions, with the amount of their salaries, terms of office, and so on; the organization, powers, and times of holding the courts, whether State or Federal, and much similar information. Part Third gives the law of each State as regards the collection of debts, the forms that obtain in the various States for the execution, acknowledgment, and proof of w[illegible]en instruments, and for executing commissions and taking depositions. Part Fourth is a mine of miscellaneous knowledge, which is described as an Official Directory of the United States. One may learn from it, speaking roughly, the names, salaries, places of residence, duties and offices of everybody in Washington, from the President to the foreman of the folding-room in the Government printing-office. Furthermore, one may learn whether or not we keep a consul at Zacatecas, and who he is; whether this or that senator or representative has his wife with him in Washington, or is accompanied by his daughters only; who are the aldermen of the Seventh Ward of Washington; when the mail leaves Washington for Port Tobacco; who are regents of the Smithsonian Institute; who represents the Worcester Spy in the Reporters' Gallery of the House, and what the number of his seat is—in short, almost everything about everybody and everything at the capital.

The compiler might very easily have made his book, as a book of reference, much handier than it is. For example, it would be far more convenient if he would keep the lawyers of his thirty-nine principal towns under the States to which the towns belong, and not in separate lists. And the towns ought, we should say, to be arranged in alphabetical order and not under the names of counties. As for inaccuracies, of which we have found some, they are pardonable in such a work, and they are not numerous, we think.

Grammatical Diagrams defended and improved, with directions for their proper construction and application, accompanied by a comprehensive outline of classification, and a complete scheme of examples for practice. By Frederick S. Jewell, Ph.D., author of "School Government." (New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1867.)—The purpose of this book is to teach English syntax by means of diagrams, expressing chiefly by their position the function and relative importance of each of the elements of a sentence. The objections to such a system are so obvious, except in so far as it may, in its simpler forms, be a convenient means of testing in the class-room the proficiency of students in the ordinary analysis, that it hardly demands a serious criticism. One of the most important of these objections is stated by the author himself, though quite unintentionally: "There is no difficulty in the analysis which does not ultimately emerge in the diagrams." Other objections, hardly less grave, are found in its complexity and its entire inadequacy to meet the wants of involved constructions, or even of simple ones whose elements express slightly varying shades of emphasis or meaning. The elaborate system of nomenclature adopted would, we are confident, offer quite as many terrors to the beginner as the simpler one now commonly used. The author shows considerable ingenuity in adapting his scheme to the necessities of complex sentences, though, if our space permitted, we should be disposed to take issue with him with regard to the consistency of some of the applications of his system as well as with regard to the correctness of his analysis of certain of the examples quoted. It is, or ought to be, surprising to find a professed teacher of grammar suggesting as one of the advantages of this system the superior facilities which it offers for the comparative study of the styles of different authors. We are disposed to doubt whether the pursuit of so intangible a quality would be materially helped by enumerating, under our author's guidance, the proportion of "qualifying, quantitative or causative modifying circumstantitives," which a page of each author might contain. The system is, as we have said, an ingenious one, but it can hardly be of much practical use.

Transcript Pieces. By Frank Foxcroft. (North Adams, Mass.: J. T. Robinson & Co.)—This is a little book which it is no great discredit to a boy to have written. But the older offender, the Transcript, of Boston in which about half the poems were first published, certainly has a great deal to answer for. It is hardened, and will laugh us to scorn for saying so; but we mean it all perfectly seriously when we say that it is surely a piece of wickedness to encourage young people to engage in pursuits so enervating and profitless as this of turning out very poor verses with next to nothing in them. Though, if that were all, it would be nobody's business, we suppose, except the editor's, and the verse-writer's, and the subscribers'. But American literature, groaning and travailing under the inflictions of hosts of pretenders and foolish persons, is going to get better than it is more slowly than it might so long as papers of the pretensions of the Transcript lend themselves to weakliness in verse and prose, instead of resisting it and even actually fighting it.

"The play hinges upon the absurdities of a female assessor, a female Judge of the Supreme Court, and a female politician, and the ludicrous aspects of a state of society in which women make proposals of marriage to men, and every bachelor is exposed to two hundred thousand offers, more or less. These ideas are carried out with great humor."—N. Y. Nation.

"The Spirit of '76—not 1776, but 1876—is the name of a spirited parlor drama which has given lively pleasure to select social circles in Boston. It gives a somewhat extravagant and, therefore, amusingly emphatic picture of what might be the condition of society and the facts of daily life if the extreme aspirations of the Woman's Rights party were practically fulfilled. Very witty is the dialogue, very comic are the situations, very incongruous the relative positions. There is no flagging in the interest, and we commend this clever jeu d'esprit, and the two amusing vaudevilles annexed, to all who love fun."—N. Y. Evening Post.

"A delicious morceau, made a capital success by the delicate humor, the many sharp hits and the amusing situations which it produces."—Boston Post.

"The piece abounds in sly hits at both sexes, and is a capital burlesque, kept within limits, so that it always sparkles, and is never dull; while it is wise in its comicality and significantly suggestive in its extravagance and exaggeration."—Boston Transcript.

The Week.

ON Wednesday Mr. Trumbull's bill regulating the qualifications of jurors came up in the Senate. There has been some talk about the bill as directed specially against Jefferson Davis, but it wears an innocent appearance, and, as Mr. Reverdy Johnson and Mr. Trumbull pointed out, the law, as now existing in many States, allows judges, in the exercise of their discretion, to do all that the new bill permits. It is provided that a man is not to be held necessarily incompetent for service as a grand juror, nor for service as a juror in trials of offences against the United States, by reason of his having formed and expressed in regard to the matter in issue opinions founded on public rumor, newspaper reports, and so on, provided he can make oath that he can and will do his duty impartially. But the court may in its discretion put aside any such juror. Mr. Bayard and Mr. Garret Davis opposed the bill as a dangerous innovation, but it passed by a vote of 37 yeas to 8 nays. Mr. Sumner introduced a joint resolution, identical with others introduced at various times, proposing a constitutional amendment to the effect that no President, and no Vice-President who has acted as President, shall afterwards be eligible to either office. It went to the Committee on the Judiciary. In the House, on the same day, Mr. Robinson, of New York, came forward with a resolution—privileged, as he said—to rescind the resolution impeaching Andrew Johnson, and to recall the honorable managers. The Speaker avoided the peril, however. He ruled that the resolution was not privileged, as the House had already, on the 31st of March, ordered the previous question on a motion to print Mr. Butler's opening address to the Senate. On Thursday and Friday neither Senate nor House did anything but go on with the trial of the President, except that the House referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs a proposal to ask the President to send a special mission to the contending South American powers to urge peace. On Saturday Judge Woodward, in the House, introduced a bill to test the constitutionality of questionable acts of Congress. It provides that when Congress has passed a bill over the President's veto, the veto having been given because of the alleged unconstitutionality of the bill, it shall be lawful for the President to cause the Attorney-General to draw up and file on record in the United States Supreme Court a feigned issue with such pleadings as may be necessary to raise the questions of unconstitutionality suggested by the veto message, and no other questions whatever. Further, the bill provides that the Speaker of the House shall be served with a certified copy of the feigned issue and pleadings and shall appear by counsel or in person to defend the constitutionality of the enactment. On Monday, in the House, Mr. Washburne said that as there was a prospect of a speedy resumption of legislative business, he should on Thursday (to-day) move a call of the House. On the same day, it being proposed to vote on the matter of printing 40,000 copies of Mr. Butler's speech, it was found that there was not a quorum present.

Judge Curtis's speech before the Senate in defence of Mr. Johnson is pleasant and yet unpleasant reading. It is pleasant, because no matter to which side one's sympathies may incline, everybody, except our friends the enthusiasts, feels the immense importance, from a moral point of view, of having the trial conducted in a manner worthy of the nation. No cause so great has ever been tried before a legal tribunal. The only approach to it was that of Charles I., but he was not tried before a legal tribunal or in accordance with forms previously prescribed by law. It is unpleasant, because there can be no question that the people have not thus far been worthily represented before the Senate. We have nothing to say against the ability of the Managers, but we have much to say against the use they have made of their discretion in committing the greater part of the conduct of their cause to that one of their members who cares least for courtesy, for decorum, and for the dignity and fairness of the trial. The contrast in demeanor between those who represent the President and those who represent the House has been already sufficiently marked, and it is a contrast on which few people will look with anything but mortification after the trial is over. If there was to be a lack of decency on either side, certainly it ought to have appeared on the side of the defendant, the more particularly as the case against him is largely made up of a charge of bad language and rowdy behavior.

Judge Curtis's opening speech for the defence, and the arguments of the Managers and the respondent's counsel on the admissibility of General Sherman's testimony, have been the principal incidents of this week of the President's trial. There was, besides, the examination of Adjutant-General Thomas, which attracted a good deal of popular attention, but which, after all, was not of vital importance. It showed plainly the mental incompetency of the gentleman whose services Mr. Johnson thought would be of peculiar advantage to the public service; and it gave Mr. Butler an opportunity to display fully the arts that make him feared in criminal courts, and not greatly respected or admired elsewhere. As to the evidence of General Sherman, the case is this: The President's counsel intended to prove by him that at the time when he was asked to take the War Office, he was told by Mr. Johnson that Mr. Stanton was to be removed in order that the validity of the Tenure-of-Office Act might be tested before the Supreme Court. The first question put to the general, when he appeared on the stand, was the signal for battle between the two sides. The Senate decided, reversing the Chief-Justice's decision, that the answer could not be admitted. The President's counsel—the evidence they so much desired having been thus shut out—endeavored to get it before the Senate indirectly. In this attempt they were very persistent, and the Managers in opposing it were equally persistent. Witnessing the anxiety of the Managers to keep out the testimony, one would have supposed the Senate an ordinary "intelligent jury." The strategy of the counsel was frustrated finally by an overwhelming vote, and on Saturday night the Managers had been successful, as no doubt on strictly legal grounds they ought to have been. On Monday, however, the Senate, by a close vote, resolved that the testimony should be admitted. Of this decision we are glad. As we have stated elsewhere, the Senate was not legally bound to admit as evidence of the intent of a violator of law words that he used months before he committed the violation. But, as Mr. Butler insisted in his opening for the prosecution, the Senate in this business of impeachment is a law unto itself, and nothing can be clearer than that it is wise to admit whatever evidence tends at all to throw light on the case. Even in ordinary criminal cases it is already the practice in some of the States to allow the prisoner to lay before the jury, as an aid to right judgment, his own statement of the facts. And the people will surely not be satisfied if Mr. Johnson is either convicted or acquitted on technicalities drawn from the practice of the least enlightened criminal courts. As a matter of fact, we suppose, no sensible man now believes that what Mr. Johnson chose to tell General Sherman when he wanted to use him is of the least value as throwing light on his real intent. The Senate seems to have been actuated by some such considerations as we have mentioned. And, in judging of the course of the Senate throughout the discussion of this question, it must be remembered that senators are accustomed to take time for their deliberations; that they may let, and habitually do let, weeks pass before definitively settling doubtful points; and that now, in this trial, very nice and doubtful points are submitted to them for almost immediate settlement. It is no wonder, then, if there is apparent vacillation in its action. But we believe, and the history of the trial thus far is our ground of belief, that the court is honestly trying to do its duty impartially, and that no American need be ashamed of its record.

The election in South Carolina is at an end to-day, and it is probable that the new constitution is ratified and the Republican candidates for State officers elected. It is worth recording that one of them, Mr. T. L. Cardozo, candidate for the Secretaryship of State, is a colored man, a native of Charleston. He is a man of ability, and, if we are not mistaken, has had the advantage of receiving a university education in Glasgow. For some years he has been at the head of the largest of the Charleston free schools, and has managed it to the satisfaction of his assistants, of whom some were young women who in the North would be—in fact were—considered accomplished teachers. It is worth recording also that the Democrats of South Carolina have reached this point:

Resolved, That under the action of the State of South Carolina, heretofore taken, we recognize the colored population of the State as an integral element of the body politic; and as such, in person and property, entitled to a full and equal protection under the State constitution and laws; and that, as citizens of South Carolina, we declare our willingness, when we have the power, to grant them, under proper qualifications as to property and intelligence, the right of suffrage.

The World will have to read these ideologues out of the party. From North Carolina news comes that the campaign is most active; speeches by the hundred being delivered each day, and the result being doubtful. Arkansas ratifies the new constitution by a majority, officially reported, of 1,679.

The Tribune has received from a special correspondent in Georgia, and prints in fac-simile, one of the documents with which the "Ku Klux Klan" are intimidating their political opponents. It is described as a handbill printed on pink paper and adorned with symbols such as a backward schoolboy of twelve years old might invent after he had just gone through the "Pirate's Own Book." There are cannon printed on it, a coffin with a white cross, a skull and cross-bones which bear a striking resemblance to those of Solonois the Black Avenger, a dagger, a chain, a coiled snake, a sword, a heart, two crescent moons, a black flag with "K. K. K." upon it, a hound, a bugle-horn, and such inscriptions as these: "Klansmen—The deed without a name is done;" "Many thanks, O Ghenghis Khan, thou whose Crown is" [device of skull and cross-bones]; "Attend the Cabala, and the curse of Nemesis upon him who speeds not the foot at its mystic summons." It is never agreeable to any one, we dare say—never to any American citizen at any rate—to have his throat cut by people on the mere ground that he voted the wrong ticket; but to be put to death by persons of the mental calibre of the inventors of these placards—to furnish in one's own person the tragic conclusion to so trivial a farce as the "Klan" performances would be if cowardly murder were not the end of them—this must be peculiarly trying to a victim whose taste is not wholly unformed. We do not know which is really the more unfavorable and depressing sign as regards the condition of the South—the formation of a secret society for the purpose of killing or intimidating political opponents, or the fitting it out when formed with these marvellous paraphernalia. However that may be, we sincerely hope that, pending the establishment of common schools throughout the Southern country, the military commanders will catch and hang all the "Klansmen" who are old enough. General Meade's order has reached us, and seems tolerably well adapted to the end he had in view in its preparation. The assassination of Mr. G. W. Ashburn and the plentiful indications that other similar murders are intended by a secret gang of ruffians, were the reasons for its promulgation. It directs military commanders who think it desirable, to organize a force of law-abiding citizens, whose services shall be paid for by a tax levied on the district put under surveillance; it forbids the publication of articles in newspapers tending to produce riot and bloodshed, and enjoins the political speakers to refrain from incendiary language. We are bound to say that we believe General Meade will have the good wishes of a large majority of Georgians in his endeavor to stop the violence of the Klan; and we are bound to say that we do not believe their good wishes will be of much service to him. The really respectable public opinion of the South was never yet able to restrain the lawlessness of the worst part of Southern society.

We do not know if there are any politico-personal intrigues behind the recent singular action taken by the Pennsylvania Republicans. If there were no special reasons to set them upon doing it, we should imagine that members of the Legislature and other presumably sensible men would have hardly done so unbecoming a thing as Governor Geary and other prominent Pennsylvanians have been doing. They asked that Senator Cameron, when Mr. Johnson should be found guilty and Senator Wade should become President Wade, and changes began to be made in the Cabinet, should urge on the President the claims of Mr. Stanton for the post from which, it is taken for granted, Mr. McCulloch will be at once removed. Mr. Stanton has published a letter, which we dare say expresses his real mind, to the effect that, having heard of the proposal, he hastens to request earnestly that Mr. Cameron will not make the desired recommendation. Enough of his life, he says, has been devoted to public duties, and he intends ceasi g to hold office as soon as his successor is appointed and confirmed.

Sergeant Bates reached Washington on Tuesday with the flag which he has publicly borne and waved ever since he left Vicksburg. By this journey he has proved to a demonstration the loyalty of the South and the security of men who reside there making no concealment of their loyalty. It disposes of the mythical stories of a "Ku Klux Klan," and henceforth the New Orleans riot comes out of history and Mr. G. W. Ashburn does not go into it. It makes General Meade's order a hoax that he ought to be ashamed of. Inasmuch as the sergeant was permitted to wave his flag from the capitol at Richmond, but was turned away from the Capitol at Washington, it is clear that the fiery love of the Union which animates Virginian souls far exceeds that in District of Columbian souls. We should like to hear Mr. Mungen or Mr. Eldridge—or Mr. E. O. Perrine will do—extending this sort of reasoning to the impeachment trial. Mr. Johnson, it is well known, went through the North displaying his "policy" without being assassinated, or even so much as brought before a police court. It follows that Congress is not fit to act in the name of the people, and that the President has uniformly kept himself within constitutional limits.

Wendell Phillips has, in the last Anti-Slavery Standard, entered into detailed proof of General Grant's "drunkenness in the streets." It consists of a speech of William E. Dodge, the President of the National Temperance Society, in which that gentleman, after having visited Washington, "assures the temperance men they need have no fears." The thoughtful teetotaller, Mr. Phillips thinks, will consider this conclusive; but if he does, all we can say of "the thoughtful teetotaller" is, what Bumble said of the law—"that he is an ass." But Mr. Phillips furnishes cumulative testimony, in the shape of a letter from Senator Wilson, in which he says that he "had seen General Grant in his camp, in his office, at his own house, and at dinner-parties where liquors were freely used by others, but had never seen him drink even a glass of wine, nor had he ever seen him when he had the slightest reason to believe that he was in any degree under the influence of drink." Mr. Wilson's failure to say that he has never heard from trustworthy sources of "the public drunken exposure of his candidate," combined with Mr. Phillips's knowledge of Mr. Wilson's character, is to him (Mr. Phillips) sufficient; or, to use his own words, "to me no further evidence is necessary"—an admission which leads us to fear that Mr. Phillips is himself a "thoughtful teetotaller," and shares in the mental peculiarities of that species of citizen. The part which poor General Grant plays in this discussion would be rather annoying to him if it were not so very amusing. He is held up to the country in the newspapers as "a street drunkard," because William E. Dodge says he is satisfied with him, and because Wendell Phillips, having the worst possible opinion of Henry Wilson, thinks he is guilty of evasion when he says he never saw General Grant drunk. Those who remember Mr. Phillips's criticisms of Abraham Lincoln and his ardent eulogies of Andrew Johnson, will sympathize with the philosophic sadness with which he remarks that he "considers the success of Mr. Wilson one of the most alarming results of democratic institutions."

The Anti-Slavery Standard, through whose columns Mr. Phillips enlightens "the thoughtful teetotaller" on so many subjects, is a journal which has many good features, but whose claims to public support have been somewhat shaken by the legal abolition of slavery. It has, however, stoutly and certainly successfully maintained its right to survive slavery, without, however, satisfying those who wished to see it die with the abuse which it had so long and so ably assailed. We ourselves have at times had doubts about its utility, but they were, if not entirely removed, very much weakened by a letter signed "J. T. S.," in the number of April, which called attention to the number of "mysterious disappearances" which have been reported to the police in New York during the last four months—two hundred and thirty-nine in all—and asking, "Who shall dare affirm that the chattel system of slavery is wholly extinct among us?" if these statements are true. It then says:

"Now, after making all due allowance for a possible exaggeration in this statement, there is no doubt that in a crowded city like New York, and even in the good old Puritanic city of Boston, there is a sytem of kidnapping, as it were, certain laborers, whether young or old, and a catering to brothels and other haunts of servitude, which substantiates our charge that slavery, or at least the essential virus of it, is not dead yet, and fully justifies our claim that the Standard should be vigorously sustained as the uncompromising advocate of human rights, and for all classes, whether black or white."

Mr. Bancroft's completion of a treaty with the North German Confederation, releasing German subjects from their allegiance after five years' residence with intent, shown in the prescribed mode, to become citizens of this country, has settled what was the most thorny and difficult branch of the expatriation question. It now remains to deal with the British branch of it, which is also important, but which has been made pressing solely through the Fenian operations. Great Britain does not conscript returned exiles, but her courts do claim the right, under the old doctrine of allegiance, to take cognizance of acts committed by British subjects on foreign soil, no matter what measures they may have taken to cast off their allegiance. There is, however, no reason to anticipate any difficulty in settling this question also, whenever there is a sincere desire to have it settled. The difficulty now is that few Americans feel that it possesses much practical importance, and the Irish, we suspect, would, on the whole, if the truth were known, sooner have it left as it is. It now furnishes materials for a good many "enthusiastic meetings," which otherwise could hardly be got together.

The Cable news of the week has been unimportant. Dr. Livingstone's safety is confirmed beyond question by an autograph letter which has reached Sir Roderick Murchison via Zanzibar; and it is a fact of much more interest than the continued progress of the British forces in Abyssinia towards Magdala and King Theodorus, as reported in two despatches. The existence of considerable uneasiness among the rural population of France, owing to the terrors of the new army law, would appear to be substantiated by the telegrams from Paris. The Liberté alleges that the U. S. Legation in that city is overrun with applications from Frenchmen for American naturalization papers, with the not very enlightened view of escaping in this way from military service. However this may be, it will be safer to anticipate from the popular discontent an increased emigration to this country, rather than an explosion in France. At least, if we were members of the society—which we believe is still alive—for promoting European emigration to Louisiana, we should think the present the most favorable opportunity for getting the ear of the French people. We only fear that it might be embarrassing to explain to them why, in fleeing the conscription at home, they must not only come under military rule at the South, but must depend upon it for security and for most of the other blessings of good government.

The acknowledged evils of the resident system of the English universities, owing largely to the increased cost of living, led last year to a proposal of reform from Mr. Ewarts, which was granted a select committee by the House of Commons, and resulted in the taking of a good deal of testimony that decidedly strengthened the claims of the chief innovation. This was to allow students to reside in the city without being connected with any college or hall. The principal objections which it encountered were, that it would remove the outsiders from parietal discipline, and also interfere with their religious training, while they would be asked to humiliate themselves by subscribing to a statement setting forth their poverty. Nevertheless, the debates in the House clearly foreshadowed the change contemplated, and the universities have wisely gone out to meet it instead of stubbornly resisting or delaying by inaction. The proposal has actually been adopted by the Congregation of the University of Oxford, and, though this does not put the reform beyond hazard, it is probably the beginning of the end. At Cambridge the Syndicates appointed last November to consider the matter have recently reported in its favor, and their report has been discussed by the Senate, without conclusion. Greater opposition was developed than was to have been expected, inasmuch as, if we remember the tenor of the debates last year, the most stress was laid upon Oxford as needing extension. Undoubtedly, when the gates are down, a class of students with more brains than money will come in to compete with the sons of fortune and position; and that this should happen simultaneously with the extension of the suffrage seems—since the latter is irrevocable—to be the fittest and most desirable consummation possible. It would not be strange if the temptation to students in this country to complete their education in England, which has always existed to some extent, should, with the increase that must be thus given it, make an appreciable addition to the undergraduates of Oxford and Cambridge.

The constitutional inability of Englishmen to believe in the feasibility of the French ship canal across the Isthmus of Suez has just been rebuked by the Duke of St. Albans, who, in a letter to the Times, says of his visit to the works, that he came a sceptic and left a true believer in the early completion of the canal. It is tolerably well known that there is a small fresh-water canal, on which two barges may pass each other, that already serves for communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea; but it is less notorious that the maritime canal is half completed and filled, and that at Portsaid, its northern terminus, is a city of ten thousand inhabitants, where, eight years ago, "there was a narrow strip of sand between the sea and the lagoon, without a hut on it." And not only a town, but a port full of shipping, with a breakwater built of stone, made by a most ingenious process from the sand of the desert. It is curious to think of the Pacific Railroad as a rival of this canal, of course only for the eastern coast of Asia, China, and Japan. The distance to these countries, across the United States, will in fact be, when the road is completed, several days shorter from London than by the Red Sea.

THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

THE most remarkable feature connected with the impeachment trial—a feature which completely overshadows all others—is the fact that it can take place at all. If republican institutions have proved their strength to carry on a civil war of unexampled magnitude, they are no less proving their ability to withstand a political strain to which no other government has ever been subjected. Kings have been deposed, and have been submitted to a judicial trial for their crimes against the people, but only after they have been deprived of all power by successful revolutions. Here is the spectacle of a President, commander-in-chief of the armies and navies, possessing the sole executive power of the nation, supported in his opinions and acts by the assent of a considerable majority of all those persons who, five years ago, were deemed to be citizens, under trial for alleged offences against the Constitution and the laws; all the machinery of government moves on as usual; no one suggests resistance; the accused obeys all process of the court, yields to its authority without a murmur, attempts no measures of violence, submits a defence entirely upon the merits. We repeat, this is the remarkable fact; and it is one which may make every thoughtful citizen both proud of his country and hopeful of the permanence of its institutions. It shows that the Government is still based upon a universal respect for the laws. The American people are not slow to discuss all questions of policy and of power with a zeal which sometimes appears dangerous; but when the Constitution is plain and express, when the measure is one provided for beyond all doubt by the organic law, the assent to its legality is universal. No thoughtful American, whatever be his party affiliations, can look upon the impeachment trial as an event inferior in moral grandeur to the war waged to suppress the rebellion.

The trial itself has presented some questions of constitutional law hitherto untouched or unsettled, and the decisions thereupon will doubtless become precedents for all future action. One of these points involves the position of the Chief-Justice as presiding officer of the Senate. We confess ourselves unable to appreciate the importance which has been attached to the official character of the Chief-Justice. It seems to have been taken by many, both in the Senate and without, as symbolizing some theory which would enlarge or diminish the jurisdiction of that body. It has been suggested that the Chief-Justice is the sole judge of the law and the Senate are the sole triers of the fact. But such a suggestion has been made by no one connected with the trial, and its absurdity is apparent. Two questions have arisen, entirely distinct from each other and depending for their solution upon entirely different considerations. The first is the right of the Chief-Justice to rule in the first instance upon incidental points which arise in the trial, subject to the revision of the Senate. This claim is based not upon any authority residing in him as presiding officer, but simply upon a construction given to the rules of procedure which the Senate adopted. That body assented to the construction, and to remove all doubt made the rule more explicit. The second question is more important, and involves the official character of the Chief-Justice. Has he the right to an absolute and peremptory vote under any circumstances? The claim is simple, and the argument in its support seems to us conclusive. Generally, the Vice-President presides. The Constitution clothes him with authority to give the casting vote in all cases of a tie. When the President is tried, the Chief-Justice shall preside. It would appear from this language taken alone that the Chief-Justice was substituted in place of the Vice-President, with all his powers, no more and no less. This conclusion is strengthened by the motive which probably led to the provision in question. As the Vice-President succeeds upon the removal of the President, it was considered improper that he should form any part of the court, and the Chief-Justice was substituted in his stead. We do not understand that Mr. Chase has claimed anything more than the right to vote in case of a tie, and his casting vote can only be used in deciding interlocutory questions; in the final result he can have no voice, for the majority must be two-thirds in order to convict.

It is evident to any one who has carefully examined the proceedings from day to day that the Senate has uniformly acted with great impartiality, and that its rulings in respect to the admission of evidence are, with one or two exceptions, absolutely unobjectionable. The only occasions when there has been any real contest between the Managers and the President's counsel were the offers to prove declarations made by General Thomas, to prove the appointment of Mr. Cooper as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and to prove on his behalf declarations made by the President. The first decision, admitting General Thomas's statements made after his appointment, seems to have been in entire accordance with settled principles of the law of evidence. It is true that generally the declarations made by one person cannot be received against another. To this rule there are exceptions; and none is more familiar than in the case of an alleged conspiracy. If the prosecution has laid the foundation by giving some proof of the conspiracy, they may follow it up by introducing the admissions of the assumed conspirators against each other. It cannot be said that the prior proof of the conspiracy must be absolutely conclusive; it can, in the nature of things, be only matter for a jury to weigh. Had such proof been offered? We think it had. The removal of Mr. Stanton, the appointment of General Thomas, and the particular directions of the President to the latter, may make out but a weak case of conspiracy, but they certainly make out a case sufficient to be submitted to a jury. The decision admitting General Thomas's statements prior to the removal of Stanton and his own appointment was, in our opinion, wrong, and wrong for the same reason that the former ruling was right. No evidence of any conspiracy existing at that time between the President and Thomas had been given. We were glad to see that most of the able lawyers on the Republican side of the Senate voted to reject this evidence. To be sure, the declarations proved were perfectly immaterial, and cannot be used to prejudice the case of the respondent.

The proposal to prove the appointment of Mr. Cooper as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury was very properly overruled. The fact itself seems simple enough, but Mr. Butler announced that the Managers intended to raise such an enormous superstructure of hypothesis upon it that they would be, in fact, adding another distinctive charge to the articles of impeachment. The Senate, in deciding that they would not try the respondent upon any new allegation, decided in strict accordance with law, as well as with common sense and common justice.

The questions raised by the counsel for the respondent, in their offers to prove the President's declarations, in order to show his intent, are much more grave, and go to the bottom of one entire branch of the defence. The criminal law, as administered by ordinary tribunals against ordinary offenders, invariably demands the presence of a wrongful intent as the very essential element of every crime. Although the Managers have denied the necessity of proving such an intent against the President, yet their actions contradict their avowals, and there can be no question that this feature of guilt must be established, and may be disproved. As intent is a mental condition rather than a physical fact, the evidence for or against its existence must be circumstantial, and on the actual trials the aid of presumptions is always invoked. Thus, the President having removed Mr. Stanton, the presumption is conclusive that he intended to do so. If the removal was in violation of the Constitution or of a statute, the presumption would also arise that he intended the violation. This latter design is the actual criminal intent which makes his act a high misdemeanor; but the presumption is not, like the former, conclusive; it may be overcome, and may be strengthened by ancillary evidence. The President claims that he is not guilty of a criminal design, because the validity of the Tenure-of-Office statute is, at least, fairly open to doubt, because the only method by which it can be questioned is for him formally to violate it, in order that the judicial machinery may be set in motion, and because he did, in fact, violate it for that purpose, and for no other. The first two of these propositions are matters of law, and are to be established by argument and not by testimony. The third is a matter of fact, and he proposes to prove it by showing what he has said to different individuals on the subject. The Senate permitted him to introduce the statements made to General Thomas, but shut out those made to General Sherman. Is there any inconsistency here? Every tyro in the law knows that as a general rule a party cannot prove what he has himself said in order to explain the nature of an act. To this rule there is the exception that, if the act and the saying were simultaneous, or were so closely connected as to form parts of the same transaction, they shall not be separated; the act shall not be shown and the language shut out; both shall be admitted to explain each other. Under this exception the Senate permitted General Thomas to detail the conversations between the President and himself. But when the counsel for the respondent passed to conversations which took place two months before the act charged in the articles of impeachment, we think the exception does not apply, but that the general rule comes in play. It could hardly be contended that similar evidence would be received on behalf of the prisoner in a trial for murder or any other crime. But we think the Senate ought to have admitted the proposed declarations on Saturday as it did on Monday, when senators had had time to consider the matter. The rules of evidence which prevail in the English and American criminal law were contrived solely for trials by jury; they were designed to shut out immaterial matters which might confuse triers unacquainted with the law; they are not necessary when the same tribunal decides the law and the fact. The Senate would not be at all prejudiced by the admission of improper evidence; each senator would for himself separate the good from the bad, and give a judgment according to his convictions. Again, the Senate should preserve the appearance of the utmost fairness; a verdict of guilty will do no good unless the people are satisfied that it was rendered upon a view of the whole case; all errors should be on the side of the President, not on the side of the Managers. Now, the great mass of persons uneducated in the technical rules of evidence would consider statements made by the President, in reference to his design in removing Mr. Stanton, as throwing great light upon his intent; they will regard the rejection of those statements as an act of injustice. We are satisfied that Mr. Butler, by his vehemence in applying the doctrines of criminal evidence with which he is so familiar, is injuring his cause with the people.

The trial itself has developed few facts of importance which were not well known before its commencement. All the articles which are based upon the removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas rest for their decision upon two considerations. The charge of conspiracy cannot be treated as raising an independent issue. The first of these two considerations is the pure question of constitutional law, In whom does the power of removal reside? We do not intend to discuss this question. It can hardly be expected that the Senate will reverse their former action and fail to pronounce the Tenure-of-Office statute a valid law, by a majority of at least two-thirds. The position that Mr. Stanton's case is not covered by that statute seems to us so technical that we may call it a quibble. But the defence will be largely rested upon the issue of wrongful intent. The true construction is certainly a matter of doubt. Mr. Curtis maintains the exact position heretofore assumed in the Nation, that in regard to most laws the President should not interfere, but in regard to some he must interfere or their validity cannot be tested. This statute falls within the latter class, and if the respondent violated it merely to set in motion a judicial proceeding, he is innocent of any misdemeanor. We agree with these views. The trouble is that the facts do not appear to support them. There is not the slightest evidence, except his own declarations, that the President desired a judicial investigation. All of his acts look in another direction; he was endeavoring to get possession of the War Office, and to compel the other side to commence proceedings if they pleased.

We cannot leave this subject without saying that one fact was proved which ought to result in the President's conviction — his direct official communication to the Alabama Legislature advising a defeat of the XIVth Amendment. Here was a bold and plain violation of his official duty; a bold and plain interference with the exclusive functions of Congress.

SQUANDERING THE NATIONAL PATRIMONY.

It is generally acknowledged that, next after class-hatred, the great difficulty in the way of the social regeneration of Southern society is the landlessness of the negroes. If there be any well-established principle in political economy, it is that the possession of land has an elevating effect on the character, and that whatever influence the multiplicity of small holdings may exercise on the gross amount of production, there can be no question as to its influence in promoting independence, industry, frugality, and prudence amongst the cultivators. No argument is needed on this point. It was settled long ago, by the mere comparison of the countries in which large landholders abound with those in which small landholders abound. All that is claimed for the former is that they produce larger crops and use better machinery; what cannot be denied to the latter is that they produce better men, which is, after all, the great end of crops and machinery. When one compares the French peasant, even in districts in which vine-culture is unknown or unprofitable, with the English hind, in any district whatever, one feels that the difference is such that neither the large yield nor improved processes of the English farm can compensate for it—and yet the French peasant is by no means the best specimen of the class of small holders.

Wendell Phillips and Thaddeus Stevens both got hold of this principle, and, two years ago, urged it with considerable energy with regard to the Southern negroes. They said, and with great truth, that there was no means of raising a man—and, above all, a degraded and dispirited man—either in his own estimation or in that of his neighbors, so good as that of giving him land of his own, in sufficient quantity to enable him to live on it in comfort. But they spoilt the effect of all they said by parading their desire that the measure should be only in part a philanthropic or reformatory one, and that the remainder should be purely penal; in other words, that they sought through it the infliction of vengeance on the South as well as the elevation of the negro. They proposed to secure the necessary amount of land by confiscation, and Wendell Phillips cited in support of his doctrine various historical precedents, whose sole value, unfortunately, lay in the lesson they afforded of the curse which even "mild confiscation" inflicts on any country in which it is carried out, especially when the sting it leaves behind is felt by a large class. In short, we cannot go to the source from which we draw the conclusion that small farms are a benefit to the community—human experience—without finding it covered over with warnings against allowing men to acquire small farms by means which look like spoliation of their neighbors. There is one thing more essential to a community than even small holdings, and that is the absence of any extraordinary cause of envy, hatred, and malice amongst its members.

It is, however, undoubtedly the duty of the Government to encourage by every means in its power the diffusion of landed property—or, in other words, the dependence of as large a proportion of the population as possible on farming for its support; for the farming class, if it be in the enjoyment of a good system of education, is undoubtedly the most valuable class, both politically and socially, and will continue to be so till co-operation in some shape or other shall have raised the artisan out of the position of a hired laborer. We have already too many men in the cities living from hand to mouth, and forming after each commercial crisis or panic a great mass of suffering and discontent; and one result of the enormous accumulation of capital in a small number of hands, which seems to be one of the inevitable incidents of our civilization, is to aggravate this drift of population to the great cities. Government can counteract it in a measure by the judicious use of the enormous area of public lands now remaining in its hands, and we hope some day to see an attempt either by State or Federal legislation to make the holding of large masses of land not under cultivation unendurably burdensome by taxation. The holding of land as it is now held at the South, in larger quantities than the owner can cultivate, or intends or hopes to cultivate, is against public policy, particularly when, as is largely the case in that region, it is done for political ends; and it would be difficult to think of a fairer object of differential taxation. It is not only a luxury but a mischievous luxury.

How terribly this legitimate means of redressing the balance between the city and the country, between classes and the masses, between large capitals and small ones, has been wasted, has been recently exposed in the House of Representatives, in a very able speech, by Mr. Julian, of Indiana—the author, we may say, of the Homestead law—to prevent the further sale of public lands except in accordance with the provisions of the Pre-emption and Homestead laws and the laws for the disposal of town sites and lands. Some of the facts he brings to light are almost astounding, and are full of instruction. Thirty millions of acres of land sold by the Government since its foundation, and which would have made 187,500 farms of 160 acres each, have not been reduced to farms at all, but have passed into the hands of speculators. About seven millions of acres have been sold under the Homestead laws, represented by 59,000 farms, while in the year 1835 about eight millions of acres passed into the hands of speculators and remain still unimproved, thus creating immense barriers between the tide of population and the wilderness beyond, which emigrants were forced to pass over in search of settlements, and leaving great tracts of unpeopled country between them and civilization, thus doubling their hardships by raising the price of everything they needed, and increasing the difficulty of securing all civilizing influences—churches, schools, books, lectures, and roads. We have more than once spoken in these columns of the barbarizing effects of great sparseness of population. Mr. Julian's revelations give all we have ever said on this subject additional point and force. The bad effects on the civilization of the whole country, on politics, society, and literature, of the way in which we have allowed great regions of the far West to be settled, are already visible, but we are satisfied we have not yet seen them in their full extent.

The Government has sold, in all, over one hundred and forty millions of acres since its foundation. Mr. Julian calculates that the country has not derived from them one-half the agricultural wealth that might have been derived had a care been taken from the outset to ensure the bringing of this vast area under cultivation as fast as it was disposed of, thus making it fulfil the end for which land, politically considered, exists—not the enrichment of individuals, but the increase of the number of happy and comfortable homes.

But it is not the private speculators alone who have to bear the responsibility of the withdrawal of these large tracts from cultivation. Mr. Julian calculates that about two hundred millions of acres have been granted in aid of railroads and other improvements, and under such conditions that the companies can withhold from the market the alternate odd numbered sections for an indefinite period, and can put on the even numbered ones the high price of $2 50 an acre. The sum total of these grants exceeds the entire area of the six New England States, together with New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, by more than five millions of acres! They are almost equal to the entire area of France, and nearly twice the size of the British Isles. Now, the construction of the railroads is most important, but it is not so important as the proper settlement of the country through which they run; and Mr. Julian proposes, and a bill embodying his proposal has been introduced, that the companies should be compelled to dispose of the odd sections to actual settlers only, and that such of the even sections as remain undisposed of at the end of ten years should at once become subject to the laws regulating the disposition of other public lands.

The Agricultural College grant, laudable as its object has been, is also being made the instrument of the wildest waste and jobbery. The total amount of the land thus granted is calculated at nearly ten millions of acres. Where the States have public lands within their limits their grants will, of course, be settled with a view to raising the largest revenue possible for the colleges; but we hardly think, as Mr. Julian does, that this can result in much mischief. We suspect that wherever a college makes it a point to get the largest possible revenue at the earliest possible moment from its land grant, whatever it does for the purpose will consist with the public interest, if it attends to the settlement itself. When a State only gets scrip, and is left to "locate" the grant itself, the case is different. In nine cases out of ten this scrip passes at low prices into the hands of speculators, and is used to delay settlement and cultivation. A company of speculators actually advertise that they have bought up the college scrip of nine States, amounting to 2,482,000 acres. The Mexican bounty warrant lands, amounting to thirteen millions of acres, have gone in the same way. The "swamp or overflowed lands" of the Southern States have had a similar fate; a large proportion of them—fifty-two millions of acres, it is calculated—are now held by speculators. Mr. Julian thinks that these, as well as confiscated estates, should have been used to settle the landless class at the South. With regard to confiscation, we, for reasons already given, entirely disagree with him; but his own statements with regard to these speculative monopolies furnish a more powerful reason for disagreeing with him than any which had occurred to us. To touch property long and legitimately held, when so many speculative tumors invite incision, would be anything but good statesmanship.

Another great land job—the scheme of granting bounty lands to soldiers who had served in the war—has just been exposed, and we hope squelched, by a report from the Committee on Public Lands, to which the bill embodying this scheme was referred. The sum and substance of it was, that about three hundred and thirty-five millions of acres, or about one-third of all the lands now remaining in the hands of the Government, be granted to soldiers. The distribution would, of course, be made in assignable land-warrants, which the soldiers would sell to speculators at prices probably, all things considered, as low as twenty-five cents an acre, and we know what would follow. Any soldier who wants land with a view to cultivating and living on it ought to have it; but if he is entitled to any reward for his services, and does not want to become a farmer, he ought to get it in money. The distribution of land-warrants is simply another mode of bestowing the prize of his valor and sufferings on a set of people who passed the entire period of the war in Wall Street, and if they helped him at all, did it by simply praising his exploits.

A NATIONAL BUREAU OF LIFE INSURANCE.

THERE is now going on in some of the daily papers of the city a discussion more than usually important, but which meets with even less than the usual attention from the parties principally interested. The subject under discussion is the propriety of establishing a National Bureau of Life Insurance at Washington, in place of the separate bureaus of the individual States in which they already exist or may yet be established—a plan which has been suggested in the Life Insurance Chamber of this city, and which must, sooner or later, come up in Congress for practical action. For the moment, the principal parties in interest seem to be the Life Insurance Companies themselves; but, in truth, the party most interested is the great public. But it does not readily appear how this question concerns the public so much, and that is one of the principal reasons why the discussion itself attracts so little attention. There is also another reason, a far more forcible one—namely: the general ignorance on the whole subject of life insurance. Unfortunately the press, to which the community looks for information on such matters, is consciously, or unconsciously, enlisted on the side of the companies, who are, if any one is, interested in maintaining the prevailing ignorance. The competition among the insurance companies for new business is naturally great; notoriety consequently is one of their great elements of strength. Hence the insurance companies are among the most liberal advertisers, and managers of newspapers, depending for their income upon their receipts from advertising, would be more than human if their sympathies in any open question did not naturally incline to the side of their important clients and business friends. Far be it from us to insinuate that such base motives could influence the respectable portion of the fraternity to defraud or connive at any wrong or injustice; but it is unquestionable that, unless some real palpable public advantage is to be gained, newspaper men, like other men, will abstain from raising a discussion that does not seem likely to benefit their friends or themselves. Until lately it has not appeared that any such general public advantage was to be gained by the discussion of life insurance management, and hence the silence of the press, hence the general ignorance. But lately a difference of opinion among the different companies as to the legislation most likely to benefit their individual objects and purposes has brought about declarations and assertions that absolutely cry out for a free and full enquiry. We have ourselves received several enquiries on the subject, and we hasten to lay before our readers such facts and thoughts as we have gathered.

We have recently shown at length why available capital abounds at the East; we need not, therefore, explain why insurance companies of all kinds are principally established in the East, and carry on the business of insurance in all the other States of the Union by means of agencies. These agencies, though always found ready to represent their companies for the purpose of receiving premiums, were frequently found unready to represent them when it came to pay losses, and insurers thus became involved in difficult and expensive litigation, which they were compelled to carry on in a distant State and at a great disadvantage. To guard against this wrong, to compel foreign companies to plead in the courts of the State where the loss is incurred, and to guarantee to insurers the responsibility of the company for the acts of its agents, some of the States have provided by law that no foreign insurance company shall do business within its limits without first depositing a large sum of money as security in the hands of the State and entering into such other engagements as have been thought likely to guarantee the insurer against fraud or mismanagement. Again, some of the States in which companies exist have established regular official departments for the purpose of superintending the companies within their limits and furnishing to the public generally some sort of guarantee against gross mismanagement. Now it must, of course, be to the advantage of the public that every facility shall be given to the business transactions of all sound and responsible companies, instead of which, the present legislation, it is claimed, throws unnecessary obstacles in their way. They say if a central bureau were established in Washington by act of Congress, empowered to investigate the affairs of all companies in all the States, and empowered to wind up the affairs of every concern on its first departure from the most correct business management or its first failure to comply with its engagements, that then the same security would exist for the insured in all parts of the Union; that the necessity for different laws in different States and for a number of superintending bureaus managed upon different principles and at considerable expense would be done away with; that companies established in States where now no superintendence is provided by law would at once become amenable to the same supervision; that the restrictions placed by some of the States upon the business of outside companies, which in many cases are vexatious only to responsible organizations and advantageous only to the unscrupulous, would be at once removed, to the benefit of all concerned; and that the whole of this important business would be at once established on a basis easily understood, entirely national, and perfectly alike in all parts of the country. It is this proposition, that such a central Bureau of Life Insurance should be established in Washington, which has led to the discussion and the enquiries above referred to.

The practical point at issue in this discussion seems to be, whether it is wise to force upon the General Government the care of interests which the individual State governments can provide for equally well. Apart from the general principle involved, it is safe to assert that individual State governments can not guard certain interests as well as the General Government can. We have right at our own doors a striking illustration in the case of the Erie Railroad war. Here is a corporation, established under the laws of the State and bound by its charter to submit to an investigation of its affairs, actually refusing to be bound by its charter, committing acts which a court declares to be of doubtful legality, and then removing its organization, its office, its books, and its property to a neighboring State, and repudiating the authority of the State to which it owes its existence. The Erie Railroad runs partly within the State; its road-bed, its rails and equipment cannot be removed, and these the State may seize and hold. But if no part of its property lay in the State, what redresss, except after endless litigation, would any innocent buyer of its recent issue of stock get, supposing that issue to be declared illegal? It is becoming evident, day by day, that there are men and corporations in our country stronger by far than all the authority of any single State; men and corporations that may some day test even the strength of the General Government.

There are life insurance companies in this city whose available cash means far exceed those of the Erie Railroad, who have little or no property over which the State can obtain control. What would be the result, if one of these companies should repudiate its obligations and set the State at defiance?

There is no disguising the fact, that in our times submission to lawful authority is not to be relied upon from powerful corporations, unless the power is at hand to enforce the authority. The life insurance companies are gradually developing into bodies of the most extraordinary power and importance. Those doing business in New York alone have assets to the extent of nearly one hundred and fifty millions of dollars; their fresh liabilities entered into last year reach nearly five hundred millions of dollars; their aggregate liabilities will, in a few years, far exceed the total of our entire national debt; the legislative restraint placed upon them is feeble, ignorant, and inefficient; and there are not wanting men of thought who assert that in less than twenty years every one of them will be bankrupt.

Reflections such as these, assertions such as these, unintentionally developed in the course of the discussion about the Central Bureau at Washington, seem to show that it is high time for the public and the press to look somewhat more closely into the subject.

Every one understands the general principles of life insurance. If one hundred men, at the age of twenty, put each one hundred dollars into a common fund, and put it out at interest, and each year add the same amount to the common fund to be similarly employed, there will be at all times money enough in the common fund to pay for each of the partners the sum of five thousand dollars at his death. We have chosen arbitrary figures, but the principle is correctly stated. It is easy to see that the success of the principle will be very much modified in practice. If the hundred men are all healthy, strong, and of good constitution, there will be a smaller number of deaths at an early age, and consequently smaller payments to be made by the partnership; the capital will be less early diminished; the increase of the capital, both from interest and from annual receipts, will be larger; and the partnership will be able to fulfil all its obligations. But if the selection of partners be not carefully made, the result will be totally different; there will be found among them some who die early; their death diminishes at one and the same time the capital of the partnership, the income from interest, and the subsequent annual receipts. The result depends, therefore, very much upon the prudence and care exercised in the admission of members to the partnership.

If the one hundred men have the good fortune to reside in healthy localities, to follow healthy avocations, to live in years free from pestilence and contagious diseases, the result will be one; but should the country, during the fifty or sixty years which their partnership may be presumed to last, be desolated by famine, cholera, or other infliction, the result will be totally different.

If the one hundred men are born within this section of country, are fully acclimated, and continue to reside here, the result will differ from what it would be had part of them been born in other climates or removed to them in after-life.

It is evident that in order to calculate exactly what each member's annual contribution should be, in order to procure the desired result, it is absolutely essential to be able to tell beforehand how many of the hundred will die in each year. No process of reasoning can give this knowledge; it can be obtained only, and then only approximately, by experience. In long-settled countries, where social changes are not rapid; where no important movement of the population is taking place; where, in consequence of the long practice of life insurance or from other causes, the necessary facts have been carefully gathered and sifted for many years, extending over periods of manifold vicissitudes, the average life of men has been ascertained with considerable exactitude, and it is upon this knowledge, almost exclusively, that the business of life insurance is carried on with us. Experience of our own, we may safely say, we have none. How the peculiarities of our various climates, our restless activity, our constant migration from State to State, our opening up of new territories, and development of new occupations, our constant accessions of peoples from climates differing from our own—how all these and many kindred influences affect and change the results of other people's experience, we are only very slowly and dimly beginning to perceive. To quote a single example of recent discovery, it is demonstrated by the few years' experience of a German company of this city that the lives of our German fellow-citizens born in Germany are positively shorter than those of Americans at home.

It is clear, then, that the business of life insurance in America is carried on upon a very uncertain and very insufficient knowledge of its most important element, the average length of life of the insured. We have said enough in what precedes to show that this knowledge cannot be obtained by any one company, by the companies of any one State, or even the experience of one generation. It is a knowledge the acquisition and possession of which are of great national importance, which can be obtained only by long-continued, careful, and persistent collection and comparison of all the facts resulting from the transactions of all the companies throughout the Union, and which should be open at all times to all classes of enquirers. This object can only be reached by a central bureau at Washington.

The question of the average length of life, or rather, as insurance men call it, the death rate, though the most important, is far from being the only one of importance. Of the total income of the companies doing business in New York one-tenth is derived from interest on the accumulated premiums of former years. The merchant and business man need not be told, but others may not be aware, how greatly the obtainable rate of interest on capital varies in different years. Of course, if the premium demanded by a company be based upon the expectation of realizing seven per cent. interest on its accumulated income, and it obtains but five per cent., it will be found that the premium asked is insufficient to maintain the company solvent. This is another very uncertain element that enters into the calculations of a life insurance company.

Far more important than the rate of interest, and almost equal in importance to the death rate, is the question of expenses. For these scarcely any reliable data existed in the earlier years of life insurance, and such as were known have been entirely upset by the enormous increase of expenses consequent upon the war, by the prevailing spirit of extravagance that characterizes almost all corporations, and by the competition among the companies themselves, which tempts them to pay enormous commissions, and to spend almost incredible sums for advertising, agencies, and kindred machinery. It is confidently asserted that of all the New York companies not more than two have succeeded in keeping their expenses within the limit upon which their premiums are calculated, and that all the rest are actually every year, by their excessive expenditures alone, and without taking into account other deficiencies and errors, eating into their substance and preparing themselves for irredeemable insolvency.

We cannot better close this article than by copying the following note of warning from a speech of the English ex-Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gladstone, delivered in the House of Commons some time in 1864—a speech which did more than anything else written or spoken to reconcile the English people to the system of national life insurance advocated by him:

"Consider for a moment the peculiar nature of life assurance. This is a business that presents the direct converse of ordinary commercial business. Ordinary commercial business, if legitimate, begins with a considerable investment of capital, and the profits follow perhaps at a considerable distance. But here, on the contrary, you begin with receiving largely, and your liabilities are postponed to a distant date. Now, I dare say there are not many members of this House who know to what an extraordinary extent this is true. When an institution of this kind is founded, so far from having difficulties at the outset, that is the time of its glory and enjoyment. The money comes rolling in, and the claims are at a distance, almost beyond the horizon. In the first year of the society the premiums far exceed the death claims. This is also the case in the subsequent years. For how long a period does the House think the premiums to be received are in excess of the death claims? For thirty-seven years."

"FINIS POLONIÆ."

A FEW weeks ago a cable despatch informed us of the final absorption, by decree of the Czar, of the Polish provinces of Russia in the body of that empire. Thus Russia's part in annihilating the once powerful kingdom of Poland, begun by an armed intervention of the Empress Catharine II., in 1767, ostensibly in the interest of religious liberty, has been consummated, after a full hundred years, by Alexander II., her great-grandson. In order to understand the right meaning and the import of this consummation, in its bearings upon the question of the further existence or non-existence of the Polish nationality in general, as well as other East-European complications, it is necessary to cast a glance upon the history of the various dismemberments of Poland, the actual condition of the severed parts, and the present relations of the dividing powers to each other.

By the first partition of Poland, executed in 1772–73 by Catharine, Frederic the Great, and Maria Theresa, or rather her son, Joseph II., Russia received some territories of the Grand-Duchy of Lithuania situated on both sides of the upper Düna and Dnieper, and now included in the governments of Vitepsk and Mohilev; Frederic annexed the bulk of Royal or West Prussia and some adjoining parts; Austria took the extensive territories now forming its province of Galicia, besides some minor ones. The second partition, in 1793, gave Catharine the Lithuanian, Volhynian, Podolian, and Ukrainian territories, now forming or embraced in the governments of Minsk, Zhitomir, Podolsk, and Kiev; Frederic William II. took Posen and other parts of Great Poland, Dantzic, and Thorn; Austria received no share. In the final dismemberment of 1795, which followed the insurrection under Kosciuszko, Catharine took the remainder of Lithuania and Volhynia (Wilna, Grodno, etc.); Francis of Austria the districts lying between the Bug, the Vistula, and the Pilica; and Prussia all the rest, with Warsaw, the capital.

For twelve years the name of Poland remained effaced from the map of Europe. A partial restoration took place in 1807, when Napoleon, having vanquished Prussia by the battles of Jena and Friedland, and compelled her to accept the humiliating terms of the treaty of Tilsit, transformed the larger part of her share of Poland into a Duchy of Warsaw, at the head of which he placed Frederic Augustus of Saxony. This new Polish state, enlarged in 1809 by parts of Austrian Poland, fell on the retreat of its founder from the disastrous campaign of 1812 in Russia, and was held during the deliberations of the Congress of Vienna by the armies of Czar Alexander I. By the final decision of that assembly Prussia received back a part of her share, including the present Grand-Duchy of Posen, while the bulk of the Duchy of Warsaw was annexed to Russia, as a semi-autonomous constitutional state, under the name of the Kingdom of Poland, the river boundaries of which were the Niemen, the Bug, and the Prosna. Only the town of Cracow, with its surrounding territory, was constituted a nominally independent Polish state, under a republican form of government. The arrangements of the Congress of Vienna, to which some of the powers gave their adhesion only with reluctance, thus contemplated and stipulated the continued existence of the Polish nationality, but only on the ruins of Poland.

The aim and hope of the quartered nation, however, continued to be the recovery of its national life and independence throughout the vast domain of its ancient fatherland. This natural tendency, which constantly manifested itself in agitations and demonstrations of a more or less threatening character, soon led to reactionary and repressive measures on the part of the dividing powers, in violation of promises, constitutional pledges, and treaty stipulations. The total or partial denationalization of the Polish provinces gradually became the object of the rulers, conspiracy the weapon of the oppressed. Bloody insurrections and cruel chastisements were everywhere the result. The Russian Kingdom of Poland had its grand revolutionary tragedy of 1830–31, which cost it its national army and its constitution, in spite of marvels of heroism; Galicia, its outbreak in February, 1846, immediately stifled in the blood of its nobility, victims of a terrible jacquerie; Cracow, its short revolutionary drama of the same month, which terminated with the annihilation of the republic and the annexation of its territory to Galicia, in open violation of the treaties of Vienna and in spite of protests from France and England; Posen, its wild fight of 1848, under the lead of Mieroslawski, after which it remained, bleeding and exhausted, a helpless prey of the Germanizing power; Russian Poland, again, its desperate insurrection of 1863–64, which drenched its soil with blood hopelessly shed, filled Siberia with victims, and in some provinces almost entirely broke the Polish element.

The territories occupied by Russia on occasion of the first dismemberment became denationalized almost as soon as detached from their former connection, this, too, having been based on the right of conquest, and the bulk of the population being more Russian than Polish.

Nearly the same was the case with the provinces annexed by Catharine in 1793. Neither was the predominant religion in these two divisions —the Greek United Church—an obstacle in the way of Russification. Descendants of Orthodox Greeks more or less violently converted by Polish masters or Jesuits, a part of the inhabitants were easily persuaded or compelled to return to the creed of their forefathers, wholesale conversions taking place chiefly during the reign of Czar Nicholas. It was also this monarch who made the first efforts for denationalizing the Lithuanian and Volhynian provinces occupied in the third partition, efforts contrary to the policy of his milder predecessor, Alexander, and stimulated by the dangers with which the widespread rising of 1830–31 threatened the integrity of the Russian empire. These efforts were successful among the mixed rural population, but less so in the towns, in which the pure Polish element prevails. But determined, as he was, to crush any new attempt at insurrection with the iron hand, Nicholas never endeavored to destroy or impair the Polish nationality in the Kingdom of Poland, created by the Congress of Vienna, though he arbitrarily abrogated its constitution. He left it its separate existence, under a viceroy, with a separate administration, separate finances, and a tariff of its own, protective even against the competition of the other provinces of the Russian empire. The language of the administration, of the courts, of the schools remained the Polish, the rights of the Catholic clergy remained almost unimpaired.

The early years of the reign of his successor, Alexander L. were characterized by still greater mildness in the government of the Kingdom. But when the stimulus given to patriotic enthusiasm by the inspiration of a reviving press, and still more by the events of 1859 and 1860 in Italy, followed, as they were, by liberal movements in Hungary and Galicia, brought about a series of national demonstrations in favor of a reunion of all Polish provinces under a free government; when the exertions of Marquis Wielopolski to win over his countrymen to the cause of Panslavism under the lead of the Czar not only proved a failure, but led to outbreaks of repugnance, the Russian Government soon again returned to measures of vigorous repression. The most violent of the latter, the wholesale conscription of the patriotic youths of the cities, finally led—perhaps not unintentionally—to the internecine struggle of 1863–64. Of small beginnings, this desperate strife soon assumed vast proportions, and when transient threats of interference by France, England, and even Austria added to its magnitude, the existence of Russia as the great empire of Eastern Europe seemed for a moment to be again in question. This unwonted hostile interference, the religious character which the struggle assumed in some parts, its extent and duration, the appeals of an otherwise liberal prince, of a frantic priesthood, and a no less frantic press, lately unshackled—all combined to exasperate the Russian people to a degree never experienced before. Aristocrats and freedmen, serviles and radicals, vied with each other in sacrifices for their empire, religion, and Czar; the threats of foreign powers were spurned, and the insurrection was crushed. But this time the mere crushing out of rebellion was not deemed sufficient. The Polish nationality altogether was now doomed, by the demands of the Russian people as well as by the undisguised policy of the Government, to total and final destruction. The gibbet, Siberia, confiscation, conscription, and all the means of refined despotism aided by popular fanaticism, were to do the work —and it is now being executed without mercy, without regard for treaties, for national, religious, or private rights, or for the opinion of the world.

In Lithuania and Volhynia this work—of expatriation, dispossession, and denationalization—is nearly complete. It was executed by a few bold, rapid, and deadly strokes. In the Kingdom of Poland, however, where the task is immensely vaster and the difficulties immeasurably greater, no less sweeping but milder measures, more numerous and subtler means, had to be used for the achievement of the same object. Landmark after landmark was removed. The Catholic clergy were deprived of a large part of their institutions, and subjected to a rigorous surveillance; the nobility were deprived of all influence in public affairs; all higher offices were filled with Russians; the Russian language replaced the Polish in the bureaus, the courts, and the schools; the Polish press was gagged; every branch of the administration was remodelled after the Russian pattern; the government and district divisions were repeatedly altered and received new names; the internal tariff lines were abolished; the financial system was assimilated to the Russian; the separate existence of the Kingdom was made first entirely illusory, and then altogether nominal; and now, we are informed, even the shadow of its existence has been swept away, even the name has been effaced; Russia contains no Poland any more, no Polish provinces, but among her governments some hewn out of Polish ruins.

This final step Russia, we believe, would have delayed longer, from her wonted prudence and slowness, and perhaps also from regard for public opinion abroad, had not recent changes in the political complexion of Eastern Europe, consequent on the war of 1866, quickened her impulses and actions. It is true the late increase of Prussia's power has not altered the attitude of that monarchy towards Russia, and least of all, perhaps, in the Polish question; and Bismark, with his well-known cynicism à la Frederic the Great, has but lately declared Poland to be a phantom living only in heated brains. It is true the national position of the Poles in Prussia has become but more difficult and more untenable for the enlargement of that kingdom and the creation of the North German Union. But the sudden, thorough, and vital metamorphosis of Austria after its late defeat; the total change of system in that empire, which has placed its new foundations chiefly on the sympathies and needs of the Hungarian and Polish elements, but late so hostile to its existence; the reorganization of Galicia on a Polish national basis, simultaneously with the restoration of the Hungarian constitution; the security of the permanence of this new system which lies in the common peril to those nationalities and Austria in Russia's no-longer-hidden Panslavistic tendencies; the hostile attitude of Austria in the Turkish question, backed, as she is, by the sympathies of both France and England; the approaching crisis on the Danube; the danger of a general conflagration; and, finally, the reviving hopes of the Poles—these considerations urge Russia to finish her work in her Polish provinces thoroughly and speedily; and to the song, "Poland is not yet lost," already resounding anew on her border, she hastens to answer, "Finis Poloniæ!" To prove the correctness of these words, she must conquer Galicia.

HERALDRY IN CONGRESS.

Mr. Chanler, of New York, proposes that Congress should levy a tax on armorial bearings. We, for our part, do not say no, though we are not in ardent sympathy with Mr. Chanler's probable motive in making the proposal. He was sacrificing, we take it, to the Genius of Democracy as he understands it. As we understand it, the Genius of Democracy does not delight in such offerings. To trample on coat-armor in presence of the simple and stern republicans of our Sixth Ward is not a more genuine tribute to the grand truths of the founders than the late Mr. Cass's appearance on the Bowery stump in his shirt-sleeves; or than the apparition of Mr. Belmont's Federal-Republican dress-coat amid the despotic governments of the Hague; or than it would be for the United States consul at Barbadoes to go barefoot, because in that island a man is set down as rather aristocratic if he wears shoes and stockings. Our America, so far as we know her true nature and her better mind, no more asks than she needs that her sons should render her any such aggressive services as these. We believe she does not ask too much thought as to what her children shall wear, and that she is as serene in her contemplation of Kings of Arms as we know her to be in her contemplation of real potentates. Real potentates, we say, for it is true that in most countries the professors of the science of heraldry are falling into disesteem; and the science itself, devoid now of most of its old significance, tends towards disuse. In England, where pedigrees are probably the longest of any in Europe; where arbitrary conventional distinctions have had most of the real substance of power behind them, heraldry has already fallen into almost hopeless decay. Every Briton who wants it enough to buy it, or be at the trouble of inventing it, can provide himself with a coat-of-arms; Melchisedec himself, "without father, without mother, without descent," if he were now alive, and lived in England, and cared to make application to the College of Heralds, could purchase hereditary ensigns armorial; or, if he preferred it, could put on his panels a device of his own manufacture, and there would be nobody to say him nay. Mr. Chanler then need not give himself over-much uneasiness about these insignia; they mean so much less than they meant once that the austerest foe of aristocracy is not called on to go out of his way to attack them.

Then there are other persons, it seems, who have been giving this subject some consideration, and who, for other reasons than those which we have conjectured to be Mr. Chanler's, have come to his conclusion. They are the genealogists. Mr. W. H. Whitmore, who is one of them, and perhaps the one of them most learned in heraldry, has recently published a pamphlet, in which he argues in favor of Mr. Chanler's plan, and gives us the rough draught of a bill to carry it into effect. He would have Congress prohibit the use of coat-armor to all but those citizens who pay an annual license-fee—say ten dollars. He would make the person intending to assume a coat-of-arms, or the person already in possession of one, file a description of it in the United States District Court, paying for the privilege of entering it a fee of not less than fifty dollars—provided, however, that no military or naval officer, or person who has ever been such, be compelled to pay anything for recording his arms. Private soldiers also, and seamen, he would, we suppose, be willing to exempt from making this payment. He would insist that the date of the year when the arms are assumed be made a necessary part of them; and this could be conveniently done, he says, by painting the figures on the scroll at the foot of the shield. In the case of the arms of military and naval men, who had shown especial gallantry in some battle, Mr. Whitmore would allow the name of the battle to be substituted for the date of assumption. Finally, he would make an infraction of the law punishable by a fine of five hundred dollars.

Mr. Whitmore's reason for urging legislation on this subject it is not very hard to guess. What he really wants is that Congress should take on itself the duties of an efficient college of heralds, and protect the possessors of hereditary coat-armor in the undisturbed enjoyment of it. Doubtless he cherishes the hope that, even in case the law he desires should fail to create and foster an American heraldry, it would at least put an end to the degradation of the noble science by prohibiting that mournful aping of foreign heraldry which has been prevalent for generations in this country. Now to us, we confess, the heraldic transgressions of our fellow-citizens are not on the whole really afflicting. On the contrary, we discover in ourselves amusement rather than genuine grief when they are brought to our notice. When we are told that an American lady is persuading her husband to adopt a pretty pattern of an escutcheon, with a neat bend-sinister among its bearings, we always say, Let her. Almost nobody has any clear notion of what is meant by the charge in question; and of those who do know so much, almost everybody is unable when he sees it to take his oath that it really is a bend-sinister; so for her purposes the shield of her choice is as good as any other. And for referring the matter to her own choice, she has as good authority as she needs; nearly every one of the States of her native Union displays armorial bearings as entirely fantastical and as little amenable to heraldic law, or any law but its own liking, as was the whimsical coat-armor of a Norman of the time of the Conquest. But such blunders shock Mr. Whitmore, and he no doubt is often shocked by other blunders to the commission of which there go an equal amount of ignorance and rather more of what a herald would call impudence. We should freely forgive a coal-man who should assume arms of dominion, or a feme sole who should undertake to bear arms of community, but Mr. Whitmore would certainly punish them severely if he could get the law of them. A sight of the service of plate presented to Mr. Supervisor Tweed the other day, adorned with the Marquis of Tweed-dale's arms, would affect him most unpleasantly.

For, as a genealogist, he has found a knowledge of heraldry serviceable to him in his researches amid the obscurity of family histories. It is natural and proper, then, that he should rate his knowledge at a high value. And it is not surprising—for we observe that it constantly happens in the case of men who are masters of any branch of rare or occult learning—that he should set a somewhat exaggerated value not on his knowledge only, but on the very subject-matter of it. The antiquary is proud of the knowledge he possesses in regard to the old Roman wall, or the Indian mound, or the Greek coin, and this is not odd; but it is a little odd, or rather it is not purely reasonable, that he should entertain, as he is very sure to entertain, a particular affection for the coin itself, and for the bit of ground that contains the relics of the fort or the sepulchre. As we suppose, it is to this feeling, due to his special knowledge of an out-of-the-way subject, that we owe Mr. Whitmore's advocacy of Mr. Chanler's measure.

Expectations of the usefulness of heraldic distinctions in the United States would not in themselves, we imagine, be of force enough to lead any one to attempt breathing into the system, never vigorous here, the breath of new life. Perhaps the age of chivalry has passed away; only perhaps, for it is only perhaps that any such age was ever here. But it is as certain as that we have newspapers and co-operative stores, that the age of the showy externals of chivalry as the badges of class rule is gone beyond recall, and that if it were possible to bring it back this is not the country likely to witness its resuscitation. It will be a good while before we see Grant and Sheridan and the rest of our fighting-men boxed up in iron. And till we see that we shall not see them painted on the outside in streaks and other striking figures; or, in other words, we shall not soon reinvent coat-armor. And till we have done that, and, furthermore, have accepted the doctrine that a citizen is to be honored not for his own worth to the State but for his father's, we shall not transfer the labels of our warriors from their full dress uniforms to escutcheons which shall serve their descendants as warrants for ruling over us. And till we have thus reinvented escutcheons and then behind them as symbols put something of the substantial power, and remodelled our political and social system, we shall not get respect for armorial bearings from any American except such a one as in some special way has hooked himself to the past, or such a one as may pretty justly entertain a contempt for the specimen of republican most intimately known to him.

But though neither Mr. Chanler's nor Mr. Whitmore's theory of burdening coat-armor commends itself to our minds; though we should decline to tax it with a view of punishing the bloated aristocrat, or teaching him a lesson in sound democratic doctrine; and though we should decline also to tax it with a view of preventing the desecration of chivalric signs that all men ought to employ with reverent care; still we are far from denying, as Mr. Whitmore at least does, that a tax may not be justified on general principles. We should lay it down for true, that shields being assuredly needless luxuries, and the United States being assuredly in need of a revenue, there is sufficient reason for Congress, if it chooses, to impose a tax. It is saying nothing, we hold, to say with Mr. Whitmore, that government cannot in decency derive revenue even from the foolish vanity of the citizen, unless it renders him some special service in the matter of gratifying the particular form of vanity which it taxes. This principle he lays down, in order to deduce from it the rule that Congress is under obligation to guarantee undisturbed possession of a taxed coat-of arms to the man who pays the annual ten dollars for the right to display it. But what particular service to the citizen as smoker does government render to the man who pays for his cigar two prices—one in payment to the dealer, and one by way of contribution to the revenue? He shares in the general shadow of the eagle's wings; he has around him forts and arsenals, and the army and navy of the Union, to secure him that immunity from the attacks of foreign despots which is essential to the highest enjoyment of manufactured tobacco in any of its varieties; but he gets no peculiar return for his disbursement to the collector. Indeed, in the case of any pursuit whatever, purely luxurious or entirely otherwise, governments in levying taxes do not at all necessarily commit themselves to the proposition that such pursuits are worthy of protection. They may be worthy or unworthy; it is sufficient that they are in existence, and that revenue can expediently be extracted from them. So our government, in putting an impost on the use of heraldric devices, might be far enough from informing the civilized world that it assented to the general agreement as to the meaning of certain combinations of marks, and equally far from promising the man who paid a tax on some such combination that nobody else should engrave it on his spoons, or paint it on his carriage door, or prick it into his forearm with india-ink. It is quite within the competency of Congress, we take it, to tax a gentleman in Oil City for displaying the royal arms of England, without previously expressing any opinion on the question whether or not the Garter King at Arms would recognize his right to use them.

However, we do not anticipate or strongly recommend immediate Congressional action on this subject. There are other courses open. A judicious modification of the tax on whiskey, and something sagacious in the way of a civil service act to provide for a supply of tolerably honest officers of internal revenue, will enable us to get on for a good while yet without any Bureau of Heralds in the Treasury Department. Besides, we don't mind confessing, no matter what we have said, that we have a little regard left for heraldry.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, March 27, 1868.

THE political situation just now is so remarkable that I must say a few words upon the subject. The main results of the Irish debate may be said to have been these: Mr. Bright made a speech distinguished by his usual eloquence and by more than his usual moderation. The effect may be judged of by the simple fact that the Saturday Review—generally most bitterly opposed to him—now declares that no Liberal ministry could be complete without him; and not only this, but that he would be an excellent corrective to some of Mr. Gladstone's eccentricities. But is a Liberal ministry probable? In the Irish debate one point was brought out with great distinctness, namely—that all sections of the Liberal party, from Mr. Lowe to Mr. Mill, unite in nothing else, but unite in condemning the Irish Church Establishment. It became almost necessary, as a test of the sincerity of the party, that a motion should be introduced pledging Parliament to the abolition of the Establishment. As the Liberals are theoretically in a majority, they ought to be in a position to carry this motion without difficulty. The injustice of the present system is one of the primary articles of the Liberal creed, to which even Mr. Gladstone, in spite of his ecclesiastical sympathies, has given his unconditional adherence. But the practical difficulty depends upon this, that Mr. Disraeli can threaten the expiring Parliament with a premature dissolution. He can say: "You must, under all circumstances, come to an end next spring to allow the new constituencies to vote. You have an immense deal of business to transact, financial arrangements, educational changes, Irish and Scotch Reform bills, and a variety of other matters of less importance. Now, if there is a majority against the Government, and I dissolve Parliament, all this business will be thrown out of gear; you will have to go to your constituents and spend heaven only knows how much on a new election, and all for a life of only a few months before a new dissolution. In short, I can fine you heavily for your disobedience, and put all the country to great inconvenience." These threats, which are more or less obscurely made, have a great influence upon the weaker members of the Liberal party. A large proportion of them would be heartily glad of a good excuse for postponing the decision. The question is, whether Mr. Disraeli, as a skilful tactician, will be able to furnish them with some pretext for evading the point, or whether Mr. Gladstone and the constituencies will succeed in bringing the refractory members up to the mark. At present the result is admitted to be uncertain. This power of dissolution is one which gives a minister great advantages occasionally towards keeping his party in order and frightening his opponent. It may, as in this case, produce a very awkward result by substituting personal considerations for the plain political issue. We generally consider, in England at least, that the power of dissolution offers advantages as compared with the American system of giving a fixed term of life to a legislative assembly. The question, however, is open to discussion by constitution mongers, and our present complication may afford some hints for one party in the dispute.

I will now turn to the question, noticed in my last letter, arising from the report of the Education Commission. Two or three discussions have taken place in Parliament, and Government have produced their scheme for primary education, of which it can only be said that it is a disappointment to every reformer. It proposes to do little beyond modifying in a very slight degree the existing system. Still less have we any satisfactory proposals as to the improvement of secondary education; and it is pretty evident, from the report of the Education Commission, that there is at least as much room for improvement in this as in other branches of education. I do n't know whether American readers are sufficiently aware of the merits of English blue-books. They have a proverbially bad name for dulness; but I really do n't know where greater masses of useful information are to be found, and often in a very entertaining form. The present book is a most elaborate and admirably-written report, giving the fullest details as to English education, in a compressed and yet very intelligible shape, and backed up by an enormous mass of evidence from England, with smaller reports from France, Prussia, Switzerland, and America. If any one wishes to understand our university system, I could not do better than refer him to the report of the Oxford and Cambridge commissions of (about) 1854; for the elementary education, the fullest details may be found in a similar report of 1858; and our great public schools, Eton, Harrow, etc., have been described in another report published about two years ago. The gap between the parish schools and Eton is filled up by the present blue-book, and it is one of the most curious illustrations of the kind of work which administrative reformers have still to accomplish in England. It will, as the commissioners themselves say, take years to bring our secondary schools into really good working order, and the cause of their present chaotic condition is instructive. It may be described, shortly, as the total absence of organization. Self government is an excellent principle when it means that people really take an interest in their own affairs, and are capable of conducting them. When it simply implies that they do n't manage them decently, but won't let any one else interfere, it is not so obviously desirable; and nothing can be plainer than that in every department of life we require more centralization and better system. We have proceeded in the spirit of letting things alone till a good deal of our social machinery has become terribly rusty and disjointed. Take these schools for example.

First, there are the old grammar-schools, some of them dating back nearly from the time of William Rufus, and with considerable endowments. In their statutes are still to be found regulations for paying the master "potation money" and "cockpennies." The first name explains itself. A cockpenny was the subscription of the scholars to get up a kind of benefit for the master. He took the pence and provided the cock-fight, the balance of profit forming part of his regular pay. This and other queer regulations have of course fallen into decay, but we still keep as close as possible to other rules made in the state of society indicated by this ingenious provision. Naturally they do n't suit the times. Some of the schools have fallen into utter decay. At Thame, two masters with good salaries and a house are employed in teaching one boy. At another school the trustees, on being asked why no pupils were to be found, replied by producing a photograph of the master—which fully accounted for the absence of scholars. At some towns there are very large charities which tend actually to spoil the education. Education is given free to any inhabitant. The endowment is not sufficient, however, to provide good masters. The competition of the free school prevents private schools from competing, whilst the education offered is worse than that in the ordinary national schools. The only people who profit are the landowners and clergy, who would otherwise subscribe to set up a decent school. At other places, again, a successful school gets a reputation and immediately sets up as a classical school of the highest class. It thus ceases to give what is wanted by the middle classes, and becomes a second-rate rival of Eton and Harrow. There is no system of inspection, and the master of an endowed school holds his place as a freehold, from which he cannot be ejected, however incompetent.

The endowed schools are thus bad in themselves, and very unequally distributed over the country. The commissioners declare that, unless reformed, they will do more harm than good. The deficiency is partly supplemented by a large number of private schools, some excellent and some execrable. The great difficulty is that, in the absence of any efficient system of inspection, the parents cannot distinguish between good masters and bad; and the advertising scholastic quack has as good a chance as the really able master. Moreover, the want of any combined system has left a singular deficiency of schools at one important part of the system. The better class of artisans and the small tradesmen and farmers are almost without any decent provision. This is specially important in regard to our manufacturers. It is now constantly pointed out that we are losing ground in competition with foreigners because there is so little chance of attaining a reasonable technical education. The education given in elementary schools is said to be better than that of the several strata immediately above them; but it is a difficulty that, owing to class prejudices, the small farmers and tradesmen refuse to send their children to the same school with their laborers. Some recent experiments tend to show that this prejudice may be surmounted with less trouble than has been supposed; but it is one element of trouble in all our educational arrangements.

The commissioners propose to remedy these defects, or rather to begin to attack them, by a rather complex piece of machinery. The main features of their proposal are to form certain county boards which may divide existing schools into three grades, each of which shall be compelled to restrain itself to its proper province, to allow a rating system for the supply of new schools where wanted, and to provide for an efficient system of inspection and examination. That all these things are extremely advisable is obvious without much argument. That they should have been hitherto so utterly neglected is the natural result of the happy-go-lucky way in which we had trusted to "laws of supply and demand," or, in other words, to the unassisted efforts of individuals to establish a satisfactory system. But whilst people are talking about the Irish Church and about reform and about the Abyssinian expedition, it is difficult to persuade them to pay any attention to the claims of our children to a decent amount of knowledge. The middle classes have since 1832 been the ruling power in England. It is curious that they have never used their power to provide themselves with a tolerable set of schools, but, on the contrary, have allowed themselves to remain the worst taught in proportion to their needs of any class of the community. The phenomenon suggests some problems which I leave to others to consider.

THE WEST AND REPUDIATION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

I admire the earnestness with which you fight the phantom of Western repudiation, and rejoice in the conviction that if it were a thing existing in the flesh you would very soon make it throw up the sponge; but I begin to think it a pity to see so much hard hitting wasted on the empty air.

There is certainly no party in Illinois, nor are there many individuals, in favor of repudiating the principal of the national debt. The idea of refusing to pay interest, or, in other words, of taking up the interest-bearing bonds with greenbacks bearing no interest, was talked about here, as it was in your neighborhood, and was countenanced by a few men of all parties for a time; but it has not been adopted by the Republicans, nor will it ever be adopted by them, if one may judge of the future from present appearances. Democrats of the Copperhead stripe would put that idea into the creed of their party if they could, and possibly they may be able to do so; and in that event they will be beaten by greater majorities than ever.

My information is derived from the reading of many Western papers, and the hearing of many speeches made by Western politicians; and it is my belief that what I have stated as true of men and parties in Illinois is true also of men and parties generally in the Mississippi Valley north of Cairo. The Indiana resolutions are already seen by the Republicans of that State to be wrong in principle, and have been substantially abandoned by them.

We believe improvements can and ought to be made in the financial affairs of the country. We think the United States ought to be able to borrow money at as low a rate of interest as any nation or corporation or man can borrow it. We want to see the national credit established in the estimation of all lenders of money, so that they will pay a higher price from week to week for our outstanding bonds, until the bonds begin to bring a premium over gold; and then we want a new class of bonds, bearing a lower rate of interest, put upon the market, and the proceeds used in paying off the present ones. To this end we should be glad if Butler and Stevens, and all such wise men of the East, would make an end of calumniating the West, and devote their talents to praising somebody—themselves, if they can praise no one else. To the same end, we want the current expenses of the Government reduced to a minimum, and the management of the revenues committed to honest men.*

If it be true, as Butler says, that nine-tenths of the bonds are held east of Lake Ontario, and if it be true that we are paying a rate of interest higher than the average rate paid by other nations, it would seem natural that attacks on the public credit should come from the East rather than from the West. When money-lenders are getting extraordinary interest from a responsible customer, they are liable to the temptation of hurting his credit with other lenders. Have you people east of Lake Ontario got a good thing, and are you trying to keep it by blackguarding the rest of us? If that is the little game, the cheek of Messrs. Butler and Stevens must reach at least to the shoulder.

Get more and better information, Mr. Editor, and you will rest assured that no man who advocates repudiation in any form can receive the support of the West for any office or place of trust. S. C.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. HURD & HOUGHTON announce "The Charities of New York," by H. G. Commanse and H. W. Camp.——D. Appleton & Co. announce the sixteenth volume—the last but one—of their cheap, paper-covered, "Plum-pudding edition" of Dickens. It is "Bleak House," and "Little Dorrit" is to follow. The equally cheap edition of Scott has reached the fifth volume, which contains "The Antiquary"—the favorite of the middle-aged and judicious. It is bound in tartan-plaid, as will be its successors, the twenty volumes which will complete the set. On the 11th of April the same house published "Not Wisely, but Too Well," by the author of "Cometh Up as a Flower"—of which latter the publishers say, "No work since 'Jane Eyre' has met with greater success"—a bold assertion. What, for example, would Messrs. Appleton say to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, who declare in Every Saturday that more than one hundred thousand copies of "Mugby Junction" were sold in this country alone, and that the sale of that particular work of Dickens's was comparatively small? On the 18th of April Appleton & Co. add to their "Globe" editions of "Dante" and "Tasso" the "Globe" "Hudibras," and to Louis Figuier's other works on natural history his newly-translated "Ocean World: a Descriptive History of the Sea and its Inhabitants." On the 25th instant the translation of Max Ring's historical novel, "John Milton and His Times," will appear, embellished with eight designs by Gaston Fay.——Robert Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, propose to publish a series of works relating to the early history of the valley of the Ohio River. This part of the great Mississippi Valley includes Western Virginia, Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, and Illinois, and its early history must tell of explorations by missionaries and hunting pioneers; of intrigues of the French and English for its possession; of wars with the Indians, and of the labors of settlement. Messrs. Clarke & Co. do not intend giving us the artistic history, or even the consecutive annals, of the valley; they rather hope to make a collection of materials for history. They express themselves astonished at the amount and value of the material which they have found accessible in print and manuscript, and as parts of the series which they have begun—and which everybody will hope they may find as profitable to them as it is honorable to them to have undertaken it—they are already able to announce these works: "An Historical Account of the Expedition against the Ohio Indians in the year 1764, under command of Henry Bouquet. By Thomas Hutchins;" "A Topographical Description of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and North Carolina, comprehending Rivers Ohio, Kenhawa, Sioto, Cherokee, Wabash, etc. By Thomas Hutchins. 1778;" "The Journal of a Tour into the Territory North-west of the Alleghany Mountains, made in the Spring of 1803, with a Geographical and Historical Account of the State of Ohio. By Thaddeus Mason Harris. 1805;" "A Topographical Description of the State of Ohio, Indiana Territory, etc. By Major Jervis Cutler. 1812;" "History of the Late War in the Western Country. By Robert B. McAfee. 1816;" "A Collection of Some Interesting Narratives of Indian Warfare in the West. By Samuel C. Metcalf. 1812;" "Topographical Description of the Western Territory of North America. By G. Imlay. 1797;" "Discovery, Settlement, and Present State of Kentucky. By John Filson. 1784." The maps and other engravings in these works will be carefully reproduced in fac-simile, by the photo-lithographic process.——Messrs. John Wiley & Son announce "Lectures on Ventilation," by Lewis L. Leeds, who is the agent of the Government in the matter of ventilating hospitals and heating and ventilating the Treasury Department buildings. "Man's own breath," says Mr. Leeds, "is his Greatest Enemy."

—As an aid to the formation of sound public opinion on a matter which we have treated at more length in another part of this week's paper, we are glad to refer the reader to an article entitled "The Public Land System," which appears in the American Law Review for the current month. The writer does little more than set forth lucidly the law in regard to the acquisition of title by the settler; still he does do something more than that, and at any rate he clears the way for a fuller understanding of the whole subject, for a more popularly effective treatment of it—a treatment which we hope it may receive in some of the larger periodicals for the general reader. Too much cannot be known about it, nor known too soon. Besides the article in question, the Review has an essay, readable, but too brief and too exclusively dealing with his legal career, on Lord Plunket. It is based on the excellent life of that very able man not long since published by his grandson. Other articles in the April number are on "The Legal Tender Acts: Their Constitutionality and Effect," and "The Liability of Common Carriers beyond their own Route."

—Some weeks ago we printed a letter—the manuscript of which we found on sale at Mr. J. W. Bouton's—that was written by Thackeray to a friend of his in this city. We did not then give the name of the gentleman to whom the letter was addressed—Mr. W. D. Robinson—who now authorizes, indeed requests, us to do so. The original letter is still in the possession of Mr. Robinson, who is not responsible for its being made public except in so far as this: He lent it to Mr. Robert Balmanno, well known in London and in this city as having been an enthusiastic collector of literary curiosities, and Mr. Balmanno, doubtless without intention of passing it off as genuine, made a fac-simile copy. Rather, he made a copy almost in fac-simile; in the original the signature is "W. M. T.," while in the copy the surname of the writer is given in full. Mr. Balmanno dying, his copy passed with the rest of his collection into other hands, and now turns up as an original. Mr. Robinson is, of course, unwilling to appear as a revealer of private correspondence. We hope forgiveness for supposing him in a better world, and for our consequent publication of his friend's letter.

—The arrival in this country of Mr. Waterhouse Hawkins, of London, is a matter of congratulation among those aware of his claims to respect as an artist and naturalist. His knowledge of comparative anatomy is probably not excelled by that of any naturalist of the day, while his skill as an artist is equalled by few. This rare combination of talent has enabled Mr. Hawkins to be of great service in putting visibly before us extinct animals, of which only a few fragmentary bones, found in the recent geological formations of England, are actually in existence. It was he who restored and built up in masonry, in their natural proportions, the elephas primigenius, the Megatherium, the Iguanodon, the Megalosaurus, and other monsters of the past. To do this it was necessary to possess an intimate knowledge of comparative anatomy, as, in some instances, no more than a bone or two could be obtained by the artist for his guidance. The unlearned reader may form some idea of the size of these animals, whose effigies, so to speak, are now standing in the Crystal Palace Park at Sydenham, when told that Mr. Hawkins once entertained a party of twenty naturalists in the interior of one of them. At a recent meeting of the Lyceum of Natural History, in this city, Mr. Hawkins exemplified the methods he would employ for conveying to lyceum audiences a knowledge of his branch of natural science by such a skilful use of the black-board that the audience, although composed of cool, scientific men, frequently broke out into enthusiastic applause. It is to be wished that his abilities as a lecturer could be displayed before every lyceum audience in the country.

* Our correspondent can hardly refer to the Secretary of the Treasury. Our belief is that we have never had, and are not likely ever to have, an honester man in that position. If Congress would place at his disposal, by reforming the Civil Service, a force worthy of him, we should have little to complain of either on the score of honesty or efficiency.—Ed. Nation.

—"The statistics of New York," says Dr. Robert Hunter, "during the period of my former residence here show a diminution of fully thirty per cent. in the mortality from consumption alone." If this is so, and we are unable to say that it is not literally true, Doctor Hunter is a public benefactor of a high order. But we can tell him how to lessen the incredulity with which many persons will receive his statement: he might leave out of his little book from which we have quoted the thirty-six pages from p. 144 to p. 179, both inclusive. They contain evidence given before the Court of Queen's Bench, Westminster. But the evidence is that of Dr. Hunter's own witnesses, and of them only; there is not the first word from the other side. Now, to many persons who have not heard of Dr. Hunter's sanitary influence on the bills of mortality in New York, but who have heard a good deal of him as a party to a suit at law against the Pall Mall Gazette, it will seem as if it were a mistake on his part and on the part of the publisher to give us a mass of purely ex-parte testimony in his favor. To give none at all or to give all would seem to be the better course to take if such persons are to be made believers. And as "few parents," to quote again from Dr. Hunter's treatise, "are indifferent to the sufferings and health of their children," and as not many people are indifferent to their own sufferings and health, it strikes us that the omission of the pages we have designated is no more than may properly be demanded in the interest of fair play—fair play as between the physician and possible patients, fair play as between author and publisher on the one hand and readers on the other.

—Among late English books of interest we notice these: Lord Lytton's "Miscellaneous Prose Works," containing a number of his semi-philosophic essays; the Bishop of Oxford's life of his father, William Wilberforce; an essay by Dean Stanley on "The Connection of Church and State;" "Sermons Preached at Brighton," a second series, by F. W. Robertson; a new edition of Lyell's "Principles of Geology;" the second volume of the new edition of Robert Browning's works—which will be found to contain some poems with which Mr. Browning's admirers are not as yet familiar. The Reverend Orby Shipley has collected into a volume, with the title "Tracts for the Day," some of the essays which he, as editor, has been for two years or so putting forth for the edification of the school of Anglicans, known as "advanced," who go back, trampling, twelve hundred years for their doctrine and ceremonial. Unflinching Ritualism—priest, sacrifice, extreme unction, auricular confession, purgatory, seven sacraments: Ritualism, in short—may be found in this book fully presented within small space. "Doctor Campany's Courtship," by the author of "Doctor Jacob," is a book of short stories, highly praised by the critics, which may be expected soon in an American reprint. Two books that seem likely to be of much interest are a volume of essays by Mr. B. Cracroft and the fourth volume in English of "The Life and Writings of Joseph Mazzini." Among Mr. Cracroft's essays is one on "The Jews of Western Europe"—a most suggestive theme. Mazzini in this volume treats mainly of topics not political—if anything is non-political in his view—as "Dante's Minor Works," "The Philosophy of Music," "Carlyle's French Revolution," etc. He has also an essay on Carlyle as a philosopher, and expresses no very high opinion of him. Expressed, we should say, and not expresses, for the essay was written a score of years since, and what is now a fair statement of admitted facts was then a prophecy. Carlyle's irreverence for the established order of things was, of course, pleasing to Mazzini; and so were his sincerity and candor; and he saw that the writer of the essays on Diderot and Jean Paul and Voltaire subordinated the exterior life to the spiritual, and believed in the government of the visible by the invisible. But he saw, too, a defect which overbalanced these good qualities. He perceived, what many besides discovered later, that Carlyle sympathized with all men indeed, but that it was with men as individuals, not with man; that he had no true sense of the unity of the race, and no belief in its progress. Thus, then, as he surveys life and history, "faith and discouragement alternate in his works as they must in his soul." He has his heroes, believes in them as incarnations, so to speak, of ideas; but he is devoid of faith in a "supreme idea," represented by the life of the race, in a divine law and in a human progress which embodies it; there is for him no order in the past nor hope in the future; hence his worship of force and success and his praise of victory as the divine intervention from which there is no appeal.

—Novel-readers who got a sensation as of something fresh and new when they made the acquaintance of Ivan Turgénef's "Fathers and Sons," will be pleased to hear that another of his very clever books has been translated into French. Its Russian title is "Duim," which means "smoke" or "vapor." The smoke and steam flitting past the window of his railway carriage seem to young Gregory Litvinof, in his despair, the best emblem of "his life, Russian life, all that is human, and especially all that is Russian." The romantic part of the book, the story proper, tells of Litvinof's love for Tatiana, and his twice unhappy passion for Irene Osinine—a woman who seemingly might be the wicked, or wickeder, sister of the Madame Odintsof whom we met in "Fathers and Sons." But the romantic part of the book, delightful as Turgénef is in passages of poetry, is not the only interesting part of it, nor indeed the larger part. The scene is laid chiefly in St. Petersburg and Baden, and sketches of Russian character—of which also "Fathers and Sons" was full—make a great part of the book. The Russian democrat, the travelled Russian colonized in some headquarters of gambling, the progressive female Russian, the revolutionary politician, the "Holy Russia" Russian, are drawn by the vigorous hand that sketched for us Bazarof the Nihilist, and Paul Petrovitch, and Nicholas Petrovitch among his newly freed serfs. People likely to read "Fumée" are perhaps people not likely to be carried away by the not very intelligent love for Russian things that is, or was, common among us. But Turgénef's descriptions of his country and their institutions will be profitable even to those persons who know enough of Russia not to be ardent Philo-Russians, and to many other Americans they will be the lifting of a veil, or like light in a dark place. It would take a very great many of the Herald's correspondent's peculiar Letters from our Iron-clad Fleet in the Baltic to give us much information of this kind; it relates to fines imposed by the Russian Government in Lithuania: on a citizen of Wilna for leaving a Russian church before the service was ended, 100 roubles, or more than a hundred of our paper dollars; on a tradesman, because a servant entering his shop asked him in Polish the price of oil, 25 roubles; on a house owner, because in frescoes adorning his house there appeared the figure of a crow, which the authorities pronounced the eagle of Poland, 500 roubles; on certain men who, without permission from the police, attended the funeral of a neighbor, 25 roubles each; on a lady for venturing to give, without permission, a ball to celebrate her daughter's marriage, 300 roubles—and that although each guest was provided with the necessary permit. Now Turgénef, who, let it be said, is far enough from being unpatriotic, and who by no means despairs of his country, helps one to see clearly the country which thus insults mankind by its paternal government of Poland. And surely information was rarely before so pleasantly conveyed.

—Times of revolution are almost always characterized by a spirit of superstition and prophecy. In 1848 many people saw with alarm the curious coincidence, noted by some enemy of the bourgeois king, as being contained in the figures of some of the notable dates in the lives of Louis Philippe and his wife, and the really remarkable way in which the sinister prophecy was fulfilled has only strengthened the superstitious belief in the potency of figures. Louis Philippe was born in 1773, his wife was born in 1782, and the pair were married in 1809. It will be noticed that the figures of each of these different dates foot up 18, which, added to 1830, the year of Louis Philippe's accession to the throne, gives 1848, the year of his abdication and flight from France in the guise of a valet de chambre. The prophecy caused at the time a good deal of excitement, and is now called to mind by a similar but doubly striking prophetic coincidence in precisely the same events in the life of the present ruler of France. Louis Napoleon was born in 1808, his wife in 1826, and his marriage took place in 1853. The figures of these dates again sum up alike, 17, and 17 added to the date of the Emperor's ascending the throne, 1852, give the year 1869, which therefore, if one likes, may for some months safely be set down as the year of dethronement for the Man of December. It is said that no French paper has yet dared to publish the prophetic figures—which seems credible enough.

SCIENTIFIC.

THE COAL-FIELDS OF THE FAR WEST.—In the forthcoming report of the U. S. Geological Survey of Nebraska, Professor Hayden gives an account of the coal or lignite beds west of the Mississippi which cannot fail to attract the attention of all who are interested in the success of the several projected Pacific railroads, and in the development of the mineral and agricultural resources of our Territories.

One of these lines, the Union Pacific Railroad, has already struck the first range of the Rocky Mountains, more than 530 miles west of the Missouri River and within four miles of its highest elevation, and passes through a region where both iron and coal are found in workable quantities.

In the upper valley of the Missouri River and the Yellowstone there are beds of coal of even seven feet in thickness, which were known as long ago as the time of Lewis and Clark, but which will not be of much practical importance till the Northern Pacific Railroad is carried through that region. It is to the coal beds of Dakota and Colorado that the mining interests of the far West, and the inhabitants of the vast and fertile but almost treeless plains, must look as a source of fuel. The advancing Union Pacific Railroad has created a new interest in these long known deposits, for the coal of Iowa and Missouri is limited in quantity, and generally of inferior quality. In the Laramie Plains the coal-beds are from five to eleven feet in thickness, and occupy a basin of about five thousand square miles. This coal is of excellent quality, burns with a bright red flame, leaving scarcely any ash, and is as good as wood for domestic purposes, and, in fact, might be called condensed wood. Here and there there are seams of jet from one to twelve inches in thickness, which look much like cannel coal.

South of these beds, in Colorado, in the vicinity of Denver, there are others which are probably the most valuable in the West. In some places as many as eleven beds are exposed on the mountain-side, having from five to thirteen feet of thickness, and giving from thirty to fifty feet at least of solid lignite. They crop out in many places all along the eastern base of the mountains, and Professor Hayden estimates that they occupy, north of the Arkansas River, an area of not less than five thousand square miles. The coal is superior to ordinary Western bituminous coal, and ranks next to anthracite for domestic purposes. In a sanitary point of view it has the advantage that it produces no offensive gas or odor. Dr. Torrey, who has made an analysis of it, states that it contains a very large percentage of carbon, and is superior to lignite found in any other quarter of the world, and sees no reason why it should not be eminently useful for generating steam and for smelting ores. The real value of these deposits is seen when we reflect that they are of from ten to twenty thousand square miles in extent, and are in the midst of a region where, in all directions, for a distance of 600 or 1,000 miles, there is no fuel of any kind either on or beneath the surface of the ground. These beds are much younger than the anthracite beds of Pennsylvania, for they belong to the Tertiary, the geological period immediately preceding the present epoch, and there are no coal-beds west of the Mississippi older than these. They are found by examination to be composed of the remains chiefly of poplars, oaks, maples, hickories, lindens, buttonwoods, dogwoods, buckthorns, and magnolias.

THE ANCIENT TREE OF TENERIFFE.—Everywhere, both in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, we find ourselves in our investigations at a loss to arrive at the real essence of the vital principle. We witness its workings all around us and in us; and we are conscious of its existence even where there is total inactivity. As a latent life we find it concealed in the germs of plants, waiting for the proper time for its activity; and we have evidence of its great patience and endurance when seeds which have been long stored up in tombs and catacombs are restored to suitable conditions of soil and atmosphere. Dr. Lindley, the learned botanist, asserts that raspberry seeds, found in Celtic tombs, and which numbered at least seventeen hundred years of existence, germinated perfectly, and produced plants which still exist in the Horticultural Society's garden in London. M. Desmoulins says that seeds of heliotrope, lucerne, and cornflower found in some Roman tombs of the second and third centuries after Christ, when planted, germinated, flowered, and fruited; and in England patches of wheat are quite common, said to have been originally derived from seed obtained from Egyptian mummies.

There are instances where the vital principle has endured through ages and ages, excluded, in a great measure, from the natural changes of the atmosphere; but Hemmingway states that seeds of the elder germinated after being twice boiled in making wine, and remaining twenty months in the dregs of the cask; and Payen found that the spores of the red-mould, in the interior of barrack-bread at Paris, some twenty years ago, did not lose their vitality on being heated to a temperature of even 248° F., but germinated and produced red-mould or fungus.

It is not alone in the seed that we find this remarkable tenacity for life showing itself, but the vital principle possesses the same power of lying dormant in the plant, and of enduring great changes of temperature. The Lewisia rediviva of Oregon and California, of the Purslane family, will sprout when dried specimens have been two years or more in an herbarium; and Edwards and Colin found that some leguminous and cereal plants would bear hot water or air of a temperature of 167° F., and still germinate. Dr. Lyall, of the British Navy, immersed a specimen of Lewisia in boiling water to stop its growing propensity before drying it, and yet it showed symptoms of vitality more than a year and a half afterwards; and in 1863 it flowered in the Royal Kew Gardens. On the southern face of the Himalayan mountains dicotyledonous plants reach to about 17,500 feet; lichens are found as high up as the snow line of 19,000 feet; and some plants have been known to germinate after being subjected to a dry cold of 70° F. below zero.

This tenacity of life in the vegetable kingdom is sometimes shown in still another way. We can see no reason why exogenous trees, or those whose growth is all on the exterior, as oaks, elms, firs, and larches, should not live on for ever; for the bark is capable of indefinite extension, and each ring of annual growth soon becomes independent of all that is within, so that the death of the interior does not, so far as we can see, necessitate a diminution of vitality in the circumference; hence, as lumbermen know, the most vigorous looking trees are often hollow. But they also know that, in spite of theory, all the different kinds of trees have a certain average term of existence, and that it is not profitable to let them stand beyond a certain age, for they decrease in their rate of growth or laying up of woody material, and their vitality weakens.

But now and then an individual seems totally to disregard this law of growth, and to live on and on for ages, successfully resisting the attacks of time. When the Benthencourts, the French adventurers, conquered the Fortunate Isles in 1402, they found there a tree venerated by the inhabitants, the Guanches, of forty-eight feet in circumference, and of from twelve to fifteen feet in diameter; and in the same century, during the early periods of the Norman and Spanish conquests, we are told mass was performed at a small altar erected in the hollow trunk of the tree. When Humboldt ascended the Peak of Teneriffe, in 1799, he found this monarch had not materially changed in size since the fifteenth century, bore flowers and fruit, and seemed to be enjoying eternal youth; and a few years later he published a drawing of this tree, made in 1776 by F. d'Ozonne, which he discovered among the posthumous papers of the celebrated Borda.

It is an evergreen, with leaves clustered together at the ends of the branches, belonging to the same order with the asparagus and the lily of the valley. In the storm of July 21, 1819, it lost one side of its leafy top or crown. All travellers to Teneriffe visit this gigantic lily. In 1856 Mr. Bunbury writes: "The famous Dragon-tree of Villa de Orotava is still in existence; a ruin, indeed, but a noble ruin. The foliage is still fresh and vigorous; but the tree has been much shattered, and has lost many branches within the last few years; and a gentleman who has long known it is of opinion that it will not last another century."

And now the news comes that this King of the Monocotyledons, the Draccena Draco, is no more! Fenzi, of Florence, tells us that it was blown down, and charges the Spanish authorities with culpable negligence in not making an effort to prevent the destruction of this venerable historical monument by means of proper supports or props. He visited it a year ago, when it was still in good health, its crown covered with panicles of scarlet fruit; and its huge trunk, though completely decayed in the interior, sustained vigorously the spreading mass of fleshy branches and sword-like foliage.

It is the opinion of the most distinguished as well as the most cautious botanists, that this tree, which has fallen in our times, was probably 6,000 years old, and may have been one of the earliest wanderers from the Garden of Eden.

There are other instances of remarkably prolonged vitality among trees. In the autumn of 1860, Dr. J. D. Hooker, the well-known botanist, visited Mount Lebanon with Captain Washington, of the British Navy. They found the cedar grove, of four hundred trees, disposed in nine groups, on as many hummocks or ancient moraines of eighty to one hundred feet in height, which were formed when the climate was quite different from the present, and when the whole summit of Lebanon was covered with perpetual snow, and the basin in which the grove now is was filled with mighty glaciers. The oldest tree is forty feet, and, strange to say, the youngest is eighteen feet in circumference. Judging from a branch, which, by the use of the lens, was found to have one hundred and forty rings of annual growth in a diameter of eight inches, the oldest tree may be 2,500 years old; and Dr. Hooker thinks that the grove has not materially decreased since the days of Solomon.

The cedar of Lebanon has a wide range, being found on Mount Atlas in Northern Africa, and forming immense forests of imposing aspect in Central Asia and on the slopes of the Himalayan Mountains; for it is believed that these varieties all sprang originally from one form.

Of all trees in Europe, the yew probably attains the greatest age. One in Derbyshire, England, is thought to be over 2,000 years old; one at Fortingal, Scotland, is computed to have an age of from 2,500 to 2,600 years; and one in Bradburn churchyard, Kent, is said to be at least 3,000 years old.

Among African trees, Adamson thought the Adamsonia of Senegal reached an age of 6,000 years; but later travellers considered this estimate quite enormous, and reduced it by one-half, if not more.

During the past twenty-five years no trees have attracted so much attention on account of their size, grandeur, and age as the great Wellingtonia or Seguoya, of California. There are eighty-five of these mammoths standing on an area of about fifty acres; and the base of one, called "The Old Maid," which is over 26 ft. in diameter, serves as a dancing-floor. Professor Gay estimates the highest probable age of one which was felled about fifteen years ago, having a height of 322 ft. and a diameter of 29 ft. 2 in. at five feet from the ground, to be not over 2,066 years, or antedating the Christian era by two centuries. A portion of the bark of this tree was for some time on exhibition in the Atlantic States, and now stands, we believe, in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. One of those still remaining has a height of 350 ft., and near the ground a circumference of 97 ft.; and some of the grove rise to a height of 200 ft. or more without a limb. The trunk of a tree lying near these has a cavity, for 250 ft. of its length, of from 10 to 12 ft. in diameter, being ample room for a horse and his rider; and it is estimated that this tree was 400 ft. high and 35 ft. in diameter.

There is another tree in California called the redwood, which is much slower in growth than this, and which some botanists think reaches a far greater age, though belonging to the same family; yet none of these are as old as even the hollow of the great Dragon-tree of Orotava.

PHYSIOLOGIES.*

We presume that, within the past five years, as many as thirty different works on physiology, designed for the use of families, schools, and colleges, have appeared in the United States; and we think we are not far out of the way when we state that the authors of most of these have each, during the same time, also published at least three or four other works on different branches of science and literature. We have among us a class of men who contribute nothing themselves directly to the advancement of science, but, understanding the market and the publishers, live on the labors of others. Hundreds of books are written and published yearly expressly to go in certain directions, where it is known that trustees or school committees are "all right," or can be made so. It is to this state of things that we owe most of the physiologies now in the hands of the young.

How few have any idea of the training necessary to enable a man, of even superior natural abilities, to prepare such a work that will be worth the publishing! More than fair attainments in natural history, comparative anatomy, physics, chemistry, and the use of the microscope are required; and also not only a power to appreciate, but a willingness to accept the labors of those of acknowledged authority in the different sciences connected with physiology. The author must himself be a physiologist, able and desirous to contribute to the advancement of his special branch of knowledge. No other can write a work that will do credit to himself, or that will stand the test of time. And to these scientific he must add certain literary qualifications, or his work fails in an essential point. Compare Dalton's Physiology with those of the class of which we have spoken, written by men who have published, and are ever ready to publish, works on any department of science or literature. What a marked difference is immediately perceptible! And in order to show that this difference is even far greater than at first appears, we propose turning over the pages of this distinguished physiologist's book. We shall see that, though we have before us a work written by one who is solely a physiologist, and whose valuable contributions are well known to all who pay special attention to this branch of science, nevertheless most decided errors and defects have passed unnoticed in it, notwithstanding it has gone through four editions, and has been subjected to the careful revision of the author.

On page 64 it is stated that, "at a point on the surface of every starch grain there is a minute pore or depression called the hilus, around which the circular markings are arranged in a concentric form." Now, all starch grains begin as minute spherical bodies, and increase in size by the addition of concentric layers; but many diverge from the spherical form by the preponderating growth of one side of the granule. The hilum (hilus being neither Latin nor English) or nucleus is this starting-point of growth, which is either solid or hollow, and is not on the surface, but is the innermost of all the concentric layers. Henfrey is the undisputed authority on the subject.

On page 114 we find that, "if a dog, with a gastric fistula, be fed with a mixture of meat and boiled starch," in portions of the fluid withdrawn "the starch is easily recognizable by its reaction with iodine;" while on page 129 we meet with the contradiction, "If one dram of such gastric juice (containing albuminose) be mixed with one dram of iodine water and boiled starch be subsequently added, no blue color is produced." It is clear that the former statement needs qualification; and on pages 155 and 157 there are two other assertions which in the same way conflict with one another. The first is that "while passing through the pulmonary circulation, however, they [fatty substances] disappear;" and the second is that "it [fatty matter] is found in considerable abundance throughout the entire vascular system." Such statements could hardly bring contending parties to an agreement.

On page 357 there is a remarkable original figure of the nervous system of the starfish, unlike that of any species which has ever come under the eye of the naturalist. The branches in the arms are represented as forked, instead of being composed of one median nerve with a succession of branchlets coming off in pairs opposite one another. In alcoholic specimens it is next to impossible to distinguish blood-vessels from nerves, and we should judge that such were used for dissection in this case. As long ago as 1816, the lamented Tiedeman published an anatomy of the starfish which has not been since materially added to; and, in fact, Professor Milne-Edwards has illustrated the great work, "Le Règne Animal," of his master Cuvier with figures taken from this well-known monograph of the distinguished German anatomist. Professor Dalton might have found enough in it for his purpose, which would also have prevented him from publishing so serious a mistake.

On page 366 there is another original figure, made to show the nervous system of centipedes, but a naturalist would immediately suspect its accuracy in this respect from the fact that it is clearly faulty in almost every other structure represented. The feet should originate from the sides of the rings, not alternate with them; and the great claw-like fang-feet should be turned not backwards but forwards and inwards. It would be just as correct to represent the natural posture of a man standing to be with his arms extended horizontally and directly backwards—a position not more torturing to the biped than the one here figured to the centipede. The nervous ganglia should be within the rings, not alternate with them, and should be connected by a nerve-cord, which, though double in structure, is single in appearance. The professor has mistaken a furrow for a total division of the cord into two threads. Here again we have high authority which might have been consulted. In the "Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society" there are to be found several valuable papers by Newport on the development of the nervous and circulatory systems in myriapoda and other articulates, which are well known to every naturalist, and which furnish figures that would serve in the present instance most fully.

Lastly, we have to notice the section on reproduction, and shall be obliged to use terms, we fear, quite unfamiliar even to the ears of many liberally educated persons; for though instruction in physiology forms a part of the system of education in most of our schools and colleges, the text-books used are most of them carefully expurgated of all that relates to the origin and development of life.

On pages 532 and 533, both in the text and in the wood-cuts, the true vitelline membrane is ignored entirely, but the zona pellucida, which is stated to be but another name for this membrane, is figured. Now, in all vertebrates the zona is an accessory, formed against the inner face of the tunica granulosa of the Graafian follicle, and outside of the vitelline membrane; and the two exist together, especially in reptiles, for some time.

On page 590 we find the "two extremities (of the allantois) coming in contact with each other and fusing together over the back of the fœtus, just as the amniotic folds had previously done." The extremities do not fuse together and become continuous, but only overlap one another; and, moreover, the outer lamina of the amnios, after being cut off from the inner one, remains, and does not "allow it (the allantois) to come in contact with the external membrane of the egg."

should be close up to the inner face of the shell, and, at the age and extent of the vascular area represented, it should be considerably larger, and not spherical but spheroidal.

In figure 212, page 592, the yolk sac should also be represented as still increasing in size, for it finally fills the whole shell, excepting the space occupied by the embryo; and the latter should be sunken in the upper part of the yolk. Long ago the illustrious Von Baer and the immortal John Hunter described these features. Nor does the allantois come out at one side, as in the figure, and turn over the back, but it folds upwards on both sides at once, and then forwards around the neck of the yolk sac, and up over the head, also on both sides. The folds, meeting on the bac, turn outwards and downwards, all around, and, passing close to the shell membrane, the persistent outer lamina of the amnios alone intervening, finally concentrate below the yolk sac.

It will be observed that we have noted chiefly those errors which, on turning over the pages of this work, were suggested by the wood-cuts, and we have to remark that the author might have greatly increased the value of his book had he aimed a little less at originality, and consented to use more freely figures drawn from other works of high authority. Our aim has been in this review not to decry the merits of Professor Dalton's Physiology, for we consider it, perhaps, the best book which we possess for the medical student—Professor Flint's being more serviceable to one who intends studying the subject beyond what is required at an examination by the faculty of any of our medical schools—but, by pointing out its errors, to show how difficult it is, considering the present activity in science, for any one, not strictly a physiologist, to write a physiology worthy of public confidence.

In the fall of 1866 Professor Huxley published in London a little work entitled "Lessons in Elementary Physiology," and designed, as he states in the preface, "to serve the purposes of a text book for teachers and learners in boys' and girls' schools." His object in writing the book was "to set down in plain and concise language that which any person, who desires to become acquainted with the principles of human physiology, may learn, with a fair prospect of having but little to unlearn as our knowledge widens —and to separate the well-established and essential from the doubtful and unimportant portions of the vast mass of knowledge and opinions we call human physiology." He has succeeded excellently well in all he aimed at. His style is clear and compact, and the whole subject is presented in a systematic and interesting manner. Those who are acquainted with the author's various contributions on the anatomical, embryological, and physiological relations of man to the lower animals, will find the work in perfect keeping with his reputation; and we are sorry that we have not an exact reprint of it, for not only is it adapted to schools, but most persons who wish to review their studies in this department of science may take it up, and in a few hours' time digest the whole of it with pleasure and profit.

Unfortunately, Professor Huxley "confided the early sheets of the work to Professor Youmans" (as the latter tells us in his preface) "to make such additions of matter" as he thought best, and to "adapt it to the circumstances and requirements of American education." In what respect the requirements of the American education of boys and girls differ from those of the English we are not told, but the American author thinks it necessary in order to meet these special requirements to contribute, of the four hundred and twenty pages, between one and two hundred of his own, in the form of an opening chapter and several chapters under the head of Hygiene. Why he did not add a succession of hundreds of pages on physiological chemistry, embryology, histology, and so on, we do not see, for Professor Huxley has only noticed them, as he has the subject of hygiene, or the laws of health, in accordance with the character and limits which he thought best to give the work. Professor Youmans's method and style differ entirely from those of the professor with whom he has associated himself. He dwells on the most commonplace subject at great length, and introduces points still in dispute as established facts. He writes with great enthusiasm and, we may say, momentum, but with a corresponding lack of conciseness.

Huxley's little work, freed from this incubus, would certainly meet with a cordial reception if reprinted here, even though the "requirements of American education" differ from those of his own country.

Les Origines du Sermon de la Montagne. Par Hippolyte Rodrigues. (Paris: Michel Lévy Frères.)—This is an octavo volume of 200 pages, the avowed object of which is to "prove scientifically, to those eyes which do not shun the light," that there is nothing new in Christianity, and that there is not a single moral precept recognized and practised by civilized nations that is not traceable to the Jewish Scriptures. More than two centuries ago Grotius observed, in regard to the Lord's Prayer, that the single phrases composing it were current in rabbinical forms at the time of Christ. M. Rodrigues (le Secrétaire Perpétuel of the Israelitic Scientifico-literary Society organized at Paris) selects for the same purpose the Sermon on the Mount, as being the highest and fullest statement of Christian morality, and endeavors to show that it enunciates no new truths, but only embodies maxims which were in the mouth of every Jew before the Saviour uttered them, or, in the language of our author, le discours de la montagne courait les rues de Jérusalem bien avant qu'il eût été prononcé. The beatitudes themselves he regards only as an anthology of Israelitic piety and morality. The assertion that "the people were astonished at his doctrine" because he taught "as one having authority," and not as the scribes, is explained as referring to the earnestness of Jesus in reproducing in the form of pungent and incisive maxims the doctrines of the sacred books, instead of overloading them with long and obscure dissertations, as the authorized orthodox interpreters were wont to do. The method pursued by M. Rodrigues is to print on alternate pages (facing each other, so as to render a comparison between them easy) the Sermon on the Mount, as contained in the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of Matthew, and the corresponding passages from the Old Testament and the Talmud. But he does not prove satisfactorily that all his citations from the Talmud are "anterior to Jesus." It is not enough to affirm that Shammai and Hillel, the most distinguished heads of the Talmudic school, lived a century or less before the Christian era; or that "the Talmud contains the tradition of doctrines preached since the third century before Jesus;" or that Gamaliel and Johanan ben Zaccai, contemporaries of Jesus, "preceded him, according to every probability, in teaching the law." The Mishna was composed, or at least reduced to writing, by the Rabbi Judah Hakkadosh about A.D. 189, the Jewish Talmud about A.D. 396, and the Babylonian Talmud, which is most highly valued by the Jews, about A.D. 500. It is not always, and indeed very seldom, possible in such compilations, which are the growth of centuries, to fix the authorship of any one precept, or to say what doctor first gave it utterance. To endeavor, therefore, to establish the date of a citation by appending to it the name of a doctor (and even in most cases the author has to content himself with the title of a treatise), is not to proceed so scientifiquement as a professed ami de la vérité ought to do. In the "postface" we have numerous extracts from Reuss, Renan, and others, corroborative of the author's views. The conclusion at which M. Rodrigues arrives is, that the principles proclaimed by Moses and Jesus being the same, the two religions should adapt themselves to the scientific and philosophic progress of the age, and thus become une seule et même religion. Every step which they take toward reform is a step toward unification. In this country the tendency of Judaism to fraternize with certain forms of Christianity is strong, and seems to grow stronger. The Rabbi Lilienthal, for example, makes no difficulty about throwing overboard every dogma except those of the unity of God and the brotherhood of man, and thus affiliates with Unitarianism; his synagogue at Cincinnati, built in the form of a cross, with the domes of a mosque, and its interior walls inscribed with Hebrew legends, fitly symbolizes the catholicity of his religious belief. But M. Rodrigues must wait some time before all Christendom or much of it becomes Unitarian.

The Bankrupt Law of the United States. Edited by Edward Avery and George M. Hobbs, Counsellors-at-Law. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1868.) —The general plan of this work is briefly set forth in the preface: "In preparing this edition of the 'Bankrupt Law' the editors have not intended to present a treatise on bankruptcy, but simply to take the statute as it stood, and so arrange the notes and references as to present the leading cases under their appropriate heads." This plan has been carried out with unusual fidelity. Though the editors, by the form of their work, disclaim all pretence to originality, yet they have furnished an amount of well-selected material which would do credit to a book of much greater pretensions, and would need little more than proper arrangement in order to become what is commonly called an original work. The difficult subject of assignments in section 14 perhaps illustrates as well as any other in the book the careful attention which has been bestowed upon the editorial task. The book has two appendices—one containing the General Orders and Forms of Proceeding in Bankruptcy, the other the United States Bankrupt Law of 1841. The index is unusually exhaustive. As a manual for daily use as well as a convenient digest of the most important cases on the subject, Messrs. Avery and Hobbs's work seems to us superior to any of its rivals, and eminently deserving of the approval and patronage of the profession.

The Week.

THE evidence for the defence in the impeachment trial closed on Saturday; nothing now remains but the summing up of counsel; and probably before this reaches our readers the whole case will be in the hands of the Senate, or perhaps even the verdict will have been delivered. Of the unimportance of the evidence we have spoken elsewhere, and, if we are right in our estimate of it, the shutting out of the testimony offered by the defence, of Mr. Johnson's having been advised by his cabinet that the Tenure-of-Office Act was unconstitutional, and that he ought to disregard it, can hardly seriously affect his case. The fact that he was so advised is an important one, and the Senate knows it, and the public knows it, whether it was proved or not. The Tenure-of-Office Act is one of those acts the constitutionality of which, as we showed some weeks ago, cannot be tested unless the President himself violates it, and the advice he received from his cabinet about it undoubtedly has an important bearing on the question of his intent in violating it. This advice does not legally exonerate him, but it is something for the Senate to consider in making up its mind as to whether it will punish him or not. Mr. Wilson's point, that the cabinet is not a constitutional body, was able and sound, but, nevertheless, perfectly irrelevant. The advice of counsel would not justify a man in resisting the sheriff; but if he killed the sheriff in resisting him, the fact that counsel did so advise him would be a very important one in an enquiry whether he was guilty of wilful and preconcerted murder or only of manslaughter.

The only other noteworthy incident in the trial since last week has been the refusal of the Senate to give Messrs. Stevens and Logan what, in the language of good nature, is called "a chance." In short, each of these gentlemen wanted to deliver a speech at the close, of indeterminate length, and upon divers subjects known and unknown. We think we do them no injustice in surmising that, in addition to the legal reasons for convicting Mr. Johnson furnished by the lawyer managers, they wished to supply others by drawing the attention of the Senate to his violations of "eternal justice" and of "the rights of man," and his disregard of the "eternal veracities." The refusal of the Senate to hear them on these subjects has, we admit, a narrow-minded look; but then the Senate is pressed for time, and the country is impatient, and the House will listen to the speeches. We were asked some weeks ago to forbear criticising Mr. Stevens's performances on account of his physical infirmity, which, we were told, incapacitated him for business after eleven or twelve o'clock every day. If this infirmity does not prevent his delivering speeches, however, it hardly furnishes a claim to immunity. Nobody's opinions, because they are his, ought to influence the Senate in this proceeding. It should listen to nothing but arguments; and if Mr. Stevens is as ill as he seems, or as his friends represent, he is not in a condition to argue or to claim a hearing from either the Senate or the public, and a proper sense of decorum would keep him in the background. The House paid a sufficient tribute to his fortitude and past services by placing him amongst the Managers; it is now for him to take care that he does not occupy the time and place which the interests of the country claim for men in possession of all their powers of mind and body.

Congress has been only very intermittently in session during the past week, but it is understood that the committees are working hard, and that when once the trial is over a good deal of legislation will be done in a short time. The Ways and Means Committee is said to have a new Tax bill nearly ready. On Monday last the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, through its chairman, Mr. Banks, offered and defended its bill in regard to the protection of American citizens abroad, and after considerable debate, in which Mr. Banks was very remarkably inefficient, the bill passed. It is declared that the right of expatriation is a natural right; that this Government, recognizing the right, has freely received emigrants from foreign countries and made them citizens; that such American citizens, no matter what theories of indefeasible allegiance may be upheld by foreign nations, owe no allegiance, except to the United States. So much by way of preamble. It is sound doctrine, and the press and our State Department in its various branches have for some years maintained it. As Mr. Jenckes pointed out, however—and he received a rebuke from Mr. Banks for doing it—our courts have been compelled to state the law as it exists, the common law on the subject, and there has been a variance between our claims, as urged abroad by our officials, and our declaration of the law and our action upon it in the courts. The new bill removes this inconsistency by expressly declaring null all opinions, decisions, and so on, which tend in any way to impair the right of expatriation. This also seems perfectly well. But next comes a provision that a naturalized American is to have the same protection abroad that a native-born American has—a principle not to be laid down without qualifications; and, finally, comes the absurd Third Section—an appropriate ornament for Mr. Banks's political, though hardly for his personal, tombstone. It provides that when an American citizen abroad is arrested on the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not dissolve his allegiance to his native country; or, when any American, arrested for any cause, is kept too long imprisoned, the President is authorized to suspend commercial relations with the offending country (this was Mr. Pile's amendment), or catch any citizen of the offending country that he can find over here and put him in jail. There is now, as is well known, little or nothing in the way of a sensible settlement of the whole question, and there is hardly a doubt that it will be but a little while before we shall be recording such a treaty with England and France as we have just concluded with North Germany. The bill passed the House by one of those votes which are ominous of the failure of the measure in the Senate. There were but 5 nays to 99 yeas. On the same day a resolution was agreed to which directs the Committee on Commerce to enquire whether Congress has power to legislate for the prevention of the great loss of life on railroads, and, if they find such power, to enquire into the expediency of Government inspection of railroads. Previously, on the 15th, the petition of a large number of citizens of New York, praying for a national railroad between this city and Washington, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. The House passed a bill appropriating $10,000 for impeachment expenses.

The election returns from Michigan, official for fifty out of the sixty-two counties of the State, and estimated for the rest, pretty well establish the following facts: The total vote—and this happens seldom in constitutional elections—is the heaviest ever cast, and shows that great interest was felt in the result. That this should be so is reasonable enough, there being at least two exciting issues before the people. One was the question whether or not it shall hereafter be unlawful in Michigan to buy and sell intoxicating beverages. It is a question that comes home eloquently to men's business bosoms everywhere, and especially in a State in which much of the hardest of hard manual labor is done, and where, also—though Michigan is perhaps the most cultivated and enlightened of the newer States—"drinking" holds an important place among the too few means of pleasure. The "prohibition" clause of the new constitution is defeated, it seems, by something like 13,000 majority. The other question was not submitted to the people separately, and undoubtedly the defeat of the constitution in general is to be attributed to the clause granting suffrage to the negroes. The adverse majority is more than 40,000, or about one-half what it would have been if the vote had been taken ten or eleven years since; and ten years is not long in the life of a race, even when "unrighteous men," and unsagacious voters, oppose it.

The Press dinner to Dickens, in spite of some conspicuous drawbacks, was a success. It gave Dickens what he probably strongly desired, an opportunity of making a hearty acknowledgment of the warmth and delicacy and "magnanimity"—this last word is his own—of the reception he has met with in this country, of avowing his intention on his return to England to append to the "American Notes" some marked modifications in the judgment therein passed on American persons and things, and of uttering a really eloquent protest against whatever tends to prevent the closer union of America and England in thought and feeling—all of which the audience received with genuine enthusiasm. The speeches, too, were more than usually good. Mr. Greeley's at the opening was both happy and graceful; was, in short, done in his best vein—which, whatever one may think of his worst vein, is in most particulars admirable. The speech of the evening was, however, Mr. G. W. Curtis's, which was a combination of sentiment and thought rather unusual in after-dinner speeches, and was in every way such an expression of the feeling of cultivated Americans towards Charles Dickens as we should all wish the great author to carry away with him as a last farewell. There was one passage in it which we cannot help reproducing, and which we earnestly commend to the consideration not only of all foul-mouthed friends of humanity, but to all those "gentlemen of the press" who want to see the press become a profession which honorable and educated men will deliberately choose, instead of being, as one speaker at the dinner called it, "a resort" to which men betake themselves when other things fail, and which successful writers who have once belonged to it make a boast of not being ashamed of:

"The paramount duty of the Literary Press is purity; of the Political Press, honesty. Our Copyright law, as you are aware, Mr. Chairman, inflicts a fine for every repetition of the offence, so that the fine is multiplied as many times as there are copies of the book printed. So the man who, as a writer for the Press, says what he does not believe, or defends a policy that he does not approve, or panders to a base passion or a mean prejudice for a party purpose, is so many times a traitor to the craft represented at this table as there are copies of his newspaper printed. And as honest or even dishonest difference of opinion is entirely compatible with courtesy, as even denunciation is a thousand-fold more stinging and effective when it is not vituperation, decency of manner becomes the Press no less than decency of matter. When the manners of the Press become those of Tombs pettifoggers, or Old Bailey shysters, or the Eatanswill Gazette, its influence upon society will be revealed by a coarse and brutal public opinion. While we boast of the tremendous power of the Press, let us remember that the foundations of its power as a truly civilizing influence are, first, purity, then honesty, then sagacity and industry. It may sometimes seem otherwise; but it is an illusion. A man may build up a great journal as he may amass any other great fortune, and seem to be a shining miracle of prosperity. But if he have neither love, nor honor, nor troops of friends, his prosperity is a fair orchard bearing only apples of Sodom."

Mr. Norton was the only speaker at the dinner who made any response to that portion of Mr. Dickens's speech—and it was certainly not the least important—in which he touched on the relations of England and America. Although what Mr. Norton said was well and eloquently said, the omission on the part of the others is to be regretted, because one of Dickens's uses, and, let us add, one of his highest uses, is as a softener of international asperities, grudges, and hates. It is the more to be regretted as the Tribune is the only paper which published a full report of the proceedings. The World omitted all mention of Mr. Curtis's speech—a circumstance which suggests some curious reflections as to the influence of newspaper editing on human character. Journalism is said to be an ennobling profession; most editors of the leading papers are adult males, and they profess to present the public with accurate, if not full, reports of the leading events of the day; and yet one of their commonest modes of displaying personal or political dislike is to suppress or turn into burlesque speeches delivered at public meetings—a kind of hostile demonstration which is only worthy of that type of vulgar, weak, and vindictive woman, so common in society, and the extirpation or great diminution of which is one of the great objects of the movement in favor of higher female education.

The Tribune, by printing an article with the pleasant heading of "Horatio Seymour as a Liar," and ringing changes on that gentleman's "lying" and other evidences of depravity, apropos of some alleged misstatements of his, about the cost of reconstruction, in a public speech recently delivered, has furnished the daily papers during the week with materials for several articles on Mr. Greeley's peculiarities of diction, and Mr. Greeley with an opportunity of repeating once more his somewhat startling, but now well-known, opinions as to the propriety and expediency of calling opponents "liars" on all possible occasions. As we have often taken the liberty of saying, we consider the practice not only silly and useless, but under certain circumstances—as, for instance, when it is committed in the columns of a "great daily"—often brutalizing and always barbarizing. Nobody can read such articles as the one referred to without being the worse of it. They do not make liars more odious; they simply make lying seem a more trifling offence. What makes the practice all the more deplorable in the present case is, that the offender is a gentleman who occupies himself largely with delivering lectures to young men on "the conduct of life" and cognate themes, and is actually an active and prominent member of the board of management of a university intended to teach the youth of the West the humanizing, civilizing, and refining arts. Nor is this the worst of it. The practice of calling men "liars" is rarely met with amongst people who place a high value on truth. It is commonest of all in places, like gambling saloons and brothels, where truthfulness is a synonym for imbecility. A charge which a man would deeply feel if made against himself, he is seldom quick to make against others. Nobody who has seen much of the world has failed to observe the close connection there commonly is between foulmouthedness and bluntness of the moral perceptions. To those who have not thought on this before we would respectfully recommend the perusal of the interesting observations on the reflex action of language on the mind which Mr. Marsh has inserted in his valuable book on "The English Language" (pp. 234–7). The unfortunate person who, two years ago, in the Boston Commonwealth, accused Henry Ward Beecher of "having turned his back on morals and religion," because, after a life of devotion to freedom, he had made a mistake about the terms of reconstruction, probably did not mean half what his words implied, and was not, after all, very deeply penetrated with a sense of the enormity of Mr. Beecher's offence. Long indulgence in extravagance and vituperation had doubtless driven from his mind all distinct impression of what "morals and religion" were, and as well led him to mistake sputtering for force, and to fancy billingsgate a good vehicle of what he thought was righteous indignation. Of the disgrace which this sort of thing reflects on American journalism we say nothing. People who are not troubled about their own reputation or their own moral condition are not likely to be affected by the consideration of the influence of their conduct on the social standing of the profession to which they belong.

Reconstruction just now gets not very much attention, and excites little interest, the fact of the matter being that people in general wait for the administration of Grant to close up the business thoroughly and speedily, and hardly look for anything final till after November. They probably are not very much mistaken in this view. Still, some irrevocable things are doing now. Arkansas is already on her way to Washington with a ratified constitution and a demand for immediate admission to Congress. Some of the other States are not far behind her; and, from present appearances, some are not yet started on the road which Arkansas has almost entirely traversed. In spite of the earnest protest of General Schofield, backed by an array of indisputable facts which his official position has brought within his knowledge, and in spite of good advice from many leading Republicans of the Radical wing of the party, the Virginia Convention, under the guidance of its least instructed politicians, has put into the constitution a test of loyalty that will ensure the failure of ratification, will keep Virginia under military rule for some time to come, and will tend to put it under Conservative rule when military rule is over. Louisiana has, perhaps, ratified the new constitution, though full returns have not yet been received. In South Carolina, which voted last week, the result is not doubtful. As we write, Georgia is voting, and the indications are that Mr. Bullock (Radical) may have been successful. General Meade's late orders show how he has worked—and how hard he has had to work—to make a fair and peaceable election at all probable. Make it certain he could not, we imagine, with the force at his disposal. He begins by forbidding the opening of the ballot-boxes, or the counting of votes, or the giving of information about the progress of the election, until after the final closing of the polls. The polls being finally closed, two men of character, chosen by the managers from the opposite party, are to be admitted to witness the counting. The next order relates to the resignations of sheriffs of counties. Such resignations have recently been pouring in on him, the General declares, and they came on the eve of an important election, when there is not time enough to make new appointments. He declines, therefore, to accept them, and threatens punishment to sheriffs who do not faithfully continue in the performance of their duties. In the same order the intimidation of voters, of which complaints are said to be numerous, is forbidden, and fine or imprisonment is denounced against offending employers. Order No. 58 forbids the calling off of laborers from their work in order to attend political meetings; prohibits nocturnal assemblages of armed voters; and requires that notification of intent to hold political meetings shall be given either to the military or to the civil authorities. Arms, concealed or otherwise, are not to be carried or worn on the days of election. The officers of the Freedmen's Bureau are to instruct the freedmen as to their duties and rights. And, finally, it is ordered, as the General hears complaints that the registrars have stricken from the voting lists names of good legal voters, that all persons whose names have been stricken off during the last five days of revision shall be allowed to vote. Their ballots, however, are to be kept separate to be sent separately to headquarters, where the status of the votes shall be determined. Louisiana seems to be yet in doubt, and North Carolina is voting.

The news from England is mainly composed of divers small signs of the rising of the democratic tide. An effort which began thirty years ago to abolish flogging in the army, has at last been crowned with success. It was one of the indications and bulwarks of the aristocratic constitution of the military system. As long as it was kept up, men whom it would be a shame and scandal not to promote were not likely to enter the ranks, and the purchase system remained tolerably safe. Now that it is gone, the purchase system will probably not last another session, and the purchase system gone, the British army loses its time-honored privilege of being led by "gentlemen." In short, it will go into action under the same breed of men who led it at Naseby and Worcester. Another "old landmark," as the reporters say, has disappeared in the abolition of proxies by the House of Lords. The old gentlemen have grown frightened by the hubbub made last year about the small attendance of peers at their debates, and, with the view of infusing some life into their sessions, have deprived absentees of the privilege of commissioning others to vote for them. But the spirit of the Lords is clearly broken. The debate on the proxies was feeble to the verge of inanity; the amendment to the Mutiny Bill abolishing flogging, which, under the leadership of the "illustrious Duke"—the Commander-in-Chief—they would have thrown out with contempt twenty or even ten years ago, they have swallowed almost with a beggar's meekness. The awful shadow of the "Compound Householder" is upon them, and they are trying to make ready for him. The general impression in England seems to be that nothing but their consent to the creation of a large number of life peers will save them; but there can be little doubt that any such creation would tend before long to the abolition of the hereditary principle altogether.

The Disraeli Ministry obtained a breathing space after its late defeat by the intervention of the Easter holidays. What they will do on the reassembling of the House there is as yet no means of conjecturing; but, if we were to judge from the language both of the Premier and Lord Stanley during the debate, we should say they would try to stay in, and do whatever the majority wanted either about the Irish Church or anything else; in other words, play over again the game which was so successful in the case of the Reform bill. The House was so disgusted, however, with their performances in the debate on the Irish Church, that it is hardly likely this will be permitted. Lord Stanley made a complete failure. His arguments were not only weak, but the speech had been apparently written out beforehand in anticipation of points which Mr. Gladstone did not make—a fatal defect, of course, in a reply, and it gave such unmistakable evidence of readiness to surrender the Irish Church that the Tories were stricken with consternation, and listened in amazed silence. Mr. Disraeli's speech was hollow and rambling and feeble, and his whole manner a marked contrast to Gladstone's fire and enthusiasm. In fact, the "gentlemen of the press" will probably be furnished by Mr. Disraeli's career, before it is over, with as striking an illustration of the value of principle as of the value of pluck and cleverness.

The disputes between masters and workmen in England have taken a new turn, and rather a singular one, by the resort of the masters to a weapon hitherto untried, and, we imagine, unthought of. The workmen of the Springhead Spinning Company struck against a reduction of wages. The company tried to fill their places, but all their efforts were foiled by the posting of placards and publication of advertisements by the strikers, explaining the nature of the quarrel. The advertisements and placards were traced to two operatives named Riley and Butterworth; and the company, having obtained proof that they had prevented persons from entering their employment, have filed a bill in Chancery asking for an injunction restraining Riley and Butterworth from issuing any more placards or advertisements, and asking for damages for the loss already sustained. The Vice-Chancellor has accordingly granted a temporary injunction until the case can be heard. The bill contains the following verses on co-operation, extracted from the work-people's address, which are perhaps as good as are often heard at the Chancery bar:

"Man, poor and feeble when alone,
The sport of every passing wind,
In war, in trade, in art has shown
He's all-resistless when combined.

"If, then, when fear or interest plead,
Sustaining crowds together press,
Why may not social kindness lead
Mankind to join for happiness?"

THE EVIDENCE IN THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

There has probably been nothing about the impeachment process which has disappointed so many people as its being treated by the Senate as a judicial process. By many of those who were most earnest in advocating it, it was evidently regarded as a mere form, somewhat like an act of attainder, for giving effect to a determination at which the legislature had already arrived. The solemn manner in which they always spoke of the Senate as the "High Court of Impeachment" was not intended to impress people with the idea that the Senate was a court of justice, so much as with the idea that its decisions could not be questioned or overruled by any other tribunal; in other words, the object of the phrase was rather to magnify its authority than describe its nature. Everything that was said by these persons to or of the Senate, also, after the trial became certain, showed that they were as far as possible from regarding the senators as judges, or from wishing the public so to regard them. The conviction of the respondent was always spoken of as "a duty," and the "High Court" was told every day that it was a duty which the country would insist on having performed—a kind of talk which strongly suggested the inference that the impeachment was looked upon not even as a legislative process, but as one purely administrative.

What meaning those who were of this way of thinking attached to the attendance of the Chief-Justice, the examination of witnesses, the appearance of counsel, and the adoption of rules of procedure, we have never been able to ascertain, though we have read their speeches and articles pretty carefully. That they considered them mere forms, there is plenty of evidence; but we have never been able to make out why they did not deny their necessity, and insist on having them dispensed with. To maintain that the Senate ought to have its mind made up on the first day, and that the country ought to insist on its acting as if it had, and yet make no objection to the waste of time in listening to speeches and examining witnesses, was, to say the least, inconsistent; but it is an inconsistency which we can only explain by ascribing it to superstition. People who imagine that the adoption of bran-new constitutions will pacify and "regenerate" the South, might naturally suppose that there is some occult virtue in legal forms, and that Mr. Johnson could not have been got out of the White House, even by a judgment of the Senate, unless he had been heard by counsel. There is another explanation to which, however, as it is less charitable, we prefer not to resort, and that is that they took the mass of the people for fools, and imagined that outward signs of a judicial proceeding could be made to disguise effectually a merely legislative act.

We are glad to say the Senate has thoroughly disappointed them, as indeed from the outset we hoped it would. It has never shown the slightest forgetfulness of the real nature of the process or of the real nature of its own duties. It has treated the Chief-Justice not as a man of straw or bundle of clothes set up in the president's chair to impose on the vulgar by tawdry imitation of European forms, but as a real magistrate, brought from the most venerable bench in the world, to assist by his learning and experience in the deliberations of the greatest of criminal tribunals, during one of the most solemn and imposing of legal processes. It has examined witnesses and heard the speeches of counsel for the purpose of informing its judgment, and not for the purpose of amusing the timid or stupid with a caricature of a court of justice. It has respected at every stage not only the demands of abstract justice, but the great traditions of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence. As far as lookers-on can judge, the exciting contests of the last eighteen months have exercised as little influence on the Senate as human nature will permit such contests to leave on those who have borne part in them. Certainly there is no lawyer who has watched the proceedings but must have been proud of his profession, and proud of the training it gives, on seeing the lawyers in the Senate split, without reference to party ties, on nearly every question of procedure, hot Radicals like Mr. Sumner just as constantly lawyer-like as cool Conservatives like Mr. Fessenden; and it is only the constant spectacle of this impartiality and this devotion to legal rules which has opened the eyes of those who clamored for impeachment to its real nature.

The evidence is now, as we write, all in, and nothing remains of the proceeding but the summing up of counsel. We are bound to say, however, that we think the evidence sheds absolutely no light on the case; and, as we look back on it, one can hardly help concurring with the Enthusiasts, though for a different reason, in thinking that it might all have been dispensed with on both sides. The managers brought nothing to light; proved nothing that was not notorious. The defence also has proved nothing that was not already known, or that would not have been just as effective if mentioned by counsel in the course of a speech as if sworn to on the stand. It is safe to assert, too, that all the time spent in arguing on the admissibility of evidence, though not wasted, was not spent in furnishing materials for a decision. Nothing has really been shut out that anybody wanted to get in. The rules of evidence, on the application of which so much argument has been expended, are all based on the theory that whatever is shut out by the rules will be really kept from the knowledge of the jury, and, in ordinary cases, this theory has a real foundation in fact. It might have been borne out even in the present case had the "high crimes and misdemeanors" with which the President is charged been acts of private iniquity, now for the first time brought to light. The charges against him are, however, of such a nature that the attempt to apply to them the technical rules of evidence has occasionally been almost ludicrous, and always a little absurd. Some of the greatest fights between counsel have been over points of about as much practical importance as the admissibility of evidence of Andrew Johnson's residence in the White House. If, for instance, the managers had succeeded in excluding all evidence of the declarations by which his alleged illegal acts were accompanied, they might have given a striking illustration of their own skill and energy; but they would hardly have succeeded in withholding from the consideration of the Senate one iota that would be likely to influence its decision. The Senate does not need evidence to show it that Andrew Johnson talked like a high-minded constitutional patriot when he was planning the removal of Mr. Stanton; and no suppression of evidence will leave it under the impression that Stanton's removal was part of a dark conspiracy against the Government. So, also, as regards its late refusal to admit evidence of what passed at the cabinet meeting before Stanton's removal was resolved on. This is spoken of as a great triumph for the managers, and a heavy blow and great discouragement to the defence: and so, if the trial were a mere match between counsel in forensic skill, or if the Senate had never heard of Mr. Johnson or of Mr. Stanton till the articles of impeachment were filed, it might be so considered. But the fact is, the Senate knows, and has long known, perfectly well what passed at that cabinet meeting. Everybody now knows it. The mere proffer of the evidence was just as effectual for all practical purposes as its formal reception. It may, of course, be said that the Senate will not permit anything to influence it in finding its verdict but what has been sworn to in open court. But then senators are but men, and their powers of self-abstraction are, therefore, limited. We have as high an opinion as anybody of the capacity of the human mind, but it is not high enough to induce us to believe that there is a single senator in the body who, acting honestly, can shut out from his mental vision, in deliberating on this case, every circumstance of which no formal proof has been put in. That the court will allow itself to be influenced by irrelevant considerations we do not for a moment believe; but a great many things that are perfectly relevant have been excluded under purely technical rules. Mr. Sumner's proposal to admit everything was in reality a sensible attempt to adapt the rules of procedure to the facts of the case, and get rid of what everybody has felt all along was a sham.

Now, it was undoubtedly under the impression that there would be in the proceedings the same field that there is in trials before ordinary courts, in ordinary cases, for the display of dexterity in getting facts before the jury, and shutting them out from its sight, or in other words, keeping it in ignorance of them, that Mr. Butler was put amongst the managers. In this sort of work, and in that mixture of badinage and insolence and readiness by which juries are always entertained, and often deceived or hoodwinked, he is beyond question a master. His course during the trial has not belied his reputation. Few matches for him, and certainly no superior, are to be found in the records of the Old Bailey bar. But owing to the peculiarities of the present case, which make it as different as can well be even from most of the great impeachment cases of history, his peculiar talents have not only been useless, but have been well-nigh wasted. The managers begin to see now that he has kept nothing from the knowledge, and brought nothing to the knowledge, of the Senate, while his professional conduct has been such as has steadily, little by little and day by day, been disgusting the Senate, and, what is if possible worse, disgusting the public; and they are, if we are not mistaken, very near the conclusion that it would have been somewhat better if the case had remained in Mr. Wilson's hands from the beginning.

The fact is that the brunt of the battle has still to come. The senators are at this moment about as wise, and know about as much, as when the trial commenced. The only new light they have received has come from Mr. Curtis, whose lucid and powerful address, worthy in every way of the best days of forensic argumentation, was the first coherent presentation that had ever been made of the President's case, and for this reason was both valuable and important, whatever may have been its real force. In so far as their decision will be affected by what they hear at their bar, it will probably be by the summing up on both sides; and in this smartness and dexterity will count for nothing—weight, learning, and logic for much. In all these things we are bound to say the President's counsel can hardly fear comparison with their adversaries. The case of the people is, in fact, now where it ought to have been all along, in the hands of Messrs. Boutwell, Bingham, and Wilson. They have escaped one great danger by having their colleagues shut out from making speeches. They must have watched the movement to unseal the fountains of Messrs. Logan's and Stevens's eloquence with no ordinary anxiety; but this passed, we may doubtless look at their hands for a stronger and abler statement of the case for the prosecution than we have yet heard.

THE CONDITION OF FRANCE.

The state of France at the present moment is, on the whole, more interesting than it has been since 1847, and the present crisis in many particulars closely resembles that which preceded the overthrow of Louis Philippe, though there is of course not much likelihood of its terminating in the same way. The Mexican failure, the aggrandizement of Prussia, and the Luxembourg check, followed closely by an immense increase in the national armament, with a corresponding depression in business, has at last ended in great political uneasiness. All the news from France speaks of a general apprehension that something is going to happen—though nobody undertakes to say what the something will be. The overthrow of the actual government by force is not now talked of, or even thought possible, as it was so constantly from 1815 to 1851. "A descent into the streets" is something which nobody now looks for, and which nobody thinks likely to succeed. Moreover, Louis Napoleon enjoys a prodigious advantage over his predecessors, and particularly over the Republic of 1848, in the increased intelligence, good sense, and education of the working-men of all the large cities. The wild dreams which led to the horrible struggle of June, 1849, have almost entirely passed away. The working-men as a body have ceased to expect anything from the state except liberty, and are completely absorbed in the experiment of co-operation. The plan of a state organization of labor, state supply of popular loan banks, and all the rest of the machinery for the improvement of the condition of the working-classes, and their withdrawal from the operation of the law of competition, which formed so large a part of the fruits of the Revolution of 1848, have vanished like a mist. The great principle even, "To everybody according to his wants—from everybody according to his capacity," which was the watchword of the last Republic, is now no longer heard of. The experience which the co-operative associations have supplied, and are supplying, of the difficulties which human nature throws in the way of conducting any business on purely humanitarian principles, or of leaving it to each individual to fix the amount of the contribution he will make to the work of civilization, has proved to be of the highest political importance. It has, in fact, ruined the "social republic," and brought the working-men into closer political sympathy with the educated bourgeoisie than they have ever been before. Moreover, by diminishing the dread of the "Rouges," and of their theories about property, which so readily drove the shopkeeping bourgeoisie in 1851 into the arms of the dictator, it has robbed the Empire of one of its strongest supports.

Accordingly, we venture to say that, in spite of the restrictions on the press, there has not been since the Restoration so great an amount of good political writing—writing displaying the political sense, the restraint, the moderation, the appreciation of difficulties, which come from experience and reflection, as is to be found in the French newspapers and reviews of to-day. There has never been so little rhetoric, extravagance, and wild generalization; and the discussion of social problems to be found in the publications of the working-men, which, prior to 1848, were about as valuable as Andrew Jackson Davis's account of the "Summer Land," are now such as no political economist can pass over, and such as but very few can study without profit and instruction. Of course, in saying all this we are simply comparing Frenchmen with Frenchmen, and not with Americans or Englishmen or Hungarians. To complete the political education of a people the entire freedom of the press, the habit of listening to oral discussion and of local self-government, are absolutely necessary. Nothing else will give the patience and the capacity of waiting and trusting to the power of talk, and talk only, to accomplish what is wanted, and the distrust of all political panaceas—in which what is called "the political sense" may be said to consist, and this the French as yet have not. Let us say also, and we believe it can be said in perfect soberness, the history of the United States during the last ten years has powerfully aided the French in their political education, and done a great deal to render Imperial tutelage not only unnecessary but irksome. The mere spectacle of the impeachment, especially if it be followed by the deposition of the President, will perhaps exercise an influence on French political thought such as no other event of foreign politics has ever done, for France has, politically, hitherto learnt little or nothing from other nations. The only country she has ever made any attempt to copy has been England, but the difference in the constitution of English and French society has always made the attempt a failure.

The prevalent uneasiness now is revealed in various ways, and has made so much impression on the Government as to extract from the Emperor what is perhaps the weakest of all his appeals to the people—the pamphlet of which we spoke a fortnight ago, adding up the various majorities which the Napoleonic dynasty has received in the various "plebiscites" for which it has called. In the first place, the army bill which is now going into operation, and which is very oppressive, has excited riots of greater or less violence in most of the departments. There has, of course, been no difficulty in suppressing them; but then the grievance which excited them remains, and is sure to be felt a year hence more deeply than now, and is perhaps the only grievance which has seriously weakened the hold of the Empire on the peasantry. Along with the increase in the armament and the depression in business have come at last revelations about the increase in the national debt which has been made by the Imperial régime, which, strange as it may appear, have taken the public by surprise. A pamphlet giving the figures in full is running through edition after edition, and this is, of course, a form of attack against which the Government is powerless. It cannot prosecute a man for publishing the public accounts in a popular form, and it cannot produce any countervailing facts that would be likely to lessen the impression which the exposure makes. We gave the figures of this increase some weeks ago in the Nation. Moreover, the Emperor and his supporters in the legislature are at loggerheads. He is either sufficiently alarmed by the condition of the country or sufficiently satisfied of the wisdom of change, with reference to the more remote future, or sufficiently weakened in the nerves, to be desirous of making concessions to the liberals. His followers in both branches of the legislature are determined that he shall not, if they can help it. The Corps Législatif has just passed two bills of considerable importance, under strong ministerial pressure: one releasing the press from the arbitrary control of the Government, the provisions of which we have more than once explained already; and the other creating a limited right of holding meetings for political discussion during a short period before each election. The bills are now in the Senate, but there they seem to have stuck fast, for some unexplained reason. The truth seems to be, however, that the imperialists are making at last a firm stand against what they consider the Emperor's weakness, the senators refusing to go any farther, and the majority in the Corps Législatif demanding as the reward of their compliance in voting against their inclination that the Chamber shall be now dissolved, and a new election held, before the new laws come into force—that is, an election on which neither the proposed right of meeting nor the proposed freedom of the press shall be brought to bear. This proposition has been anxiously discussed at the Tuileries, but, at the date of the latest news, without any decision, the Emperor fearing the result of an appeal to the country during the prevalence of the existing discontents. The alternative proposed by the inner circle of the imperialists is said to be war, but whether with Russia or Prussia seems as yet undetermined. The seeds of a petty quarrel already exist in the Prussian controversy with Denmark, in which France is endeavoring to act as a mediator. There is also talk of a renewal of the demand for a "territorial compensation" on the Rhine, which Prussia so contemptuously rejected shortly after Sadowa. The probable ground of quarrel with Russia does not yet appear, but Russia seems to be slightly preferred as an antagonist, as, in a conflict with her, Austrian aid might be counted on with tolerable certainty.

The conclusion at which the French conservatives—that is, the clergy, the large landholders, and the old legitimists—are said to have arrived, is that there is nothing for France but a return to pure despotism like that of Louis XIV., and that the mixed system, half despotic, half constitutional, has proved a failure, and must be abandoned. The liberals, on the other hand—and under this term must be included in this matter a large body of supporters of the present dynasty—maintain that a people as intelligent and highly educated as the French cannot be governed by even as much despotism as is now brought into play, for the simple reason that no emperor, however able and enlightened, is equal to the burden of responsibility which results from failures and mishaps, and that if the dynasty is to be saved a ministry responsible to the people must be set up, to draw off from the throne the fire of popular indignation, and furnish by resignation or dismissal a ready and harmless mode of appeasing discontent. The amount of outspokenness which the discussion is producing is something extraordinary, and unless it should be all silenced for the present by war, which there is some reason to fear, cannot but produce before very long some serious results.

A PRECIOUS OPPORTUNITY.

For a nation which pretends to be civilized the United States has already a deplorably bad credit. Compared with the credit of England, France, Prussia, and most of the secondary states of Europe, the credit of the richest and most powerful of republics is humiliatingly low. It would be quite superfluous to quote the prices of the loans of these empires, monarchies, and aristocracies in comparison with the prices of the republican loans; the fact is patent and admitted on all hands. The primary cause of this condition of things is not far to seek. Educated Europe does not believe in republican honor. Looking down at its own laboring classes, it says: "Republican honor is practically nothing better than the honor of the majority of the common people. It is impossible that the masses of the people should have that delicate sense of honor which is the best possession of the enlightened few who in reality control European governments. All history is against such a supposition. The vulgar cannot comprehend the sanctity of a promise. Majorities under universal suffrage must always be vulgar." Following out this train of thought to its legitimate conclusion, educated Europe does not believe in the stability of republican institutions. Most European thinkers believe that the republic will go to pieces; some think the wreck will be complete without possibility of regeneration; others, more hopeful, look forward to the seizing of the fragments of the dishonored republic by the richer and more honorable classes of society. These views rest upon an axiom and a mere opinion: the axiom is this, that in the long run there is but one guaranty of the permanence of a government, namely, the pre-eminent public virtue of the governors—which failing, confusion and disastrous changes are inevitable; and the opinion is this, that where the majority of the male population are practically the governors, public virtue as embodied in legislation will certainly fall below the standard of the better classes of the community. When European capitalists lend money to the United States of America, they demand two or three times as much interest as they obtain from England or France, in order to compensate themselves for the greater risk they run in view of the untrustworthiness and uncertain tenure of the debtor. Even Chili, a little republic with a restricted suffrage, can hire money on better terms than the United States.

It is not to be denied that many educated Americans share these doubts, or at least are sometimes visited by horrible qualms of distrust, concerning the uprightness of popular majorities. History is uncomfortable reading on this subject. The bankruptcy of the first French republic, the fate of our own continental currency, the neglect of the French Spoliation Claims, the temporary repudiation of their just debts by several of the States of the Union, the recent payment in paper of the interest upon State loans contracted before the war (a fraud which only Massachusetts and the Pacific States are guiltless of)—these are indeed bad omens.

Under these circumstances, a providential opportunity is vouchsafed to the Republic. The question of paying the five-twenty bonds in coin or in paper is emphatically a question of honor. The word coin is not in the act; the strict legal obligation does not exist. But never was obligation more binding in honor. All the officers of the Treasury and spokesmen for the Government, including the spokesman of Congress on such subjects (the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means) believed and proclaimed that the loan was payable in gold. Such was the universal understanding of all buyers and sellers the country over. No man of honor who has once made himself acquainted with the history of the five-twenty loan can entertain a moment's doubt of the obligation to pay those bonds in coin. Honor never could pronounce more clearly, though the letter of the law fails. Here is a precious opportunity to assert by telling deeds the purity and inflexibility of republican honor. Let the nation insist upon the payment of these bonds in gold, and Lee's surrender was not a greater triumph for the cause of free government. Let the people consent to have their bonds dishonored, and the national disgrace will justly rejoice all enemies, foreign and domestic, of republican institutions.

The Government of the people of the United States, for and by the people, rests upon two broad foundations, constructed with infinite pains, and both essential: the traditions and practices of free government, gradually developed and transmitted from generation to generation through two hundred years, constitute one basis; the other basis is the average character of the people, growing, changing from day to day, inherited in part, and in part moulded by school and church, by public discussion, by the recognized rules of trade, and the reflex action of legislation. To undermine the public character by dishonorable public acts, justified by sophistical and demoralizing argumentation, is to make sure of the fall of the whole superstructure of government.

We do not propose to say a word upon the economic aspects of the subject, although nothing can be more fallacious than the expectation that dollars will be saved by destroying the credit of the Republic. Arguments on this aspect of the subject have their place, but it is a humble one. Questions as to who the bondholders may be, and what they had better do to defend their rights, are all of secondary importance. If all the five-twenty bonds were held by a single Liverpool blockade-running Jew, the honor and the true interest of the Republic would demand their payment in coin just as much as if they had been distributed among the widows and children of our fallen soldiers. To make the question one of dollars chiefly, though they were counted by hundreds of millions, is to belittle it. "Thus Esau despised his birthright." The vital question is, not whether the country shall save or spend a few millions of dollars more or less, but whether republican honor shall be polluted and shrivelled or purified and braced.

The public conscience would be less corrupted by impudent and defiant robbery of the national creditors than by the cowardly cheating which takes on a cloak of law and honesty. Propositions to force the holders of five-twenty bonds to exchange them for less productive property, are at the bottom as dishonorable as total repudiation of the debt. Promises cannot be kept more or less. A nation's word pledged in honor is either absolutely good or it is rotten. No specious phrases, fair appearances, or ingenious devices can deceive even the present generation, much less history. If the five-twenty bonds are paid in gold, the world will say: "The United States were honest when in great straits, true and honorable when tempted of the devil." If the five-twenty bonds are not paid in gold, the just verdict will be: "The great Republic was a cheat; see what comes of government by the people."

One of the arguments of the advocates of repudiation is so piously base as to deserve special mention; it is really worthy of Rachel and her subtle son Jacob, when they conspired to cheat blind Isaac and absent Esau. These tender guides of the people urge that the present generation has no right to entail upon their children a debt which no letter of law makes binding; that in the veritable interest of the children the fathers ought to take advantage of the absence of a strict legal obligation to pay their just debts. Are, then, the rules of public honor so unlike those of private uprightness? Is a fair name, of nation or individual, really to be weighed in the balance with dollars and cents? A father, who has conducted great enterprises and laid up much goods, dying, summons his numerous and hearty children about him, and thus addresses them: "My children, for love of you I have piously cheated much. I leave you a tarnished name; but you will be consoled. The encumbrances on your vast estates are five or six per cent. smaller than they would have been had I been honest." The free nation of to-day can prepare for its heirs no heritage so precious as an unspotted public honor; with this, all burdens will be bearable; without it, all other inheritances will be little worth.

The payment of the five-twenty bonds in paper promises, dishonored in advance, is not very likely to be made an immediate party issue. There is time for discussion, for consideration and reconsideration. No public question is so important, excepting only the question of keeping faith with the freedmen. The people need to be persuaded that it is not a question of mere money, but a question of national uprightness, whose final answer will either fearfully weaken or greatly solidify the foundations of all republican government. If the public honor proves to be purer and more sacred under monarchical or aristocratic forms of government than it is under republican, then monarchy or aristocracy is actually to be preferred to the republic, and those forms of government will ultimately prevail over the freer; for in the long run the loftier character will dominate the baser among nations as among individuals.

With time on their side, we have confidence in the power of the press, the pulpit, and the honorable men and women of the country to save the national honor. No snap-judgment is going to settle this question. We have not given our sons and brothers to the cause of free government that it should be so soon lost on a question of integrity in money matters. History will not say of the revolution through which the country has been passing since 1860—the Republic saved all, except its honor.

A FEW WORDS WITH THE "THOUGHTFUL TEETOTALLER."

THE "Thoughtful Teetotaller," the gentleman to whom Mr. Wendell Phillips addresses himself in the matter of General Grant's drunkenness, is not a person with whom on ordinary occasions we care to reason or remonstrate. Our object in addressing him now is simply to remind him, and those who arraign public men at his bar, that in enquiring into the truth or falsehood of charges of drunkenness, he must act under the control—we will not say of technical rules of evidence—but of the laws of the human mind, and in accordance with the established canons of induction. General Grant is now before him, brought there by the indefatigable pursuit of Wendell Phillips, and the case against him, as Wendell Phillips makes it out, is this: That there is a report abroad that General Grant has been seen at some period not mentioned, but certainly recent, "drunk in the streets of Washington;" that General Grant has not contradicted this rumor; and that William E. Dodge and Henry Wilson have not formally declared that they have not heard and do not believe it.

Now, we would warn the Thoughtful Teetotaller against convicting the General on this charge, for two reasons: one is, that General Grant's silence, in spite of Mr. Phillips's challenges to him to speak, is, for reasons the knowledge of which we should prefer, if we could, to confine to General Grant, Mr. Phillips, and ourselves, perfectly reconcilable with the theory of his entire innocence. Not only have charges on various occasions been made against Presidential candidates which they have never denied, and of which they were, nevertheless, entirely and notoriously guiltless, but things have on various occasions been said of public men by Mr. Phillips himself of which Mr. Phillips kept back the proof. Therefore, a rumor about a man may circulate, may be believed and supported by Wendell Phillips, and may meet with no denial from the man himself, and yet the Thoughtful Teetotaller may not be justified in crediting it. Let nobody say that this position of ours indicates hostility on our part to the temperance cause. It rests on the laws of the human mind, which we had no hand in framing and for the working of which we are not responsible. If they trouble either Mr. Phillips or the Thoughtful Teetotaller, let them not throw the blame on us.

We come now to the fact that Mr. William E. Dodge, the president of the National Temperance Association, has been at Washington, and comes back and says not that the rumor aforesaid is not true, or not that he has not heard it, but simply that, as a temperance man, "he is satisfied with General Grant." Now, it may seem at first blush that this has an ugly look for Grant; but from this, also, he, it seems to us, has the means of escaping. To make it fatal for him, it must be shown, first, that Mr. Dodge has heard the rumor; next, that he enquired into its truth; and next, that a law of nature obliges him to communicate in detail the result of his investigations to Mr. Phillips and the public. That there is no such law we infer from the fact that Mr. Dodge has, on various other occasions, passed over rumors which affected both Wendell Phillips and himself unpleasantly without making a public declaration of his sentiments thereupon. Mr. Dodge is, therefore, we conclude, a free agent in dealing with reports about street drunkards. He may speak out his mind about them or he may keep silent. He may satisfy Mr. Phillips or he may not; but if he does not, his neglect or refusal cannot logically conclude third parties. As we have said before, we are not responsible for this position. Favorable as it may appear to the secret consumption of ardent spirits by public men, the seeds of it are to be found in all elementary treatises on the art of reasoning, and not simply in our own brain.

There remains Senator Wilson's manner of dealing with the rumor. He says not that the rumor of drunkenness in the street is untrue, but that he has seen Grant exposed to various temptations, and has never seen him drink or give any signs of having drunk. To this Mr. Phillips replies that the rumor must be true because his (Mr. Phillips's) opinion of Senator Wilson is very bad, and he considers his rise to his present position "an alarming result of democratic institutions." Now, this is doubtless a plausible argument, but we feel bound to warn the Thoughtful Teetotaller that there is a fallacy in it. It proves too much. If it follows from Mr Phillips's bad opinion of Senator Wilson that a rumor that General Grant has been drunk in the streets is true, the same conclusion may be drawn with regard to anybody whom Mr. Wilson represents as sober, and whom Mr. Phillips considers a drunkard. The argument is this: There is a report that A. has been beastly drunk in the gutter; Henry Wilson, who has an interest in showing A. to be sober, does not deny the report, but says he has seen A. exposed to all kinds of temptations and has never seen him drink any intoxicating liquor; but Wendell Phillips considers Henry Wilson a bad man, and therefore A. must have been drunk in the gutter. There is nobody with whom Mr. Wilson is acquainted whose drunkenness might not be proved in the same way.

This brings us to a point to which we wish to draw the Thoughtful Teetotaller's careful attention. The proof which Mr. Wilson has offered of General Grant's sobriety is the only proof which can be offered of anybody's sobriety. This may seem a startling fact. The proclamation of it may be injurious to the young, but our duty is none the less clear. Out it must come. Human testimony in support of the temperance of any free man must be negative testimony. The only reason we have for believing that anybody has never been drunk in the streets is the strong improbability created by the fact that no trustworthy person has ever seen him in this situation, or that many trustworthy persons who have enjoyed frequent intercourse with him have never seen him drink at all or drink to excess. The only reason, for instance, we have for believing that Mr. Phillips is not frequently carried to bed in a helpless condition is that no credible witness has ever come forward and asserted that he had assisted at such a painful and humiliating spectacle, and that those who see Mr. Phillips frequently have never seen him indulge in wine, beer, spirits, or cider, bang or opium. No person in the enjoyment of his personal freedom is ever so closely watched that he can produce a person to swear that he has never on any occasion taken more than was good for him. Even the wife of a man's bosom cannot account for all his time night and day, or present more than negative proof that he has never been thrown into a ditch by over-indulgence. Therefore, when Henry Wilson says that he has never seen Grant drunk, though he has seen him frequently amongst drinkers and never seen any signs of drinking about him, he bears as strong testimony to his sobriety as any of Mr. Phillips's friends can bear to his. This is so clear that we trust it will be considered unnecessary to discuss the bearing on Grant's character of Mr. Phillips's poor opinion of Senator Wilson's character.

There is one other matter which the Thoughtful Teetotaller will do well to bear in mind. There is hardly a man of any prominence in public life who has not at one time or other been brought before him for drunkenness. During the next six or eight months, the number of such cases is likely, for obvious reasons, to be largely increased. From this ordeal, too, as we all know from experience, no abstinence, and no constitutional dislike to intoxicating drinks, will save anybody. Men such as General McDowell, who from their boyhood have completely abstained from all kinds of stimulants, even from tea and coffee, are nearly as much exposed to the charge of drunkenness as the teetotaller's bête noire the "Moderate Drinker." The reason of this is that the temperance people are now a powerful body in the country, and that a charge of drunkenness is always easy to make; whenever made, is likely to tell, and is, from its very nature, hard to refute. Moreover, it is readily believed, not simply because drunkenness is very common, but because it is a vice against which, inasmuch as it does not at once taint the general character, and is often found in company with great integrity as well as great genius, even good men are not always on their guard, and which the general public, for the same reason, is disposed to look at with indulgence. That it is, however, a great curse to society, and especially—for reasons which we have not the time to discuss here—a curse to American society, and that it is disgustingly prevalent in political and military circles, there is no denying. The result of this prevalence is that the zeal of a good many temperance people has, as is not uncommon in such cases, outrun their discretion, and developed amongst them a kind of monomania about drunkenness, which makes them care less about wounding or injuring the innocent than about bringing the guilty to justice. Many of those, too, who are most diligent in hunting drunkards down and bringing them before the Thoughtful Teetotaller for condemnation, are persons whom either nature or education has entirely unfitted for the examination of evidence of any kind, especially evidence in cases of drunkenness. They are apt to be either philanthropists who have most of their lives avoided drinking circles as they would a witches' feast, or women who have never been in drinking circles at all, and have no more practical acquaintance with the symptoms of drunkenness than with the symptoms of meningitis.

A curious illustration of the way in which their horror of this vice, combined with their ignorance of its phenomena, leads them to spread reports injurious to character, is well told in another column by a correspondent with whose name and reputation for accuracy our readers are very familiar. We publish it as a warning both to the Thoughtful Teetotaller and to the public at large. To the former it may prove especially useful, by suggesting that whatever support the temperance cause derives from the disgrace attaching to drunkenness, is likely to be lost if charges of drunkenness are made so carelessly and indiscriminately, and with so little foundation, that the Moderate Drinker gets into the habit of laughing at them. Whatever helps to make them a subject of derision undoubtedly destroys one of the strongest sanctions of sobriety. But then truth is better than temperance; slander is worse than drunkenness. Whenever a good character ceases to have any value, and the honest or temperate man holds his reputation at the mercy of any reckless reviler or excited enthusiast who chooses to assail it, it will very soon be a matter of indifference to the community what men drink, or how much they drink. After all, it is what comes out of the mouth, and not what goes into it, which defiles a man. The soul of the individual is killed just as readily by untruthfulness as by whiskey, and the soul of a nation, we suspect, more readily. When a people has ceased to respect and cherish private character as the very highest of its possessions, it matters little how many of its citizens pass their nights in the gutter.

We beg to add that we trust we shall not be told in reply to this article that in writing it we "practically place ourselves on the side of the drunkards." This is a euphemistic formula with which some people disguise the assertion, "You differ from me, and therefore you must have a sneaking tenderness for immorality." We are not on the side of the drunkards. We detest drunken politicians just as we detest ignorant ones. Whenever a candidate is accused of drunkenness, and proper evidence is produced in support of the charge, we think he ought to meet it or be cast aside. We think the shameless refusal of the Massachusetts Convention, which nominated Mr. N. P. Banks, to investigate a charge of this sort distinctly made against him, with place, dates, and circumstances, was one of the most discreditable incidents in the history of the Republican party. But the proof ought to be forthcoming before the charge is made. There is a worse offence against morals and government than even drunkenness, and that is availing yourself of a glib tongue, a ready pen, and a thick cuticle to spread rumors damaging to private character which you have no means of proving, and which you have never taken the trouble to investigate, and it is aggravated by the impudent assumption that your victim's silence, or the silence of his friends, supplies you with the needed justification of your assertions.

Correspondence.

THE GENESIS OF A RUMOR.

To the Editor of the Nation:

One day in the spring of 1863, Mr. Frederick Knapp and myself were guests of General Grant, at his headquarters, on a steamboat lying at Milliken's Bend, a few miles above Vicksburg. A curtain had been hung in such a way as to give a certain degree of seclusion to the after-part of the main cabin, and when we rose from dinner we were asked to sit with the General behind the screen, where there was a writing table with a pitcher and glasses. The General then told us that he had a few hours before received unfavorable intelligence from General Sherman's expedition up the Sunflower. Inviting our enquiries, and replying to all we thought it proper to make, with an unexpectedly generous freedom and painstaking thoroughness of explanation, he was gradually led into a comprehensive review of the existing conditions of his campaign, which it was easy to see were of the very gravest character. We were impressed as much by the remarkably methodical clearness of the narration as by the simple candor and ingenuousness with which it was given to us who, the day before, had been strangers to him. He took up several hypotheses and suggestions, and analyzed them in such a way as to make prominent the uncertainties and uncontrollable elements which were involved in them, and I could not but think, so musing and quietly reflective was his manner, and yet so exact and well-arranged his expressions, that he was simply repeating a process of "thinking it out," in order to assure himself that he fully comprehended and gave just weight to all the important elements of some grand military problem, the solution of which he was about to undertake.

(The last attempt to attack Vicksburg on the north ended that day, and a few hours after our interview the first step was taken looking toward the approach from the south; but of this no hint was given us, and we only heard of it the next morning.)

All at once he stopped short, and, with an expression of surprise, if not of distress, put his cigar away, rose, and moved his chair aside. A moment before we could not have imagined that there was a woman within many miles of us; but, turning my eyes, I saw one who had just parted the screen, comely, well-dressed, and with the air and manner of a gentlewoman. She had just arrived by a steamboat from Memphis, and came to present General Grant with a memorial or petition. In a few words she made known her purpose, and offered to give in detail certain facts, of which she stated that she was cognizant, bearing upon her object. The General stood listening to her in an attitude of the most deferential attention, his hand still upon his chair, which was half in front of him as he had turned to face her, and slightly nodding his head as an expression of assent at almost every sentence she uttered. When she had completed her statement, he said, speaking very low, and with an appearance of reluctance: "I shall be compelled to consult my medical director, and to obtain a report from him before I can meet your wishes. If agreeable to you, I will ask him to call upon you to-morrow; shall I say at eleven o'clock?" The lady bowed and withdrew; the General took a long breath, resumed his cigar and his seat, said that he was inclined to think her proposition a reasonable and humane one, and then went on with the interrupted review.

A week or two after this, having gone up the river, Mr. Knapp met this lady at a hotel, when, in the course of a conversation, she referred with much sadness to the deplorable habits of General Grant, and the hopelessness of success while our army was commanded by a man so unfit to be charged with any grave responsibility. Mr. Knapp replied that he had the best reason for stating that the reports to which she referred were without foundation, and proceeded to give her certain exact information of which he happened to be possessed, which, as far as possible, refuted them. "Unfortunately," said the lady, "I have certain knowledge that they are but too true." She then described her recent interview with General Grant, and it appeared that, from her point of view, the General was engaged in a carouse with one or two boon companions when she came unexpectedly upon him; that he rose to his feet with difficulty, could not stand without staggering, and was obliged to support himself with a chair; that he was evidently conscious that he was in an unfit condition to attend to business, and wanted to put her off till the next day; that his voice was thick, he spoke incoherently, and she was so much shocked that she was obliged to withdraw almost immediately. The next day, being ashamed to see her himself, he sent his doctor to find out what she wanted.

Mr. Knapp then told her that, having been one of the boon companions whom she had observed with the General on that occasion, and that having dined with him and been face to face with him for fully three hours, he not only knew that he was under the influence of no drink stronger than the unqualified mud of the Mississippi, but he could assure her that he had never seen a man who appeared to him more thoroughly sober and clear-headed than General Grant at the moment of her entrance.

Notwithstanding his assurances, the lady repeated that she could not doubt the evidence of her own senses, and I suppose that to this day Mr. Knapp and myself rank, equally with General Grant, in her mind as confirmed drunkards.

This experience is by no means a unique one, and the zealous devotion with which I have often heard both men and women undermining the character of others for temperance on equally slight grounds, has often led me to question if there are not vices in our society more destructive to sound judgment and honest courses than that of habitual overdrinking.

Yours respectfully,

FRED. LAW OLMSTED.

ITALIAN FINANCES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Your issue of 9th April contains an article, entitled the "National Debt of Europe," in which extended references are made to Italy, which, if allowed to pass unnoticed, would tend to depreciate her reputation for national honor and good faith towards her creditors. The publication of an article of this nature, in a journal of the character of your own, so usually well-informed on Italian matters, is calculated to do great injustice to my country as well as to those of my fellow-countrymen here who, like myself, give much attention to the tone of American opinion in regard to the political and financial development of Italy. I therefore hope you will allow me sufficient space in your esteemed paper to correct the errors of the article in question.

Among other remarks not pertinent to the present purpose, you say:

"We are now, however, enabled to state, for the consolation of the repudiators, that it seems likely that Austria and Italy will before long, to use General Butler's elegant phrase, take all seeming or actual wrong from their debt by clapping a heavy income tax on the interest paid to the public creditors. We cannot say that either of these powers stands high amongst the nations of the world. . . . Italy, too, has not much to boast of as a nation either in the past or present. It has struggled into independence by foreign aid, and thus far has not shown its ability to hold single-handed against any of its neighbors, and is beset by internal difficulties such as most other countries have taken centuries to overcome, and which it would certainly not reflect any great discredit on Italian statesmen to be foiled by. . . . The thing is a flagrant breach of faith, for the simple reason that its creditors are nearly all foreigners." . . .

I do not propose to take the advantage of your kindness to argue upon the standing of Italy among the nations of the world; nor do I intend to force upon you my opinions as to whether my country has or has not much to boast of in the past or present. It is sufficient to know that she occupies a somewhat prominent place in the great history of human events, and to impartial history we may leave the judgment as to the importance of her position; neither is it becoming in an American citizen to reproach another country for struggling into independence by foreign aid. The United States, to her credit be it said, has never publicly repudiated her obligations to those friends who assisted her in her struggle for independence, nor has the fact of such aid detracted from the honor justly paid to the memory of her own people who were then engaged in the effort to establish what has since proved to be the model government of the world.

That Italy, however, is now beset by internal difficulties, the speedy overcoming of which is obstructed by this same "foreign aid," it were useless to deny; but, inspired by the spectacle lately exhibited by the people of this country in the suppression of the intensest internal dissensions that ever agitated any nation, I do not despair of the final triumph of liberty in Italy, having confidence that the ability of her statesmen and the patriotism of the people will eventually give her a place among the nations of the world second only to the acknowledged champion of human rights.

My main purpose, however, in now addressing you, is to inform you and the many readers of the Nation that the repudiators have no cause for consolation so far as Italy is concerned, for she neither proposes to swindle nor cheat her foreign creditors. What our Parliament intend doing is to demand of the people of Italy alone a further sacrifice as a proof of their good faith towards their foreign creditors; and this intent may be best expressed by quoting the words of Count Cambray-Digny, the Finance Minister of Italy, at the sitting of Parliament, March 25:

"It is just and according to law, to apply the income tax to the interest on bonds owned by Italian citizens; but it is not just or according to law to apply it to the interest of bonds which are owned by foreigners, because they are in a situation quite different. Out of 328 millions of lire of interest that we pay, but 28 millions suffer the income tax. By the working of this bill I am confident of augmenting our revenue eight millions."

It is hardly necessary to point out the difference between your version of this matter, as expressed in your journal of April 9, and that of the Finance Minister above quoted; and I am sure, from the previous manifestations of interest taken by you in Italian affairs, you will not hesitate to give place to the correction of an error which has unquestionably arisen from the want of proper information on the subject.

I have the honor, sir, to be your most obedient servant,

GRASSI.

NEW YORK, April 10, 1868.

[We spoke, of course, of the Kingdom of Italy. We are not so foolish or ignorant as to assert that the Italians have "nothing to boast of in the past." It still remains to be seen whether Count Cambray-Digny can enforce his views.—ED. NATION.]

LITERARY.

"LIFE in the Argentine Republic in the days of the Tyrants; or, Civilization and Barbarism," is the title of a work by Colonel, and Minister Plenipotentiary, Sarmiento, which will be published by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. It is translated from the Spanish by Mrs. Mary Mann, who also furnishes a biographical sketch of the author.——A. Roman & Co. announce a new novel, "Aldeane," by Laura Preston, and "Going to Jericho; or, Sketches of Travel in Spain and the East," by John F. Swift.——T. B. Peterson & Co. announce a translation of Dumas's "Count of Moret; or, Richelieu and his Rivals;" a translation by W. W. Thomas, Jr., of a Swedish novel, "The Last Athenian," by Victor Rydberg; and a new book, by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, entitled "Doubly False."——"Lake George: Its Scenes and Characteristics, with Glimpses of the Olden Time," by B. F. De Costa, is announced by A. D. F. Randolph.——Messrs. Eldridge & Brother, of Philadelphia, have in press a work which will be issued in about a month, entitled "In the School-Room; or, Chapters on the Philosophy of Teaching," by Professor Hart, of the New Jersey State Normal School.

—The Bopp Library, to whose approaching sale we called attention a few weeks since, has been secured for the Cornell University, and will give that young institution, in the department of comparative philology, an advantage over many of our long-established libraries. The Prussian Government acknowledges its lasting indebtedness to the great philologist, and atones in a measure for its want of liberality toward him while living by a pension of five hundred thalers to his widow. It was, in fact, as we are informed, partly his modesty and uncomplaining reticence that caused the seeming injustice of the Government toward him in making insufficient provision for the wants of his declining years. But the scale on which support and encouragement are everywhere in Germany doled out to men of science and literature is shamefully niggardly. It would, we doubt not, astonish and horrify our readers to learn what pittances are paid there to some of the men whose reputations are among the chief glories of their respective states.

—Carl Knortz communicates to the Michigan Journal a highly interesting sketch of the life of Father (Friedrich) Baraga, Bishop of Marquette, who died at that place on the 23d of January. This good man and scholar was born June 29, 1797, in the Austrian province of Krain (Carniola), of wealthy parents. In his ninth year he was sent to the Gymnasium at the ancient city of Laybach, where, besides the classics, he studied also with diligence and remarkable success German, French, and Italian, and cultivated his mother-tongue, the Slavonian, so far as to compose in it. The years 1816–1821 he spent at the University of Vienna, and to gratify his parents made a thorough study of the law; but immediately afterwards he devoted himself to the more congenial study of theology, and on the 21st September, 1828, was elected priest. Earnestly desiring to preach the Gospel to the poor, he did so to two congregations in his native place for seven years, and in this time published his Slavonian writings, which have taken great hold on the people of Krain. In January, 1831, Baraga came to America, and passed the spring of that year in Cincinnati, performing his spiritual functions. As a missionary to the Indians he labored in the Lake regions uncessingly from the date last-mentioned to his death, and is said to have baptized (half-breeds included) about three thousand Ottawa and Ojibway Indians. Before leaving Europe he had divided all his property, save a small annuity, among his relations, and in his new position he thoroughly adapted himself to the Indian mode of life, hardening himself to exposure and dispensing with all luxuries; nor did he make any change in his living when he was appointed Bishop of Marquette and Sault St. Marie. With a single exception, at every station he was a pioneer, and even at La Pointe every trace of the once active Jesuit Mission had disappeared before his arrival. When the copper mines of Upper Michigan were opened in 1844 he made the round of them at great risk to satisfy the religious wants of the miners. Often he would preach in one day in four languages—German, French, English, and the Ojibway; he could speak seven with fluency. Thus his reputation grew immensely in those parts, and he was welcome to the captains of vessels and an object of superstitious reverence to the Indians. The following is a list of his works while among them: 1. Anamie-Masinaigan, a prayer-book in the Ojibway language, with an appendix of songs and a catechism. Many editions of this were published, and the work was finally stereotyped. Baraga also published a version of it in the Ottawa dialect, which ran through several editions. 2. Gagikwe-Masinaigan. Excerpts from the Old and New Testaments, containing chiefly Epistles and Gospels for Sundays and holydays. The last edition was published in Cincinnati (Heman). This too appeared in the Ottawa dialect. 3. Nanagatawendamowinan. A complete exposition of Christian doctrine. 4. Kagige Debwewinam. "Some Truths:" a book of meditations, consisting of short sermons. 5. A Theoretical and Practical Grammar of the Otchipwe Language. Pp. 576. Published in Detroit by Jabez Fox. 6. A Dictionary of the Otchipwe Language, Explained in English. This language is spoken by the Chippewa Indians, as also by the Ottawas, Potawatamies, and Algonkins, with but slight differences. For the use of Missionaries, etc. Cincinnati: Jos. E. Heman; 1853; 12mo, pp. vii., 662. Nos. 5 and 6 are the most important works of Baraga, and are a highly valuable contribution to comparative philology. They surpass similar undertakings by English observers in employing the precise scientific notation which the Continental savans are agreed in using for aboriginal languages, in default of which such works as George Gibbs's vocabulary of Californian dialects, the "Chinook" Dictionary, and Schoolcraft's collections lose a great part of their worth. Unfortunately, just as the Smithsonian Institution was preparing to reprint them with the author's revision, he has passed away, having been stricken down at the time of the Baltimore Council in 1866 and having since lingered in great debility till now. The republication, however, will not be given over, but the revision will be confided to Mr. John Chebul, Bayfield, Wisconsin, "well known," as Mr. Knortz states, "as the most thorough living scholar in the Ojibway language."

—"Some writers of note," says Mr. John Torrey Morse in his North American Review article on "Expatriation and Naturalization," "have interpreted as corresponding to our own the French law relative to the claims of France upon Frenchmen who have become naturalized American citizens. Mr. Morse expresses an opinion adverse to this interpretation. The French law seems to him, he says, to impose a species of penalty on the French subject for having expatriated himself—become a renegade; it takes from him the right to demand the protection of the country of his birth, and remands him for aid and countenance in trouble to the country with which he has chosen to cast in his lot. But while thus taking from him his character as a French citizen, France does not, by the law in question, as Mr. Morse construes it, forego her rights in his case should he ever return to his native country; he is then to be held to all the duties of a French citizen, and even he may think himself lucky if he receives no specific punishment for his act of renunciation. This view of the French law is borne out by a decision just rendered by the Military Tribunal of Bordeaux. A young Frenchman, twenty-seven years of age, left France for this country ten years ago. He made a fortune, became naturalized, and is at the present moment, says the Pall Mall Gazette, at the head of a large commercial house in New Orleans. On the death of his father he was obliged to make a visit to France for the purpose of settling certain family affairs, and was there arrested as a deserter, having, during his residence in America, been drawn as a conscript. It is not stated whether, at the very time of his having been drawn, he was an American citizen or not. The court gave him the light sentence of imprisonment for six days.

—It is well known, or it may be well learned, if one will diligently peruse the Conservative English reviews of twenty and thirty years ago, that we have never had any real eloquence in this country. How should we?—when in "that travesty of the Imperial Parliament," the Yankee Congress, the fatal custom obtains of elaborately preparing speeches beforehand instead of trusting for manly, flexible eloquence to the inspiration of the occasion—as most of the greatest orators, by the way, have not done at any time. Perhaps it is not very profitable to revive these little recollections. Perhaps it is as well, first as last, to concede cheerfully that we do "possess, in common with us, a Chaucer, a Shakespeare, and a Milton." But perhaps, again, it is not altogether unprofitable to just mention old affairs. Our English friends have not yet wholly made an end of "sitting down on us;" and that truly noble revenge we are taking for the contumeliousness of the Britisher, that Americanizing of him which we are engaged in, is inevitably coming, of course, but it comes a little slowly, and meantime it comforts the natural man to take certain small revenges whenever it happens that he can get at them. We confess it, we feel great delight and triumph whenever we see our British relative "in what Jonathan calls 'a fix.'" But the particular fact which led us to recall the memories of the Monthly and Quarterly Past, as Bulwer would say—himself a speaker of written speeches—is this: Lord Stanley, of the historic Stanleys, from his place "in the greatest deliberative assembly that the world has ever seen," has been delivering, more Americano, an elaborate oration which he had written out and learned by heart, quite in the manner of a "member for Buncombe." He came down to the House of Commons ready primed with this reprehensible document, supposing that he knew what Mr. Gladstone would say in regard to the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. Unfortunately, Mr. Gladstone's resolutions were anything but vague and general, and his speech as far as possible from being violent. So Lord Stanley's reply forcibly reminded Mr. Lowe of those guns in the Bosphorus, built in the wall, which will blow a vessel into the air if it will only get precisely in front of them, but which otherwise hit nothing. Seriously, this affair has been unfortunate for Lord Stanley's reputation, which has declined greatly since Mr. Disraeli has partly had charge of it.

—"At present large towns grow up because of the facilities they offer mankind for a voluntary exchange of service in the form of merchandise; but nearly all the older European towns of importance, from which we have received the fashion of our present street arrangements, were formed either to strengthen or to resist a purpose involving the destruction of life and the plunder of merchandise." These sentences are in the opening part of one of the most readable little treatises in the nature of an official report that we have seen. It is a report presented by the architects to the Commissioners of the new park in Brooklyn. The Commissioners in the outset of their labors felt the necessity of securing better approaches leading from the more thickly populated districts of the city to the park, and called on Messrs. Olmsted, Vaux & Company for suggestions as to the best method of meeting the difficulty. They got by way of answer what may be called a philosophical sketch of the general history of the street from the Middle Ages till now, accompanied by a plan, much more extensive, probably, than they were expecting, for the laying out of the desired roads. The report describes three stages in the history of street arrangements. First, in order of time, were the narrow foot-ways between the ill-ordered houses of walled towns—towns that really were fortresses, and which it was therefore desirable to keep as small as possible. At this period any highways deserving a better name than foot-paths were for purposes of defence. Such, for example, were the comparatively straight and broad roads which in old Paris led across the city, and by which was effected the rapid transfer of reinforcements from one part of the fortifications to another. And towards the close of the first period the powerful began to build strongholds, and later, in more peaceful times, the rich to build villas just outside the cities, and to these the trader, with his pack on his mule's back or his own, brought the few articles of consumption which the owner of the villa or the stronghold needed and did not himself produce. At this same time the poor, who had, so to speak, overflowed the city walls, built their dwellings in the suburbs, and, of course, built them on the plan with which the architecture of cities had made them familiar. In the second stage of road-development, wagons took the place of pack trains, but the streets were not materially enlarged, and so far from being improved, became much worse. The writers of this report refer to the fact that so late as the time of George the Third bundles of fagots had to be laid in the streets through which his state carriage passed on its way from the palace to Westminster. The foot passenger in any of the capitals of Europe was really in constant danger when he ventured into the filthy, ill-paved, narrow streets. His discomforts in London are immortal in the most readable—except his "Shepherd's Week"—of Gay's poems, "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets." To this period belong the lines of posts set at intervals a little way from the houses to prevent the pedestrian from being crushed, and, we believe, the raised walk in the middle of the way. In the third period traffic demands room for streams of vehicles, and we have the middle walk split into two and carried back with its curbstone to the place of the posts. The report shows how slow and how unnecessarily expensive was the change from the early arrangement of streets to the present, and presents the reasons, drawn from many considerations, for abandoning entirely the old theory of towns and town life, and for henceforth working intelligently in accordance with the new conditions. The essay ought to be scattered broadcast. The American of to-day may be called the greatest builder of towns the world has ever seen—or might be if he would build well; and this report ought to be the cause why future generations should bless the names of hundreds of selectmen between here and California.

—We have just received the first volume, issued since the beginning of the year, of the Memoirs put forth by the Linguistic Society of Paris. This is a new society, founded but two or three years ago, but numbering among its fourscore members some whose names are well known all over the world. Its organization presents one peculiar feature. By its constitution, it "admits no communication concerning either the origin of language or the creation of a universal language." Here, it seems to us, is a very odd confusion of two wholly heterogeneous matters under a common condemnation. That an association formed for the historical and scientific study of the varying tongues of men should decline to take any part in the attempt—fairly to be qualified as utopian, if not worse—to supersede them all by a new fabrication, is natural and defensible enough; but what should justify such an association in setting an arbitrary limit to its researches among the past phases of human speech by declaring that it will allow no account to be taken of the earliest phase, is more than we can discover. We wonder with what feelings its president for 1867 conducted its deliberations—M. Renan, whose eloquent and spirituel volume, "Of the Origin of Language," has deservedly passed through several editions in France. Must not his face have tingled a little, as if gently slapped by his colleagues, at each meeting? There can be no denying that the origin of language is a perfectly legitimate scientific question, and one which even thrusts itself upon the attention of every profound linguistic student. It is, to be sure, also a greatly contested one; there is a right and fruitful method of approaching it, and there are many wrong ones, resulting in nothing but windy debate; a vast deal of trash and nonsense has been and is written upon it; but this is because it has most often fallen into the hands of men possessing insufficient linguistic knowledge and training—men who were in gross error touching the history and nature of speech. We should, then, expect of a Parisian "Société de Linguistique" that it would do all in its power to remedy this unfortunate condition of affairs by setting an example of discussion on the right basis and in the right spirit. Can it not trust its own members to avoid vain babblings, or itself to put them down if offered? Or since when has it been the way with French men of science to blink important questions for the sake of peace, harmony, and orthodoxy? So Darwinism is a subject which is setting another class of students by the ears, and calling out floods of nonsense from ignorant assailants and presumptuous defenders; but who would not regard the zoölogical society as stultifying itself which should, by its fundamental law, rigorously exclude from its deliberations the question of the origin of species? The volume of Memoirs (containing somewhat less than a hundred closely printed royal octavo pages) is made up of half-a-dozen articles, of high character and value. Two of them are of a more general interest; the first, by the veteran Egger, discusses the present condition of the modern Greek, and points out the inconcinnity and futility of the attempt now making by a certain party to bring it back to conformity with the ancient classical standards, or to convert it from modern Greek into ancient Greek; the other, by Bréal, one of the soundest and most esteemed of the younger philologists of France, treats of the "Progress of Comparative Grammar," and is a careful and suggestive exposition of the errors into which students in this branch are liable to fall. The rest deal with matters of detail in etymology and the comparative study of language.

—We had been thinking that the days were gone when any one would venture on that line of sarcastic remark, so common once, which kept authors in their proper place by allusions to Grub Street duns and so on. But even the deadest of jokes it is next to impossible to bury, and we find in a recent English publication a revival of the old gibe that so constantly recurs in the literature of a hundred years ago, and the constant recurrence of which has much to do with a disagreeable impression which that literature produces on its readers—a general impression of sordidness and wretchedness, such as the literature of almost no other period produces in anything like the same degree. The joke is not worth repeating. What called it forth was the statement, made at the annual meeting of the corporation known as the Royal Literary Fund, of the number of persons to whom grants were made during the year 1867. There were forty-three in all, of whom what seems an undue number, sixteen, were women. Seven recipients were writers of tales or essays; six were poets; six were classified under the head of historians and biographers; and there were six writers upon science and art; five were writers upon topography and travel; four were writers on classical literature and educational subjects; two were dramatists; and two are described as writers for periodicals—writers of rejected communications, these latter, we suppose; one was a medical writer, one a writer on law, and under the head of Biblical Literature there is also only one. The sums given ranged from ten pounds to a hundred, and some of the recipients were relieved for the tenth time. Most, however, last year received aid for the first time.

—Mr. Joseph Parkes, the collector of Juniana, died almost too soon for complete happiness. "Der Statthalter von Bengalen" is a German drama, just published in print though long on the stage, which deals in an ingenious and amusing manner with the famous anonymous letter-writer. In the year 1770, the play informs the audience, the political world of England was thrown into a state of extreme agitation by certain communications that appeared in the Public Advertiser, a journal in the hands of a sturdy, independent Briton named Woodfall. Just at the same time the governor-generalship of Bengal was to be filled, and the three prominent candidates for the office were Sir Richard Blunt, betrothed to Junia, niece of the Duke of Grafton; Lord Adolphus Waterford, married to Sarah, sister of the duke; and Sir Philip Francis, beloved by Junia, and also by the improper Lady Waterford, whose husband, Lord Adolphus, was a very feeble-minded specimen of an effete aristocrat and is the comic character of Herr Heinrich Laube's play. It is represented, however, that he wants the governor-generalship, but is justly diffident of his ability to pass the severe oral and written competitive examination which all candidates for that office must be prepared to undergo. For the written examination he provides by hiring Henry Summer, Sir Philip's secretary, to write him an Essay on the True Mode of Governing Bengal. But Henry Summer is in love with Esther Sackville, and desires the success of Sir Philip, who, he hopes, will then take him and Esther to India; so he fills Lord Adolphus's essay with the most nefarious sentiments, sentiments extremely odious to the wise and moderate "Lord William Chatham"—the elder Pitt—who is one of the examiners. The Duke of Grafton is in great indignation on account of the Advertiser letters, and in the council-chambers avers that he will surely bring the writer to the gallows. Chatham reminds him, however, that trial by jury is the palladium of British liberty, and that only a judicial tribunal can put the British subject to death. Thereupon the duke calls to himself three gentlemen of the press—Swinney, Shoking, and Sweep—and, promising to give them large sums of money, urges them to the discovery of his libeller. Swinney thinks Sir Philip Francis is probably connected with the attacks, and hopes by the expenditure of a thousand pounds to procure part of the manuscript of the next letter. This he does. But, before he does it, Shoking comes with part of a letter already published in the Advertiser. It is seen to be in the handwriting of Lord Adolphus's essay, and that wretched nobleman, threatened with the terrors of the law and with a separation from his wife, the offended duke's sister, finds himself in a bad enough scrape. But now comes Swinney with another bit of manuscript, in quite a new hand. It seems, more certainly than Shoking's, a veritable "Junius," for the duke has it some time before it appears in print, and it appears in print exactly as written. Lady Waterford, however, has got hold of a love-letter written by Henry Summer to Esther, and, seeing that Shoking's manuscript and the billet-doux are in the same hand, she feels sure that this Henry, who has constantly professed entire ignorance of the art of penmanship, is employed by Sir Philip to copy the Junius letters for the printer. She holds her tongue though, intending by-and-by to let Sir Philip know that he is in her power, and to extort his love. Meantime the competitive examination is over. Lord Adolphus has broken down very badly in the oral, Sir Richard Blunt has done but poorly, and Sir Philip, whose love affair has come to an unfortunate termination, and who has resolved to live for his country alone, has been completely victorious; having not only sketched a noble scheme for the government of Bengal, but thrown in besides a prophecy of our Revolutionary War. Lady Sarah and her passion would doubtless have made much trouble, but the play was not to be a tragedy, and just in the nick of time the Grafton Ministry falls from power, and Sir Philip goes out as governor-general—Warren Hastings and history to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW.*

WISE Catholics, we imagine, would be glad to obliterate much of the history of the sixteenth century—not that of the Reformation, but of the attempts to suppress it. What was gained by the burnings and torturings, the assassinations and the massacres instigated or sanctioned by popes and prelates, perpetrated by zealous princes, a fanatical clergy, and an unchained rabble? As a means of re-establishing the shattered supremacy of Rome and restoring the unity of Christendom, these acts were worse than fruitless. Considered simply as defensive measures, they are now seen to have been superfluous. The mere existence of the Church as a religious institution might have been, and was in fact, preserved by other means. Its vitality was greatly strengthened through the effect of the attack it was called upon to repel. But for the Reformation—had Tetzel triumphed and Luther succumbed—the corruption which had given occasion for the schism would have gone on until regeneration would have been impossible. As it was, the Church, roused by its peril, gathered up its waning strength, reformed its discipline, manifested something of its old energy, and thereby gained a new lease of life. Grounded in antiquity, panoplied with logic, interfused with the spirit of many generations of saints, mystics, and martyrs, it proved, and still continues to prove, that, in the power to touch every chord, to satisfy every craving of the religious sentiment, it has no rival. Its only foe is the human understanding—the common enemy of all creeds, more hostile doubtless, yet far less dangerous, to Catholicism than to other forms of belief which offer it a vantage ground and invite its approaches. Rationalism eats into the heart of many religious systems; it only wears away the edges—slowly diminishing the bulk without at all affecting the substance—of Catholicism.

It was, however, natural that the Church, assailed in a period of degeneracy, should have immediate recourse to the weapons which the authority it had so long wielded over governments and nations, as well as individuals, placed at its command. The decree went forth. Princes were to drive back their erring subjects into the fold; erring princes were to be dethroned by their subjects; states that continued faithful were to join in reducing rebellious states to obedience; persecutions, civil discords, universal war, were the agencies through which the world was to be reconverted to the true faith.

Where heresy had broken out only in isolated spots, the simple remedy of exterminating the heretics was generally feasible. In Spain, for example, a slight cauterization sufficed, the patient being recumbent and quiescent, the operators skilful and unflinching, the apparatus and instruments absolutely perfect. But in cases where the application was less timely, a succession of frightful scenes ensued—desperate struggles, treacherous coaxings, wild gashes inflicted by a nerveless hand. Such was especially the state of things in France, where Protestantism did not, as in parts of Germany, seize upon the mass of the community, nor obtain the control of the government, as in England, but where the efforts for its suppression were thwarted by a variety of causes, two, we think, being chief.

One was the legal spirit that swayed the parliaments and the states—those bodies which made France not indeed a constitutional monarchy in the modern sense of the term, but yet a country governed, in the main, by well-established principles and under settled forms of law. The jurists of France had no love of popular liberty and no sympathy with free opinion. They were opposed to toleration, chiefly because an organized Church disconnected from the state seemed to them dangerous to the authority of the state—an imperium in imperio. But they were equally jealous, and on the same grounds, of the encroachments of Rome. They were bent upon maintaining the rights of the Gallican Church as independent except in matters of faith, and upon confining the ecclesiastical authority at home within due limits. Hence they refused to accept the Inquisition, or aid of any kind, in enforcing submission—that would have been derogatory to the rights of the crown or subversive of the regular tribunals and forms of procedure.

The other great impediment lay in the activity of the French intellect, which, whatever its deficiencies or its excesses, makes it impossible for the nation to be kept in a state of torpor. Whatever there was of genius in France, instead of soaring into the region of the pure imagination, busied itself with the questions of the day both in their abstract and practical aspects; and hence in all ranks of society there was constant enquiry, discussion, and agitation, often favorable to Protestantism, always adverse to the claims of the Church.

Hampered by these and by many minor difficulties, the Government was unable to keep up a steady prosecution of the work. It acted by fits and starts, was now cruel and now indulgent. After a short season of sanguinary zeal, it relaxed its hand, opened the prison doors, and winked at the violation of its bloody edicts. At length, however, under the guidance of the Guises, it was determined to abandon half-way measures and bring the matter to a swift conclusion. The Huguenots, on their side, saw that the time for patient endurance had passed, that henceforth their only hope lay in armed resistance. They were numerically weak, and they were scattered through all the provinces. But, though generally defeated in the field, they showed such a power of surviving defeat that the Government, gaining little by its victories, gave up the attempt and retraced its steps. Toleration, within certain limits, was conceded, and a general pacification proclaimed.

It was, however, clear that the dominant party were only temporizing, and that the Protestants had no sufficient security for the observance of the treaty. How was security to be obtained? Only by gaining influence in the royal counsels, instilling a new spirit into the government and reversing its policy. The Huguenots had for their leader the best soldier, the ablest statesman, the purest patriot, and, despite his forced rebellion, the most loyal subject in France. With such a guide the country might hope to enter on a new career. With such a servant the young king—whose natural instincts, as far as they pierced through the mists of a diseased constitution and a depraved training, appeared to be noble, and whose choice had hitherto lain between the wily policy of his Italian mother and the violent domination of the Guises—might look forward to a reign distinguished by other triumphs than those of faction.

The policy proposed by Coligny and accepted by Charles was one that appealed to the nation at large. Dispassionate observers had long been of opinion that the contending parties might be reconciled to the extent of living together in peace and ceasing to hate each other as idolaters and unbelievers, if they could be engaged in a common enterprise which would lead them to remember that they were all Frenchmen. What the enterprise should be needed no deliberation. The civil wars had merely suspended the long rivalry with Spain, in which France had been stripped of territories and degraded from its place as the foremost power in Christendom. The moment was most propitious for renewing the struggle. England, which, in the last contest had been the ally of Spain, was now ready to become the ally of France. The Netherlands, which had furnished their Spanish rulers with a base of operations and ample resources, were now ripe for revolt. A league with Elizabeth and the Prince of Orange would ensure the recovery by France of Flanders and Artois, the liberation of the Netherlands at a single blow, the overthrow of Spanish dominion on a foreign soil and of Spanish influence in foreign courts, and—if not as the direct object, yet as a necessary corollary—the triumph of Protestantism in Europe.

The triumph of Protestantism—herein lay the obstacle to the prosecution of such a scheme. The clergy of Paris denounced the war with Spain as, under the circumstances, a crusade in behalf of heresy. The Catholics, Guise and his adherents, had been forced aside, but they waited only for an opportunity to intervene. Yet it is doubtful whether, if the interests of the Church alone had been involved, the plans of its enemies would have come to naught. Purely personal motives have, in many crises of history, a decisive influence. The queen-mother, with principles as pliant as her character was domineering, would apparently have been willing to exert in the interests of the Protestant party that ascendency over her son which she had hitherto exerted in the interests of the Catholic party. But she soon perceived that Coligny was seeking not to use, but to undermine her influence. His aims and her agency were in truth irreconcilable. If his power were firmly established she must become a nullity. He was, therefore, in her eyes no longer the mere chief of one of those factions which she had skilfully balanced, but a rival who must be removed, an enemy who must be destroyed. For matters had advanced so fast and so far that no common means, no mere intrigue, would avail to arrest them. A sudden, desperate, foul, and bloody stroke could alone save the game.

* "The Massacre of St. Bartholomew. Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By Henry White." London: Murray; New York: Harper & Brothers. 1868.

Meanwhile, a declaration of war against Spain was fully expected by the world. French volunteers had been allowed to join the standard of Orange. Louis of Nassau had been received at the French court, and had carried away written assurances of support. A special envoy had been sent to engage the co-operation of England, and when the wary Elizabeth demanded additional proofs of the king's sincerity, she was told that, within a few days, she would have ample reason to be satisfied. The marriage of the Huguenot King of Navarre with Margaret of Valois, celebrated without a Papal dispensation, afforded as strong a pledge as could well have been exacted of his intention to inaugurate a new policy. Alva, Philip, the Pope, were in despair.

Instead of the expected event, what took place, without notice or previous indication, was the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew—the slaughter, under the royal orders, of the Huguenots in Paris and in the provinces, to the number, on a moderate computation, of twenty thousand. The suddenness of the act, its atrocity, and its perfidy, not only astounded but bewildered mankind. The monstrosity was almost forgotten in the mystery that enshrouded it. It became one of the puzzles of history.

Yet the puzzle was mainly one of history's own making. The situation and the characters being known, there was nothing that needed to seem inexplicable. But though the deed was notorious and the actors stood revealed, there was little evidence as to how, when, and by whom the plan had been arranged. There was therefore a field for the imagination to work in. Protestants believed, and there were Catholics who boasted, that the plot had been contrived months, and even years, before it was put in practice; that the king had been a party to it from the first; that the Pope and the King of Spain had been privy to it, had been, indeed, the first to suggest it; that every step taken by the government in the pretended conciliation had been merely a lure; that the pacification had been made in order to disarm the Huguenots, the pretended change of policy to lull them into a false security, and the marriage of the King of Navarre to ensnare them. Gradually, however, this theory has been dropped by both parties —by Catholics, because it heightened the guilt of the transaction; by Protestants, as discreditable to the intelligence of the chief victims. Impartial criticism has shown that it rests on no sufficient proofs, and that the theory which is intrinsically the more probable is also the most accordant with all the well ascertained facts.

In two Venetian relazioni, which are among the authorities for the story, we find the two opposite views presented. Contarini, who was the resident envoy at the French court, rejects the notion of a long-prepared plot. He considers such a stupendous piece of prudenza as incredible; thinks that, if a trap had been laid, Coligny was too sagacious to have entered it, and adduces as proof of the absence of deliberation beforehand the subsequent irresolution of the government, and its failure to proceed to a complete consummation. On the other hand, Micheli, who arrived in Paris on a special embassy shortly before the massacre, asserts his belief, founded on information derived from the persons most nearly concerned, that every movement had been preconcerted, as already described. He states that this was openly declared by the queen-mother, who appealed to the Papal nuncio, Salviati, to say whether she had not given him a previous intimation of what was intended. At the first blush this seems strong evidence. It is to be noted, however, that Contarini himself had at first, as he mentioned in his relation, made the same report, and that, if he afterwards changed his opinion, it must have been because he had seen reason for rejecting statements to which he had previously attached weight. Moreover, this evidence, like all the rest that has been adduced, exhibits merely declarations made after the event. These declarations all centre round that of Catharine herself. It was quite in the character of that wretched woman to have assumed a deeper infamy than really belonged to her. Having, apparently, no conscience of her own to guide her, she judged her acts simply as she saw them judged by the world. At first she attempted to disown the responsibility. When she found the deed applauded by the Papal court and Catholic princes, she was eager to claim all the merit which they were ready to assign her. She buried the personal motives which had really swayed her, and gave out that she had acted as the agent and champion of the Church.

Having sketched the outlines of the subject, and indicated the debatable questions connected with it, we can the more easily convey to the reader our estimate of Mr. White's treatment of it. His narrative of the details is a very readable one. His materials are copious; the matter is well arranged; the story is carried on without circumlocutions or digressions; and the style, though never forcible, and often vapid, is always a faithful reflection of the sense, not a straining of language to cover the want of sense. It is obvious, however, that the subject required for its due presentment far higher qualities than these—the power to exhibit men of stormy passions and subtle intellects contending for great prizes and important principles; the skill to penetrate hidden motives, to unravel the skeins of intrigue, and to trace the broader current of general causes; the art to delineate in fitting colors some of the most graphic scenes which the pencil of the historian has ever touched. In all these respects Mr. White seems to us very deficient. His descriptions are tame; his comments and reflections are puerile; his portraitures are feeble in the extreme. He condemns the Huguenots for having taken up arms in self-defence, because they had always professed the doctrine of passive obedience. They should, it seems, have allowed themselves to be slaughtered for the sake of being consistent. Mr. White occasionally speaks of the duplicity and deceitfulness of Catharine and the Guises; but the best proof he exhibits of their powers in this respect is his own readiness in becoming their victim. When they are most artful he is most credulous. Thus, he treats the conference at Poissy not as a scheme for dividing the Calvinists and Lutherans, but as a serious effort to reconcile both with the Church of Rome; and when the Cardinal of Lorraine declares emphatically that his own views on the Eucharist are in full accordance with those of Beza, we are not invited to admire the histrionic fervor so characteristic of the speakers. In short, character is, with Mr. White, no index to acts. It is a shifting attribute that varies with the circumstances. Alva, yet "unstained with blood," was simply "a statesman possessing great capacity." As a general his capacity appears to have been doubtful, for we are told that, "as viceroy of Naples, he foiled all the efforts of the Duke of Guise to recover the throne of that country for France," and that he "afterward waged a fruitless war in Italy against Francis of Guise and the Pope." As there was only one war in Italy in which Alva and Guise encountered each other, we must consider the two remarks as conflicting judgments of the result.

In his preface Mr. White speaks somewhat elaborately of explorations among unpublished sources, especially in the provincial archives of France. But there is nothing in the body of his book to justify the expectations thus raised. He has collected more details and cited a greater number of authorities than any former writer; and the additions thus made are not only creditable to his industry, but valuable as contributions to our knowledge of the period. But he has not brought to light any manuscript documents; he has given no fresh evidence in regard to the transactions, their causes or consequences; and he has presented no striking or original views. We do not reproach him for this. The views which he has adopted were formed by able critics, and we do not think they are likely to be shaken by the researches of keener investigators. There is, however, one point on which we could have wished for some elucidation. The common accounts of what took place in the royal cabinet when the massacre was determined upon, of the arts by which Catharine stifled the sentiments of honor and humanity in the breast of her son, are derived from a narrative known as the Duke of Anjou's. Ranke has denied the authenticity of this document, but without fulfilling his promise to give the grounds of his opinion. The question probably might be settled by a careful scrutiny. Mr. White has not discussed it. Perhaps he has done as well in refraining.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR APRIL.

THE opening article of the April North American is Dr. Dalton's essay on the "Metropolitan Board of Health." Though not particularly attractive, perhaps, it is useful, occupying as it does a middle place between literature and the official reports, the substance of which it puts before the general reader better than he could himself; if indeed he were likely to try. And the importance of doing this will not be gainsaid. For the life of our Board of Health depends on the intelligence and good-will of the Legislature; and it is not too much to say that the next year's lives of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of our fellow-citizens depend on the continued existence of the board. One reflects with gratitude on what has already been done, though much remains to be done, for the people who live in the eighteen or nineteen thousand "tenement houses" of New York, of which you may almost say that living in them men can practise no virtue but fortitude, and that they are cut off from almost every comfort and decency of life; that they are the dens which have succeeded in making repub lican government in this city a bad failure.

The second essay is by Mr. Norton, and is entitled "The Church and Religion." Mr. Norton begins by asserting the historical fact that, of the two main principles in religious affairs, the principle of authority and the principle of liberty, the latter is gaining ground. And this although the other was never more ardently and uncompromisingly asserted than now, when the Church of authority, the Romanist, fairly, in the Papal Encyclical of 1864, flings defiance at the enlightenment of the age; and he points it out as a fact that not only the Romanist but the Protestant also requires the submission of the intellect to an authority pronounced infallible. Without going into any argument as to the existence of an infallible teacher—with an infallibility resting for proof on fallibility—but accepting as axiomatic the proposition that the individual will should be free of external dominion in religious as in secular thought, Mr. Norton goes on to pronounce the Church of the present an anachronism, which fails to perform the functions which the supernatural theory allots to it, and which fails as obviously in the natural order. This part of his essay relates not at all to the Roman Catholic Church, between which and the essayist there is the apparently widest gulf while he speaks of the two main currents in religious affairs, but rather is a sharp criticism on the modes of worship and the character and services of clergymen of the various Protestant denominations. Then follows, what will be of less popular interest and is rather vague, an answer to the question, How is the Church of the future to be made in fact what it is in idea—namely, "the natural instrument for securing those ends to the pursuit of which individuals in society are directed by the religious sentiment;" how is it to become what it is not now, the complete expression of that moral order which underlies the political? An answer, we said; but an answer is not given, for the process of the change is not to be determined beforehand. The essay concludes with a general statement of the ends which the Church of the future will have in view, and declares that already such a church is potentially in existence wherever men, having discarded the notion of true religion as something external, to be got by special experience, as a system of dogmas to be accepted and forms to be regarded, have arrived at the conception of religion as absolute, utter devotion to whatever each knows and feels to be best.

Mr. Emerson contributes an article on "Quotation and Originality." It consists of chat about the indebtedness of all of us in general to all the rest of us, and in particular about special debts of certain famous writers to other writers. It might be extended indefinitely, in depth and length; but, as it stands, will be found a very agreeable essay of the talkative kind. There is readable matter also in Professor Evans's article on "Pompeii," in which, among some things not fresh, there are several interesting pages on the inscriptions that may be read on the walls of Pompeian houses. On the whole, it would be not easy to find anywhere else, within the same compass, an equally full and accurate account of the burial of the city and of the excavations. The sketch of the bibliography of the subject is comprehensive. There is nowhere in English, so far as we know, anything like a tolerable paper on the general subject of the exhumations to which we owe so great a number of all extant works of ancient art. Professor Evans would be doing good service if he would take it up, and do for it what he intended to do, and partly has done, for the Pompeian excavations.

Mr. Lowell's "Shakespeare Once More," excellent for instruction and entertainment throughout, as well in its minuter as in its more general criticisms, is especially good in its examination of the character of Hamlet. The reader of Shakespearian criticism may very likely feel when he has finished the essay as if he knew before all that there is in it; there is no display of over-ingeniousness seeking new views of Hamlet's nature; the view accepted by the most judicious, indeed accepted by most critics, is the one held by Mr. Lowell. But he brings out with a fulness not elsewhere matched, we think, every shade of the wonderful picture; he fills out, as only a learned and sympathetic touch could, the outline drawn correctly by others. The effect on the reader is as if he saw, by means of a powerful glass, every feature of the face which he had previously been seeing only dimly.

Mr. Adams completes the presentation, begun in the January North American, of his views in regard to the decline of Boston. He is convinced that it may yet be saved, and he tells how, as it seems to him, the thing may be done. It all looks to us very reasonable; unless foreign fields of enterprise have drawn off all the best business blood of Boston—and we should say that the man saying so would have to account for Mr. Adams's residence there before he could be held to have made out his case—it would seem as if the city had seen its worst days.

The other articles in this number are by Mr. F. B. Sanborn ("Poor Laws of New England"); Mr. Raphael Pumpelly ("Western Policy in China"); Mr. J. E. Cabot ("Hegel"); Mr. J. T. Morse ("Expatriation and Naturalization"); and Mr. Norton addresses a brief parting word—kind as parting words may rightly be—to Mr. Dickens.

Professor Whitney, after some remarks, characterized by his accustomed lucidity of statement and lightened by the agreeable subacidity of his sarcasm, on the Vedic literature in general, proceeds to a brief examination of the controversy, now pretty much at an end, between the opponents and the champions of the theory, that in order to the fullest understanding of the Vedas that is possible for the western student, it is only necessary for him to seat himself in docility at the feet of the Oriental commentators. Professor Whitney ranges himself among the disbelievers in this doctrine, giving what seem conclusive reasons against it.

Mr. Pumpelly, who has studied the subject on the spot, gives an account that will be welcomed of the position now held by the western nations in China. That the representatives in China of the United States and the European Powers should be able and willing to keep their fellow-countrymen in order, should restrain the tendency now too common among them to resort to violent and dishonest courses in their dealings with the Chinese people, this seems to be the duty of the moment. It is a duty our due fulfilment of which seems to promise immediate and large rewards. The article is of such a kind that it has especial value for journalists.

Mr. Cabot's "Hegel" we have not yet read with the attention which it apparently deserves. Mr. Sanborn's well-known acquaintance with his subject is a guarantee that his advice in regard to the management of the pauper class is worth the attention of every one whose duty or inclination it is to investigate the matter. One never fails to get from his papers a fair and full exhibition of the facts and clear conclusions from them orderly arranged. Mr. Morse's essay we read easily and with profit, as a layman doubting nothing his correctness. In another place we give a fact, occurring since his essay was written, which confirms his judgment on a disputed point. We advise Mr. Banks, if he ever does any reading, to look into "Expatriation and Naturalization" before drafting any more bills for the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

In the "Critical Notices" only thirteen books are reviewed. But the last quarter has been a dull one in the book market. And of the thirteen reviews most are careful and valuable. Altogether we have found this number of the North American more than usually good reading, and usually we find it better, we should say, than any other quarterly.

The Chimney Corner. By Christopher Crowfield. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1868.)—Mrs. Stowe brings to the discussion of social questions a great deal of practical good sense and good temper; her chair of philosophy stands in its proper place, we think, when it stands in the chimney corner. But we should say that, as a matter of taste, she has made a mistake in putting a male professor in it. Such men as Christopher Crowfield, when they do occasionally make their appearance in real life, are apt to receive a title somewhat less complimentary than that of philosopher, and are certainly the men whom women most instinctively abhor. Not in New England any more than in other regions where social philosophy is cultivated does the male moralizer habitually take his observations of life through the kitchen window, or preach persistently the ethics of cupboard and pantry.

From the internal evidence afforded by these papers, we infer that they have caused considerable discussion among the readers of the Atlantic. Essay writers do not, we presume, talk much about the letters they receive—without some good reason; and we conclude that Mrs. Stowe has interested her public and supplied a real need—which is a very sufficient reason why her papers should have been written. The need was not, we should say, a literary one, and the response to it hardly comes under the head of literature. Bound up with Miss Mulock's and Mrs. Ellis's advice to mothers and daughters and housekeepers, it would be a suitable present for young brides who might be supposed to be entering on their new duties with inadequate preparation.

Mrs. Stowe's idea of the functions and sphere of woman is hardly ours—to perform the works laid down by Iago as the duty of the "true woman," and to perform them in a neat and utilitarian Yankee fashion, is about the scope of her advice. She discusses the woman question at length and under various aspects, but by whatever road she travels she reaches in the end one constant bourne. The delights of a well-kept house, the lively comfort of seeing one's face reflected in a series of well-scoured pans—this or something essentially like this forms the endless refrain of her song. She seems to share, in part at least, and in larger part than altogether pleases us, Dr. Allen's belief, that girls' brains are cultivated at the expense of their muscles; like him, also, she apparently believes in the total depravity of the French woman, and deduces thence the conclusion that to follow her fashions is to court contagion. She believes that women ought to vote—in order to ensure clean streets. She has not, however, as much faith in the ballot as a means of elevating her sex as in domestic service. She recommends the thousands of half-starving American seamstresses and shop-girls to seek employment as servants "in good families," as a training for their own future family life. The suggestion, if it were at all likely to be followed, if spirited women could be got to put themselves under the rule of their own sex, would be a good one, as affording a remedy in some important respects for the condition of our native women, and at the same time leaving the woman question to the small moralists, whose sympathies, if they are not bounded by geographical lines, would then be left to flow freely in the direction of the superseded Bridget.

The Crowfield philosophy has a good deal to recommend it, and when preached in Mrs. Stowe's good-humored and sensible manner is not disagreeable. It puts things, however, on a culinary basis, which in time dissatisfies to some extent even those people who accept with due meekness the service of the cooking-range and clothes-basket. One may be permitted, after studying life in this chimney corner, to turn, not without a feeling of relief, to Thoreau's counter-irritant Walden housekeeping, and sympathize with him in his rejection of the foot-mat because it would waste precious time to shake it; to pick up Montaigne and perhaps find his easy contempt for woman healthier than the feeling which enthrones her as the goddess of the kitchen and the sitting-room, the highly cultivated nymph of the innocent greenhouse. Good dinners, well-ordered households, neat and appropriate toilets, fireside chats about dress and politics and patriotism—all of them of the housekeeping order—are good things; there is no doubt of it; we have no wish to depreciate them. But we have no wish to see the work of exalting them—a work decidedly of supererogation—performed by a clever woman.

One does n't, after all, believe that the pursuit of material comfort is the highest end of life, and that men best fulfil their destinies in becoming good providers, and women theirs in performing the duties of good housekeepers. These things are not ends, but means. It is very well to train girls in the manner recommended by Mrs. Stowe—to make bread-making, plain sewing, and household economy a part of their school education, for every woman is better equipped for life in understanding these things. But if it were possible to train them at the same time so that they could read intelligently and lay to heart the lesson taught in such essays as Emerson's on Self-Reliance, or Stuart Mill's on Liberty, it seems to us that the housekeeping would by no means suffer, although it might cease to be regarded as the chief end for which God made women. If, on the other hand, they are taught that the first question to be considered in their case is that of sex, and then the special duties entailed by it, their education is begun in the middle, and ends only in making them suitable companions for the men who believe that they on their part were born to watch rising and falling stocks.

The fact of personality comes before the fact of sex. Its total neglect leaves both men and women in the condition of more or less well-fed and well-cared-for animals; its partial neglect leaves men and women the needlessly incomplete beings we see. One's first duty is to one's self, even when one happens to be a woman; and, absorbing and necessary as is the question of work, it may be doubted whether the natural order of things is not precisely reversed when work is assumed to be the object of growth. There would be no fault to find with philosophers who discuss merely practical affairs—charities and politics, the dress question, the suffrage question, the woman question—if they recognized the fact that they discuss only the grammar of life, and seldom, or never, offer any useful hints as to its worth and significance.

Mozart. A Biographical Romance. From the German of Heribert Rau. By E. R. Sill. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1868.)—This book belongs to a class whose usefulness we consider somewhat problematical—the kind of small historical novel of which Mrs. Clara Mundt has furnished so many examples; the idea of which seems to be to import into the pages of a story some well-known personage, to detail with sufficient accuracy the prominent events of his life, and to press imagination into the service of inventing minor ones, of describing his love affairs with more or less warmth of color, and of furnishing an occasional flow of "fine writing" to the extent supposed to be necessary to show enthusiasm on the part of the writer, and to produce it on that of the reader. The plan appears, on the outside, to be a promising one, and we do not wonder that it is so frequently adopted by people who have a vague, general desire to write without having anything particular to say—people who are in much the same predicament with those of whom Thoreau complained that they wanted to be good without being good for anything. We suspect, however, that to the production of a genuinely good historical novel there must needs go even more imagination than to one made, as the saying is, "out of whole cloth." The plot, it is true, is ready to one's hand, and so are the characters, but they are inexorable and admit of no tampering; and the question how to adjust them to each other without patchwork and botching must be a serious one.

With this particular novel we have no especial fault to find beyond that which is to be found in general with the class to which it belongs—that there seems to be no necessity for its existence. Mr. Rau adheres with a good deal of accuracy to the facts of Mozart's life—we judge so, at least, from the numberless foot-notes which say "historical," "this is a fact," "his very words," "see Jahn," etc. We should say, however, that his book would be absolutely worthless to the intelligent enthusiast in music, to whom the bare facts, without embellishment, would be sufficiently suggestive; and almost as much so to those who, being unversed in what Mr. Rau calls the "tone art," care more in a novel for its literary excellence and its general truth to nature than for any special adherence to the facts of a particular case. The book is not enthusiastic enough to excite enthusiasm. Perhaps some of our readers may remember "Charles Auchester," Miss Elizabeth Sheppard's historico-musical, or, rather, biographico-musical novel, and be able to recall how, without knowing even their musical a b c's, they were ready to say with Disraeli, "If it were not for music, we might in these days say, 'The Beautiful is dead'"—and to feel that to be a Jew and a musician was to have drawn the highest prizes of life. The perusal of "Mozart" will not renew that pleasing experience. Miss Sheppard understood the requirements of a romance better than Mr. Rau. Very probably, however, Mr. Rau's enthusiasm was held in check by the fact that he contemplated selecting other composers as themes for future romances—which shows what may be some of the incidental disadvantages of writing historical novels.

The Lost Galleon, and other Tales. By Fr. Bret Harte. (San Francisco: Towne & Bacon. 1867.)—Perhaps by itself this book would not give one so distinct an impression of Mr. Harte as is given by his volume of parodies on popular novels, but it confirms the pleasant impression which one gets from that agreeable little book. In his serious pieces, which are all patriotic, Mr. Harte does not shine, though he is always the man of sense and of considerable delicacy of taste, and shows to advantage beside the mass of his rivals, wholly evading one, and escaping unruined from the other of the two besetting dangers of patriotic poetry—which is pretty sure to be not poetry at all, and which is apt to make one sincerely hate his native land. In the most successful of the serious pieces, however, there is at least a touch of the comic; "How are you Sanitary?" we call the most successful. And it is in the pieces purely comic that we find Mr. Harte at his best. He is then exercising the special faculty in which he excels, probably, a very large majority of all the human beings now in existence; whereas in the production of more than passable little sentimental matters, many thousands of his contemporaneous fellow-denizens of earth are as good as he, and some thousands, we dare say, are better. So that it seems as if he would do best for himself and his readers if he would forswear unmixed sentiment and make satire and fun his mainstay. His comic verses, some of them, are labored, as if done at short notice for the newspapers; and some of them, as "The Lost Galleon," are labored and apparently have not the excuse of short notice; and some of them depend for their effect on nothing more humorous than a parody of the obvious characteristics of Poe or some other grave writer; and almost none of them is filled full of fun. But most are funny in places; as witness this, which is from some remarks on Alaska:

> "Where the short-legged Esquimaux
> Waddle in the ice and snow,
> And the playful polar bear
> Nips the hunter unaware."

And we laughed at the idea of calling a pony's tail its "back-hair." "The Pliocene Skull" we liked also. It relates to the skull which was found two miles from Angel's, in Calaveras county, California, at a depth of one hundred and fifty-two feet below the surface of the earth. The newspaper savans of California promptly decided that man must have existed in that State years before the mastodon was created. But after a long address, in a highly scientific strain, delivered by Mr. Harte, the skull explains as follows, using the mining dialect of the present century:

> "Which my name is Bowers, and my crust was busted > Falling down a shaft in Calaveras county."

Les Salons de Paris et la Société Parisienne sous Napoléon III. By the Vte. de Beaumont-Vassy. (Paris. 1868. New York: F. W. Christern.)—The author of "Une Marquise d'Autrefois" and other novels, of the "Histoire de Suéde depuis Charles XII.," "Histoire de mon temps" and other histories, of "Les Salons de Paris sous Louis Philippe" and similar sketches, the Vte. de Beaumont-Vassy, is little known beyond the limits of his native country; but he deserves to be better known—not as a writer, for his talents are not of a high order, and even his esprit has a rather scanty flow; nor as a historical scholar, for few French works on modern history are less remarkable for geniality or impartial study than his; but as a representative man of the order of political knights errant who have surrendered their wit and their conscience to the cause of the man of December. The individuals of the higher class of that order—the Mornys, the Edgar Neys, and the like—write little, or only as diplomatists, and must therefore be studied in their own spheres of activity; the journalists like Granier de Cassagnac would require of their student the sacrifice of daily tracking them along the tortuous and repulsive path of political jugglery. De Beaumont-Vassy gives himself entire and en négligé, in a pleasant little book of personal recollections concerning men and things Napoleonic, in a sketch which vividly displays the mongrel characteristics of the aristocratic-servile, ultramontane-infidel, cynico-epicurean livery-bearers of the French Bas-Empire.

An aristocrat by birth, a writer by profession, a meddler in politics and diplomacy from inclination, a reactionary conspirator from hatred of democracy, a Bonapartist in spite of Legitimist professions and Orleanistic proclivities, out of office, our author bidding adieu to exacting and poorly-paying Clio, has finally devoted himself to writing on the attractive theme of "Parisian Salons"—that is to say, to writing books under that title. The title, however, is a deceptive one, as if everything Neo-Napoleonic seems to be bound to begin, as well as to end, in deception. There are in the book before us a few scattered pages on Parisian salons, and a few scattered passages on Parisian society, but the bulk of it is devoted to semi-historical sketches of political situations and events preceding the re-establishment of the empire "sous Napoléon III.;" to Jenkins-like narratives of imperial journeys, royal visits, and public festive scenes; to dutiful adulation lavishly bestowed on the deus ex machinâ who saved France from the abyss into which the Marrasts, Ledru-Rollins, and Louis Blancs, the Blanquis, Raspails, and Barbés had plunged it; on the diva Kirkpatrick-Teba-Montijo, whom the new French Soter chose for his partner on the throne; and on the demi-gods and demi-goddesses and héroes and heroines of the new Augustan era.

In this new era, to judge with our author, none has shone brighter, perhaps, than the Count, then Duke, de Morny, "type particulier de gentilhomme financier qui n'existait pas autrefois, mais que les mœurs actuelles expliquent malheureusement de nos jours." This sad remark seems to come from the very depths of the vicomte's heart, who, in spite of all the splendor and all the blessings of the new golden, or rather paper-money era, cannot refrain occasionally from sighing for the past—when people still knew the art of dancing—from making reflections on some dangerous habits of the present, such as "le luxe," or from looking with strange forebodings into the future. In the very conclusion of the book, after speaking of his own salon and convivial receptions, and while exhorting his friends, in the tone of a Mæcenas and in the words of Horace—characters, by the by, like Agrippa and Virgil, entirely wanting at the new Augustan court—not to forget that time flies away rapidly, he exclaims: "Let us crown ourselves with flowers, string our lyres, and . . with firmness await the barbarians!" The men of Napoleonic "salons" are evidently still haunted by the "spectre rouge" which they pretended to have laid on December 2, or rather, December 4, 1851, and from their festal couches they again and again seem to cast a troubled glance towards the wall, as if looking for a handwriting to appear on it. The very recollection of that bloody Fourth of December seems to be painful to them; or rather, they would like to make others forget it; there is not an allusion to it in this book, though it devotes scores of pages to the narration of scenes and events of the preceding days, narratives to which the personal experiences of the author, his acquaintance with Napoleon, and more intimate connections with some of the minor actors, lend some particular interest. Altogether, as a partial history of that period—partial in a double sense—the vicomte's new book is not devoid of information for readers otherwise familiar with the history of the second French republic and empire.

Das Leben Mosis. Von Dr. Hermann Réckendorf. (Leipzig: Gerhard. 1868.)—A work dedicated to all thinking friends of the Bible, allen denkenden Bibelfreunden, and designed to portray the life of the Hebrew lawgiver in the light of modern historical criticism. The biographer claims for his hero no supernatural character, represents him not as a god-man (Gottmensch), but as a man of God (Gottesmann), and is well content that all the miracles recorded of him should be either explained on scientific principles or relegated to the limbo of myths. To have accomplished the sublime work of religious and political organization which he effected, and to have elaborated principles of ethics and of law which have entered into the codes of all subsequent nations and been regarded by most of them as divine, Herr Reckendorf thinks, is sufficiently miraculous, and will be recognized as such even by those who have gone farthest im Verneinen aller Wunderwesen—in denying the existence of everything miraculous. It is a maxim of the Talmud nearly two thousand years old, that "he who interprets the Scripture literally, is a liar and a blasphemer." Our author claims the right and duty of illimitable and untrammelled research, and generally exercises it with great freedom; the Jew, he says, in entering upon a work like this, must leave bibliolatry behind him. But we can hardly reconcile with this declaration the assertion which meets us at the very outset (p. 7), that Mosaism believes itself to be not only a revelation, but also the only revelation, denying all genuineness to subsequent pretensions of a like kind. The two chief foes of Judaism, he affirms, are heathenism and the later revealed religions which acknowledge the historical Moses, but declare his law abrogated. We commend the little volume to our readers, not because we accept its doctrine, but on account of the freshness and suggestiveness with which it treats a very old and rather juiceless subject.

La Conscience et La Foi. (Paris: Baillière. 1867.)—We have here a religious treatise written with that clearness of thought and style and that sweetness of temper which characterize everything that comes from the pen of Athanase Coquerel fils. It would be out of the province of literary journalism to discuss the ideas put forth in this book, and we limit ourselves to a simple statement of its contents: Conscience and God; Conscience and Human Life; Conscience and the Holy Scriptures; Conscience and Jesus Christ; Conscience and the Church, are the themes which the author discourses upon.

Kitty's Class Day. By Louisa M. Alcott. (Boston: Loring.)—Loring's Tales of the Day include "A Week in a French Country House," by Madame Sartoris; Miss Thackeray's "Sleeping Beauty in the Wood;" "Jack the Giant-Killer," and so on, and seem to be a good series of rather better than ordinary light reading. The present issue is a gracefully-told story by Miss Alcott, which relates the mishaps which befell a little girl on Harvard College Class Day in consequence of her neglecting to sew the facing on her dress, and trusting, instead, to basting-threads and pins. The results of her negligence were hardly so serious as they should have been made in the interests of sound morality, since, by means of her small troubles, she discovered the general good-for-nothingness of the youth with whom she fancied herself about to fall in love, and surrendered her heart, instead, before class day was over, to a much more satisfactory person; which seems as if Kitty were rather to be congratulated on her laziness.

The Week.

THE House alone has done any legislative business during the week. The only business of any importance transacted was the passage of the amendatory Bankrupt bill. It makes several unimportant changes, and one change of importance, in the act as now existing. The time in which a bankrupt whose assets do not amount to fifty per cent. of his indebtedness may get a discharge without the consent of his creditors is extended from the 1st of JUNE till the 1st of January, 1869.

The impeachment trial has, during the week, been devoted to speeches on both sides. Of these, Mr. Nelson's for the defence, being delivered by him in the character of a "friend" of the respondent, and having a striking resemblance to several orations on Andrew Johnson's life and services delivered by Andrew Johnson himself, does not merit any notice. Mr. Boutwell, on the other side, spoke with great force and a good deal of fire, but made no new point and developed no new line of argument. He was, however, strong everywhere except in his rhetoric, in which, as is not unusual, he came to grief. He informed the Senate that Andrew Johnson was guiltier than Verres, the Roman proconsul, because the superficial area of Sicily, over which Verres tyrannized, was only ten thousand square miles, while that of the United States, over which Andrew Johnson tyrannized, was many times greater. A gentleman who addresses such an argument as this to a body like the Senate—not to a jury or a mass meeting—can hardly be said to be in a state of mind to qualify him for the position of guide and leader which Mr. Boutwell has so long held. He might just as well measure guilt by the weight in avoirdupois of the criminal as by the extent of the earth's surface over which he had the opportunity of committing crimes. This is not a small criticism. It touches a serious matter—the elementary notions of jurisprudence held by men occupying high public positions and exercising an important influence on legislation at a very grave crisis in national affairs.

Mr. Groesbeck's speech was perhaps the most effective, if not the ablest, that has been made for the defence. He argued that the Senate was a court bound by legal rules and precedents; that the Tenure-of-Office Act did not cover Mr. Stanton's case, and that most of the senators, at the time of its passage, did not believe it did; and that the understanding of all departments of the Government for eighty years had been that the President possessed the power of removal under the Act of 1789, and that as the Tenure-of-Office Act contained no repealing clause, that understanding must be allowed to have weight in the present instance; and, finally, as regards the 10th Article, that the President is entitled, under the Constitution, to say what he pleases, subject, of course, to popular disapproval. Mr. Groesbeck maintains, moreover, that impeachment was intended to be a mode of punishing officers whose tenure is for life, all others being punishable only by the popular refusal to re-elect them. Some of this doctrine is a little too strong to make it necessary to argue against it.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens has also made a speech, and we were pleased to meet him once more on the solid earth, after his long sojourn in the regions of the supernatural. His argument was close and strong, and some of it novel, and, considering his state of health and his age, was really a remarkable feat. He maintained that if the clause of the Tenure-of-Office Act which fixes the Secretary of War, amongst others, in his office during the term of office of the President by whom he was appointed, and for one month afterwards, does not, as the defence contends, cover Mr. Stanton's case, then the preceding clause, which expressly covers all cases not covered by the last one, certainly includes it, and in either case Mr. Stanton's removal was unlawful. In the remainder of his arguments on this point, Mr. Stevens relied on estoppel, showing, from Mr. Johnson's letter to Mr. McCulloch, that the President acknowledged the applicability of the act to Mr. Stanton's case, and by one of his letters to General Grant that he was determined to keep Mr. Stanton out "whether sustained in the suspension or not." Mr. Stevens relied, for the constitutionality of the act, mainly on the vote of the Senate when it was passed, and threatened with "a gibbet of everlasting obloquy" and "a long and dark track of infamy" any Senator who, having then voted for the bill, would now vote for the President's acquittal on the ground of its unconstitutionality. Some of the moral reflections by which the argument was accompanied were very entertaining, though whether Mr. Stevens meant them to be so we are unable to say—such, for instance, as "How lovely to contemplate what was so assiduously inculcated by a celebrated Pagan into the mind of his son: 'Virtue is truth, and truth is virtue.'" He also complimented Mr. Groesbeck, by assuring him that his peroration reminded him of "the elegance and pathos of a Roman senator pleading for virtue;" but, fearing, perhaps, that Mr. Groesbeck might be too much "set up" by this observation, added that "had he been arguing before the Roman Senate for such a delinquent, and Cato the Censor had been amongst the judges, his client would soon have found himself in the stocks in the middle of the Forum." Mr. Williams followed Mr. Stevens, but contributed nothing new to the discussion. Before our next issue the case will probably be decided.

It is now no longer denied that Arkansas has ratified the new constitution. In Louisiana the Republicans have elected three out of four Congressmen, and the constitution is undoubtedly accepted. From Louisiana the first news spoke of Conservative victories, but this was merely because the agents of the Associated Press throughout the South allow their political hopes to color their telegrams—a state of things which one would suppose the Associated Press would not endure for a week. Similarly untrustworthy were the first reports from Georgia and North Carolina. But it now seems clear that North Carolina has been carried by the Republicans by a heavy majority in favor of the constitution, and by a good enough majority in favor of W. W. Holden, a much distrusted man, who had to contend against a second Republican candidate as well as against the nominee of the Conservatives. The Republicans elect all the seven Congressmen except one. Mr. Nathaniel Boyden, of Salisbury, beats his Republican opponent. Mr. Boyden is a Massachusetts man, and, though he probably thinks the natural division of mankind is into Whigs and unfortunate Democrats, and is a little mazed by all this pro-slavery and anti-slavery business, yet he is an honest gentleman; was never for a minute a secessionist, never at any time scrupled to tell his fellow-townsmen how utterly wrong they were in their rebellion, and altogether will make a very respectable member of Congress. South Carolina is Republican by some 30,000 majority. Georgia, it seems clear, has given for the new constitution a majority of 10,000, or less. Mr. Bullock, the Republican candidate, is pretty certainly elected; but, so far as we can tell from such returns as have got into print, by a number of votes some thousands less than that given in favor of the constitution. There is little doubt that if General Meade had been removed just on the eve of the election, as Generals Pope and Swayne were on the eve of the Alabama election, Georgia would have gone as Alabama did. It is Meade who has saved it.

Amongst the rumors by which Washington is agitated is one that the Senate will render their verdict by ballot, a result which those who desire to see who the "recreants" are who will "dare" to vote for an acquittal are naturally desirous of preventing. Mr. Sumner has been making an effort to have the practice of the House of Lords—each member rising in his place and saying "guilty" or "not guilty"—adopted as a rule of the Senate, so as to ensure publicity. Although we are not greatly concerned about the matter, and do not believe it will make any serious difference whichever way the vote is taken, there are one or two things connected with the subject which are worth consideration. One is, that if the Senate be a court of justice, there seems no good reason why the senator should not enjoy the same protection for his independence as the juryman—though it may, of course, be said in reply to this that the temptation to vote corruptly in a case of this kind is greater than any to which a juryman is exposed, and that therefore the public eye may prove a stimulus to honesty. The other is that the difference in the constitution of the Senate and of the House of Lords, to which we drew attention some days ago, seems to make the practice of the latter in this particular unsuited to our use. The theory of a peer is, that he is responsible to nobody, and cares nothing for anybody. He represents himself, and is not affected by anybody's censure. Therefore, he runs no risk in giving his verdict publicly and viva voce. Moreover, the practice of voting openly is essentially a feudal practice. It was unknown in Greece or Rome; it was introduced into politics with feudalism and the rule of the strong hand, and was one of the modes by which the feudal lord not only showed that he was afraid of nobody himself, but saw that his vassals and dependents did their duty to him. The ballot came once more into use when free assemblies began to arise in modern Europe, and it is eminently the free and democratic mode of deciding on all questions which have to be decided by votes, because, with all its drawbacks, no other mode offers the same security for the expression of the voter's real opinion.

Ever since the completion of Mr. Bancroft's treaty with the North German Confederation, settling the effects of American naturalization, doubts have been expressed whether the five years' residence in this country which the treaty requires in order to release a German from his allegiance to his own government, began to run from the date of his landing or the date of his naturalization. Mr. Bancroft took the former view, and now writes that the matter has been fully debated in the North German Parliament, and that Count Bismark has there declared most distinctly that he understood the five years to begin with the emigrant's landing, and that the lapse of this period combined with naturalization would henceforward release the German American from all claims on the part of the German Government. So the question may now be considered settled, and, thanks to Mr. Bancroft, settled satisfactorily. A similar treaty can, we have no doubt, be negotiated without difficulty with Great Britain, and, this done, we should not only be delivered from further Fenian complications, but from Mr. N. P. Banks's annual speech on the right of expatriation, which is perhaps the most disagreeable feature in the whole controversy.

The Independent a fortnight since formally discarded Chief-Justice Chase as the candidate of the Republican party, which it ought to have done about a year and a half sooner, or, in fact, about the time he was first seriously spoken of as a candidate, inasmuch as every argument it ever produced in favor of his claims was absolutely fatal to them. Had it done so, it would have been saved the discredit of seeming to treat him unhandsomely, and of doing the right thing for the wrong reason, which, we regret to say, has now fallen upon it. It throws the unfortunate jurist overboard, simply because the editor came to the conclusion, from a recent conversation with him, that he would not accept a Republican, while he would accept a Democratic, nomination, and that he is opposed to impeachment. Whereupon the Chief-Justice has apparently inspired Mr. J. S. Pike with a slashing letter addressed to the New York Tribune, and printed in that journal on Saturday, in which the editor of the Independent is treated with great roughness, accused both of misrepresentation and want of comprehension, and his charge of willingness to become the Democratic candidate repelled with a judicious mixture of ridicule and indignation. The letter also lets us know by implication what most people guessed a year ago, that the Chief-Justice did not think well of impeachment, that he is in favor of the payment of the public debt in coin, and of the contraction of the currency, and that he is opposed to the military government of the South, and leans toward Mr. Greeley's plan of universal suffrage and universal amnesty. None of these opinions is, of course, in the least dishonorable, and in fact they are all of them opinions which it is not unnatural for a Chief-Justice to hold. We think, however, most of our readers will agree with us when we say the sooner Mr. Chase ceases talking politics with editors and others, and carrying on newspaper controversies with them, the better it will be for his own reputation and the dignity of the office which he fills. The public has discussed his eligibility for the Presidency quite as much as is good for either him or it, and the subject is rendered all the more repulsive by the admirable manner in which he has presided over the impeachment trial. That so good a judge should even think of being anything else than a judge is little short of a scandal.

We were not aware till three or four days ago that there was such a thing as a Sunday edition of the World. Our ignorance was due partly to the fact that only three numbers of it had appeared before the 23d of April, and partly to the fact that the Sunday editions of the daily papers being often composed of the refuse matter accumulated during the previous week, we do not look for them with proper eagerness or anxiety. We say all this by way of accounting for the error into which we fell last week in accusing the World of having suppressed Mr. G. W. Curtis's speech at the Dickens dinner. The speech appeared in the Sunday edition, and thus we did not see it, although we read the week-day World with regularity, and we are not ashamed to say with profit—while warning weaker brethren, however, that the practice might be dangerous for persons less firmly grounded in the faith. As a matter of taste, we think the World would have done well to print the speech on Monday, but with the taste of the proceeding we perhaps have no concern. Our business is simply to apologize for our mistake, which we do, and we beg all persons who may have been led by our observations into "reflecting on the influence of newspaper editing on human character," to discard as worthless any conclusions at which they may have arrived, and to begin anew on some other basis.

We cannot any longer conceal from ourselves that the New York Times has designs on our veracity. Some months ago it charged us with injustice and inaccuracy in accusing all the morning papers of publishing certain ridiculous telegrams from the cable newsman, and obliged us, in self-defence, to fill half a column, by way of proof, with names, dates, and circumstances of no sort of interest to the general public, and of which, for this reason, it very properly took no notice. It now says that we have been guilty of "untruth" in saying that the Tribune alone published a full report of the Dickens dinner. We are sorry to be obliged to stick to this assertion, with the simple modification that the report was published in the Sunday World, of which only two numbers had appeared when the dinner took place, and of which, as we have just explained, we had never heard when we made our remarks. We may also add, that a report in the Sunday World or Times is not exactly the same thing as a report in either the week-day World or Times, as is proved by their regular republication on Monday of all reports of importance which have already appeared on Sunday. We had, however, not the least intention of imputing to the Times any motive but convenience in curtailing its own report. Of the tendency of the daily press to suppress the speeches of personal or political enemies, we shall call a very good witness, James Parton, writing in the North American Review in April, 1866, and we might support him, if the work were not so dirty, with a volume of documentary evidence. However, in order to make our charge less offensive, we shall throw it into a complimentary form, and say that it is extremely remarkable how frequently writers or speakers to whom the conductors of great dailies entertain personal and political dislike are foolish and obscure persons, whose sayings and doings are not worth reporting or noticing at all, or more than very briefly. We must say, however, that one of the great excellences of the Times is that illustrations of this "strange coincidence" are never, as far as our observation goes, found in its columns.

The writer of the Cable despatches in London has been putting the newspapers to unnecessary expense during the past week by reporting various things of the "Honorable John Bright." Mr. Bright has no such title, and if he ever had he would long ago have grown out of it into John Bright, which is his present designation. "Honorable" is a term applied in England by courtesy to the sons and daughters of barons, the lowest order in the peerage. Members of the Privy Council are "Right Honorables," but Mr. Bright being neither one nor the other, the title-mongers would do well to let him alone. We have as many "Honorables" and other titular dignitaries ourselves already as any nation can well stand, and if we were to get a fresh supply from amongst the English Radicals we fear something would give way. Many persons in America are now called "Honorable" because they have written an article in the Washington Intelligencer, or supplied oysters for the President's "state dinners." There ought to be an end to this folly, especially since our ambassadors have been prohibited from wearing court dress.

There is as yet no news from England as to what the Disraeli ministry mean to do, but it seems to be universally conceded that they cannot save the Irish Church, and that whether they try to save it or abandon it, their fate is certain. Mr. Disraeli's friends seem to consider his lot a hard one in being compelled to meet such a question before he has had a longer enjoyment of the sweets of office, and before the new household voters have had an opportunity of testifying their gratitude to him. But there is little question that the new House of Commons will contain more Radicals than ever, and that he can expect no support from them in the maintenance of a Tory policy. He will probably be pushed to the wall before the session closes. The complete success of the Abyssinian expedition will give the ministry some much needed aid, as it is success achieved in the teeth of the gloomiest forebodings on the part of a large portion of the public. The triumph is heightened by the release in health and safety of all the captives in whose behalf the expedition was undertaken. This will also prove a very important relief to Mr. Ward Hunt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose budget has not thus far proved a success.

The translation of an extraordinary letter from the Pope to the Emperor Francis Joseph has been published in the French papers, in which his Holiness rates the Emperor soundly for his concessions to liberalism, upbraids him with his desertion of the Church, and with letting the reins of government fly wildly, when he ought to hold them tightly and with a firm hand. He also calls his Majesty's attention to the fact that the Empress is awaiting "a painful and happy event," but does not indicate exactly what bearing this "event" is to have on the question of the abolition of the concordat. The Papal Nuncio in Paris, however, pronounces the letter a forgery, but M. Louis Veuillot, whose authority is considered in ecclesiastical circles as higher than even that of the Nuncio, and to whose hands the Pope, it is believed, occasionally commits the chastisement even of bishops, says that although the Pope may not have written the letter, the sentiments it contains are his. We have elsewhere described the triumph of religious liberty in Austria, and it will consequently be readily seen how little the Pope has to hope for from denunciation.

The trouble between the French clergy and the philosophers still continues. The former have recently addressed a petition to the Senate, calling attention to the fact that some of the professors in the Collège de France, and particularly the medical professors, are teaching the students pure materialism, or, in other words, that thought is simply an excretion of the brain, and that some of the latter have ridiculed some of their patients for wearing crosses. Moreover, a medical diploma lately granted has been revoked by the Minister of Public Instruction, on the ground that traces of materialism had been discovered in the graduate's answers at his examination. This led to an amusing correspondence between the Bishop of Orleans and the doctor, in which the latter informed the bishop that his father was a materialist, and yet a devoted physician; to which the bishop replies, that the father may have been a good man, though of that he was not so sure, but he was not a broad thinker, that his other ancestors were better, and that the present representative of the family would do well to take his opinions from them. That materialism is making progress in France, in circles where it has never hitherto shown itself, there is no denying, and although it is doubtless perfectly proper to prevent its being taught in the schools and colleges supported by the state, the policy of making the repudiation of it a condition of being permitted to practise medicine is more than doubtful. A nascent sect could hardly desire better aid than official persecution.

The attempt to assassinate Prince Alfred in Australia is another of those crimes which have done so much to make Fenianism detestable. It is very likely that the organization properly so-called had nothing to do with it, any more than with the assassination of D'Arcy McGee in Canada; but there is hardly a doubt that it is to the influence of the organization, and of its modes of working on the minds of ignorant men, that we owe all the atrocities its members have committed. It was founded on a swindle; that is, it owed its growth and brief prosperity, including the "mansion" in Union Square, to a system of imposture practised on servant girls and laborers by men of some education. Then, the invasion of Canada by a large horde of adventurers, the sweepings of our great cities, without flag discipline, or organization, by which it struck its first great blow, was the sum of all villanies—murder, robbery, rape, and arson; and the Christian people of this country had the pleasure of seeing the President abused in Republican newspapers for putting a stop to it. The blowing up of the Clerkenwell prison, and the assassination of solitary policemen in Ireland, by which this was followed up, were simply the legitimate result of the preaching of the doctrine that there can be republics without territory, and governments without a name, and military discipline without an army. Once admit that the members of secret associations may incur to unknown chiefs the same obligation of obedience as the soldier of an established government owes to his officer in time of war, and you suspend, as far as they are concerned, all the laws of morality as well as the laws of the land, and it is useless to complain of them afterwards, no matter what they do. Invisible belligerents cannot be bound by the same rules as visible belligerents. As they cannot meet their enemies on the battle-field, they must shoot them in the back or roast them in their houses.

THE PROBABLE EFFECT OF THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

THE anticipation which we, in common with many others, entertained as to the effect of the possible acquittal of Mr. Johnson on the fortunes of the Republican party, must, we think, be somewhat modified, in view of the course things have taken since the trial commenced. Had the expectation of the "original impeachers" been fully realized, and had the President been tried as a political "obstacle," and not as a political criminal, the failure to get rid of him would have been a disaster. Moreover, owing to a combination of circumstances, the trial has produced absolutely no excitement in the public mind. All attempts to make it "sensational" have failed utterly. The articles, the speeches, the evidence have been listened to by the country with perfect calm. It has been found impossible to work people up into anything like fervor about the case. We hear of "tremendous pressure" being brought to bear on the Senate in favor of conviction, but it is not organized pressure from the party at large; most of it, we suspect, comes from individual politicians in search of places. There has been no perceptible addition to the mails, in the shape of letters from imperious constituents; and if there have been any prayers offered up for the President's condemnation, they have been private prayers.

The natural consequence of this absence of excitement, for which, let us add, we have to thank not the politicians or newspapers, but the popular good sense, has been the absence of any disturbance in business or in society. Had the public risen to the same height of moral exaltation as the original impeachers and the Washington correspondents of the party organs, few of us would have passed many nights in bed during the last two months, or had either heart or head for the care of our private affairs. But, owing to the general coolness, not only has the Senate been enabled to conduct the trial with fairness, dignity, and decorum, but the world of trade and commerce has enjoyed unwonted repose. Gold has declined; business has, if anything, showed signs of revival; and owing to the concentration of the attention of the House and Senate on the trial, a temporary stop has been put to the attempts to tinker currency which were so common during the winter. The natural result of this general repose has been to deprive the impeachment, in the public eye, of most of its obnoxious features. Although we are satisfied few, if any, of those who before it was commenced thought it inexpedient, now think differently, nobody considers it as dangerous as he once did. Moreover, enough has been brought against the President to make an otherwise harmless attempt to convict and remove him seem reasonable and justifiable. People say to themselves that if impeachment involves no more disturbance to the body politic than this impeachment has so far caused, the House cannot be very much blamed for trying it, even if it results in nothing. So that even if the party has been unwise in taking the matter up, it has more than atoned for its want of wisdom by its manner of conducting the process.

If, therefore, Mr. Johnson should be acquitted, his acquittal would probably be ascribed rather to the fair-mindedness and freedom from party passions of the majority of the Senate than to the weakness of the Managers' case—or, in other words, to the groundlessness of the attack upon him—and would, therefore, do the party little injury in reputation. If this be true, of course it has already escaped its greatest danger. It is a great deal to be sure of coming out of so delicate and dangerous a process without actual damage. Of course an acquittal would, on the surface, seem equivalent to a confession that Mr. Johnson was right, and the Congressional majority was wrong, in their long controversy; but nobody who has followed the case is likely to fall into this error, and the Senate might easily disabuse the minds of those who have not, by attaching to their verdict an expression of their opinion as to the strength of the case which the Managers have made out. At least three things appear in the evidence which we all knew before, but which Mr. Johnson has shown himself unable to rebut on a fair field: that he did not remove Mr. Stanton for the purpose of bringing the Tenure-of Office Act before the courts; that he did wantonly endeavor to dissuade the Southern States from adopting an amendment to the Constitution offered for their adoption by Congress; that he did seek by foul and insulting language to bring the legislature into hatred and contempt in the minds of the people. These are serious charges. The expediency of trying the President for them at all is open to doubt, and so is the expediency of condemning him for them, considering the state of the political world, by a strict party vote; but if the Senate acquitted him on them, while expressing their opinion that they would have furnished a grand jury ground for finding a true bill against him, it might bring the party out of what two months ago seemed a bad scrape, without any perceptible harm.

On the other hand, Mr. Johnson is hardly a man to bear acquittal. His head is not a strong one, and we cannot conceive of any combination of circumstances that will be likely to enable him to put the true construction on his escape, if he does escape. He has one quality of a barbarian, and that is a total incapacity to understand a person's refraining, under the influence of either moral or intellectual considerations, from using all the power at his disposal. The prevalence of this quality at the South had a great deal to do with all that was most offensive in its prosecution of the slavery controversy, as well as with the final resort to hostilities. It has led the President, ever since his quarrel with Congress, into one blunder after another. People in Tennessee seldom keep their fingers out of an enemy's hair, their thumbs out of his eye, and their knives out of his ribs, and their tongues off his character, except under the influence of fear; and Mr. Johnson has never been able to believe the slowness, the moderation, the dislike to extreme courses, which he has witnessed on the part both of Congress and the Northern people, to be anything else. He did a great deal—in fact, pace Manager Butler, more than any one else—to bring about impeachment, by his always acting as if the plain reluctance of the majority to impeach was the result of terror of him and of his supporters. Such pieces of wanton insult as the message recommending a vote of thanks to General Hancock are not explicable in any other way. We greatly fear, therefore, that his acquittal would be so construed by him as to make his last end worse than his first. He probably regards the whole process against him as an outburst of party hatred against one of the best of men, and if he extricates himself from it, no matter how, he will probably ascribe his deliverance to the Radical dread of popular indignation, and plunge into his "policy" with a fiercer zest than ever. It is difficult to believe that this consideration will be without influence on the Senate. The probability that this would be the effect on him of the failure of the trial has always been one of the objections to beginning it, because it tempts and forces the Senate into taking into account what no judicial tribunal ought to take into account in determining on the guilt or innocence of a criminal—viz., the possible effect of its verdict on his subsequent conduct. We do not say that this could ever of itself have furnished a sufficient argument against impeachment; but in discussing the expediency of it, it ought to have gone into the scale along with others.

There is another reason for thinking that the public is now not only ready to forgive the party for bringing the President to trial, but will probably be disappointed if he is acquitted, and that is, that what it most disliked about impeachment was the beginning of it. Having been begun, whatever mischief it can do has been done. It is doubtful, therefore, whether people will not be sorry now if, after what they most feared has come to pass, the process does not end in getting rid of the author of all the mischief. Mr. Johnson minus impeachment is bad enough; Mr. Johnson plus impeachment would be worse still. He would not only, as we have said, put a wrong construction on his escape, but he would, knowing that he had nothing more to fear, probably take a more active part in the approaching campaign than any President has ever done before him; and it is not impossible even that he would sing songs of triumph on the stump throughout the summer. The only thing that reconciles anybody to this prospect is the looming up of Mr. Wade on the horizon. But Mr. Wade, it is right to say, has displayed, since the trial commenced, a great deal more discretion and delicacy than was expected of him, and even promises to afford the world a shining example of magnanimity in not taking part in the final vote. He also, it is said, steadily repels all applications on the subject of places. At worst, his term of office will be too short and most of the active politicians too busy during his term of office arranging combinations for Grant's advent, to make it possible for him to do much mischief, even were he mischievously disposed, and he is too honest and frank a man to take part in any intrigues for the embarrassment of Grant's administration.

There is one result of impeachment for which we fear a good many people are looking, but for which it is extremely desirable they should cease to look, and that is, the establishment of the reign of pure truth and pure justice through the length and breadth of the land in case of Mr. Johnson's removal. So much heat of language is necessary in the present state of the world to carry on the work of popular agitation, that it is hardly ever carried on without exciting most extravagant expectations regarding the consequences of success. This has been peculiarly true of the agitation against Mr. Johnson. What with his own bad behavior and the fearful pictures of him drawn by his enemies, a great many good people have been worked into the belief that he is responsible for nearly every evil by which our society is afflicted, and that once he is removed there will be nothing but harmony and tranquillity and prosperity within our borders. Now, there is no doubt that his removal will do something to promote these things, but not very much more, we fear, than the election of General Grant next November. In spite of all we hear on the stump, human nature remains human nature, and "man," as the young ladies are taught in fashionable seminaries, "progresses by gradual stages." We say this, not by way of dampening people's reforming ardor, but by way of quickening it; by way of reminding them that the world is not made much better by occasional strokes or "jumps ahead;" that there are no political or social "pain-killers" or "ready reliefs;" that the real instruments of progress are religion and education; and that unless the removal of Andrew Johnson is followed by a higher regard for character in public servants, we shall be laughing ten years hence over the fuss that has been made about him.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN AUSTRIA.

From the time of the Reformation down to our own the house of Austria, in both its branches, has been justly regarded as the main support of the Roman Church. Charles V. fought the Reformation, in its infancy, in Germany; Philip II. fought it in the Netherlands, in France, in England, and succeeded in exterminating it in his Spanish and Italian possessions; the Catholic zeal of Ferdinand II. kindled the Thirty Years' War against Protestantism, and his son, Ferdinand III., carried it on to the end; Leopold I. waged bloody wars against the Protestants of Hungary and Transylvania; Maria Theresa, in her three wars with Frederic of Prussia, struggled not only for her own right, but also for Catholic supremacy in the empire; Francis II., in the coalition wars against France, was the champion not only of the legitimate rights of kings, but also of those of his Church; and even the short fight of Francis Joseph against Prussia, in 1866, was near assuming a religious character.

There are, however, a few exceptions to be noticed in the history of the German branch. Ferdinand I. was tolerant, and his son, Maximilian II., even favorably disposed towards Protestantism; Mathias, before his accession to the throne, conspired with the Protestant subjects of his bigoted brother Rodolph; Maria Theresa, though a pious Catholic, on some occasions evinced a certain imperial independence of the See of Rome; and her son Joseph II., in his brief and brilliant career as despotic reformer, for a time almost entirely overthrew all clerical power in his empire, subjecting the Church in every respect to the laws and regulations of the state.

The attempts of Joseph, though emanating from an arbitrary, all-centralizing will, were of a revolutionary character. His levelling innovations were too numerous and too sweeping to succeed. They were baffled by the simultaneous opposition of all privileged, provincial, and national interests. While doing everything for the people, he had not called the people to aid him in carrying through his work. His work fell from want of support. On his death-bed he acknowledged it fallen. The ancient order of things was fully and speedily restored by his humane but feeble brother, Leopold II., amidst the mutterings of the revolutionary storms from France. The conservatism of Francis and his Ahithophel, Metternich, preserved that order intact down to March, 1848, when a new French revolutionary storm swept over the Continent, reached Vienna, and violently overthrew Metternich and his system. Feudal and clerical Austria was shaken to its foundations. An era of reform, more sweeping than that of Joseph, was now inaugurated by popular and revolutionary agencies.

But this change, too, was transient; the people, in their turn unaided, were not prepared to achieve the work. Want of experience in the leaders, the ignorance of the masses, dissensions and excesses, the clergy and the aristocracy, the court and the army, combined to break it down. The revolution in Hungary was suppressed with the aid of Russia. The triumph of reaction was complete. Constitutional life and religious freedom were both abrogated by decrees of the victorious young Emperor, Francis Joseph. To make this double restoration the more perfect, and the more firmly to guard it against possible new shocks, a concordat was concluded, in 1855, with the See of Rome, in which some of the most essential rights of the citizens as well as of the state were recklessly and ruthlessly bartered away for promises of clerical aid to imperial absolutism. This compact, which subjected all the subjects of Austria, and especially the Catholic portion of them, to a system of clerical supervision extending from the cradle to the grave, was regarded by the enlightened or half-enlightened classes of all denominations as the documentary personification of the most abject slavery. Against it the murmurs of discontent and the shafts of wit and sarcasm were constantly directed; wherever circumstances allowed it, it was assailed with all the weapons of unsparing invective.

"The end of this period"—to speak with Count Anton Auersperg, the immortal "Anastasius Grün"—"is called Solferino." It was followed by a few years of semi-constitutional life in Cis-Leithan (non-Hungarian) Austria, and by futile attempts to pacify Hungary, which were renewed in 1865, when the new general constitution of the empire was discontinued. The end of the succeeding brief period of vacillating and expectant absolutism "is called Königgrätz." Absolutism, propped by ultramontanism, had exhausted all its resources and carried the house of Hapsburg to the very brink of ruin. Italy was given up, the leadership in Germany seized by Prussia, bankruptcy imminent, discontent loud everywhere, dissolution threatening. Francis Joseph was made to understand the full meaning of the crisis. The only means of salvation lay in a speedy and sincere return to constitutional liberty, combined with a full pacification of Hungary, and Francis Joseph adopted it.

The past was entirely discarded. Beust, a Protestant and a stranger, was called to hold the helm formerly held by Metternich and Bach. The constitutional autonomy of Hungary was restored. Her generosity and national vanity were appealed to as in the times of Maria Theresa. A new Reichsrath was assembled, and a new liberal constitution elaborated and promulgated for the Cis-Leithan parts of the empire. An anti-Russian policy was adopted in both the Polish and Turkish questions. Liberal ministries were appointed in both divisions of the empire, the Cis-Leithan consisting chiefly of conspicuous members of the former opposition. A series of reformatory laws was proposed in the Reichsrath by this new ministry.

Three of these bills—the civil marriage law, the law on education, and the inter-denominational law—were directly aimed at the existence of the concordat, which, though virtually broken by the promulgated "fundamental laws," was not yet explicitly repudiated by legal enactments. To these new measures no opposition was expected, and none was offered, on the part of the lower House of the national legislature. Their fate in the upper, the Herrenhaus, seemed to be more doubtful. The issue of a revolution seemed to depend on the decision of an assembly consisting mainly of the highest Austrian nobility, Catholic prelates, and superior functionaries of the state. And this revolution, not as the others were, the product of one power in the empire in antagonism to all the rest, was to be the result of a harmonious action of both the government and the people, and therefore successful, and possibly permanent.

The civil marriage law was the first of the three to be debated by the Herrenhaus. The vote on it was expected to be decisive of the fate of all, the aim and tendency of the three being identical—to wit, the emancipation of the state from the control of the church. The great debate took place on the 19th, 20th, and 21st of last month. Liberal Vienna thronged the galleries and crowded around the edifice, freely expressing its approval or disapproval in half-checked acclamations and hisses. Austria, Germany scrutinized with anxiety the reports flashed by the telegraph. The discussions were dignified, thoroughgoing, and earnest, in some of the speeches, as in that of Count Auersperg, rising to an eloquence worthy of the occasion, while others, like those of Hasner, the Minister of Education, and Herbst, the Minister of Justice, were marked by rare logical strictness and acuteness. The energetic, almost threatening, declarations of the ministers, and chiefly of their president, Prince Carlos Auersperg, the overwhelming vote by which the lower House had adopted the bill, the enthusiastic sympathy of the public, the less ostentatious influence of Beust, presumed to represent the wishes of the Emperor, the natural sequence of events,—were so many weights cast into the liberal scale, in addition to the greater abilities of the liberal orators, against whom Cardinal Rauscher, the principal author of the concordat; Cardinal Prince Schwarzenberg; Count Blome, originally a Danish diplomatist; Count Leo Thun, an eccentric aristocrat; ex-Minister Rechberg, the strongest opponent of the bill, and others, seemed to struggle with the consciousness of unavoidable defeat. They dwelt chiefly on the sacredness of treaties, which, if concluded with the Pope, could not be less binding than if concluded with a railroad company; on the duty of every administration to observe compacts entered into by its predecessors, even after changes in the form of government; on the religious character of marriage; on the regards due to the sentiment of the Catholic majority of the Austrian people, to the martyr-like character of Pius IX., one of the contracting parties, and to the august character of the other, the reigning Emperor, who must not be compelled to repudiate his own signature; on the necessity, in the exhausted and still perilous condition of the state, of avoiding a conflict with the head of the Church, which might not only lead to dangerous agitations "in huts and palaces," but also to humiliations and losses like those suffered by Prussia and Holland in similar conflicts in our century, and possibly to a general conflagration threatening the dissolution of the empire; and finally on the impolicy of cutting through, instead of solving, knotty questions, and of imitating Joseph II., whose attempt proved so disastrous a failure, or the reformers of 1848, who tried to break down the altar in order to reach and assail the throne. On their side, the advocates of the law emphasized the inalienable rights of man, and especially of the state, which can limit for a time, but not indefinitely surrender, its sovereignty; the distinction between ceding, by contracts, the property of individuals or states, and ceding, for the future, their liberty and self-rule; the absurdity of the idea of treaties like the concordat remaining eternally in force in spite of all changes of circumstances, opinions, and forms of government; the nullity of the concordat as concluded, on the part of Austria, by unauthorized, unconstitutional agencies, in a reign which began with a constitutional compact never legally abrogated; the entirely changed relations of both contracting parties, of which one has now lost all, and the other most, of its possessions in Italy; the requirements of the new constitutional system on the basis of which Austria is to be regenerated; the advantages of making the church and the state independent of each other, which would not only restore the sovereignty of the latter, but also raise the moral authority and the true dignity of the former; the often experienced uselessness of negotiations with Rome for rescinding the concordat by common consent; and the impolicy of spurning the moderate demands of the liberal portions of the Austrian people, which, if rejected, would be followed by more exacting clamors, of refusing to remove from the empire a mark of bondage which made it so unpopular abroad, or of exposing it, by compelling the ministry to resign, to a crisis of the utmost peril. These arguments prevailed, and on a second division the liberal cause triumphed by a majority of sixty-nine votes against thirty-four. In favor of the bill voted, among others: two Princes and two Counts Auersperg, Count Chotek, Prince Czartoryski, Count Degenfeld, Landgrave Fürstenberg, Lieutenant-Field-Marshal Gablenz, the old poet Grillparzer, Count Hartig, Field-Marshal Hess, Prince Hohenlohe, Prince Kinsky, ex-Minister Krauss, Prince Liechtenstein, Count Meran, Count Potocki, Baron Rothschild, Oldgrave Salm, Chevalier Schmerling, Admiral Tegethoff, Count Oswald Thurn, Count Waldstein, Count Wickenburg, and Count Wrbna, Jr.

The announcement of this result was received by the crowds in and around the House with outbursts of rapturous enthusiasm. The whole city soon became a scene of feverish excitement. In the evening it was illuminated. The prominent defenders of the law received "ovations." Similar scenes took place in other cities of the empire. At last accounts this general current of popular enthusiasm had not yet subsided, in spite of protests and remonstrances by the clergy, in face of which the ministry, with unshaken determination, was vigorously pressing its cycle of anti-concordat laws through both houses of the legislature. The imperial sanction was expected to be given to all at once, an event which would be the definite conclusion of one of the most disastrous and disgraceful periods in the history of Austria, and would put the seal upon the novel union of the house of Hapsburg with liberty. There are still some who doubt the final consummation of this surprising metamorphosis, and many who doubt its possible duration; but so wonderfully checkered has been the political life of the Austrian empire in the last twenty years, so vital have already been its changes in the last two, and so obviously necessary has liberty become to its future existence, threatened as it is by the Panslavism of Russia and the Pangermanism of Prussia, that a more hopeful view seems also to be a more rational one.

THE BEAUTY OF AMERICAN EDITORS.

THERE are people who have laughed at it, but no one, so far as we know, has seriously set about disproving it, that we, as a people, are able, or, before the flood of foreign immigration set in upon us, were able, to jump to a greater height, come down harder, swim farther, dive deeper, hold our breath longer, come up drier, and scream louder than the British or French or Dutch, or indeed than the Chinese or the subjects of any of the more hoary monarchies. They do say that, as a general thing, we are born easier than foreigners. To be sure, this is not proved beyond doubt, likely as it looks; only one of our magazines says it. That is, as yet; even while we pen these lines it may be going into print wherever the national banner is flung to the breeze—from Alaska to a point on the coast near Beaufort, South Carolina, and across our vast country the other way; from this city or Portland to Galveston. At any rate, whether or not the proof of our exceptionally easy entrance upon life is at this present moment in process of speedy completion, no one will doubt that we die hard, nor that our lives are considerably longer than those of persons over whom is thrown the blighting shadow of thrones and bastilles. American Longevity can proudly lay her hand on statistical tables and boldly appeal to insurance offices to establish that fact. But what ought, we think, to thrill us more than any of the considerations above enumerated, is the fact that, in the matter of extraordinary personal beauty, we are superior to any race on the planet—so far as known. The British Miss Martineau, when she was in this country contemplating our free institutions, confessed the handsomeness of our leading statesmen and most prominent citizens. The same thing has been said by other women, both English and Continental European, in repeated instances; and, of course, in such a matter women are the proper judges. As regards our American women, their pre-eminency is universally admitted. They are the belles of the French court; we have known Germans to cry for them; several of them have married gentlemen from Italy, the land of ideal beauty; and, as for the English, even a Saturday Reviewer has just acknowledged that after gazing upon our women, the Englishman can understand, though he cannot commend, Hawthorne's having so low an opinion of Mrs. Bull's face and figure.

This, we say, we esteem our proudest boast. To be born easy may be no more than accident; to live long may be only to add years of feeble sinfulness to years of energetic crime, and at the best is but to increase labor and sorrow; to excel in jumping high or to be capable of holding the breath for a longer time than people of another nation is pleasant enough, and cause for satisfaction within reasonable limits, but it does not of necessity prove us morally more admirable than they, more magnanimous, wise, and good. Strength, courage, agility, intellectual greatness, may coexist with extreme wickedness; and after all there is no one, child of freedom or monarchist, who does not acknowledge goodness as the truly admirable and honorable, and regard immorality as a reproach to any nation.

Now, physical beauty, in the true sense of the word, in the sense, at any rate, in which it must be that the enlightened witnesses we have cited conceived of it, is but the fleshly manifestation of an inward, spiritual beauty. So, of necessity, the handsomest race and nation is the one with most of moral excellence, most of spontaneous sweetness and goodness, and most capacity for virtue. Foreigners, then, let us say—we do not spend too much time on the various steps of our argument,—foreigners make a serious mistake if they fancy that the content and pleasure which we Americans feel in the consciousness of the national handsomeness arise from gratified pride and vanity, or even from an artistic delight in our physical comeliness as mere comeliness. It is rather an inferential and virtuous joy and rejoicing, based on our knowledge that underlying our external graces are mines of moral beauty of which those external graces are the visible expression. Keeping this in mind, the world outside of the Republic will be able to account for our superiority in personal advantages and our complacent avowal of the fact; and will be able to account for both on a theory more just and honorable to us and less displeasing to them than the one which very likely they are holding now.

If, now, the nation which is most advanced in goodness is the handsomest, and if the American is the nation most advanced in goodness, it may well be that the two hundred gentlemen of the press who banquetted with Mr. Dickens possessed singular charms of form and feature. For no prudent man will deny the virtuousness of the editorial fraternity. For, as has been said a day or two since, by one of themselves, the editor in the United States, "viewed as a laborer in a vast field, deserves the prayers of good people in the task to which he puts his brains and his pen." For "he seeks to elevate and bless men;" and "he does elevate and bless them;" and "patiently, courteously, and genially he labors on, day and night, to give us each day that without which we could not live as communities half as well as we could survive without our meals;" and "we are making the most of our daily lives by what he gives us every morning;" and "he is still at work mining the ore and stamping the coin for our use without failure and without faltering. God bless the editor." After this there is no need of our saying more as to the American editorial character; but it will do no harm, and to some minds it will strengthen the editorial claim to the highest honors paid to unfaltering courage, to patience, to self-sacrifice for the elevation and blessing of others, to constant, genial courtesy—which may be described as Christianity made hard to one and made easy to everybody else—it may, we say, strengthen the editorial claim to such honors if we illustrate and confirm by a single particular instance the validity of the general eulogium above cited. The Memphis Avalanche uses this language, in welcoming to Tennessee certain editors of this city. We change the name, for among his other traits the American editor counts modesty. The Avalanche says: "Jackson Mulholland, Shield of the Right! Buckler of the Constitution! Champion of Truth! He is in the South. He has the admiration of brave men, the love of our women. His character is refulgent and untarnished, and he > . . . "Stands like the sun when all around > Drinks life, and light, and glory from his aspect."

And yet, strong as this is, probably there is not an editor in the profession who does not feel confident that, as a Shield of the Right, Mr. Mulholland would, on a fair trial, be unable, as they say in Texas, to "set him half a turn back."

The object of the Avalanche's praises was not, we think, present at the Dickens dinner, and we are without information as to the particular style of his indubitable handsomeness. But of those who were present we have minute descriptions by means of which we learn, as we have said, that their lineaments fitly body forth the soul of loveliness, the moral dignity which, as we see, is theirs. Quite delightful it is to think that among the very last things which Mr. Dickens saw in our country was the remarkable array of beauty described by the observer we have mentioned.

In a seat near the writer sat "one of the editorial writers on that sheet, nearly opposite Mr. Dolby. He has a handsome head of black hair, a moustache and imperial. He wears glasses, and has a happy way of making himself agreeable." Near him was an editor who is "the well-known dramatist," who has beautiful black "hair as straight and glossy as an Indian's; his features are as regular and handsome as a girl's." Not far off was the well-known editor of a handsome monthly, "a man of keen wit," "genial character," and "great executive talent." It is not strange that "his eye is famous for its beauty," and it looks out of "a head less than forty years old." Not a head of hair, for a wonder. It is very noticeable that the particular glory of beauty which seems to have affected our observer most powerfully was that one which he would call "hirsute honors." It suggests to us an idle question as to him himself; whether, for example, he is crowned with "glossy black hair and a moderately heavy moustache and imperial of the same color;" or boasts "hair rich and black as a raven's wing, parted in the middle and curled in beautiful ringlets," while "a deep black moustache contrasts finely with his pale face;" or whether he rejoices in "dark hair, and a heavy and long, light moustache, the ends of which stand out from his face;" or prefers "dark hair, with a black beard which he confines to the under part of his chin;" or "shaves his cheeks, leaving a fine moustache and full chin-whiskers (hair of a dark brown color);" or whether, as it might be if he has passed the period of youth, "his hair is mixing grey with its darker hue," and "his moustache and side-whiskers are iron-grey;" or, as would be natural in case he is of "a fair blonde, almost childish complexion," his hair is straight and light brown, or "light hair with English side-whiskers," or "dark brown hair parted nearly in the centre." Our own belief is that he is perfectly bald. That fear occurs to the reader who notes how, as certainly as if he had been a hair-dresser, the luxuriance of the editorial locks agitates him. Here, under our eye, is as good an example of the relative value which he sets upon tresses as can be given: "This gentleman was decidedly the most impressive man in his personal appearance who sat at any table of the Dickens dinner on Saturday night. . . . His head is a massive one. . . Add to his massive head a full, wavy mass of dark brown hair, and a very full, very long, and very luxuriant beard."

But we have no uncontrollable wish to be impertinent in our remarks. Doubtless the reporter's laying peculiar emphasis upon beards, moustaches, and hair is quite consistent with his never having been inside a barber's shop, and with his being able to sit on his back-hair when he lets it down. For of the various components of beauty—which, as has been said, we Americans possess in such combination that we are handsomer than any other collection of men and women—it is not to be forgotten that in some special traits we fall short—we may as well confess to the supremacy of the American dentist over his foreign rivals—and it is not less to be remembered that the one in which we are hardest to beat is our hair. The barber of a foreign seaport town will tell you that, of all the people of various nationalities who pass through his hands, the race most careful of its hair, which adorns it most, and takes most pains with it, is the American. Our beards are the wonder of the close-shaven European giaours, and the admiration of such as attempt rivalship; they win us the respect of the Turk even, whose father's beard is a part of his religion, and whose own is the object of an almost sacred care. Many a deck-hand on a Western steamboat wears a moustache that a sedulous Austrian major of cavalry might envy; many a Sunday-school picnic in Massachusetts shows a rich variety of colors and textures in "heads" that would shame a Parisian shop-window full of chignons. It is not surprising, therefore, that a person taking down notes of the personal appearance of a number of American editors, intending to publish them, if he could get permission to do so; not consciously taking them for the purpose of illustrating any theory, but simply to show us what his eye saw—it is not surprising, we say, that he should have spent his strength upon the hair, moustache, and beard. To sum up the argument: beauty of hair, moustache, and beard is chief among the constituents of our national beauty; it is the good who are the beautiful; editors are best among the good; editors ought, then, to be very beautiful and pretty hairy; but it is editors whom our observer was describing; therefore he did well, and is not necessarily bald or a barber because he devotes himself with enthusiasm to hair.

No theory of national application is to be scrutinized too strictly in all its details; and no rule is without exceptions. There are unmoral, even immoral, gentlemen of the press in this country—men foul-mouthed and impudent, rather than courteous, patient, and modest; servers of party—the property of politicians, rather than Shields of the Right; innocent of knowledge, devoid of taste, without high ambitions, rather than honest instructors of the people; accepters of bribes, reckless of truth—persons, therefore, whose outside man would hardly prepossess an inspector of it. And good men may, it is not denied, be of uncomely appearance. We are pleased to notice, however, that our observer does not seek out such to gloat over the homeliness consequent on their deviations from virtue. He is as easy as possible, finding some good to say of every one. If a man is not a model of beauty he is, at any rate, "thick-set;" or he has "a full suit of black, swallow-tailed coat and all;" or he "is brother of the celebrated Orange Judd;" or he is "dressed in the most exquisite taste, having the most Frenchy look of any gentleman present;" or "no man fills a chair better;" or he "tells nice stories of actors and actresses;" or he is, "a stranger would think, a thoroughly genial companion;" or he "can be merry betimes," and is writing a life of General Grant, or there is some other redeeming point about him.

As for our moral—we hardly know. Much logic of a close kind is as fatiguing as loose logic. If inconsequence may be pardoned for a moment, we should say that something like this would be a passably good moral: "Exercise much discretion as to the sort of man you let take a seat among your guests;" or this: "Mind with whom you eat;" or this might do: "Here's to the press; nothing can make it disgusting but itself."

ENGLAND.

LONDON, April 10, 1868.

THE Irish Church is to become the great bone of political contention for the next few months or, it may be, years. The relations between the church and the state are so complicated that they cannot be summarily altered by any single act of legislation. There are innumerable vested interests which require careful handling and afford abundant opportunity for protracted party fights. If Mr. Disraeli and his party choose to take advantage of every defensive position offered by the nature of the case, they may continue the struggle for years; and perhaps the best hope for a speedy termination lies in Mr. Disraeli's character for insincerity. He may, it is hoped, be disposed once more to undertake the "education" of his party and lead them into a position from which they are at present inclined to shrink.

It must be said that the progress hitherto made does not hold out much hopes for this result. It is a satisfactory circumstance that the Liberal party have rallied upon the main point and have carried the first division by a decisive majority. They must, however, count upon a dogged opposition. The Government tactics showed Mr. Disraeli's usual acuteness, though on this occasion he went too far and rather outwitted himself. The manœuvring was instructive. Lord Stanley was first put up to effect a diversion. His high character for independence and for a certain cool common-sense has been more than once put to good use by Mr. Disraeli. Last session, for example, before the true character of the Government bill was known, he declared that Government would never consent to household suffrage, and his words were received with a confidence which would scarcely have been given to the Prime Minister. As I need not say, the confidence was deceived, and Lord Stanley's reputation was so far injured to no purpose. On the present occasion he has done himself still more harm by condescending to be turned into a catspaw. He proposed an amendment and supported it by a speech which could only mean one thing, namely, that although nothing could well be done in the present Parliament, some modifications were imperatively necessary; and by "modifications" every one understood the depriving the State Church of some part of its endowment. This equivocal line of policy disgusted the Conservatives without pleasing the opposition. Lord Stanley (whose Church sentiments are suspected of undue liberality) put it forward with a hesitating manner which disgusted his followers. Lord Cranbourne, the Tory Abdiel, denounced his former colleague's speech with extreme bitterness, declaring it to be a symptom that the Irish Church was about to suffer from traitors in office, just as the British constitution had suffered a year ago. The attempt at evading a plain issue failed; and Mr. Disraeli's ministry thereupon accepted the line of uncompromising bigotry. They practically threw over Lord Stanley's guidance, and raised the cry of "no surrender." They explained that "modifications" merely meant a different arrangement of church property within the Church, but by no means an abandonment of a single penny that belonged to it. Mr. Gathorne Hardy (Mr. Gladstone's successor in the favor of the University of Oxford) rose to something like eloquence, and certainly called out the genuine party fervor in claiming the complete sanctity of the Church property, and maintaining that any and every interference with it was no better than sacrilege. Mr. Disraeli himself was obliged to follow suit in a strange speech, mixing, after his fashion, felicitous satire with the most astonishing series of pompous paradoxes. One bit of his political philosophy is characteristic enough to be noticed. It had been said with undeniable truth that the Church of Ireland was a badge of conquest. Mr. Disraeli replied that England, too, had been conquered by Cromwell and by William III., but that no one ever said that the Constitution of 1688 was a badge of conquest, or retained any rancor against Cromwell's party. When a prime minister, and a very able prime minister, talks nonsense which would degrade a clever lad at a debating club, one cannot but fancy that he must know it to be nonsense. And if that belief be well founded, we may yet see him escaping from a creed which is too flimsy to impose even upon himself, and abandoning a position which is plainly indefensible.

Meanwhile, the threats of dissolution which had been freely used in the ministerial papers, and more ambiguously suggested by Mr. Disraeli himself, seem to have died away; and the ministry, although in a minority, will continue to struggle against the inevitable without appealing to the country. They affect to hope that the Protestant bigotry of England may still be awakened, and that the new Parliament may relieve the besieged garrison of the Irish Church. I think that their expectations will be as signally falsified as will their pleasant delusion that a lower class of society than that which now enjoys the franchise will prove to be more conservative. We shall see before long; and, meanwhile, speculations are not very useful. It is plain that the Tory party has now got into a position where the only effectual arguments are majorities. They are planted immovably in the most dogged British prejudices, and they cannot be reasoned out of this stronghold, though they may be forcibly expelled from it. At least, if Mr. Disraeli is equal to the task of inducing them to come out of themselves, he will prove himself a greater conjurer than any one has yet suspected.

The most remarkable change amongst the political leaders is still the improving position of Mr. Bright. In speaking to the Conservatives he has lately adopted an amusingly encouraging tone. He speaks to them as a father might speak to a boy unwilling to take his advice. See, he says, how naughty you were—how you refused free trade and the lowering of the franchise, and declared that they were too nasty to be swallowed. Now you have taken them you find that, instead of a nasty pill, I was really giving you something to do you good. Pray trust me, and take this one dose more! The remarkable thing is that the Conservatives seem to like this language, and have cheered Mr. Bright almost as much as his own side. When the next change of ministry takes place, Mr. Bright must undoubtedly occupy a conspicuous place.

Coming events, we all know, cast their shadows before; and the influence of a new Parliament is not equivocally felt in these questions. The Conservatives have become more malleable; they fight with the consciousness that in another year they may have to receive laws from a very different set of masters. I may notice one or two small incidents which go to illustrate the resulting change. Thus, it has scarcely been remarked that flogging has at last disappeared from the English army—at least in time of peace. The cat o'-nine tails has died without a struggle; scarcely a tear has been shed above its grave; and yet it was not long since it was one of the many palladia of the British constitution. Various measures have lately been adopted tending to restrict its use; but its sudden abolition has passed almost without notice. Whatever may be said for flogging from an abstract point of view, it had the plain disadvantage of forming the greatest popular argument against enlistment; and in an army which depends entirely upon voluntary recruiting, that disadvantage should be conclusive. Add the fact that the friends and relatives of floggable persons will now have a direct influence on the election of members of Parliament, and the abolition of the cat is easily explained.

Another symptom of coming changes is rather more curious. The House of Lords has suddenly awakened to the consciousness that it is rather behind the times. It has been going to sleep and doing nothing. It has not ventured for years to take any determined stand; it has thrown out a few bills which had passed the Commons, but only when they were bills about which no popular feeling was excited; in short, it has confined itself to acting in a very humble way as a drag. The natural consequence is that the attendance in the House is generally scanty. Except on a few grand field-nights, the noble chamber of the Lords is filled by less than a score of old gentlemen, who take good care to get their work over by dinner-time. In the House of Commons the benches become thin at that sacred hour, but there is always some one ready to talk even to thin benches in so powerful an assembly. No one will take the trouble to raise his voice in the utter wilderness of the House of Lords. Occasionally, it is true, a more important debate is raised by some of the legal luminaries, who rouse themselves from their dignified repose to express an opinion on some question of law; and with such men as Lord Cairns and Lord Westbury as members, supported by some of the most distinguished of English lawyers, the House of Lords may at such rare intervals sustain a comparison with the lower chamber. As a rule, it is a picture of indolent repose. I do not suppose that the disease admits of a remedy by any measure short of giving more real weight to the opinion of the House. It has been felt, however, that the scandal has been much increased by the use of proxies. When the opinion of the peers who have actually shared in a debate has been upset by the voices of those who were absent, the decision certainly loses moral authority; and the possibility of exercising their legislative influence in this way enables a large part of the peerage to pass their noble existences with few and rare visits to the House, and to content themselves with handing over their share of legislative power to their friends. Proxies are therefore to be abolished for the future, and if a noble lord wants to vote he must take the trouble of coming to the House. Other rules of a more technical character are meant to secure a better attendance upon the committees at which private business is despatched, and it is hoped that by this means some of the most glaring scandals of our hereditary legislation will be removed.

One other reform would do more to set the poor old upper chamber on its legs, and though it was scornfully rejected in the case of Lord Wensleydale some years ago, I think it may probably be heard of again. He received a life peerage, and the House of Lords indignantly refused to allow that the appointment was constitutional, fearing that if Government could make peers for life without ennobling a man's descendants, they would have no scruple in a temporary swamping of the House of Lords. If things go on as they are, they ought to be too glad to secure an element of able men who could give some real weight to their debates. The divergence between the House of Lords and the Household Parliament is likely to be wider than that which at present exists between the chambers, and if the Upper House is not to sink even below its present insignificance, it must strengthen itself in some way to sustain competition with a popular assembly.

THE TREATY-MAKING POWER.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: As you have several times discussed a question, in relation to the public debt, in which it is supposed our national credit and reputation for good faith are involved, I venture to call your attention to the discussion of a kindred subject which does not seem to have attracted that careful scrutiny to which its nature and importance entitle it. I allude to the obligation of performing treaty stipulations and the supposed prerogative of the House of Representatives in such matters. Recent discussions in the House indicate that some respectable jurists entertain the opinion that when a treaty has been made by the President and ratified by the Senate, there is yet a complete and constitutional discretion in the House whether it will make the necessary appropriation to carry the treaty into effect.

Among their many great and undoubted benefits, it is one of the evils of all written constitutions that they have a tendency to limit the range of legal study and of legal views. Some of our most conscientious public men are in the habit of treating great questions of public law as if some one clause of the Constitution of the United States contained and expressed all the law in the world on that subject.

In all constitutional governments, and especially in those with written constitutions, there are two sorts of checks. One is the strictly constitutional, the positive, the expressed negative—the affirmative check distinctly provided for. The other is the negative check, the check of silence, inaction—felt not by what is done but by what is not done. Of the first kind is a disagreement of the two Houses, the veto of the President, the dissent of the Senate where its assent is required, and some judgments of the courts upon constitutional questions. Of the second kind would be the refusal of Congress, or its failure, to appropriate money, or levy troops, to carry on a war; and a more violent example would be the omission of the States to send senators to Congress, by which the operation of the Government would be suspended.

Under the Constitution no money can be paid out of the Treasury but by virtue of a law appropriating it, and no money can be either raised or appropriated without the consent and the action of the House. This has led some to the conclusion that foreign nations must be held to treat with us in view of this fact, and that, whether they have it in view or not, it confers on the House a constitutional and rightful discretion whether a treaty shall be carried into effect. This view does not embrace the whole case.

A public debt can only be created by virtue of law, or by the exercise of a power conferred by law. When created, its only effect and its only security is a pledge of the public faith, the public honor, the public sense of justice. Although created by law, it is not legally binding in the sense of being enforced by a legal sanction, or calling into activity a definite legal remedy, or being the command of a superior. The individual creditor can only petition, the sovereign creditor is remitted to the last resort.

Sovereign nations, as independent, equal, free bodies politic, have their own agencies and organs of outward manifestation to their neighbors and coequals for effecting any desired agreement. The usual form of that agreement is a treaty. The mode adopted by each for thus binding itself under the public law of the world is that part of its own exterior public law which it may make for itself, and which others must take notice of, and which they are supposed to have in view when treating. The mode adopted by each for carrying the treaty into effect in matters requiring separate action, and which the treaty cannot regulate, is that public internal law, and that corresponding municipal enactment, which others are not required to consider, and cannot be held to have treated with any view to it. So much of the Constitution as regulates the making of treaties is thus specially addressed to foreign nations, while so much of the Constitution as relates to raising and appropriating money refers to all financial affairs, and as much to one public debt as to another—it is interior law.

In some countries the crown alone makes treaties; in some, as in small republics, the senate alone makes them, and in some two departments of the government, executive and legislative, are required to concur. In some, where legislative ratification is necessary, it applies only to certain treaties, as those appertaining to the public domain. Thus each selects for itself its own mode of obliging itself by treaty, and all others must notice that mode But it would be as impracticable, as it would be unjust to one and derogatory to the other, to give to internal municipal action the effect now claimed for it in the House.

From the foregoing premises and from the Constitution, from the practice of the Government, from various judicial opinions, and from standard and approved commentaries, may be drawn the following conclusions:

In the United States the treaty-making power is vested exclusively in the President and the Senate, and a treaty made and ratified by them becomes a part of the supreme law of the land. Whether this is a wise and safe provision is a political question not now involved, but which was fully discussed in framing and adopting the Constitution.

A debt contracted or any money promise made by such a treaty necessarily occupies precisely the same position as any other public debt or money engagement entered into by law, a treaty being as much a law for this purpose as a statute authorizing a loan.

Therefore, the House has precisely the same power over such a debt, the same discretion as to paying it, that it has over the payment of the bonds for the public debt—using payment in its general sense, without reference to the question whether it shall be in gold or greenbacks. The bonds cannot be paid without an appropriation, and that appropriation cannot be made without the consent of the House.

A treaty which creates or defines the rights of certain persons in or to certain things, may and must be, on proper occasion, directly acted upon by the courts, which take judicial notice of it as a part of the supreme law of the land. But a treaty which promises that something shall be done internationally, as the payment of money, or infra-territorially, as a municipal enactment or regulation, or other matter requiring executive or political action, cannot be executed by the courts, but is a promise by one sovereign to another, with no guarantee but that of good faith, and depends upon the political department of the government for execution. The foundation of this difference between judicial and political execution is, that one affects men and things, and the other external, international obligations. But that which is supreme law for one department of the government is supreme law to the other. A president or a judge might be impeached for openly and wantonly violating a treaty or disregarding it. A legislator cannot and ought not to be arraigned for voting or not voting a particular way, but it is a question with his conscience and his constituents whether he has obeyed the law of the land.

A money promise made to a foreign government by a treaty is just as much a public debt, and rests quite as plainly on the supreme law of the land, as if it had been promised in a statute passed by both Houses of Congress, or even in an amendment to the Constitution. The question of appropriating money to pay the debt remains precisely the same, and the relations of the House to that question would be precisely the same in each case.

Finally, in most countries, as in England, the treaty-making power, embracing, of course, the power to promise whatever can be promised by a treaty, is vested exclusively in the crown; while performance of the promise, when it does not embrace mere executive action, or money is required to carry the treaty into effect, depends on the concurring legislation of Parliament. In our case the power to promise, and to put the promise on a footing with statutes and the Constitution, an effect not given to treaties in most other countries, is with the President and Senate; while House, Senate, and President must concur in performance. But non-performance, in the case of a treaty promise to pay money, is just as much a refusal to pay a debt lawfully contracted as would be the non-payment of bonds for money borrowed by authority of a Congressional statute.

To what extent we should be injured by a refusal to comply with a treaty negotiated in the way provided by our own Constitution, how much it would affect our financial standing and our diplomatic influence abroad, and how much our diplomacy would be crippled by practically compelling the treaty-making power to take, in advance, the sense of the House on all such measures, are political questions of fact which do not fall within this discussion. Similar considerations, though not in the same degree, should make the Senate very careful in declining to ratify treaties negotiated at our own instance. Y.

BERLIN, PRUSSIA, April 7, 1868.

[We think our correspondent attaches rather too much importance to the moral aspect of the reluctance of the House to pay for Alaska. Failure to pay for it could hardly affect our financial standing abroad to the same degree as failure to pay our bonds, for the simple reason that, in the case of Alaska, if the money is not paid, the goods are returned. In the other case, we have borrowed money and spent it, and are not able to return it. Of course, if we keep Alaska and do not pay for it, it will be a swindle, and we believe a unique swindle, on the part of somebody.—ED. NATION.]

THE WEST IN FAVOR OF REPUDIATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Let me assure you your earnestness in fighting repudiation has by no means been expended upon phantoms. Repudiation is a scheme dearly cherished in parts of the West, and especially is it dear to the Democratic party.

Some day, if the opportunity offers, words and threats will be put in actual deeds of legislation.

If your correspondent, "S. C.," believes men in the West are too good to tamper with the national credit, I would beg to call his attention to the recent enactments of the Ohio Legislature. Do you suppose that men who, in the face of facts and the very foundation principles of a republican form of government, can disfranchise the voting colored people of this State, or snatch from the hands of students at institutions of learning and soldiers at soldiers' homes the ballot, will hesitate a moment to rob the widows and orphans as well as the rich bondholders?

From these diabolical acts let us learn a lesson on a miniature scale what the ruling party of this State will do if it ever becomes the ruling party of the United States. We certainly can have or can need no better warning. Our nation's credit can be kept good only by keeping its promises. Lenders of money will respect it when it becomes a sure and profitable investment. The United States will be able to borrow money at as low rates as other nations as soon as the rates of other investments are equally reduced. The supply certainly has something to do with the demand in this case.

If we can receive eight or ten per cent. on deposits and twelve and fourteen on safe loans, we certainly should be foolish to buy insecure national bonds at five and six per cent. in gold. The fact is, the United States is borrowing money cheaper to-day than any other nation, if we consider the rates of interest usual in the West. Repudiation ought to be sounded from the East; but there is no denying it, it is a child of the West.

In the midst of this corruption of the Democracy it behooves all to watch with an eagle eye the next Presidential election, and as far as possible to put the right men of principle in important places of public trust.

Yours very truly, J. S. PALMER.

DISHONESTY IN OFFICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Referring to my letter in the Nation of April 16 and your note thereto, I beg to state that in expressing a desire on the part of the West to see the "management of the revenues committed to honest men," I did not intend to make personal allusion to the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to any individual whomsoever. I believe with you that Mr. McCulloch is both honest and capable; and I believe that a large majority of his subordinates are worthy of the same commendation.

Yet I propose to justify the words quoted above, as follows:

The distillation of spirits was for many years an important part of the business of this city. In 1860 there were seven distilleries running here; capital invested, $700,000; annual product, 5,000,000 gallons; value of annual product, about $1,500,000. There are now eleven distilleries here in running order; capital invested, say $1,000,000; annual capacity, 8,000,000 gallons; value of legitimate annual product, eqclusive of tax, about $2,500,000. But not one of these establishments is in operation; most of them have been closed for over two years; thousands of barrels of spirits are lying here in bonded warehouses, the owners not being willing to pay the tax and put them upon the market. The tax is $2 per gallon; the market price, tax paid (!), is $1 65.

Let us assume the cost of carriages manufactured in New Haven to be $500; and let us suppose a law enacted imposing a tax of 600 per centum on carriages; the proper value of a carriage would then be $3,500. If afterward new carriages should be everywhere offered for sale at $2,500, each bearing a revenue officer's certificate that $3,000 tax had been paid on it; if New Haven makers closed their shops, as they would be compelled to do in such a case; and if some one, in view of these and similar facts all over the country, should say that a wish prevailed at a certain point of the compass to have the "management of the revenues committed to honest men," where would be the harm? The phrase is unobjectionable, I think, provided "management" be taken distributively, as applicable to all concerned in carrying out the revenue laws.

Not to make a longer digression from my original subject, repudiation, I heartily approve your views as to the need of a general reform in the civil service, of which the management of the revenues is but a branch, and so close. S. C.

THE GREAT TREES OF CALIFORNIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION

The age of the Sequoiæ (misprinted Seguoya) is greatly overstated in your interesting article in last issue. The rings of annual growth have been repeatedly counted on the stump of the giant which was cut down in the Calaveras Grove in 1853, and alluded to in your article as the "Old Maid." They do not exceed 1255, but as a portion at the centre is decayed, it is safe to say that the age of the tree was not less than 1300 years, nor was it probably much, if at all, older than this. Hooker and other early writers were led into a very natural error respecting the age of these trees from counting the rings in a section cut from near the outer diameter and from the number of rings in a foot of thickness, computing the number for the radius of ten or fifteen feet. This mode of computation overlooked the important fact that the rapidity of growth greatly diminished as the age of the tree advanced. Hence fifty years in the first century of the age of one of the monarchs of the forest occupied as much space on the radius as two centuries or more near the outer circumference. Moreover, it is a curious fact, but natural enough, that these annual growths make a sort of meteorological register, chronicling the more or less favorable seasons of growth, corresponding to periods of extreme drouth or to very favorable seasons. Thus, several rings in succession are of about identical thickness, indicating a uniform condition of growth; then may follow one or two of remarkable magnitude, and again several of very noticeable narrowness, one or two perhaps indicating a period of almost entire rest. It would be both curious and instructive to compare these natural records with known periods of extreme drouth and rainfall, of which several have been observed since the occupation of the country by Europeans, about ninety years. Should such a comparison show coincidences with these known meteorological epochs, starting from a given date, as 1853, when the Calaveras tree was felled, it would be easy to fix the exact date of all periods of greatly diminished or increased growth, and from these data possibly some law of succession in the order of such events might be evolved.

The diameter of the particular tree in question, at the base, is said to have been 30 feet before the bark was removed. A portion of the shaft now resting upon the ground was six feet above the roots, twenty-six feet through, also without the bark. This tree was cut down by the use of large augers boring holes as close side by side as possible, the labor of five men for twenty-five working days being required to accomplish the work. No other of the big trees in either the Calaveras or Mariposa Grove has been cut down. The "Mother of the Forest," also in the Calaveras Grove, was stripped of its bark for 116 feet upwards from the ground. This tree is now dead, of course, the scaffolding by which the perilous work of removing the bark was accomplished still standing, and thus denuded measures 78 feet in circumference and 327 feet in height. It was a section of the bark from this tree which was shown in New York in 1853–4, and which was afterwards set up at Sydenham Palace, London, where it was destroyed by fire.

All the trees of notable magnitude in the Calaveras Grove have been named by various visitors, some of them absurdly enough, from various statesmen and persons of local fame, while others bear the names of WASHINGTON, BRYANT, LONGFELLOW, etc. One group is distinguished by the names of TORREY, GRAY, and DANA, neatly engraved on tablets of marble attached to the shafts, twenty feet from the ground; and with equally good taste another group carries the names of HOOKER, LINDLEY, and HUMBOLDT.

A very erroneous notion has obtained credence that the number of these gigantic trees in California is very restricted. On the contrary, they are found in great numbers at a certain elevation of from 5,000 to 6,000 feet or more, all the way from the Calaveras Grove, near Murphy's, southward into Tulare County, over a hundred and fifty miles in extent, dotted here and there among the stately "sugar pine" and magnificent spruce trees. The observations of Messrs. Brewer, King, and Gardner, of the Geological Survey, have added greatly to our knowledge of the geographical range of this magnificent tree, while the superb photographs by Watkins, of San Francisco, have made the portraits of the grizzly giant and other "wood gods" of that region familiar to many both here and abroad.

There is a curious sort of tannin surrounding the minute seeds of this gigantic Sequoia, which is perfectly soluble in water, giving a fine reddish-purple ink, which flows well from the pen. This substance has never been chemically examined. If the mustard seed was deemed worthy of mention for minuteness as compared with the plant which grew from it, what will be said of the seed of the Sequoia, which hardly exceed in magnitude those of the mustard! The cones of this conifer are rarely over two inches in length by one inch in diameter.

ONE WHO IS PERSONALLY FAMILIAR WITH THE FACTS.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MOORHEAD, SIMPSON & BOND announce "Alethitheras; or, Travels by Land and Sea"—a satirical work, of which the author's name is not given. ——Charles Scribner & Co. announce a novel, entitled "Margaret: a Story of Life on a Prairie Farm." It is by a new American author.—— Mr. Lawrence Kehoe, our readers will be glad to hear, intends issuing a volume of the later poems of Aubrey De Vere—the best of Ireland's recent poets, and to Protestants as readable a Catholic author in poetry as Newman is in prose.

——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt have put Fritz Reuter's "In the Year '13" into cloth, and Mr. Bristed's "Interference Theory of Government" into paper, for the reason that the one deserves more than a transient reading, and the other more than a limited circulation among those who would choose to pay a dollar for it in cloth. We have already indicated why we should be very glad of an extensive sale for both these books, which of course belong under very different categories. The novel with the awkward title is one of the most artistic and pleasing bits of history to be found, we think, in any literature. Mr. Bristed's pamphlet is valuable for the freedom and independence which he generally brings to the discussion of any subject, and for its drawing attention to certain tendencies of our society which need to be seriously considered in the light of all attained and attainable experience, whether Mr. Bristed is right or wrong in opposing them. A new and revised edition within the means of almost everybody ought not to lie long unsold on the shelves of the publishers. The same house have issued a cloth-bound edition, in four volumes of the well-known Tauchnitz size, of the sermons of the late F. W. Robertson. In this pretty edition four books, eminently fit for companions, put on a most companionable appearance.

——The success of Fletcher and Kidder's "Brazil and the Brazilians," lately reviewed by us in its sixth edition, and now issued in its eighth, is merited, if only for the pains which the editors take to keep the book abreast of the progress of the Empire, and so maintain its value both as a guide-book and a history. In their present preface they call attention to the two great commercial reforms by which the Amazon has been opened, since Sept. 7, 1867, to the flags of all nations throughout its course, and the coast trade likewise from Pará to Rio Grande do Sul. "The result of the new policy is beyond the most sanguine expectation. The exports and imports of Pará for October and November, 1867, were double those of 1866," and greater developments may of course be expected. Emigration, too, say the editors, is getting systematized, and, with all the mistakes that have been made and false anticipations indulged, "many Southerners have succeeded and are succeeding in Brazil." The number of slaves has been diminished 1,600,000 since 1853, leaving 1,400,000 to be emancipated ere long. An important aid to abolition is the direct taxation which the Paraguayan war has rendered compulsory. This conflict "has done more to give Brazil a national feeling than any event since 1822," and its "history and aims have been more persistently misrepresented than those of any other war of modern times," our civil war excepted. Passing from which to coffee and cotton, the editors report, as Agassiz has done, the prizes awarded to Brazil for these products at the Paris Exposition, where also the drug Guaraná attracted much notice as an anti-febrile remedy. Prof. Laboulaye has offered to write an introduction for a French translation of this work.

——Dr. Francis Lieber, whose works on political science are well known, has lately circulated a very brief and compact essay on "The National Polity as the Normal Type of Modern Government." His main thesis is that the national polity is to our own epoch what the feudal system was to the Middle Ages, and, under certain conditions, the city-state to antiquity —the characteristic form of the political development of the period. Connected with the national polity, he remarks, as characteristic of the modern epoch, "the general endeavor to define more clearly, and to extend more widely, human rights and civil liberty;" and further, the flourishing at one and the same time of many leading nations, each independent, yet together forming a community of nations under the restraint and protection of the law of nations, and in the bonds of a common civilization. The thought is not altogether novel, but it is one that deserves more attention than it has yet received from political students. The development of the national polity and the community of nations are not only marked features of the improvement in human relations in recent times, but indicate the growth of political and social conditions under which the progress of mankind is likely to become much more rapid, secure, and uninterrupted than in previous historical ages. It is worth noting that the word "nationality," which for the past twenty years has had so prominent a part in political discussions, is now used with a significance altogether different from its original meaning. A good definition of "nationality," in a political sense, is much needed. M. Cochut, in a paper on "Nationalities" in the Revue des Deux Mondes for August, 1866, ascribes to Madame de Staël the first use of the word in French in its modern meaning. We doubt if it is to be found used in its political sense in the works of any English author of repute, before the revolutions of 1848 brought it into European diplomacy.

——A bill has been introduced in the California Assembly projecting a university system on a more symmetrical and comprehensive scale than that of any of the older States of the Union. We gave in our last volume some account of the proposed voluntary disincorporation of the College of California in favor of the Agricultural College, when the latter should fairly come into existence. The bill provides for a State College of Agriculture, which is to be established first in order, a State College of Mechanic Arts, a State College of Mines, a State College of Civil Engineering, and perhaps others of a kindred nature; along with a State College of Letters, Colleges of Medicine, Law, etc., etc., all under the head of a State University. It is also wisely arranged that other colleges now or to be established may be affiliated with the University, the President of which will be ex officio a member of their faculties. Students may be received from them, examined, and awarded degrees for proficiency in either general or special branches of learning. A Board of Regents, twenty-two in number, will constitute the government of the University, embracing the Governor of the State, the Lieutenant-Governor, Speaker of the Assembly, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, President of the State Agricultural Society, President of the San Francisco Mechanics' Institute, eight members to be nominated by the Governor, and eight chosen by the foregoing fourteen. The endowments in land and money are already very large.

——Many of our readers must have met M. de Chabrol, a French gentleman of a Legitimist family, but in politics a Catholic democrat of the Montalembert school. He made a long visit to this country a year ago and devoted himself to a very careful examination of "our institutions," a task for which he was unusually well prepared both by nature and education. He has, since his return to France, published in the Correspondant, a Catholic monthly review, a very interesting paper on the "Political Parties in the United States," containing the result of his researches. The earlier portion of it, in which he sketches the history of the great political parties is exceedingly clear and accurate, and his statement of the immediate causes of the rebellion and of the condition of the political world since the close of the war displays not only great skill in arrangement, but a great deal of insight. In describing and explaining what he himself saw he is for obvious reasons less successful, and has frequently given way to that passion for generalizing which is the besetting sin of French political writers. For instance, it will pain the Tribune to hear that when Horace Greeley went bail for Jefferson Davis "more than six thousand subscribers at the Far-West at once stopped their paper." We ourselves, we confess, were not aware that one reason why the Irish are generally Democratic is that their love of city life and of the profession of "'longshoremen" makes them friends of foreign commerce and therefore of free trade. It will also be new to "all the most distinguished writers of the North," that they write for the New York Loyal Publication Society; and to the Harvard professors, that "during the war they wrote a series of articles which they sent every week to four hundred little country papers." The essay is marked by many inaccuracies of this kind, which take away somewhat from the weight of the author's conclusions, inasmuch as it is from a mass of details, each perhaps trifling in itself, that general conclusions, either in politics or society, are formed. But it is nevertheless a valuable contribution to the literature of the war, more vigorous though less accurate than M. Laugel's, but vastly superior in every way to anything produced by M. de Gasparin.

—Among recent historical works published in Germany we find mention of Johannes Scherr's "Ein Trauerspiel in Mexico" (The Mexican Tragedy); Leipsic: Wigand. It is a judicial examination of the parts taken by Napoleon and Maximilian respectively in the subjugation of Mexico, with liberal chastisement of their priestly abettors at Rome and in the "Terra Caliente." Scherr's estimate of the character of Maximilian is said to be uncommonly just. The same author publishes "1848–1851. Eine Komödie der Weltgeschichte" (A Comedy from the World's History), in three volumes, of which the treatment is much lighter than that of the work just cited, as the titles indicate. It has a prologue, full of sharp sallies; a prelude, involving inter alia the election of Pope Pius IX. in 1846, and the late King Ludwig's connection with Lola Montez; a development (Entwickelung), embracing the French Revolution in February, 1848, the infection of German liberalism, and the March revolutions in Vienna and Berlin. The second volume opens with the unravelling (Verwickelung), or the parliamentary contests; the third contains the winding up (Abwickelung), the triumph of reaction. In this dramatic form the author has great scope for reckless handling, of which he is sufficiently fond, and lays about him right and left, belaboring the priests, as before, with especial vigor.——Eduard Arnd publishes "Geschichte der Jahre 1860 bis 1867;" Leipsic: Duncker & Humblot. He had previously contributed to Becker's "History of the World" the history of the period 1848–1860, so that his present work is a direct continuation of the former, although other editors are now charged with the completion of Becker. Arnd's work is meeting with a lively sale, and is heartily commended for its clear exposés, sound judgments, and sure sightedness.——Engelmann publishes at Leipsic the third volume of S. Sugenheim's "Geschichte des deutschen Volkes und seiner Cultur von den ersten Anfängen historischer Kunde bis zur Gegenwart" (History of the German People and its Civilization from the beginning of historical knowledge to the present time). The first volume extended to Charlemagne, the second to the downfall of the Hohenstaufens; the present ends with the rise of modern history (1273–1477). The work is to be completed in three more volumes, and the author, by expressing his contempt for those who attempt great things without finishing them, seems to imply a determination to carry out his programme at all hazards.

—The Deutsches Wörterbuch of the brothers Grimm began to be published at Leipsic in 1852. It was to contain every word used in German literature from Luther to Goethe. Ten years were consumed in completing the first three volumes; the fourth and fifth are yet incomplete. Five years were required to produce Parts I. and II. of Vol. IV.; four years for Parts I.–VII. of Vol. V., which begins with the letter K. Part VII. has but just been published by Hirzel, and contains only so much of the vocabulary as is included between the words "Knirren" and "Kommen." R. Hildebrand has the eighth part in hand, and K. Weigand, at Giessen, the third and fourth of Vol. IV. These three, the publishers announce, will soon be through the press; but it is feared that nothing short of a national adoption of the undertaking will infuse into it life enough to encourage subscribers with the hope of seeing it completed.

—Friedrich Schmitt, a well-known teacher of singing in Munich, has published a work entitled "A New System for Learning German Pronunciation, with a New Classification of the Alphabet." The author complains that his countrymen pronounce their own language badly, and attributes it partly to the word-mangling of the nursery, partly to the defective teaching of the primary schools, and partly to the carelessness of grown-up people. Mr. Schmitt promises by his method to correct imperfect utterance of every description, to enable Germans to acquire foreign languages with unusual readiness, and—what is most interesting to us—to enable foreigners quickly to master German.

—From the Berlin directories of 1850–1868, it appears that in the interval between these two dates the various trades of the city have increased as follows: The bakers from 313 to 723, dealers in butter from 138 to 246, coffee-house and restaurant keepers from 456 to 926, distillers from 143 to 362, fish-dealers from 70 to 100, dealers in meats from 50 to 101, butchers from 449 to 976, dealers in delicacies from 70 to 118, inns of the first, second, and third class from 110 to 172, tapsters and victuallers from 1,660 to 2,693. The shops for the sale of women's furnishing goods have increased from 12 to 32, ladies' cloaks from 26 to 72, perfumery (factories and shops) from 48 to 95, white goods (ditto) from 46 to 167, lace factories from 517 to 842, milliners' shops from 162 to 242, straw hat factories from 56 to 74, hosieries from 163 to 404. The number of architects has grown from 43 to 137, master-masons from 87 to 300, master-carpenters from 80 to 196. The dealers in drugs have increased from 26 to 111, bankers, exchange and stock brokers from 143 to 297, machine-builders from 53 to 174, opticians from 153 to 393, tobacconists from 64 to 199, tobacco shops from 460 to 776. The breweries alone do not share the general increment having fallen from 45 to 43, in spite of the well-known fact that the people of Berlin drink more beer than ever. But in this case the larger establishments have absorbed the smaller.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEM.*

Mr. Tennyson's long-rumored poem of "Lucretius" has just been published, and seems tolerably successful. Its story is briefly this: Lucretius is the Roman poet of that name, who sang of "primordia," atoms, "semina rerum," the first beginnings of things, putting into eloquent verse the speculations of Epicurus and Epicurus's predecessors. His pre-occupation in study and in his poetic art seems to his wife, Lucilia, to be caused by a failure in his love for her, possibly by an improper love for some other woman. She therefore procures and gives him philtres. The effects of the "wicked broth" are described—not very happily, although in part of the description there is a suggestion of the way in which Shakespeare's "juice of cursed hebenon" operates upon the blood of old Hamlet. In verses, one of which is appropriately and one meaninglessly rough, we are told that it

> "Confused the chemic labor of the blood,
> And, tickling the brute within the man's brain,
> Made havoc among those tender cells."

Under the effects of the drug the poet loses his "power to shape," loathes himself for his new-born sensuality, and finally commits suicide in disgust and despair. The most of the poem is a raging soliloquy, in which Lucretius, who has just risen from a couch troubled by base dreams, recounts what he has endured in sleep, and argues himself into a determination to end a life never too dear, and now beastlike and therefore hateful. At first, in his dream, it seemed that "a void was made in Nature;" not the "vacuum" which is insisted upon in the "De Rerum," the philosophic void which had exercised so much of his thoughts; but he beheld Nature with

> . . . . . "All her bonds
> Cracked; and I saw the flaring atom-streams > Ruining along the illimitable inane;"

and flying on to make new and still new "frames of things" for ever and ever, without stop or end. That, he says, he could believe to be his own dream, proper to him as a supporter of the atomic theory of creation, just as the sleeping dog—in "Locksley Hall," also, we have this fact noted, with less of a Lucretian fulness of language—

> "With inward yelp and restless fore-foot plies
> His function of the woodland."

But soon the aphrodisiacs in the philtre begin to apply their function. The confusion of all things in nature may be supposed to have suggested to the mind of the dreamer the whelming of all political and social order in the horrors of Sulla's rule; Sulla, at any rate, comes into the dream, and all the blood shed by the dictator appears to be raining down from heaven; but when it strikes the earth, there spring up not the armed men of the Cadmian fabulous tale, but "girls, Hetairai, curious in their art, hired animal isms," who harass the sleeper. After these there came a dream of Helen, the great type of such creatures, Helen, of whom Marlowe said, "The face that launched a thousand ships"—ships carrying heroes to the destruction of Troy; and of whom Tennyson's "Lucretius" imitatively says, speaking of her breasts:

* "Lucretius. A Poem. By Alfred Tennyson, Poet-Laureate." 1868.

. . . . . "As I stared, a fire—
The fire that left a roofless Ilion Shot out of them and scorched me."

Having made an end of his dreams, he goes on questioning if these torments of visions are not the vengeance of Venus upon him, because he would not that sacrifices should be offered her. Yet in the proëmium of his poem, he reminds her, he invokes her, and pays her worthy honor. Not, indeed, as she is in the conceptions of the vulgar mythology, but as he conceives her, the all-generating, genial heat of Nature, which shows itself in this and that and this other thing—"which things appear the work of mighty gods." The word "work" reminds him of his own, and he declares he had meant, before he finished it, to prove "that gods there are, and deathless." While he talks he sees, new-risen, "another of our gods, the Sun"—Apollo, Delius, Hyperion, what you will. It is but a fable, he says; there is no godship in the sun, which sees nothing, shines with indifference, knows nothing, cannot, for example, tell whether he at that moment intends suicide or to listen to Plato where he says that man has no right to dismiss himself from his post of duty, but should wait till the gods call him. But how if one believes that the gods are utterly careless of man? The drug now begins to work again, and the poet has to struggle with the suggestions of his diseased imagination. These he momentarily subdues, and then he complains of his fate that, after all his labor toward a better life, he is thus thrown into a slough he hates. Life at best was never much to him, he says; but now it has become unendurable, for he is given over to degradations he abhors. He therefore resolves to let Nature, the womb and tomb of all things, take again the atoms and blind beginnings which make up Lucretius, in order that, forcing them far apart, she may again dash them together into what new forms she will, through all her cycles of duration. He stabs himself, and his wife running in, confessing her fault with much grief, makes known the fact of the drugging. This minute or two of Lucretius's life we are left to imagine. Mr. Tennyson does nothing at all with it, though one would have thought he could not possibly have failed to seize upon it. Essentially the poem is this: A man of high character suddenly finds himself compelled to believe that for him to live longer is to live degraded in his own eyes. He will kill himself, then. For is not God merely the sum of the forces of nature?—at any rate, are not the gods utterly indifferent to man, and man a chance-collected congeries of atoms? Around this main conception various circumstances are thrown. The man is Lucretius, a writer of books from which the poem can draw a full set of arguments for a human being in the supposed position; and this it does with sufficient learning and no pedantry or obscurity. As for the thing which to this partly imaginary Lucretius makes life seem degrading, it is adequate to that end; being the continually renewing struggle between the most brutalizing of passions and the better part in human nature. The thing is set forth with what is to be called—not delicacy, perhaps; certainly, however, with moral cleanness. Even if it were done with less delicacy, still there would be in the reader's mind the constant knowledge that the virtuous man held death preferable to its presence, such was its loathsomeness to him. And as for the objection that, though it disgusted him so much that he killed himself, yet it found harborage in his mind—that it must have been in him or it could not have troubled him—that is accounted for by the poet's making the struggle due to the poisoning of his blood. It is here that the pathos of the situation, considered as personal to this particular man, centres. Of the general situation the pathos is well enough set forth; not too well; not so well that the poem is at all a great one, or more than a clever, learned, well-finished one. But the pathos of the situation in which we see the individual Lucretius is great; he is really a good and great man fallen a prey to a mean accident. We doubt if it was not merely the necessity of accounting for such a struggle in such a man that made Mr. Tennyson bring in Lucilia and her philtres, and yet, as it seems to us, it is not Mr. Tennyson's revivification of a philosophic suicide under the name of Lucretius, nor his skilful weaving of the atomic theory, and so on, into his poem, nor its finish; but just this bringing in of Lucilia, that saved his work from being quite a dull one. But if he had intended her to do more than set going the conflict in Lucretius's mind; if he had seen how she and her philtres were available, could he have failed to use to the full the new element of interest given him? As the thing stands now, it is conceivable that the reader and not the writer imports into the poem the tragic interest that belongs, as one may say personally, to Lucretius, victim really of a foolish woman and a vile drug, who conceives himself the sport of cruel chance. But had the poet shown him to us when the discovery is made to him, there would then have been no doubt as to his meaning to give us all we have found, and, we being judge, we should have had a more powerful poem. But to elaborate this view fully would take more space than we have room for.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

TURNING over the first May magazine that reached us, the most noticeable thing we came upon was a little preaching of a certain literary heresy of which Putnam's may, without serious misuse of language, be called the heresiarch. Not that Putnam's invented it and made the earliest attempts to promulgate it; several generations of men, living in unnecessary gross darkness, have arisen and passed away since it began sapping the foundations of the true faith. But we should say that, in virtue of its reputation and position, Putnam's is to-day the most dangerous upholder of the pernicious doctrine. "Nothing is rarer," says the literary editor in this month's "Monthly Chronicle," "than good bread and genial criticism. Critic means one who is bilious, liable to dyspepsia, aggravates it with tobacco-smoke and coffee; one who has never done his best himself and loves to think every one else has failed; can't enjoy the sunshine because it is too clear at mid-day and too misty at evening; can't tolerate a man's book because he spells Saviour without a u—that is what we mean by critic." And again, he says, hinting at what he thinks a true critic should be, "Why smell of chamomile when one can smell of pinks; why stare into a gutter when you can look into the sky?" Now, on the contrary, nothing is commoner than the sort of criticism called genial; and nothing is more sadly unlike good bread. The "looking up into the sky," of the kind commended, would seem to be but a futile, Millerite way of hurrying on the millennium; and beyond peradventure the hastening on of the millennium is what the critic, like all the rest of us who can or cannot write, ought to be continually laboring at. We have no doubt that the most genial of critics, in his better moments, theoretically agrees with us in this view of the critical office. But criticism of the genial kind seems to him a method to be adopted for the attainment of the end desired; it is just there that we and everybody but the bad author and the successful publisher find ourselves at variance with him. It is true that some readers are at one with him apparently; it may be are really at one with him till after thinking of the matter; and it was the thought of the kind-hearted people whom he misleads that led us to speak of the doctrine as dangerous. But state the question plainly to the readers of Putnam's, or any readers, and "geniality" is condemned. If I, seeking good—good of truth, good of beauty, what not—am shown in a given work good things which I had not found for myself, I am debtor to him who shows them to me as to a man who has aided me in finding what I seek. He helps me to use the means in my hands. For no other reason but for the same precisely I am indebted to the man who aids me to get what I seek by showing me that, though not contained in the work before me—book, picture, whatever it may be—it yet exists, and might have been contained in it. And, as things actually go in this world, it happens that I am far oftener indebted to the latter of these two men than to the other. For there is in man a facility of being pleased which, indulged, is fatal to excellence; and the temptation to indulge it, to stop in what ought to be our pilgrimage, to rest and be thankful and lazy by the wayside, is strong. But to do this when we have reached the pretty good—or the Pretty Good, as the typographical school of philosophers say—is, by definition, to stop short of the millennium, which is the Best. It would be long to carry our principle into detailed application, destroying this man and that man among us by way of illustration; and it would be a work of indefinite length to apply it to the various objects of even contemporary literary criticism. But we may say briefly that we look on the "genial critic," the encourager of the deadly sloth above mentioned, as practically an enemy of the race, a traitor to humanity, even when he means well, and is as honest as a man can be who keeps his mind in a hazy condition. The genial critic who sells himself to the publisher, or whom the newspaper proprietor sells, is of a much commoner kind, and his existence makes with extreme force in favor of our view of "genial criticism" in general—the honest, the partly honest, and the rankly dishonest; but we need say nothing of him. The honest one is sufficient for our purpose; his failure, speaking in a practical way and generally, has been so decided; his influence has been so bad, and so much needs counteraction, that one is tempted to lay it down as a rule that the critic's usual function is continual speech with a view of making other people hold their tongues, while the duty of the genial critic is habitually to hold his own. If any one condemns these remarks of ours as very tritical, we assent with alacrity; if their newness were all, it would seem obligatory to apologize for making them. But that they are not needed nobody will say who knows how next to impossible it is to get the least help from most of our American criticism, who will recollect how much he might have been delivered from if, say twenty years ago, there had been in existence among us a school of sound criticism, even of unduly harsh criticism—any school rather than that one which used to walk out two and two, and smell the pinks and gaze into the sky, and so on, and still is doing just that much for American literature and no more. Many thousands of us might have broken our idols a long time since if the principle asserted by the writer in Putnam's—and illustrated by him, as the reader of the "Monthly Chronicle" may see—had been replaced by the less feeble one.

In this number of Putnam's the table of contents offers us fifteen or sixteen articles, varied as regards subjects but of about equal pretensions as regards ability in the handling. Two of them are on financial questions—one by Mr. V. B. Denslow, the other by Mr. L. E. Chittenden, neither of which will teach its readers anything wrong. A plea for an international copyright law is by Dr. Prime—an article of which the same remark may be made as of the papers on finance; and to them, also, as well as to it, applies the further remark, that the average reader may very likely find it useful. An attempt to answer the question, "Fenianism—Why is it?" is made by some one who has but a very inadequate amount of information on the subject. "It may be well," most certainly, to ascertain whether Feniafism is founded on anything more substantial "than the laments of Irish poets, the romances of Irish novelists, and the declamations of Irish politicians." For the enquiry is sure to lead to a most profitable lesson, and it is an enquiry so easy that the writer of the essay we speak of is inexcusable. The testimony—delivered by Englishmen who have but recently been in the witness-box, and whose evidence ought to be fresh in memory—gives overpowering proof that for centuries English rule in Ireland was so severe, unjust, and insulting, that if the ordinary Irishman of to-day did not hate bitterly the very name of England, he would really be hardly human—a saint whom it would be almost unkind and slighting not to persecute actively. This inheritance of natural hatred the essayist leaves almost entirely out of account. And he takes too little account of the hardships of the Irish system of land tenures as a legitimate cause of Irish disaffection. "The Mississippi River," and the paper on "San Francisco," and a little article entitled "Office," may be called readable. So may "Ole Bull among his Countrymen." Of "Women and Work" the same thing is not to be said. Within the past year "woman" has become a topic which any one of any thousand magazine writers can take up and on which they can manufacture padding—that by any one as good as that by any other—of which hardly one page in a thousand ought not to be rejected. A part of the poetry of this number consists of some devotional stanzas, resembling Herbert's in a way, by E. Foxton. The rest of it is by President Hill, of Cambridge. "Choriambic" he styles it. "Hymn of Niagara" is the title, and if we are not altogether rusty in our prosody we should describe it as being in the Metrum Asclepiadeum novum—or Metrum Asclepiadeum Collinum—dicolon, tetrastrophon—composed of two choriambic trimeters, catalectic in pyrrichium aut iambum aut spondæum aut trochæum, and with a spondaic basis, followed by two verses of the same kind without a basis. Or, if anybody else has a preference for some other metre, we suppose neither we nor Mr. Hill could interpose any very effectual objection. Such is the refractory nature of English in respect to quantity!

The Atlantic's poetry is by Mr. Whittier and Mr. Lowell. In Mr. Lowell's verses a father, who has just come back to his house from the burial of his little daughter, rejects the commonplaces of condolence and good advice. The somewhat petulant impatience with which consolation is received by the sufferer at such a time is well expressed in the half-soliloquizing, half-conversational talk, full sometimes of tender reminiscence, sometimes of resentful replication, and again of despairing sorrow inciting to distrust of God. The last two stanzas seemed to us to hurt the poem. They made it clear that the dead who is mourned was a little child, while we had been thinking of her as a woman. Something in the sixth stanza, perhaps, was the cause of our thinking so; or perhaps the passionate tone of the love; or the weight of grief—it being so much harder when men and women are taken out of the world to admit the thought that our loss is a gain to them, than it is to think so when little children leave us. The desperation of these last two stanzas is perhaps not to be objected against them; it seems in keeping; which the phraseology, perhaps, does not wholly; "incomes from dreamland" hardly seems so. And from the two stanzas preceding the last two we, rightly or wrongly, got suggestions of another tone than that of the poem in general. It is sure enough that grief often enough plays fantastical tricks, though people who grieve in a business-like manner do not believe it; but in the verse > "Console if you will; I can bear it," as spoken to a well-intentioned friend, there appears to be a mingling of humor and malice, even of cruelty, that strikes us as unnatural. Mr. Whittier has a more cheerful subject. He expresses in verse as finished as Mr. Lowell's the freshness which the face of nature wears to one who has just risen from long sickness. It will please everybody.

Among the prose articles there is a bright, cheery story by Mr. E. E. Hale, with a bit of the mystification that he is so fond of, with the touch of good-humored satire that is pretty sure to be found in everything he writes, and with some fearless incidentally-delivered opinions on matters of taste—concerning which, however, there is no disputing, so we say nothing. A good sketch by Mr. De Forest introduces us to a South Carolina gentleman of the old school. Apparently the story told is a true one.

Mr. J. E. Babson's article, "On a Pair of Spectacles," is too affected to be pleasant reading. Mr. Clarke's "Modern Lettre de Cachet" will startle many of its readers ignorant of the facilities which American physicians enjoy, in nine States out of ten, in the matter of shutting us up in lunatic asylums. Mr. Bayard Taylor this month visits Thuringia, and makes an article thereon, which is as good as any of his late papers, and somebody writes disagreeably about Grant—under the title of "Our Next President"—hardly concealing the unwillingness with which he acquiesces in the General's nomination. Mr. Parton's second and last paper on "Our Roman Catholic Brethren" is mainly devoted to a biographical sketch of Father Hecker, the head of the Paulists of this city. Mr. Hecker can hardly complain at finding himself depicted at full length for the public eye; apparently it was he who furnished Mr. Parton the materials for his sketch. Rather unpleasant in this view, the article is not more satisfactory in the only other view which it is of consequence to take. Suppose that the Church is going into the condition prophesied by Mr. Parton; suppose that she no longer attempts to frame a theory of the universe; suppose she gives up her pretensions of informing us of what Mr. Parton would pronounce the unknowable, of painting the abyss; suppose, in short, she no longer conceives of another world as alone what gives meaning or value to this one—does Mr. Parton imagine that then it will any longer be possible to say of her that she exists? When that breath from the other world, which is the life of the Church as she has existed in all ages, once goes out of her nostrils, the Church, as such, will vanish; that which makes her a thing to be loved or disliked, what makes her all-powerful over some minds and utterly powerless over others—all, in short, that she essentially is, will disappear when man ceases to want and she ceases to offer him a solution of the riddle of the earth. That she now does this gives her the vast machinery which she controls. When she makes her essential characteristic that which is now incidental—her instruction of men in morality—when she declares herself no longer the voice of God speaking to man of his dreaded future, but the voice of man giving other men good advice about the present—she commits suicide. Of this, all of which Mr. Hecker will tell Mr. Parton in so many words if he will ask it, Mr. Parton seems to have no notion at all.

The Galaxy comes to us enlarged and improved, and contains good light reading. Two or three new departments are added, and the number of illustrations is increased. The latter are from designs by Mr. W. J. Hennessy, Mr. Gaston Fay, and Mr. Winslow Homer. Mr. Fay is not seen at his best in Mrs. Linton's story; nor Mr. Homer, perhaps, in his picture of the self-willed little flirt who is to make mischief in Marion Harland's "Beechdale." In illustration of Mrs. Prescott Spofford's rather tame "wild tale of horror," Mr. Hennessy is about as usual. A fourth picture is from a Japanese drawing. We have, said, we believe, that Mr. Linton is to have the general superintendence of the Galaxy's engraving, and that several full-page drawings are to be given each month. Of the new departments just added to the magazine one is of "Literature and Art," which begins well with a sound criticism on Swinburne's "Blake," by Mr. Grant White, who is, however, not sufficiently unkind to Swinburne, whose exhumation of Blake, for his own peculiar purposes, merits very severe rebuke. The collection of brief essays, if one may call them so, signed by Philip Quilibet, are manly and clever—more so than the title under which they are ranged would lead one to expect. His remarks on the Alabama claims have a degree of freshness which we thought that the subject had wholly lost; and the "New Hampshire Canvassers," accompanied by a rule for telling how large a majority that State is going to give at any election, is equally good. "The Galaxy Miscellany" is a receptacle for short articles which, except for their shortness, might as well go into the body of the magazine as anywhere else. Mr. Blot discourses to us here—native wines being his theme; and Mr. G. W. Appleton tells of the singular "Camorra of Naples," and there is some rather laborious fun by Mark Twain. The "Nebulæ" still retains its old form. Among the long articles, "Our Millionaires" will be of interest to many persons, its statement of facts constituting its only claim to respect. There are several other articles—a smooth poem by Mr. Stedman, in clever imitation of Matthew Arnold's "Thyrsis" and "Scholar's Gipsey;" a sonnet by "H. H.," who is, perhaps, too constantly sentimental—though she does sentimental poems very well; more of "Words and their Uses," by Mr. Grant White; "The House and the Heart," a poem, by Mr. Sill; "The Shadow on the Wall," a poem, by some person unknown; and "The Trumpet Saith," a poem, by Mr. C. D. Shanly. "Personalism" is by Mr. Walt Whitman, whose power of brain does not seem sufficient to make his prose remarks valuable.

Lippincott's for May is rather sober sided, but good. The Talmud is talked about without great weight of knowledge or forcibleness of thought. "Dallas Galbraith" is continued; Gloucester, Massachusetts, is described not very well; so is "The Court of the Tuileries," and an ordinary "Village School in Germany." The publication in a Philadelphia magazine of the article entitled "Boston Wit and Humor," containing what the article does and no more than it does, wears a very sinister look; if Boston is placated by the gross and palpable flattery with which the essayist closes, we are mistaken. "Communication with the Pacific" relates to our trans-continental railroad, and may profitably be read by those persons who think the popular notion about the possible extent of our trade with the East is a vastly exaggerated one. Somewhat exaggerated it is, no doubt, but the writer in Lippincott's presents considerations that show our expectations may well be large. Artists may probably be interested in reading a memoir of the late John Neagle, portrait painter.

The Catholic World begins with an essay on Tennyson in his Catholic aspects—aspects which he doubtless presents. But then he has Broad Church aspects, and Ritualistic aspects, and ordinary Episcopalian aspects, and others. It is giving a sample of the essayist's critical power—which is that of about two young ladies who have just made the acquaintance of "Sir Galahad"—to say that the verse "Lie still, dry dust, secure of change," appears to him proof that Tennyson believes in the resurrection of the body. The context and his knowledge of Latin, and a recollection of the poet's habit of using Greek and Latin idioms, ought to have saved him from giving the passage a precisely contradictory meaning to its real one. A capable writer takes Professor Draper's works in hand in a very unceremonious manner, and, not with all the scientific coolness desirable in such cases—rather, apparently, with the fact constantly before his mind that the professor's works have reached the fifth edition, and that an unscientific public is to be addressed—he shows the insufficiency of that author. The five editions are reasons why the attack should be made; and an attack on Professor Draper is to some extent an attack on the general position which is held by the forces with whom he is ranked, but it is not by triumphant victories over such champions that the citadel our polemic essayist dislikes is going to be taken or even seriously endangered. Another paper in this month's Catholic World that will be read with interest, is one in which a demand is made that, inasmuch as Roman Catholics pay school taxes in every part of the country, and inasmuch as they believe that it is well to teach religion—not to say the only true religion—to school children, as being immortal souls at the age of most docility, it is therefore right that they should be allowed to take a due proportion of the school fund of the various States, and support with it Roman Catholic schools. Of this question, which, we take it, is to be settled on grounds of state expediency, and which the people are under no obligation whatever to consider from any religious point of view, we are likely to hear more before we begin to hear less. We have no space here to go into anything like an examination of it. A republican state must have its children instructed; from its own right to preserve itself in existence, it derives the right to insist on education for its future rulers—that may pass as axiomatic. And the inference is easy, that if it may insist on the thing, it may insist on what is proved to be, all things considered, the best method of doing the thing, and that therefore it may justly give a final Yes or No in regard to all matters of method and detail. When we have got thus far we come to the domain where everything is to be settled by evidence as to the practical working of various systems. The burden of proving that, in the interests of good government, a change is desirable, rests upon our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens.

The most noticeable article in Harper's, which is as generally readable as ever, is Mr. M. D. Conway's clever essay on Disraeli and Derby. For the latter he has even less respect—or rather, in speaking of him he is less respectful—than Liberals usually. To him, an American, the Stanleys are nothing except as they are men and politicians who commend themselves to his favor; the English Liberal cannot forget that the house of Derby is a proud historic house. Of Disraeli Mr. Conway seems to entertain a better opinion than one can willingly accept as correct. In his eyes Disraeli's comparatively low origin seems to atone for his comparatively low character, and his services to the cause of democracy in England—services accidental and heartless or sincere and intended—make Mr. Conway, in whom apparently there is not much unimpassioned impartiality, forget what we are disposed to think the thorough unadmirableness of his career. Besides this article there are three illustrated papers—one on Lady Herbert's "Cradle Lands," one on Mr. Macgregor's last cruise in the Rob Roy, and one by Mr. E. G. Squiers on a journey which he had made in the Peruvian and Bolivian Andes. Then, besides, we have six or eight short articles—stories and verses, pieces of useful information—some book notices better than ordinary, and the agreeable "Easy Chair." The ballet question is discussed by the "Easy Chair" in the presence of Mrs. Grundy, who, however, let it be said, is not by any means the only person who has been making severe remarks on some recent plays. To compel her to silence and confusion of face is of course not hard, especially as the "Easy Chair" shifts the issue somewhat from, and hardly addresses itself to, the special one that has been raised; but we, who are sharper a good deal than Mrs. Grundy, and, for the purposes of argument, strong in unimpeached virtuousness, may properly decline to receive the justification of the ballet in general, or of to-day's ballet when compared with that of other days, as a sufficient justification for some particular ballets and operas that certainly are demoralizing contemporary theatre-goers.

Readers of Hours at Home will find in this month's number a rather bad translation of the "Dies Iræ," accompanied by a good deal of information about the history and contents of the poem. The writer may thank us for directing him to a discussion in regard to it which has recently—within a month or two—been going on in the Pall Mall Gazette and the Spectator. Reading it he will perhaps see fit to revise to some extent his critical opinion of the poem. Doctor Bushnell has a clever essay on "Distinctions of Color," which would do more good if so written that his audience could more easily follow his line of argument, which is of a kind that ought to seem weighty to the minds of religious men, and is to be called subtle. But subtleties treated of with the somewhat diffuse eloquence characteristic of Dr. Bushnell are of little value to most men till they have been worked over, so to speak, as many men are not able, and more men are not willing, to work them over. Professor Schele de Vere bases an essay that would displease a Frenchman on some passages in Lanfrey's "Histoire de Napoléon I." —the passages in which the free-spoken author deals with the First Consul's craftiness and unscrupulousness in the management of San Domingo and the French republican army which never returned from the West Indies. A writer new to us, George Exmouth Percy, appears with a well-written essay on "The Prose of Poets." Mr. Percy has literary knowledge evidently, and literary and other ability; but some fields of criticism he would do well to keep out of as out of miry clay. One might believe that Emerson had latent poetic gifts, he thinks, if one could forget "Bramah.' Forget "Bramah"—which no one is likely to do who knows what is in it—or remember "Bramah," and we not the less have in Emerson one of the two or three best poets of our day—it is hardly necessary to say our day and country.

Besides the articles already mentioned, we have instalments of the Countess de Gasparin's and Miss Yonge's novels; there is a brief account of the Jewish colonies existing in China; Dr. Ray Palmer writes an article entitled "Home and Woman," which, as we understand it, gives a side glance at the "woman question," and which certainly is beside the real question if it is to be considered as having any reference to it; Mr. J. O. Noyes, who wrote "The Mississippi River" for Putnam's, writes on "The Climate of the Mississippi Valley" for Hours at Home. There is some poetry also, which need not be criticised particularly; the publishers went to a reputable maker, Mrs. Craik, for some of it at least, and, if it is not good, they at any rate must be held to have discharged their consciences. The same thing may be said of the publishers of the Catholic World, who this month get for us from Aubrey de Vere a puzzling sonnet, full of darkness, headed "Poland."

We mention "Public Spirit: A Monthly Magazine," in order to acknowledge the receipt of it; the Northern Monthly, for the purpose of mentioning an article, by Dr. George H. Beard, embodying the usual arguments in favor of the use of narcotics and stimulants, and the Broadway, in order to call attention to Mr. Grant White's article on copyright law, of which we may possibly speak more fully hereafter. It is worth attention, as capable of giving clearness to many people's confused notions on the subject.

The Philosophy of Mathematics, with Special Reference to the Elements of Geometry and the Infinitesimal Method. By Professor A. T. Bledsoe, A.M., LL.D., late of the University of Virginia. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—This work is mainly devoted to the rationale of the various infinitesimal methods, and to a succinct and interesting discussion of the essential logic of these methods. We have discovered nothing of value essentially original in the philosophical exposition of these methods, unless in a realistic and uncompromising application of the "method of limits" to their philosophy.

One English author, Mr. Todhunter, who ventures to ignore the question whether a variable actually reaches its limits or not, appears to be regarded by the author as an arch-heretic, because he purposely omits from the definition of a limit the words "that value which the function never actually attains." Realism would seem quite out of place in matters so technical and abstract; and to us it seems quite unimportant in the "method of limits" to consider whether an actual infinity of steps are continuously passed over in "passing" to the limit of a ratio, or whether the limits of value in the ratios of infinitesimals be only substituted (or understood to be substituted) for their actual ratios. Either would fully justify that neglect of infinitesimal terms in sums and differences which the method explains.

The author is undoubtedly correct in regarding the "method of limits" as the only complete rationale of the exactness of the infinitesimal calculus, but he appears to us in his discussion of this method to be more a metaphysician than a mathematician, more concerned and interested in collateral considerations on the theory than in the practice of mathematical research; and we especially dissent from his views on the causes of the difficulties which students find in the common presentations of fundamental mathematical principles. The "axioms" of mathematics are properly only axioms of an art, and only claim to be the simplest, direct, practical maxims for mathematical deductions, not necessarily the most obvious of truths philosophically considered; though they are the most extensive and useful in the art of mathematical investigation. This is especially true of modern mathematics, which lack and forego the rigor of the ancient geometry, because they do not so much aim at a clear philosophical comprehension of what we already know as at a trustworthy and expeditious method of discovering what we are still ignorant of. No mathematician at all familiar with the infinitesimal calculus can doubt of its rigorous exactness in dealing with abstract hypothetical problems; even though he can render no clear account of its logic. As an abstract instrument of scientific research it may be better known through its technical axioms than in its philosophical foundations.

But our author appears to have chiefly in view in his work the difficulties of the mathematical teacher, the difficulties of making the principles of the calculus understood by the student. That he greatly over-estimates the philosophical difficulties to which his work is mainly devoted we attribute to his own admirable idiosyncrasy. He clearly knows and recounts his own difficulties rather than those of students in general. Simple algebra, which involves none of these difficulties, is a stumbling-block to the very sort of minds for which he has written his book. He knows much better what he is talking about than what he is talking to. The main difficulty is not metaphysical. It does not so much consist in a lack of the evidences, for the reception of which the human reason is especially apt, as in that want of disposition and attention to which the human will, since the fall, is especially prone. We would not be understood, however, as depreciating the importance of clear philosophical views in the study of an art either in mathematics or in politics, and we believe that this most interesting account of the controversy which has engaged the attention of metaphysicians since the origin of modern mathematical analysis will be instructive as well as interesting to most mathematical readers.

FORTY-THIRD EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

FIRST NOTICE.

CAN anything be done, by any social or artistic or critical influence, to improve the spring exhibitions of the Academy? The community has a right to expect from them a fair opportunity to judge of American painting and, to a certain extent, of American sculpture, for the previous year. It is only the spring show, of which we now greet the forty-third renewal, which pretends to any especial quality or character, or any completeness of form. The Artists' Fund Exhibitions, which would be nothing without the customary display of borrowed pictures, are of a very accidental and miscellaneous character; the newly established winter exhibitions of the Academy, like those former autumn ones under the care of the other association, include old as well as new pictures; we go to these and to other such exhibitions to see what may offer itself, a little of this and a little of that, a Gérôme lent by one picture buyer and a Dieffenbach by another, and such American pictures as may happen in. But the spring exhibition—let us not lose sight of the fact—is meant for a bringing together of the previous year's work of the artists of our community. The time of year, whether adopted instinctively in imitation of English and French example, or chosen independently, is originally intended to suit the supposed requirements of painters, who, making out-of-door studies during the summer and shaping them into pictures during the winter, may be assumed to have their most important work just ready at the approach of the new out-of-door season. The fact is of interest that the May exhibition in the dreary building which fronts on Trafalgar Square, and the "Salon" held yearly in the Champs Elysées, are tolerably representative of English and of French art "of the period." When one of the younger and less known painters is absent, it is probably because his work has been rejected; when one of the more celebrated sends nothing, he is engaged upon wall-paintings or he is travelling in the East; his non-appearance needs to be accounted for in some sufficient way.

It is not doubtful that, if our Academy exhibitions could be made more attractive to the artists, they would also be more attractive to the public; if the new works of art were sent to them as a matter of course, every one contributing his most important works for the year unless absolutely prevented, the object of these collections would be more nearly attained, and the public regard for art much advanced. One reason for the unwillingness of some painters to exhibit is, no doubt, the foolishness alike of the praise and of the blame which visitors bestow upon their works; but the comparative absence from the galleries of visitors of a better class is mainly caused by the comparative slightness of the temptation to go. Why should a lover of landscape painting very much care to visit this year's exhibition? The chances are that he has seen better pictures of landscape subjects painted, too, since last spring, than the best, or than any except the very best, now in the galleries. The indifferent character of the collection as a whole keeps away those to whom pictures are familiar; and if those to whom pictures are strange and therefore incomprehensible are left alone to walk about the galleries and utter vague praise and unconsidered censure, the non-exhibiting artists are primarily to blame.

That the exhibition this year, though not necessarily worse than former exhibitions, is yet poor compared with what it might have been, may be easily shown by considering further its show of landscape painting. There is an interesting picture by Mr. S. R. Gifford, "Shrewsbury River"—not in his best style; not so quietly effective as the "Hunter Mountain," two years ago, but yet in many ways good. There are two pictures by Mr. C. C. Coleman—one of the Arch of Titus and one of an Italian hill, with olive trees; Mr. S. Colman's two pictures are both attractive, and of both we hope to speak again; Mr. Griswold's very interesting and valuable Newport picture shows his peculiar power better than it has been publicly shown since 1865. Each of these pictures contains something new; each of these painters is fairly well represented. But Mr. McEntee sends nothing that can compare with his best work of former years; Mr. Farrer's "Bear's Bath Fall" is not in his best manner, and one small landscape but poorly represents so diligent a painter; Mr. Church sends one very small and trifling picture to hang on the wall where the great and powerful "Niagara" hung not two months ago; Mr. Kensett's pictures, taken together, are more nearly a worthy contribution, but no one of them is the best he can do; and there are altogether absent J. W. Hill and J. H. Hill, of Nyack; Gay, of Hingham; Moore, of Catskill; Williams, of Boston; and Warren, of New York. On the whole, it would be safe to say that half of the landscape-painting talent in the country is absent from this exhibition. Mr. Hennessy comes from the ranks of the figure-painters to help with his landscape backgrounds in the pictures Nos. 305 and No. 387; and another powerful man, Mr. Homer, contributes a sketch; but this aid, though needed, is given to a cause too weak to profit much by it, and the lover of exhibitions must turn to the figure-painters for comfort.

The figure-painters are so few that the presence of two or three in this exhibition seems a fair representation of their art. Mr. Johnson and Mr. Hennessy demand the spectator's best attention, more, perhaps, than usual. And in portraiture there is to be recorded the welcome appearance of four heads by Mr. Page, whose most important exhibition of last December might have almost excused him from further contributions during the year.

The Week.

NOTHING to equal the proceedings in the House during Friday and Saturday of last week is to be found, we venture to say, in the history of any deliberative body in the world. On Friday, Messrs. Butler and Logan, who are two of the Managers of impeachment, and one of whom was mainly instrumental in procuring Mr. Johnson's indictment for bad language, went back to the House and had a bout of abuse with Mr. James Brooks which would have disgraced the spectators of a Sunday-morning dog-fight, and which Andrew Johnson has not approached either in scurrility or vulgarity. Mr. Butler, too, gracefully seized the opportunity to abuse Mr. Evarts, his professional opponent in the Senate chamber, and pronounced him a "servant of the devil." But Friday was nothing to Saturday. Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, it seems, has written a letter accusing Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, of Minnesota, of being a fugitive from Pennsylvanian justice, and having changed his name. Of course Mr. Donnelly's course was clear. He could either demand an investigation or commence a suit. But, instead of doing either, or preparatory to doing either, he made an attack on Mr. Washburne in the House which lasted—and by "unanimous consent," be it remarked—for over an hour, and which consisted of an unbroken stream of obscenity and blasphemy and buffoonery—much of the obscenity, too, being of that revolting kind which has nothing to recommend it even to the most degraded of human beings except its filth. The scene was, to anybody who realizes what the House of Representatives professes to be, and ought to be, an awful one. The Speaker vainly protested against the performance, but the House evidently enjoyed the sport, and would not suffer the unfortunate man to be interrupted. What took place on Monday when the offender came to be called to account was, if possible, worse; for the whole affair was treated jocularly, and some of the blackguardism of Saturday served up cold, with a little addition of stupid profanity. Mr. Donnelly appropriately closed his jocular apology on that day, by proposing that the whole body should adjourn and "take a drink," which was received with laughter and applause, not a soul in the House apparently being sensible of the shame and scandal of the scene. We venture to say that Mr. John Morrissey has never heard in his experience—and he has associated with the worst ruffians of both hemispheres, and seen them in moments when drink and excitement had reduced the human in them to the lowest point—so much vile ribaldry from the lips of one man, in one place, as the Legislature of this Christian, civilized country listened to by unanimous consent, last week, from one of its own members, while the Chief Magistrate was actually on trial in the next room for simple violence and indecorum. It seems scarcely possible that this sort of behavior can continue much longer to be passed over by those who send these men to Congress and pay them for being, amongst other things, decent. It is said that Mr. Washburne is overbearing and conceited, and therefore unpopular; but this can hardly be seriously put forward as a reason why everybody who comes into contact with him may throw off even the restraints of civilization.

No legislative business has been done by the Senate this week, except a little work in the way of appropriations, and the House has been almost equally idle. Mr. Brooks endeavored to get a committee of investigation into the Alta Vela letter appointed; and Mr. Windom succeeded in getting a committee of investigation into the truth of the charges which Mr. Elihu Washburne has been making against the character of Mr. Ignatius Donnelly. A christening committee, to find an appropriate designation for the remarkable period in Congressional annals that we have just passed through, is as necessary as either Mr. Brooks's or Mr. Windom's.

Mr. Evarts and Mr. Bingham have taken up the whole week with their speeches in the Impeachment trial. Mr. Evarts was very long-winded, speaking for fourteen mortal hours, and coming very near tiring the Senate out before he finished. We cannot, therefore, even enumerate his points. He passed most of his time in the regions of what may be called higher expediency, and addressed himself more to the discretion of the Senate or its political sense than any of his colleagues had done, touching very slightly on questions of construction, and treating the evidence, as well he might, as trivial and unimportant. He claimed for the President the credit of having acted in good faith in disobeying the law; affirmed very strongly the doctrine that a law is not a law if not constitutional; that it is for the Supreme Court to say whether it is constitutional or not; that in deciding it to be unconstitutional the court does not annul a law; it simply says that something which has been passing as a law is not a law, and that, therefore, a person accused of breaking it has not been guilty of any crime. Mr. Evarts claimed for the President a large amount of responsibility to the people for the safety of the Constitution. The great merit of his speech, however, lay in the dexterity with which he turned their own weapons against the Managers, and with which he overwhelmed them with ridicule. Few happier hits have ever been made than his declaration, alluding to Mr. Butler's argument that the Senate was not a court, that he had often heard a defendant plead coram non judice, but had never heard a plaintiff plead it before.

In fact, Mr. Evarts seems to have been raised up as the champion of decency and good manners, whose cause he vindicated in the best of possible ways, by mercilessly chastising their enemies amongst the Managers. When Mr. Butler first introduced into the trial the pleasing little wiles and tricks of that renowned body, the Old Bailey bar, he was evidently under the impression that he had nobody more formidable to deal with than Mr. Stanbery, and there was probably nobody more astonished than himself when he found himself laid out for dissection at the hands of Mr. Evarts, and found what a masterly knife the operator wielded, and how familiar he was with the more interesting portions of his (Mr. Butler's) mental and moral anatomy. The passages which Mr. Evarts quoted from the graceful encounter between the two leading Managers which took place a year ago, and which we described at the time in the language of the prize-ring, as the only dialect adapted to the occasion, were peculiarly apt, in view of Mr. Butler's introducing into the articles the charge of bad language, and the solemnity with which he dwelt on this portion of the President's misconduct in his opening speech. We admit the gravity of the President's offence, but we are also sensible of the importance of keeping before the popular mind the fact that there is in these matters a standard of right and wrong independent of party interests, and that when the devil cites Scripture, no matter for what purpose, it degrades Scripture and does not improve the devil.

Mr. Bingham has had to discharge what is perhaps the most important of the Managers' duties, the summing up at the close, and he is engaged in it as we write. His rhetoric is so rank and luxuriant that the argument has to be followed through it like a trail through a tropical jungle. One gets to one's destination by pursuing it, but not without much toil and many scratches. He maintained that the Senate is the supreme judge of the constitutionality of laws, at least for the purposes of impeachment, a proposition which, so far as we know, nobody has denied; that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court does not extend at all over political matters; that the President is bound to obey all laws passed by Congress, and his only remedy if he thinks them unconstitutional is an appeal to the people; in fact, Mr. Bingham laid it down very broadly that it is "the people" alone, that is, the majority, which can decide points of constitutionality, a theory which, if true, of course disposes of the Constitution altogether. The use of a constitution is to prevent the decision of the majority being final in particular cases, and in times of excitement. The President's claim to the general right of dispensing with the execution of laws on his own judgment of their unconstitutionality, and leaving to others the task of bringing the question before the courts, he demolished very effectually. He was throughout very severe on Mr. Evarts, and departed, it seems to us, from the paths of decorum as well as of common sense when he sneered at that gentleman and his associates as "hired advocates." As far as the world has gone yet, "hired advocates" have been on the whole a more respectable and honorable body of men in all countries than hired legislators, for reasons on which we shall not here dilate. But he dealt a heavy blow at Judge Curtis, in quoting from his pamphlet, published in 1862, on the limits of the President's power.

While no choice of a Presidential candidate has been made by the Democratic masses, it is not much doubted that Mr. Belmont and the inner circle of leaders have their man already selected, though who he is remains quite unknown. Mr. Johnson is given up. Governor Thomas Seymour, of Connecticut, at the Jefferson's Birthday dinner, scoffed at him in his calamity, and was rewarded by "applause and laughter." Nobody now talks of Mr. Chase or of General McClellan, and nobody but Mr. Bennett of Admiral Farragut. Judge Joel Parker, of New Jersey, Mr. Pendleton, Governor Seymour, of this State, General Hancock, Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, are all mentioned, as they all have been mentioned for months past; but which of them it is to be, no Democratic paper or politician has yet so much as hinted. Mr. Belmont's March letter to his fellow-members of the National Committee has just been printed, but it gives no indication at all as to the candidate, and in its statement of principles it does little more than furnish transparency devices. War Democrats are to be conciliated, we judge, and negro supremacy is to be opposed, and the usurpations of Congress must be resisted. But nothing is said as to what we are to do with the negro when we have cut him off from absolute dominion; we are not informed if we may spread him on the triangles as aforetime; nor are we told about the national debt and the repudiation of it; nor, in fact, about anything with definiteness. For that we are obliged to turn to the Birthday dinner above-mentioned. Governor Seymour said: "Mr. Jefferson says that Patrick Henry, in his reply to the monarchists of that body, 'came down upon them in one incessant storm of lightning and thunder.' That is what is needed at the present crisis of the country"—and even that, perhaps, is not a favorable specimen of a definitive proposition in politics; but this certainly will do: "State sovereignty—the fountain of all federal power and the palladium of our liberty;" or this: "White supremacy the doctrine of the framers of our Constitution and the keystone of the arch of our civilization;" or this: "The constitutional Congress of the United States—may it soon be restored." And this, we imagine, is valuable as showing how hard it will be for Mr. Belmont and the Committee to make even a fair bid for the support of people north of Kentucky and west of Mulberry Street:

> "The South—the birth-place of the greatest statesmen, orators, and heroes of the Revolution—desolated by the military rule of strangers and tyrants, may she rise like a Phœnix from its ashes, and bestow again the inestimable blessings of peace and liberty upon her people."

In his Alta Vela resolution Mr. James Brooks asserted by implication that several Republican members of Congress, among them four of the Managers, had for money received, or to be received, tried to intimidate the President, or to bribe him with hopes of their favor, into using his power in behalf of a certain guano company or firm. Mr. Johnson was to send a ship of war to Alta Vela and terrify the Dominicans; Mr. Butler, Mr. Logan, Mr. Bingham, and Mr. Stevens were thereupon to hold themselves in during the prosecution, and not make as powerful speeches as they can make if they like, and the guano company in its turn was to turn over money or stock to the Representatives in payment for the use of their names. The authority for all this is a written legal opinion which Mr. Butler gave Mr. J. W. Schaffner, once a staff officer of Butler's, more recently a member of the above-mentioned guano company who wished to sell his stock, and thought he could do so if it were known that Mr. Butler considered the company's title to Alta Vela a good one. The informal opinion was to the effect that it would be right enough for Mr. Johnson to send a ship of war to the island and put the dispossessed Americans once more in control of it. These things happened before Mr. Butler was Manager Butler and before Mr. Johnson had committed the offence for which he is on trial. Mr. Logan, who has a congenital tendency to despatch war vessels under a full head of steam to all parts of the earth, was asked to append his name to the opinion, and did so with great willingness. Mr. Stevens says he too signed willingly; he holds Mr. Jeremiah Black's opinion that from the beginning (now five or six years distant) of the Alta Vela business "Seward has acted the scoundrel," and taken a course that Mr. Johnson or any other man may properly oppose if opportunity offers. As for Mr. Bingham, it is not doubtful that whatever may have been his motive in signing, it was one consistent with perfect honesty. The fact is that nothing in the world is given away with more unthinking lavish kindness than the Congressional autograph. The names having been thus secured by Colonel Schaffner and the guano company's attorneys, the latter at once and naturally laid them before the President to influence his action. Indeed there is some indication that Mr. Johnson, more suo, angled a little for some of the signatures. However that may be, there is no doubt that by-and-by he imagined that the possession of them put him in a position to administer a crushing blow to the Republican impeachment; which blow Mr. T. A. R. Nelson with much simplicity proceeded the other day to deliver. Mr. Brooks's delight on getting hold of the fatal document was equally Arcadian—intellectually speaking—with that of the pair of friends, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Nelson. He has probably by this time admitted it to have been a causeless joy; Mr. Butler's explanation in the Senate Chamber was so convincing as not to be discredited even by the violence and brutality of the accused members in the House. The House explanations supplied Mr. Brooks with something like an excuse for what otherwise would have plainly appeared an exhibition of the feebleness and malevolence which characterize so much of his political activity.

It may not be generally known to our readers, but it ought to be, that the votes of money by the Legislature of this State to the Catholic Church, for the support of its religious schools and other ecclesiastical purposes, are now so regular and so large in amount as to be equivalent to a fixed endowment. In fact, it may be said that the Catholic Church is the Established Church of this State, in so far as a Church can be established by annual grants. The sum set apart in the Tax Levy and a Charity bill for this purpose this year amounted to over $200,000, and in order to disguise the real nature of the performance from the public, a few grants in aid of the charitable institutions of other denominations are scattered through the list. One of these, to the Young Men's Christian Association, was never asked for, and has been refused by the president, Mr. W. E. Dodge, Jr. What strikes one most unpleasantly about all this is not that the Legislature should vote the money, or that the mass of their Irish constituents should be gratified by seeing them vote it, but that the Catholic clergy should be willing to accept it. Their doing so is simply profiting by what they know to be an abuse; and, more than this, it is a breach of faith toward their Protestant fellow-citizens. It is just that kind of unscrupulousness, too, which has, wherever they have been oppressed by Protestants, furnished a ready excuse for oppressing them, on the ground that they never accept or concede equality themselves when superiority is within their reach. In fact, one of their organs, the Dublin Review, not very long ago denied that toleration was a duty when the true believers were in sufficient force to compel uniformity, and it looks now as if they accepted the voluntary system only when Protestants were too strong to be fleeced. A curious illustration of the shifting, slippery character of their doctrine on all matters affecting religious equality, has just been afforded by the Osservatore Romano, the Papal organ published in Rome, which abuses Mr. Gladstone savagely for trying to disestablish the Irish Church, and praises Mr. Disraeli to the skies for resisting him, showing that their love of state endowments and ecclesiastical supremacy is stronger than their horror of heresy. As a matter of prudence, however, the hierarchy in this State would do well to take their hands out of the purses of their Protestant neighbors, even when they can get a legislative warrant for putting them there. We can think of nothing better calculated to rekindle the flames of religious strife and bigotry amongst us—or, in other words, to inflict on the community the greatest of calamities; and we would remind them, too, that the arguments by which they doubtless justify these appropriations to their own consciences are much too subtle for the popular understanding.

The recent passage of arms between Lords Derby and Russell has given the first open intimation of what has been for some time privately and more plainly reported as to the sentiments of the Queen on the Irish Church question. For the first time in her long reign, hitherto unruffled by constitutional disagreements, she is said to be meditating opposition to Parliament and an independent exercise of the high prerogatives with which she is nominally invested. She considers herself restrained, by the obligations of her coronation oath, from giving her assent to any bill which may pass the two Houses for the "disestablishment" of the Irish Church. This report may be said almost to derive confirmation from the extraordinary performance on the part of the Ministry of which the Cable has just brought the news. A week ago, the first of Mr. Gladstone's resolutions with regard to the Irish Church was passed in a full House by an increased majority, showing that the tide of opinion has been running with him, and not against him, since the last division. Mr. Disraeli then took four days for deliberation upon the course the Ministry should pursue, and, in he interval, paid a visit to Osborne, and had an interview with the Queen. He announced on Monday night that he would neither resign nor now dissolve Parliament, but would hold on till the new voters had an opportunity of expressing their opinion in the ordinary course of things next year, in which course, he said, he was simply complying with the Queen's request. The present crisis is not unlike that which preceded the close of the American war and the passage of the Catholic Emancipation Act. Mr. Gladstone has, however, announced his intention of pressing his resolutions vigorously, and the unconstitutional position taken up by the Ministry in declaring their intention of retaining possession of the Government for nine months longer in the teeth of a large and hostile majority, will probably lead to a vote of want of confidence, and this, if the Queen's scruples hold firm, may lead to a dissolution of Parliament, bringing the householder into the political field nearly a year sooner than he expected.

The Woman's Rights movement in England has at last taken the shape of a regularly organized agitation. A public meeting, in connection with the "National Society for Woman's Suffrage," has been held at Manchester, in which for the first time on such an occasion women themselves figured largely. Sympathetic letters were read not from Mr. J. S. Mill only, but from the Dean of Canterbury, Mr. Coleridge, Sir George Bowyer—the English champion of Ultramontanism, Mr. Edward Baines—the arch dissenter, Mr. Ewart—of anti-capital punishment fame, Professor Huxley, Mr. Hare—the advocate of minority representation, and the Rev. Charles Kingsley. Moreover—for wonders increase—Archdeacon Sanford was one of the speakers, and he was preceded by Miss Becker and followed by Mrs. Pochin, the wife of the Mayor of Salford. In all "movements," as in all novels, there is sure to be a villain, whose rottenness and infamy have to be exposed at every step, and against whom its speakers and writers at the beginning discharge most of their shafts. We are pleased to see that the villain of the English Woman's Rights movement is the Saturday Review, which is now at last receiving its deserts. We must add, however, that weightier, denser, more moderate and accurate talking and thinking than is to be found in Mrs. Pochin's speech, as reported, is not often heard at public meetings.

The Prince of Wales has visited Ireland and been enrolled in the order of St. Patrick with great éclat. He made a speech at the banquet in which he gave grounds for believing that this visit is the first of a series. The accounts of his reception vary. The daily papers are unanimous as to its cordiality, but private accounts and the weekly papers say it was cold. At all events it is not in the least likely that Fenianism was touched by it, though royal visits have been tried as a means of pacifying Ireland sufficiently often to prove their worthlessness.

Italian affairs are steadily improving, and there are certain signs of social regeneration which make the political sky look brighter also. Count Mamiani, a distinguished poet and philosopher as well as politician, and Signor Berti, the ex-minister, have been delivering lectures at Florence to large audiences on the causes of Italian weakness. The first ascribed it in part, at least, to the small influence of religion on Italian life and character, and said in plain terms that that influence could never be exerted through an organization relying so much on symbolism and sensuous agencies as the Catholic Church. The second preached strength of will, and enforced his preaching by the example of Alfieri, Balbo, d'Azeglio, and Cavour. The ministry has at last got hold of a good working majority in the Parliament, and has carried what is called the multure tax—that is, the tax on corn ground at the mills—and the tax on Government coupons, excepting, we believe, foreign holders. The greatest difficulty with which the Government has had to contend is thus overcome. Count Cambray-Digny has been steadily rising in public estimation, and now stands high—the result of sheer pluck and perseverance. The Italian correspondent of the London Daily News says he was generally spoken of at the beginning of the year as "poor Digny;" he was then promoted to "poor hard-working Digny;" he then became "hard-working Digny;" then "courageous Digny;" then "courageous and clear-headed;" and he is now "distinguished Digny."

MR. WADE'S ARRANGEMENTS.

If one may infer anything with safety from what one hears and reads, we are not likely to gain much by the impeachment, should it end in conviction, beyond Mr. Johnson's removal. We have no desire in the world to underrate the advantages of this, but they are not very numerous nor very weighty. It seems at first blush as if it was an important matter to get the Federal patronage out of his hands before the Presidential election; but then the Federal patronage is now of very little use to him, at least as a weapon of offence. Having no party at his back, and no political future, the office-holders have already deserted him to a man, and, were he now to escape deposition, would during the canvass pay little attention to his behests, even if the Tenure-of-Office Act had not deprived his displeasure of all terrors. In short, there is almost as little to be feared as hoped from him, even if he is acquitted, so far as the campaign is concerned. The Republican party is sure already of the aid of custom-houses and post-offices; the only thing undecided is for what particular candidates they will work between now and the nomination.

Admitting that Mr. Johnson's removal would not seriously affect the campaign, would it help the work of reconstruction? Could it have been effected just after the fourteenth constitutional amendment was proposed, or even immediately after the passage of the Reconstruction Act, there would have been little difficulty in answering this question in the affirmative. That he was almost entirely responsible for the refusal of the South to ratify the amendment, and that he has been largely responsible for its refusal to accept the last Reconstruction Act, or its delay in accepting it, there is little doubt. But his influence on the policy of the Southerners, whether for good or evil, has ceased. It is many months now since his weakness was clearly revealed, and since all Southerners of much weight or intelligence ceased to expect any help from him. The near approach of the expiration of his term of office, and the certainty that he has no chance of re-election, would have brought about this result if the word impeachment had never been mentioned. The days are long past in which a President, whose successor has been nominated, counted for very much in the eyes of either friends or foes in the last six months of his incumbency. So that it is safe to assert, that to make the impeachment process help reconstruction it ought to have begun a year ago at least.

We admit that his conviction may be of considerable advantage in getting a thoroughly objectionable man out of the public service, inasmuch as the failure of the process would probably drive him into fresh acts of folly and violence during the coming summer. Possibly he will be guilty of such acts, whether he is acquitted or condemned; but then it will make a great difference to the country whether he commits them as Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, or as the President of the United States. To those who expect some valuable moral result from this trial; who expect it to serve as a solemn and impressive lesson to all coming Presidents, or to purify the political atmosphere, we really have nothing to say. No calm man who has watched the whole proceeding intelligently, we venture to assert, looks for anything of the kind. The conduct of some of the Managers of the House during its progress, the way in which it has been treated by the party organs, the doctrines which have been proclaimed as to the character of the proceeding, render it impossible to hope that posterity will look back on it as anything but a great exertion of party strength, in which the opposition was finally and completely crushed. We say this in spite of the unqualified admiration we have felt all along for the conduct of the Chief-Justice and the Senate. All that could be done to give elevation and dignity to the proceeding, and to make it really an instrument of warning and instruction, they have done. But then their share in it will not fill as large a space in the eyes of coming generations as it does in ours. Posterity will look at the whole case and its surroundings in a way that we cannot, and will perhaps be as much shocked or amused by the newspaper articles abusing and refuting the President's counsel, laying down the law day by day during the trial, and by the indulgence of the House, and some of the Managers, in one part of the Capitol, in language which would disgrace a prize-ring, while prosecuting the President in another room for violence of speech, as it will be impressed by the decorum and gravity of the procedure, and the calm and impartiality of the court.

At present, the question arising out of the trial which seems most prominently to occupy the political world is the use Mr. Wade is likely to make of his "chance." We do not like to believe that he is himself a party to the intrigues and arrangements which are being made all around him for the division of the spoils of office and the manipulation of the Chicago Convention. As a general rule, one is apt to overrate the delicacy and self-restraint of politicians; but there is certainly fair ground for believing that Mr. Wade is trying hard not to give scandal. But his friends are neither so reticent nor so scrupulous, and are dividing the offices for him. They are hardly doing it in complete ignorance of his wishes or intentions. Mr. Butler, it is generally said, and it is, let us add, generally believed, is pressing him hard for the mission to England, and Mr. Greeley is talked of, though less confidently, as Mr. Seward's successor. Arrangements on an extensive scale for the extortion from the Convention of Mr. Wade's nomination at least to the Vice-Presidency are also said to be in progress, and some of the more "advanced" politicians even claim the Presidency for him, on the ground that Grant has failed to excite enthusiasm enough to make him a safe candidate in view of the limited success of the party at the recent elections.

Moreover, there are already signs that Mr. Wade is preparing "a policy" of his own; and yet, if Mr. Johnson's case were of any value whatever as a lesson, one would think it would put an end to everything like the formation of a "President's policy." The American Industrial League, which met the other day, addressed him earnestly on the subject of an increase in the tariff, and seem to have enlisted him in support of it, though how he is to help it without running counter to all the rules of Presidential conduct which the Radical journals have been preaching for the last six months, it is hard to see. Moreover, he is apparently expected to have views on the subject of the currency and the national finances generally—a matter with which he is about as fit to deal as with Chinese metaphysics—and to express his views; doubtless, in the selection of a new Secretary of the Treasury, and by the use of his influence on the House.

We do not pretend to prophesy what is going to happen. We are simply putting before our readers what the signs visible to outsiders seem to indicate—and the thing they indicate most clearly is the approach of nine months or more of great confusion, into which two changes of administration and one Presidential election will be crowded, and in which the foreign policy and financial policy of the Government will be unsettled, and entirely new and untried men assigned to some of its most delicate and important duties. In fact, the most probable immediate result of the impeachment trial now seems to be the complete ascendency of what may be called the War-Horse section of the party, which the normal and regular process of recovery after the war was slowly but steadily consigning to a secondary and obscure position. It was the consciousness of this which made them struggle so desperately for impeachment as their only chance of salvation; and Andrew Johnson played into their hands with truly amazing fatuity. He at last did all they wanted him to do in violating the Tenure-of-Office Act, and the mind and knowledge and forethought and civil prudence of the Republican party at once fell into the background, and the War-Horses everywhere came to the front "with head and tail erect," neighing, snorting, and plunging. The Wilsons and Binghams made way in the impeachment business for the Butlers and Stevenses, and it was only after a smart tussle that the Senate and the Chief-Justice were saved from falling under the domination of the inspired portion of that body, and the War-Horse organs began to furnish bran-new law and jurisprudence literally by the yard, for use on the trial, with a rapidity that puts one out of all patience with the celebrated jurists of other ages and nations. If the two most striking results of Mr. Johnson's removal should be Mr. Wade's nomination to the Vice-Presidency and the selection of Mr. B. F. Butler by the "moral party" of the country for the British mission, and the installation of War-Horses in the State Department and the Treasury, we suspect it will be a good while before another President is impeached.

It does not need any remarkable perspicacity to be able to say that all the country expects, as the proper sequel to the impeachment trial, is that Mr. Wade will confine himself to the work of preventing any unnecessary disturbance in the machinery of government during the few months that are to intervene before the inauguration of the new administration. He has no more right to start "a policy" than Mr. Johnson had; if for no other reason, for the very simple one that in the Presidential chair he will be, far more than Mr. Johnson, the "accident of an accident." The people have not voted for him for that or any similar position, and his duty is simply to keep the car of state in motion, and not to give it any new direction until a properly chosen driver comes to relieve him. The support of the present office-holders of course may be counted on with certainty for any candidate the Convention may nominate. All changes or upturnings are therefore unnecessary for party purposes, and if any are made for the mere purpose of filling the public service with Mr. Wade's creatures or supporters, or helping the War-Horse interest at the Convention, it is not Mr. Wade only who will suffer for it, but the party at large. Many of the Republican leaders are constantly disposed to forget how much of their security they owe to the inherent badness of the Democrats, but that it is unsafe to rely on this too much, the elections of the last year have shown. The "week-kneed" and "lukewarm," let us repeat, are a powerful body. In the field of rhetoric a "burning editorial" may scatter them like chaff before the whirlwind, but at the polls they count and cannot be driven off.

THE USES OF ADVERSITY TO THE DEMOCRATS.

The Democratic party has now been out of power a sufficient length of time, and has witnessed the spending by other hands than its own of a sufficient amount of money, to have learnt whatever adversity has to teach. It has, too, during this period of exclusion from office, enjoyed the great advantage of being delivered from that necessity of defending slavery which weighed down its energies and destroyed its influence for so many years before the war, and which, many of its foremost members loved to believe, obscured, but did not diminish, its virtues. It still, they said, had great principles in its keeping, and its uses to the commonwealth, as the guardian of these principles, would be plainer than ever when the troubles arising out of the war were at an end.

What all this amounts to we have, luckily, during the past winter seen exemplified on a small scale, but still on a scale large enough to give us the means of judging what kind of government we should have if the party secured the Presidency, and had a majority in Congress to support its nominee. Owing to various circumstances, still fresh in the recollection of our readers, the elections went against the Republicans last fall in two of the largest, richest, and most intelligent States in the Union, New York and Ohio, and the Democrats got the upper-hand in the State Legislatures for the first time in some years. Here, then, they had at last an opportunity of showing the world what they meant by their criticisms when in opposition; of setting the Republicans an example of what they considered good government; of giving the Radical visionaries an idea of "practical statesmanship;" of proving the horror of the corruption by which they say the land has been disgraced during the rebellion, by their own purity, and illustrating the folly of the policy of coercion pursued at the South by a policy of moderation and conciliation at home. Few people, of course, who were familiar with the materials of which the party is now composed, expected from it a display of genuine virtue and wisdom; but there were plenty who believed that there was enough brains left in it to produce a fair imitation both of virtue and wisdom.

The experiment has now lasted half a year, and we have the result. The New York Legislature now sitting is probably the most corrupt legislative body which has ever assembled, not excepting the Irish Parliament of famous and melancholy memory. The most corrupt not simply from the largeness of the proportion of purchasable members it contains, but from the smallness of the sum for which they can be bought. In the popular mode of estimating the degree of corruption to which a deliberative body has attained, the error is usually committed of supposing the corruption to increase in the direct ratio of the amount of money paid—so that, when one hears that a very large sum has been divided amongst the legislators, we are apt to think of their moral condition as proportionately low. The fact is, of course, that, the number of legislators to be bought being fixed, their degradation is in the inverse ratio of the sums they receive; and judged by this standard the members of the New York Legislature stand lowest in the long roll of parliamentary knaves. Tested by the amount of impudent indifference to public opinion which they exhibit, the result is the same. Of course we do not claim for the Republican members the credit of purity; but there are degrees in rascality as in everything else, and though the New York Legislature was very corrupt last year, the lowest depth was not reached till the majority became Democratic. We use the phrase "lowest depth" advisedly. It is not likely, unless some terrible moral break-up should occur in the community at large, that the State Legislature will ever contain a larger number of knaves than it does now. A few honest men will always find their way into it at least by accident. If further progress in the downward direction should be made it will doubtless be made rather by the increasing degradation of individuals already degraded than by the spread of corruption amongst a greater number. That is to say, the price of votes will probably steadily fall under the influence of increasing impudence and the competition of corrupt men for seats. Hitherto, something has had to be paid as a compensation for risk to reputation in case of exposure, but the idea of risk to reputation has already become a pleasant joke. This, then, is what has been gained in this State by the "uprising" last fall against Radical corruption and excesses. To crown all, the Assembly, in which alone the Democrats have a majority, apparently in pure love of knavery, and with a desire to propagate it as much as possible, have just passed resolutions asking Congress to pay off the national debt in greenbacks and to tax the bonds; in other words, not only to break faith with the public creditors, but to break it with as much parade of meanness as possible. Moreover, they have just made an investigation into their own corruption, and report with great simplicity that they have discovered nothing—which reminds us of Mr. Sam Weller's inability to see his father in the court-room when Mr. Justice Starleigh asked him to point him out that he might commit him for contempt.

In Ohio, the Democratic majority have not, so far as we have heard, shown themselves adepts in the art of corruption, but they have revealed other tendencies not less significant. One of their first acts, as our readers may remember, was an attempt to revoke the ratification of the fourteenth constitutional amendment, made by the last Legislature. There is nothing in this amendment, as everybody knows, in the smallest degree opposed to any principles the Democracy has ever professed. It is simply the lawful means of effecting some changes in the Constitution of which nobody denies the desirableness. It may be objectionable for Congress to make the adoption of it by the Southern States a condition of their readmission to the Union, but this is a matter which does not affect the merits of the amendment per se, and it cannot possibly render it improper that a Northern State, acting freely, should adopt it. Nobody, too, has ventured to maintain that it would not have been, or would not now be, a good thing for the Southern States to ratify it of their own free will; so that the attempt of the Ohio Legislature to withdraw the ratification of that State would, even if successful, have had no better result than the increase of confusion and bitterness, the prolongation of the controversies by which the country is already distracted, and the flinging into the cauldron of contention one more ingredient; and yet this was done by a party which daily abuses the Radicals for not being "practical," for laying stress on non-essentials, and for not adapting their policy to the actual state of things.

They have, however, gone further than this. One of their great objections to the enfranchisement of the Southern negroes, or to the enfranchisement of the Northern negroes either, has been the ignorance of the negroes. They denounce the Republicans for desiring to concede a share in the government to African barbarians, ignorant of its principles, of its processes, and of its aims. One would naturally expect that a party which talks in this way, and which is so careful about the kind of influence brought to bear on politics that it will not suffer even educated negroes to vote at the North, lest blood alone should carry with it some secret political incapacity, would make every effort at least to include in the voting population the largest possible number of educated and intelligent white men; that it would oppose all attempts to restrain, by technical rules, the participation in the government of those whose descent and training made their political value undeniable; that let the supporters of disqualification and strict construction be who they might, they would not be found in the ranks of the Democratic party. Nevertheless, the Ohio Legislature has just disfranchised all students of colleges, and all inmates of soldiers' homes, who cannot show that they are permanent residents in the district in which the college or home is situated. The same phenomenon has been witnessed in New Haven. The Democratic selectmen in that city refuse to register students of Yale College, and there is, it appears, under the Constitution no power in the courts to compel them.

We confess we do not regret the disfranchisement of the Ohio students. No harm whatever can be done in any question now pending by the formal admission of the Democratic party itself that not only is it the foe of intelligence and education, but that in every place in which young men meet to think and learn it finds an enemy's stronghold. The measure is not only remarkable as an illustration of the want of practical ability in the party, the stupid indifference to results which pervades it, and the malignity which presides over its councils, but as a solemn declaration of its hatred of the light. It is valuable, too, in our eyes as proof of the correctness of the view which we ventured to promulgate nearly a year ago, that the present subjects of party strife could not last very long, and that when they had passed away it would be found that the great and permanent political hosts, between which the strife would be perpetuated, would be the party of ignorance, corruption, bad faith, and maladministration, and the party of education, purity, honesty, and reform. Slavery is dead; secession we are not likely to hear of in the next two centuries, if ever again; the controversy over the tariff will be settled before many years—if not by the spread of economical knowledge, by the growth of American industry into such robustness as to make protection not only really, but evidently, unnecessary. All has been done for the negro that direct legislation can do; the rest must come from the growth of the community at large in faith, virtue, and knowledge. The work which will, therefore, hereafter fall to the lot of the Republican party or of the party which succeeds it and undertakes its duties, will be not the overthrow of caste or privilege, for there will be no caste or privileges; not the protection of this or that branch of industry, for there will be no branch of industry needing protection, but the protection of the courts, the schools, and the legislature and the treasury against the assaults of the ignorant, the foolish, and the knavish; the preservation in all walks of life of a fair field for intelligence and honesty; the application to the work of government of knowledge and experience and reflection in opposition to the vast body of persons who, as long as human nature is what it is, will like to see national affairs administered as if the Government only needed to "last their time," and were not a sacred inheritance to be transmitted to the remotest ages, "defended by reverence, defended by power—a fortress at once, and a temple," and as if true wisdom were "the work of sudden acuteness, and not of well-balanced reason." If this view of the case be the true one, young men of education need not regret that the hosts of ignorance and of darkness should early hurl defiance at them. The future, after all, belongs to the children of light. The intellect and energy of the best men of the country will not hereafter have to be employed in the coarse labor of draining the pestilential swamps of slavery. The processes of politics will have all the delicacy and complexity which mark the affairs of a united, homogeneous, and highly civilized community, and they will perhaps possess, even if the age of great statesmen have passed away, such attractions for those who have learnt to regard them as the highest of human pursuits as they have never offered before.

ELOQUENCE OF THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

The trial of the President has called forth very little that merits the name of eloquence. Indeed, we are inclined to disregard the correspondents and say that there has been nothing at all of the sort, except the appeal to the Senate with which Mr. Groesbeck closed his address. It may very well have been, as they listened to this speaker's simple, forcible language, full as it was, or seemed to be, of sincere feeling, that Mr. Johnson's judges forgot for a few moments the exacerbations of the last three years and recollected only the honorable and admirable passages in Mr. Johnson's life—the dark days when what has since been his narrow-minded stubbornness was his patriotic energy and singleness of faith, the influence of which in the Border country was worth to the Union almost an army; and those earlier, still darker days when with vehement boldness he confronted the sullenness and threats of the senators daily withdrawing from the Senate chamber to the field of battle, and gave the country and its rulers an example not unneeded of defiant and undoubting confidence in the national power. This part of Mr. Groesbeck's appeal, if we may judge it by the effect which the reading of it had on our own mind, was really eloquence, and eloquence of no mean order.

Except this single one, however, the orations, alike those for the prosecution and those for the defence, seem to us altogether barren of those displays which certainly it was not unreasonable to expect—for which, at any rate, the trial afforded excellent opportunity. To be sure, the case as presented to the court was of a strictly and technically legal character. And the pleaders, all of them, were lawyers. And it may be laid down as true that to expect from lawyers as such anything which, in the high sense of the term, can be called eloquence, is unwarranted. No one of the world's great orators is such simply in virtue of his pleas in courts. The private causes in which the greatest orators of antiquity won something of that fame by which their names have been made synonyms for eloquence itself, were causes in which the affairs of plaintiff and defendant were blended with the concerns of states and empires; and of most of their renown pure politics was the sole source. So, also, of the highest oratory of modern times, that of England, of France, of this country; unless, indeed, for both ancient and modern times, we make exception of religious eloquence, an exception, however, which avails the lawyers nothing.

Still, for whomsoever was capable, there was most favorable opportunity of transcending the narrow bounds which the case immediately before the court apparently imposed. The act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices was but a small thing among the issues involved. The trial may well enough be held the culminating point of the struggle between slavery and its enemies which for more than a generation has agitated the country, and which but recently has carried death or wounds into most families in the United States; it raises questions which touch the foundations of the organic law, and the decision of which affects our future history; and it is true, too, that the advocates addressed not the Senate only, but a court of revision behind the Senate—the people, who also are to be convinced and persuaded, for whom the exposition of the law in the case could not be made too lucid, whose sentence may rightly be governed by the general considerations of justice and national expediency—fit subject-matter of the truest eloquence—sound reasoning surcharged with feeling, and exercised on topics at once of importance and of the widest interest. Of this aspect of the trial the lawyers were for the most part unmindful, and, as we have said, when it was in their minds, and they attempted to speak in view of it, they succeeded but badly, lame or stiff rhetorical gambolling being as near as most of them came to the soaring of eloquence.

Of the legal arguments, as they are called, we of course do not here speak; and, primarily, all the speeches were legal arguments. Mr. Curtis's and Mr. Stanbery's were entirely such. Mr. Butler's, more readable than either of these, was all but entirely such, and might with advantage have been such altogether, the emphasis of the peroration being not particularly impressive. There was something not unimpressive in the emphasis with which Mr. Stevens prophesied infamy unending for the heirs of senators who, as judges, may dare to express an opinion different from that which as legislators they have already expressed; but certainly the prediction added no weight to the forcible, straightforward argumentation which composed nearly all the rest of Mr. Stevens's address; all except the end of it. In that Mr. Groesback figures as a Conscript Father, and, on Mr. Stevens's authority, the stocks are set up in the Forum Romanum and given in charge to Cato the Censor.

This sort of undigested bits of classic lore out of Plutarch and the dictionaries of biography have for some time been as certain an ear-mark of what is called polished "American eloquence" as wild ornithology is of our cross-roads variety, or as exclamation points of "French eloquence," or mixed metaphors of "Irish eloquence," or double-columns of figures of "Scotch eloquence"—geographically bounded but otherwise imaginary provinces of what is one undivided realm. It is noticeable, though not odd or unaccountable, that the fondness for borrowing second-hand, threadbare classical ornaments is greatest among persons who not only seem to partake in but the very smallest degree of the spirit of antiquity, whose minds have least been clarified and liberalized by the influences which classical literature exerts, but who also are in the completest ignorance of even the outside of antiquity. We fancy they may be in part misled by Mr. Sumner's habitual array of quotations from Greek and Latin authors, and imagine that to possess the externals of his scholarship is to possess his education and liberal culture. If so, he has much to answer for; but it is a point that we do not press. After all, the tasteless imitation of what it half understands and can but injudiciously admire, is too surely a native tendency of the not completely civilized soul and mind for it to be at all fair to attribute much blame to anything but the force of nature. In the interest of eloquence, however, indeed of endurable rhetoric, it is to be desired that the House of Representatives should add to "Cushing's Manual" a new rule making it an offence punishable by reprimand for any speaker to refer in any manner whatsoever to any man, institution, or event of times prior, say, to A.D. 1640. That date being fixed upon, honorable gentlemen would still have the use of the head of Charles the First, and James the Second's abdication, and the career of Napoleon, and the Pilgrim and Continental Congressional Fathers, and the French Revolution, and our own Wars of Independence and of 1812, and the late rebellion, and other historic pages in numbers ample enough for Mr. James Brooks or Mr. N. P. Banks. But we should be saved heaps of pretentious folly about "Cicero, Tully, and other sages of Greece;" and, sacred history being barred as well as profane, we should be spared that peculiar way of handling the mysteries of the Christian faith which now occasionally staggers the humbler believer. Of both these rhetorical blemishes many examples are to be found scattered through the speeches. Mr. Boutwell's otherwise clever speech furnishes two that are very striking. What can be more puerile than the absurd parallel which he drew between a certain Caius Verres and Andrew Johnson? (Throughout the trial, by the way, Mr. Johnson has had his full name given him with what seems extreme and, before his conviction, unjustifiable severity). Nothing could be more puerile, we should say, to answer our own question, except the puerility—mingled with an irreverence which, real or only apparent, has always the effect of an offence against good taste—with which he identified the "outer darkness" of which the Saviour speaks with that astonishing astronomical "hole in the sky" which possibly is to be the future abode of recreant Presidents!

Mr. Evarts, whose oration was perhaps more carefully prepared than any other that has been delivered, was very successful in making the efforts of Mr. Boutwell's somewhat creaking imagination seem as ridiculous as they really were. The Congressmen among his audience might, by the way, have profitably marked how utterly he destroyed the fabric of his opponents, without at all placing himself so far as concerns manners below the brutes of the less civilized countries. As an advocate, Mr. Evarts carries fearlessness of his brethren of the bar to the point of seeming arrogance of mind and contemptuousness of manner, and he lightened the tediousness of his long argument by a good many characteristic sarcastic touches. His acrid satire had an amusingly powerful and sudden effect in shrivelling the tumidities to which it was applied. A still better application of it than that of which Mr. Boutwell got the benefit, was Mr. Evarts's citation of the well-known savage debate between Mr. Bingham and Mr. Butler, in which the one taunted the other with his military failures during the late war, and was in turn told that he himself had shed the blood of but one person throughout the whole rebellion, and that one an innocent woman. "But what do you think," said Mr. Evarts, "was the subject that those honorable gentlemen were debating upon? Why, it was charity!" "What?" "a Senator" asks, opportunely and obligingly. "Charity," replied Mr. Evarts, and he went on using the familiar apostolic description of charity in a very effective manner, and, we dare say, much amusing General Butler, who may have been reminded of an occasion when he himself made use of the same quotation with equal skill and readiness, and with still more of bitter wit. Mr. Evarts's command of Scripture served him in good stead throughout his speech; it is a gift that must always be advantageous to an orator before any Anglo-Saxon audience, fed as it is from infancy on the Bible. But on his part, too, there were occasional slips of the kind which have been censured in Mr. Boutwell's case. And excellent as Mr. Evarts's speech was in the keenness of its satirical parts, and successful as he was in making fun of his opponents, his own high flights were not appreciably better than theirs. His comparison of an oath to a steel-tipped lightning-rod was not in what is thought the best taste; and in equally bad taste was his schooling of the Senate as if it were a jurat of tender years, from the lower walks of life, on the sanctity of an oath; and what, to give a further example, does talk of this kind mean, and how should a sensible man set his face solemnly and deliver it with impressiveness as having some peculiar signification?

"Now, what does the Constitution do for us? A few little words; that is all—truth, justice, oath, duty; and what does the whole scope of our moral nature, and what support we may hope from higher aid, extend to in any of our affairs of life than this? Truth, justice, oath, duty, controlt he fate, life, liberty, character, and property of every citizen. Truth, justice, oath, duty, are the ideas which the Constitution has forced upon your souls to-day. You receive them or you neglect them. Whichever way you turn you cannot be the same men afterward that you were. Accept them, embrace and obey them, and you are nobler and stronger and better. Spurn and reject them, and you are worse and baser and weaker and wickeder than before."

Whenever the speech was not legal or satirical, it was apt to run into this vein, and we hope no young man will be misled into taking for his model Mr. Evarts's performance when eloquence is his aim, still less to imitate the Johnsonese haranguing of Mr. Nelson, or the operose turgidity of Mr. Williams, or the high classicism of Mr. Stevens and Mr. Boutwell. A better thing for any young aspirant would be to read through the speeches and note how satisfactory each of them was while the speaker contented himself with being straightforward, and made no straining after being grand and fine.

THE PRESS AND THE RICH MEN.

A CORRESPONDENT in another column calls attention to a matter which is every day acquiring greater and greater importance, viz., the precise limits of a man's liberty of living for himself, or, to put it another way, of his obligation to live for his neighbors. When rich men complain, as our correspondent does, of having their private affairs discussed in a magazine article, the question they raise is to what extent they are bound to contribute to other people's instruction or enjoyment, and to what extent they may devote themselves to their own instruction or enjoyment. It is quite true that in this country, as in every democratic country, the old respect for privacy and for the feelings of individuals, in all matters in which they interfere with the gratification of public curiosity, is diminishing. It has diminished in the United States very rapidly of late, mainly owing, as we believe, to our internal revenue system. The income tax alone has done a great deal to destroy the sanctity which once surrounded private affairs, by making the exposure of them seem a kind of patriotic duty. It was hard enough for a man to be obliged to give an account of his income to officials, who were not bound to secrecy about it, but it has been still harder since the newspapers began to publish lists of the taxable incomes. We do not suffer seriously from the practice in this city, owing to its size and the metropolitan character of its population; but the effect of it in the smaller towns, where every man's thoughts were already only too much occupied by his neighbor's affairs, has been simply execrable. Taking into account, in fact, the character of the functionaries whom it has called into existence, the temptations it has placed in their way, the feebleness of the checks it has imposed on their frauds and misconduct, the stimulus it has given to cheating, perjury, and impertinent curiosity amongst the community at large, we doubt if any people was ever afflicted with a more ingenious and effective instrument of demoralization than our revenue system has proved, and we are satisfied we are as yet far from a thorough appreciation of its results.

But then as regards the exposure of the private affairs of individuals—and especially of rich individuals—it has only stimulated and provided fresh means of gratifying a feeling which already existed. There are few who would, on the whole, not like to know, if they could learn it without being base or mean or impertinent, how much money their neighbors have, and what are their principal peculiarities of life or character; and the more prominent a person in the community one's neighbor is, the more one wants to know about him. There is a good deal of confusion in the teachings on this subject amongst lecturers and writers on the conduct of life, and especially amongst those writers who address themselves specially to young people, as to the extent to which it is excusable or useful to occupy one's self with thought or conversation about one's friends and neighbors. They tell us with great gravity that "the proper study of mankind is man," and they rate very highly what is called "a knowledge of the world" or "a knowledge of human nature;" but in the same breath in which they laud these things they denounce that habit of minute observation of individuals by which alone a knowledge of human nature can be acquired, and that interchange of the results of observation in conversation, which is commonly called "gossip," by which alone the habit can be kept up. The person who resolutely resolves not to occupy his mind with the doings or sayings of his fellow-men, but to confine himself to "questions" or to business, is pretty sure to be a man without enemies; but he is also pretty sure to be a very uninteresting person, with little or no acuteness or sagacity, and to possess very little value as a friend. One meets constantly, to be sure, with people who can keep their eye on everybody and everything, note all that passes before them, and read character after five minutes' talk with the owner, and yet avoid in society all discussion of their friends and acquaintances; but then people of this sort are to society what geniuses are to literature and politics and war. They are valuable and admirable, but if the mass of men were to try to imitate them, the result would be not only an enormous multiplication of simpletons, but the conversion of life into a dull and colorless round of uninteresting duties.

The fact is that, to root out the interest we all feel in our neighbors' concerns, we should have to change human nature itself. Man is an animal, and a gregarious animal; and he must cease both to be an animal and to be gregarious before he can be got to take his eye off the rest of the herd, and occupy himself exclusively or mainly with matters which do not relate to individual peculiarities. Of course, this interest in our fellows may be abused, and, of course, gossip may become "ill-natured," and may be as debasing an occupation as any in which a human being can engage; but the feeling which creates gossip is not a discreditable one, and, what is more to our purpose, it does not necessarily generate unkindliness, and is perfectly consistent with great regard for individual feelings. The societies in which there is least gossip, in which privacy is most respected, in which people care least and occupy themselves least with what their neighbors are doing, are not the most agreeable or humane societies, or those in which there exists most regard for individual tastes and susceptibilities.

There is, however, a broad line between the private discussion of a man's affairs and habits and history by his neighbors and friends, and the discussion of them in the newspapers for the benefit of those who only know him by name or have never heard of him at all, and, as is mostly the case, by writers whose impressions about him are hasty and imperfect, and, let them be ever so erroneous, cannot be corrected; and this line is drawn by his own feelings. Talk about a man's affairs or peculiarities in a private parlor is one thing; talk about them in a magazine or newspaper is another, for the simple reason that, if properly conducted, the first can neither give him pain nor do him harm, while the latter may do him harm and is sure to give him pain; and whenever the press ceases to consider these feelings of individuals to be of any consequence, it will be a safe sign that the community is far gone in brutality and degradation. We do not deny that there is always a certain amount of curiosity on the part of the public even about people they have never heard of; it is a curiosity which, as we have been saying, has its basis in human nature, and is in itself not wholly blameworthy. But, like acquisitiveness, amativeness, and several other in themselves useful feelings, it is one which to be useful must be kept within certain limits. Society is not benefited by having the whole country informed in print how much money A. B. has, how he acquired it, what his habits are, and how he lives; while if A. B. is pained or made uncomfortable by it, society is seriously injured. We know very well that every day the value of individuals and of individuality is coming to be considered of less and less consequence, but it is of great consequence nevertheless. We do not think public spirit—that is, the subordination of their own interests to those of their fellow-citizens on the part of individuals, and especially rich men—is as great as it ought to be by any means; but unless the feeling of respect for individual tastes and habits is more cultivated, unless it is made easier for individuals to lead their own lives, consult their own tastes, and follow their own bent, the number of individuals capable of rendering the community any real service will diminish instead of increasing.

The plan of making rich men generous, self-devoting, patriotic, by sending spies into their homes to examine their check-books and their silver safe, and then "showing them up" in the newspapers, is about as sensible as the old plan of making children love their parents by whipping them. There is no doubt that although wealth is one of the great prizes of life in America, those who acquire it or inherit it ought to consider it a trust, and use it largely for the good of their fellow-men; but this state of virtuous feeling cannot be forced. It must grow spontaneously, along with all other virtues, out of the soil of moral culture, and there is no surer way of preventing its growing than exacting it, and treating those who do not show it as outlaws or wrongdoers. If the press and the small moralists deny rich men the privilege which every poor man, however rascally, enjoys, of doing what he pleases with his money, the result will be not that more rich men will labor for the public good, but that fewer will stay in the country after having made their fortunes. The best class of them—those with most taste, sentiment, and culture; that is, those whose services and influence American society most needs—are leaving us every year to establish themselves in Europe, where they already form a colony of enormous size, taking little interest in American affairs, except in so far as they affect dividends, and looking on their travelling countrymen, as the Saturday Review remarked the other day, as Romanized Visigoths must have looked on a newly-arrived horde from the other side of the Rhine.

The "Thoughtful Teetotaller" will doubtless say that they are no loss, and that we are better without them; but he is mistaken. We are not better without them. Every person who maintains an elegant or even luxurious home, in which the graces of life are cultivated, in which art and literature are held in respect, is a civilizing agency of no ordinary value, and there is no country in the world in which, owing to the peculiar nature of its progress, such agencies are more needed than here; and whenever an American capable of creating such a home transfers himself to foreign soil, he inflicts a real loss on his own country.

It is precisely this class of rich men we drive away by our prying and impertinent criticism. The class who are not annoyed by it, who are sure to stay with us, and who would, on the whole, be glad to have a newspaper reporter at all their balls and at their dinner-parties, if he would content himself with broken victuals in the butler's pantry, and for whom notoriety has no terrors, are the guzzling, gambling, horsey rich men who, instead of being a blessing to the community, are a curse to it, and who, instead of using their wealth for its edification, so use it as to corrupt the young, make simplicity, good taste, industry, and economy—in short, nearly all the virtues by which society is either preserved or adorned—contemptible or ridiculous.

There is no question that the principle of freedom—the plan of letting people alone—works as well in the field of philanthropy as in other fields. It has been found that the less there is done to regulate people, the less regulation and police do they need; that the less trouble we take to instruct them in the art of growing rich, the faster the national wealth accumulates; and it will be found, too, that the less we bully people into leading "useful lives," the more useful lives will there be led. The great virtues of all kinds grow best in the open air.

Unfortunately, however, the matter of prying into people's private affairs, for the purpose of procuring materials for criticism, can hardly be said to be in the hands of the public. The competition amongst periodicals, as amongst theatres, has become so great, in spite of the steady improvement in the public taste, that immediate success can only be achieved by what is called "sensationalism," and the difficulty of providing "sensational" matter without being either profane or indecent is every day increasing. The collection of information about persons is, therefore, growing more and more into favor with writers who work in this field, and who find distasteful or laborious the amount of thinking or reading necessary to make the profession of literature either respectable or useful. They have long been in the habit of describing each other with great minuteness, adding such details about habits, characteristics, domestic life, and yearly income as would make the picture more complete. This was a comparatively harmless occupation, for two reasons; one was that the persons described rather enjoyed it, and the other was that the interest of the public in the appearance, manners, and customs of "lively writers" is, to say the least, languid. But there is hardly any more work of this kind to be done. The greatest beauty of the press will hardly bear having his head of hair or the cut of his pantaloons sketched more than twice, and the laborers are consequently wandering about in search of virgin soil. The practice of "interviewing," as it is called—that is, of calling on public men, pumping them on public affairs, and taking down what they say, and surrounding their remarks with a little sketch of their houses, families, and furniture—has been carried of late to extraordinary perfection, owing to the increasing candor and openness of our new class of statesmen; but then this, too, is wearing out. The "interviewers" have nearly all been called "liars" by their great correlatives, which renders a second visit embarrassing for both parties. The "millionaires" are accordingly being brought into use, and as there is a very large number of them, and as their position is the only one to which the whole population aspires, or would like to fill, they promise to furnish a very large amount of entertaining matter. Our advice to them would be, to furnish "full particulars" themselves to the most enterprising periodicals, and thus not only secure accuracy, but add to their "pile" whatever the article may be worth, instead of having it go into the pockets of relentless spies and busybodies.

WHAT ONE NOBLE FAMILY HAS DONE FOR ITALY.

It was with no small surprise, on looking over a volume of commercial statistics for the year 1865, that we found that Italy imports earthenware, porcelain, and glass to the amount of thirteen millions of francs, while she only exports half a million of these articles. Recalling the world-famed glass of Venice, and the scarcely less renowned potteries of some sixty Italian cities, this almost total dependence on foreigners for the commonest articles of daily use seemed but one more proof of the utter ruin and decay engendered by three centuries of slavery. Too little time has elapsed since the "last tyrant was dethroned," and too much inevitable confusion attended the unification, the fusion of seven provinces into one, for any great perceptible progress to be noted by the casual observer; but progress is the order of the day, as is proved by the statistics of the succeeding years. And, although Italy's real prosperity must lie chiefly in her fertile soil and tideless sea, there are signs which give fair hope that she may recover something of her old renown as a manufacturing country. Some time since we sent to the readers of the Nation an account of Salviati's Venetian mosaics and glass manufactory, and we are happy to say that a flourishing company has now undertaken that beautiful as useful enterprise, even as the bead factories are looking up, and the table and ornamental glass fabrics in general, so that by the time the commercial statistics for 1868 appear we trust that the glass importation list will be diminished and the exportation increased. This will assuredly be the case in the pottery and porcelain department if all the manufactures increase in proportion to that of the Ginori-Lisci at Doccia, which we have to-day visited to our infinite pleasure and surprise—sensations produced even less by the beauty of the objects exhibited than by the Italianissimo resolution to make of that establishment a national institution, not to be beaten or outrivalled by any foreign manufacture.

The founder of this factory was the Marquis Carlo Ginori, senator in 1735. A true descendant of the sturdy old Tuscan race, who looked on work as noble, all his wealth and influence were devoted to restore something of the old prosperity and love of labor among his degenerate countrymen. He purchased the marshes of Riparbella, and set to work to drain them, built a vast palace and fishermen's cottages alongside, hoping to establish coral fishing on a solid basis. In fact, in four years quite a little fleet of seventeen boats set out in pursuit of this source of prosperity new to Tuscany. His speculations in Angola sheep were not so successful, but his crowning success was the porcelain establishment. Governor of Leghorn at that epoch, he sent at his own expense a ship to the East Indies in order to obtain specimens of the clay of which the Chinese and Japanese porcelain is composed. After many failures and much study and labor, he succeeded in producing articles fit for sale. The rulers of Italy caused manufactories to be opened in other provinces; but, dependent on the Government for life, all failed. The only privilege enjoyed by Giori was the exclusive right of porcelain manufacture in Tuscany; but, considering the superiority of imported articles, this was a small boon, and even this ceased in 1812. In the early times the beautiful was more cultivated than the useful, and connoisseurs still seek eagerly for the "old Ginori" china. Finding that the ignorance of the workmen was one of the greatest obstacles to success, the marquis set up schools in the district of Doccia, and sent any youth who gave signs of talent to complete his studies in Florence or in Rome; and so bent was he on discovering the best material, that in the museum of the factory are three thousand specimens of home and foreign clay collected during his lifetime. To the Marquis Carlo, who died in 1757, succeeded his son Lorenzo, who enlarged the buildings and caused a cylindrical furnace—a novelty in those days—to be constructed. Lorenzo's son Carlo was worthy of both father and grandfather, and his widow jealously watched over the precious inheritance of her children, one of whom, the present proprietor, was sent abroad to be educated, attended the chemical lectures of Dumas and Pelouze at the Sorbonne, and worked practically in the laboratory. On his return to Florence he gave himself up entirely to further the advancement of his establishment, the famous bas-reliefs of Capodimonte ware were copied in perfection, while the specimens of Italian majolica—for which the fabrics of Faenza, Urbino, Castel Durante, and especially Gubbio, were so renowned—which issued from the Doccia deceived connoisseurs all over Europe, and made the fortune of more than one old curiosity dealer who palmed them off as antique. Prizes were awarded to the Ginori ware at the Paris Exhibition of 1855, at the Italian of '61, at the English of '62; but when the balance was prepared each year an increasing deficit warned the Ginori family that their hobby-horse was a very costly one.

The political changes of 1859, the increased facility of transport, and especially the commercial treaties with France, England, and Germany, brought matters to a climax—it was clear that the manufactory of Doccia must either be limited to the production of artistic works in which it would fear no rivals, but which could never repay the cost of produce, or be placed in a condition to compete with, and in time defy, the ware of foreign markets. The risk was serious, but the Ginori blood savors of Saxon rather than Latin race. When the present marquis retraced the traditions of his house, visited the little colony of workmen grandsons and great-grandsons, most of them of his own great-grandfather, Carlo, his resolution was taken—the Doccia should be radically reorganized; new furnaces and larger mills constructed; the machines in use in other countries introduced; fewer Etruscan vases, inlaid tables, Lucca della Robbia medallions, Gubbio majolica, should be wrought, if necessary; but pots and pans, penny-a-plate dinner services, stoves, kitchen utensils, and all household ware should in time find their way to all Italian homes with the Ginori mark on each. No sooner said than done. In five years the building itself has been increased by a fourth, the old furnace of 1808 demolished and one with five stories of graduated heat substituted, another furnace of three stories for biscuit china introduced, fresh laboratories and special rooms for colored porcelain opened. The result has been adequate to the daring: whereas in 1860 but 150 workmen were employed and in 1864 but 250, this year 355 are in full work, earning annual wages to the amount of 180,000f. The accounts of the present year will not be made out till the end of the present month; but the inspector told me yesterday that though (or we should perhaps say because) the prices of the ware have been reduced from 20 to 50 per cent., they have received orders to the amount of 650,000f. "For beautiful or useful ware?" I asked. "Oh! for both," he said. "Our English customers go in for beauty; we cannot turn out sufficient bas-relief services for them. But our own countrymen go in for use; we supply the chemists with all the vases for their laboratories; all the stoves in Florence are ours; in 1864, when the transfer of government required all the public buildings for offices, we could not supply them fast enough; the hollow tubes through which the telegraphic wires pass are of the finest porcelain, while our common majolica ware is finding its way to every crockery shop in Italy." So saying, he led us through the warehouses where every imaginable article of crockery was piled up, and for the first time in Italy I saw a decent-sized hand-basin, and resolved to send an order for the same, to replace the soup-plates now on my washing-stands. From the warehouses we went to the factory, and the inspector told me, with considerable satisfaction, that of the clays used in the porcelain three-fifths are Italian and two-fifths foreign. I was surprised at seeing no machinery yet in work, but was assured that the time was near at hand when all the best models would be introduced. The quickness and dexterity of the workmen was extreme, and they all looked bright, strong, and healthy. The inspector, I fancy, thought that I tarried unnecessarily long in the common rooms, and seemed more at his ease when he led us into the laboratories, the studios, and the museum. Here we found first-class artists at work, painting the bas-relief services or the majolica vases, whose prices vary from 300 to 1,000 francs apiece. In the museum are specimens of all the ware produced in the factory from the first year of its commencement, and such a collection of what in very ignorance I set down as antique I have never seen. Besides the "Capodimonte" and "fifteenth-century majolica," and "Lucca della Robbia" curiosities, all the European specialties are reproduced—a cup and saucer that would not disgrace Sevres; Wedgwood china that might deceive the old man himself; German, Prussian, porcelain, all is there; but they are made merely as experiments, as the Ginoris have a very just appreciation of the merits of their own productions, nor care to imitate the style of the moderns.

One of the great drawbacks to the success of their competition in point of price with the English market is the price of fuel, as wood—oak—is burnt in all the furnaces, and the deficiency, we may say absence, of coal naturally affects all the manufactures of the Peninsula. At present the commonest ware of this factory is very brown and clumsy; the plates such as the peasants use cost 1 franc 60 centimes a dozen, and are thick, heavy, and yellowish. Our guide, while I was remarking this, took down from a rack a plate with dark-blue flowers on white ground, light and even elegant, and turning it up he showed me the name of Wedgwood. "There," he said, "is a plate that gave me quite a shock when I saw it; thousands and thousands were offered to me at eleven pence (1 franc 10 centimes) per dozen." "But it is more brittle than your heavy stuff," I said, trying to find some superior merit in ugliness. "No, it is less brittle," he said, "and it will be some time before we can come up to it." To me the mere fact that the directors of this establishment send men to scour Europe to see who excels them—that they place the superior articles of their rivals before their workmen's eyes—is in itself one of the most hopeful signs for the future. When the new machines shall be introduced, and if a certain lignite recently discovered can be substituted for oak branches to feed the furnace, I think that there is little doubt that in ten years' time no foreign earthenware or porcelain will be purchased in Italy except by fancy buyers.

In these days of strikes and trades-unions the relations between employers and employed are very pleasant to witness. The men are thoroughly independent; they have their schools of design, their elementary schools, a musical band, a market of grain and wine, cottages built expressly for them; yet there seems no patronage on the part of the proprietor, no servility on theirs. During the 132 years that the establishment has lasted no strike has ever occurred. As soon as the savings-bank was opened in Florence these workmen, forming a society of mutual aid, were the first to deposit their savings, so that in case of ill health the members are sure of support. The funds are increased by all the forfeits incurred for transgressions of the rules of the establishment.

Our space prevents us from enlarging more on this theme, but we would advise all Americans visiting Florence to spare one day from the galleries of the "old" masters, and devote it to a visit to the Ginori manufactory at Doccia.

"OUR MILLIONAIRES."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your only comment on one of the articles in the Galaxy for May is this: "Among the long articles, 'Our Millionaires' will be of interest to many persons, its statement of facts constituting its only claim to respect." The gentlemen most interested complain that a statement of facts in regard to their private affairs, with which the public has no possible concern, is one of the least respectable features of the article in question.

Here is one of these statements of fact, for example: "The only wasteful extravagance ever charged on 'Young Peter' has been a lavish expenditure for peacocks and pheasants, which are alleged never to have produced anything at all." Here is another statement of facts, so called, though I give the initials where the writer prints the names of the parties: "It is safe to say that Mr. A. cut down the fine trees which once graced the old Vauxhall Garden (where the Astor Library now stands) because he could not afford to keep them for the delectation of himself and his friends. It is safe to say that Mr. R. thought a statue of Washington in front of his house a very unnecessary expenditure of money." The phrase "it is safe to say" is the key-note of the article, which contains just so much slander as is consistent with the safety of the author. In carrying out this plan the writer has hit upon an ingenious way of blackening the character of one man by telling an anecdote of another, and at the same time warning the reader not to make what clergymen call the application; of which quaint device I submit a fair specimen, which I condense to show how it is possible to slander by parables. Speaking of Mr. A. as having been engaged in the fur-trade with the Indians, he tells a story of a Yankee deacon in the same trade who palmed off worthless cast-iron gun-barrels on his native customers, taking care, however, to ease his conscience and prevent accidents by not boring the touch-holes. The writer candidly adds, "Now, this anecdote is not intended to apply to any one in particular."

Sometimes he kills two characters with one stone, when, for example, he says Mr. R., a living millionaire, always looked carefully after his interest account, and then illustrates the importance of doing so by an anecdote of Mr. W., a deceased millionaire, who would not give a beggar a penny because he could not bear the thought of losing the interest on it; thus casting a double reflection on the dead and the living. This method has the advantage of making history; for the public, confused by its indirectness, soon begin to tell how Mr. A. sold gun-barrels to Indians, and Mr. R. would not give a penny to a beggar, and so on. It is a safe method, too; but really the writer of "Our Millionaires" is doubly safe, because the gentlemen whose lives and characters are his text cannot complain without making themselves public property, which they were not before. Next to the pleasure of seeing a private individual "shown up" before the public is the delight of hearing his complaints; it is taken for granted that a shoe which pinches must be a good fit and the shoemaker a conscientious workman. Still, Mr. Editor, I must say when a shoe for which you were never measured is made for you gratuitously by a stranger, for the very purpose of pinching, and is then forced on your foot by the public, it is hard to be silent. Particularly so when T. W. confesses that "it is safe to say" you have never "violated any of the usages of respectable society."

Yours, etc.,

M. W.

New York, May 1, 1868.

["T. W.'s" philosophy was so very little to our mind that we spoke of the facts of his article as alone making it worthy of respect. We considered them relatively to the theorizing, and in no other light, and thus carelessly laid ourselves open to the strictures now made by "M. W."—Ed. Nation.]

FOUND OUT AT LAST.

To the Editor of the Nation:

It may be counted presumption in me to take exceptions to anything published in the Nation, but I can hardly forbear speaking of one thing which I regard as a blot on the fair name of the Nation. And it is because I hold the Nation in such high esteem that I venture to speak, and admire so much its frankness, honesty, and independence.

It has occurred to me that the Nation takes special delight in thrusting at the "Christian Religion," and rather seeks opportunities to do so.

My complaint is not against your religious views, Mr. Editor, for I know not, neither do I care, what your religious views are, so far as the matter now in hand is concerned. My complaint is, that, since you do not claim to publish a religious paper, you should so often lug religion into your columns, and that for the sole purpose, as it seems to me, to belabor it and show your contempt for it, and this when you must be aware that a large number of your readers take the Nation as a paper laying no claim to being a religious paper. I contend that your course in these matters is not manly or honest. You invite us to one kind of food and then take occasion to give us another.

If your paper is to be a religious paper and the advocate of Catholicism or the champion of Darwin, let it be so understood in the outset, and then no one will be deceived or have reason to find fault.

But do not, I pray you, get behind a political or literary breastwork in order to fire at Christianity. That I regard as worse than that the clergy of Massachusetts should preach up "Maine Law" on the Sabbath, which you seemed to deprecate so much.

The last and most unnecessary thrust at a pure Christianity that I have noticed in the Nation was in an article on "The Massacre of St. Bartholomew." Purporting to be a criticism on a certain book, you seem unable to let the opportunity pass of hitting "Protestantism." The impression would be that you owed Protestantism a sort of spite, and in order to gratify that spite you were willing to place above it any other belief or religion, no matter how false or unscriptural, if thereby you could heap reproach on Protestantism.

Now, it is no matter of interest to me whether you are a Catholic or a disciple of Darwin or Comte, but it does matter that a leading journalist who has secured a reputation for manliness and honesty in other questions should stoop to do an unmanly thing in matters of religion.

And you must be aware that were the religion of our country this very religion which you declare "has no rival," that a paper like the Nation would have no existence.

A paper of the high order of the Nation owes its very life to an intelligence begotten of Protestantism; and all I ask is that you show the same honesty and firmness in these matters as in questions of politics and reform.

SUBSCRIBER.

BELLEVILLE, Ill., April 30, 1868.

[We print the above as an example of almost preternatural acuteness. Many attempts have been made to "expose" us, but this is the only one which has fairly hit the mark. Our attacks on religion, and our introduction of it into our columns for the purpose of "belaboring it," we cannot defend. We have always felt that our only chance of safety on this point was to deceive the public. Now that we are found out, we have nothing to say. As to our Darwinism, we may as well acknowledge that we believe in Darwin's existence, and in his having produced a book which we have read, and that, on being put in possession of his facts, we "thought out" the origin of species ourselves in a very few minutes, although he has been afraid to construct even a theory; but we decline for the present to say what our discovery is. Next year we may communicate the secret to new subscribers as a premium. Our hostility to Protestantism and devotion to the Catholic faith it would, of course, be useless any longer to deny. But we may as well tell our readers frankly that we have now fully resolved on breaking with the Papacy—partly owing to the decline of the temporal power, and partly to the non-payment of our last quarter's stipend from the Propaganda. Much as we dislike Protestantism, to defend Catholicism on credit is a thing we will not do; and the money not being forthcoming, over we go to the enemy's camp from this day forward. We have done with the priests and Jesuits, and warn all our readers against them.—ED. NATION.]

A MINISTER'S TROUBLES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

I want to say a few words, through your columns, on the want of delicacy shown in dealing with a clergyman's private pecuniary matters. What a chapter it is! Where shall I begin? Show us a copy of almost any journal, religious or secular, which does not invade the privacy of a clergyman's pecuniary affairs till from any man of sensitive and delicate feelings is wrung the cry of Pauline indignation, Has a clergyman no rights that the world is bound to respect? We take up our spiritual mentor, and, turning from the column of small jokes or of hair-dyes and rejuvenators, our eye lights on a paragraph like this: "The Rev. John S——, of ——, was visited on Tuesday last by several ladies and gentlemen of his parish, who, after spending a very social evening, placed in his hands a purse containing six-and-eightpence. Appropriate addresses were made on both sides, and many were visibly affected by the touching scene. It is thought that the reverend gentleman will take the opportunity to get himself a new hat and a pair of boots." Failing to draw from this information any special edification, we pass, perhaps, to the following: "The Rev. A. B——, of B——, has received a call to the church in C——, with a salary of $1,800. He has now been receiving $1,200, and his parish is endeavoring to make up the difference so as to keep him." Or again: we go to the installation of a minister, and attend the preliminary examination by the council, which is open not only to all the parish, but to any idle stranger who cares to come in. It is not enough that the candidate's spiritual life is turned inside out for the edification of the mob; but all the details of his engagement with the society, with the amount of salary in dollars and cents, are spread before the public.

Now I protest against all this dragging of a clergyman's private pecuniary matters before the world. No decent man cares to know what A. B.'s salary is, or how much his clothes cost him, or how much he will spend this summer; and the morbid or idle curiosity which finds pleasure in such details ought to be rebuked soundly. And if a religious journal cannot float without pandering to such an evil taste, then, as we have long thought when reading their advertisements of doubtful morality, they would better go under.

It will not avail to say that these phenomena merely illustrate the general American tendency to be interested in everybody's business but one's own, the spirit of curiosity which studies the income returns with more interest than the latest fiction; we know of no other profession or calling in life where a man may not easily screen himself, for the most part, from such impertinent scrutiny.

Notice now the evil results. First, the petty pride of individuals and of societies is fostered. The Church in Heathenville makes a donation to its pastor, and forthwith sends a complacent notice of it to the Christian Trumpet, with details as above; while other societies and other ministers who read the Trumpet see the notice, and make unpleasant comparisons. But how is it, meanwhile, with the minister who has been made the object of this (in more than one sense) visitation? If he be a very weak man, he will be vain enough to enjoy the petty notoriety; but if he have a reasonable amount of delicacy and self-respect, he will be unspeakably wounded and disgusted. But there are cases where the skin, under constant irritation, grows tough and insensible; and so we see how it could become possible for an elderly clergyman, moving in refined society in one of our cities, after extending to the writer, then unsettled, a courteous invitation to preach for him, to qualify the same by an intimation that the writer would probably prefer to preach where he could "get some dollars!"

Then see how the whole work and character of the minister's office is degraded. Can we wonder any more that societies and ministers are so often estimated by the dollars-and-cents standard; that a society is thought eligible in proportion to the salary it offers, and the comforts and emoluments it promises; and that a minister's success in his life-work is measured by the fatness of the place he may have attained to?

My experience has probably been far from extraordinary in this matter; yet again and again I have been led to mingled wonder and disgust at the (to speak moderately) extremely bad taste of people. Once, after preaching in a strange church, the customary fee was handed to me with the query, "Is that enough?" At another time it was, in substance, "How much do you want?" And once a well-meaning friend expressed to me his earnest desire to see the latter "in a larger and richer parish."

Believe it, dear laymen, though you sometimes speak of the clerical life as an easy one, where the lightly-won compensations flow like charities from good-natured donors to respectable beneficiaries,—believe it, the faithful minister has doubts and anxieties, mental and spiritual, which the world knows not of. Will you then in addition encourage needless inflictions, which can cease to be such to their victim only when they have blunted his finer feelings and made him a miserable place-seeker?

Let clergymen cease to talk of each other's salaries, societies to boast of their generosity to their pastors, and the religious press to emulate the sensational rumors of the secular journals. We may then look hopefully for a sensible increase of the religious spirit.

A MINISTER.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. announce "Practical Notes on Wine," by Edward Lonsdale Beckwith, Associate Juror and Reporter on Wines at the late Paris Exposition; "Speeches on Various Questions of Public Policy," by John Bright, who has assisted Professor Rogers in the labor of editing the volume; "Gleanings from the English Poets, from Chaucer to Tennyson, with Biographical Notices of the Authors," the gleaner's name not given; "Among the Arabs, Adventures from Life," by G. Naphegyi, whose book will be amusing if the title is a specimen of its English; and a republication of the volume of Essays by Mr. Cracroft, of which we have already spoken.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce a limited number of large-paper copies of Mr. Brinton's forthcoming work, "The Myths of the New World."——T. B. Peterson & Co. have in press a "History of the Trial and Impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States." The book will be a cheap one for general circulation.—"Folly as it flies, Hit At" is the name of Fanny Fern's new book, to be published by G. W. Carleton & Co., who also announce translations of Hugo's "Claude Gueux" and George Sand's "Mademoiselle Merquem," and "a new novel" by each of three authors—A. S. Roe, M. J. Holmes, and R. B. Kimball.——Roberts Brothers are to give us "Poems of Rural Life," by William Barnes, who made a success in his book of poems in the Dorsetshire dialect. In this volume he uses common English. "Table-Talk and Opinions of Napoleon the Great" is the title of another of Roberts Brothers' promised publications, and still others are a child's book, "The Story of Vain Zoe, Mischievous Jean, and Boasting Hector," with illustrations by Frölich, and S. Baring-Gould's "Silver Store, Collected from Mediæval Christian and Jewish Times."

—The songs of birds have often been transcribed and printed in score. In the American Naturalist for May. Mr. S. H. Scudder, after describing the musical instruments, represents the music, of the grasshopper tribe. It consists chiefly of a trill upon one note. His account of the means employed to excite the grasshopper to sing, and to make it at pleasure pipe in one of its two strains—diurnal and nocturnal—reminds us of the following experiment communicated to us by the eminent musician who made it. Hearing a bird at his window one morning repeating its cycle of notes—varied only by beginning first at one and then at another of the series, which always maintained the same order of intervals—he imitated the songster on his piano till he induced her to respond; then, pitching the air a semitone higher, he succeeded in elevating her pitch in a corresponding degree, and thus he went on constantly ascending till the bird failed to follow, or even lost her voice.—Other articles in the Naturalist, which is uncommonly interesting, are "Bears and Bear-Hunting;" "The Geographical Distribution of Animals"—in which the author might have quoted Mr. Marsh to advantage; "Do Snakes Swallow their Young?"—answered in the affirmative; "The Lakes of Iowa—Past and Present." There is also the usual miscellany, and, under the head "Botany," the moot question of mummy-wheat (i. e., wheat recovered from Egyptian mummies) preserving its vitality to this day, and bearing on being planted. The Rev. Albert Hale, of Springfield, Illinois, appears likely to be able to settle this question or to throw great light upon it, Professor Gray preferring to doubt the fact which is so generally believed. The "Entomological Calendar" reappears this month, and is of itself a sufficient reason why the Naturalist should be widely taken among farmers all over the country.

—An impartial review of Mr. Motley, in a late number of Harper's Magazine, set forth the general grounds on which the historian of the Dutch Republic is entitled to be ranked above Gibbon, Carlyle, Macaulay, and all other writers of history, ancient and modern. The only thing we missed in the article was a little of that analysis which enables an unlearned reader to distinguish and appreciate the different styles of eminent masters, and thus to understand the reasons that justify his own instinctive preference. A single illustration will show how this might have been done. There can be no greater contrast than between the bold, massive, graphic touches of Mr. Motley and the light, easy, negligent strokes of Hume. Take a passage from each describing an incident in the last hours of Queen Elizabeth: "Her anxious mind had so long preyed on her frail body that her end was visibly approaching; and the council, being assembled, sent the keeper, admiral, and secretary to know her will with regard to a successor. She answered with a faint voice that, as she had held a regal sceptre, she desired no other than a royal successor." Hume, it will be perceived, makes no exertion of the imaginative faculty; his only embellishment consists in clothing the courtly version of Elizabeth's reply in an elegant antithesis. Mr. Motley, on the other hand, disdaining idle graces, seeks to realize the scene, and to bring it before us in its naked impressiveness: "The great queen—moody, despairing, dying, wrapt in profoundest thought, with eyes fixed upon the ground or already gazing into infinity—was besought by the counsellors around her to name the man to whom she chose that the crown should devolve. 'Not to a Rough,' said Elizabeth, sententiously and grimly." Here we see the effects which are produced by a vigorous handling and an aggregation of striking details. The bluntness of Elizabeth's real answer is not only preserved but heightened by the preparatory elaboration. It is, however, curious and instructive to remark how the separate particulars that together constitute so admirable a whole lie open to minute objections. The epithets "moody" and "despairing"—of which the latter seems either to include the former as the greater the less, or else to exclude it as something inconsistent—are not well coupled. "Wrapt in profoundest thought" implies a more vigorous employment of the mental faculties than is perhaps conceivable of a person who is at once moody, despairing, and dying; and, in fact, Elizabeth, according to the most authentic accounts, had been for days in a lethargy from which she could with difficulty be roused. The participle "dying," which here merely indicates a physical fact, should not have been interjected between adjectives descriptive of a mental condition. "Eyes fixed on the ground or already gazing into infinity" would lead us to infer that Elizabeth had the power of looking into the invisible world with her corporeal eyes; while the uncertainty as to the direction of her gaze leaves the reader to an embarrassing choice between "infinity" and "the floor." (A letter of the French ambassador says she remained for several days with her eyes "fixed on the ground" and—"her finger always in her mouth.") All this would, of course, be mere hypercriticism if adduced for the purpose of fault-finding. Our object, on the contrary, is to point out how little the verbal nicety cultivated by Hume and others of the same school has to do with an artistic treatment of historical themes, which requires broad and athletic groupings, and calls for no particular delicacy in the manipulation. We pass to a not less interesting but more dubious point. "'Not to a Rough,' said Elizabeth, sententiously and grimly." One cannot but be startled at hearing nineteenth-century slang from the lips of a female sovereign, virgin or otherwise, of the sixteenth century. The word has crept into the last edition of Webster, but cannot, we apprehend, be found in any earlier dictionary of the English language. Mr. Motley takes it from a Venetian relazione edited by Barozzi, and gives the entire passage in a foot-note. As the Senate of the most serene Republic could not be expected to understand what was meant by "a rough," the ambassador added, by way of explanation, "che in lingua inglese significa persona bassa e vile." Our suspicions in regard to the word are increased rather than allayed by its being correctly spelt. Nothing is more rare than to find English words and names correctly spelt in foreign historical documents, and rough belongs to a class of words peculiarly embarrassing to foreigners. But how does that affect the matter, it may be urged, since in the present instance the word is spelt correctly? Yes, in the printed text; but we are not so sure as to the original manuscript. If Barozzi found a wrong orthography, he would have been very likely to amend it according to his lights. Suppose him, for example, to have found the word written roghe; this, to the eye, would bear a closer resemblance to rough than to any other English word. But roghe is, in fact, an old form for rogue—a familiar word at the time, and doubtless in the mouth of Queen Elizabeth. Let us see which of the two words corresponds most nearly in meaning with the definition "persona bassa e vile"—a person of base or vile condition. Rough is defined in Webster as "a rude, coarse fellow; a swaggerer, a coarse bully." The primitive meaning of rogue is supposed to have been vagabond. It seems to have been also applied to any one of base condition or breeding. Thus Hamlet exclaims, "O what a rogue and peasant-slave am I!" Rascal, of which rogue is given by Webster as one of the equivalents, was similarly applied; and the two words often go together as expressive of the same notion. Cassio says to Roderigo, "You rogue! you rascal!" and Dryden has a well-known couplet:

> "If he call rogue and rascal from the garret,
> He means you no more mischief than a parrot."

Now, besides the two contrasted versions of Elizabeth's speech adopted respectively by Hume and Mr. Motley, there is a third, which runs thus: "I told you my seat has been the seat of kings, and I will have no rascal to succeed me, but a king.". This is found in a supposed official report among the Lansdowne MSS. in the British Museum, and has been cited by Lingard, Raumer, and other writers. We do not consider it as settling the precise word used by Elizabeth; but as it is substantially the same account as that of the Venetian minister, and was evidently derived from the same source, we think it settles the meaning of the word which he intended to write, and gives us, in fact, in synonym. Unless, therefore, some rebutting evidence be adduced, we shall conclude that the great, moody, despairing, dying, profoundly thoughtful, grim, and sententious queen intended to designate the Lady Arabella Stuart not as a rough, but as a rascal or rogue.

—Some weeks ago we quoted from the Book-Buyer a statement that Kinglake's "Crimean War" was originally refused by Mr. Murray, of Albemarle Street, who had not sufficient confidence in the popularity of the work to run the risk of printing a thousand copies. We are now informed on better authority that this statement was incorrect. Mr. Murray was willing to accept the work on the high terms on which it was offered to him, but broke off the treaty when he found that Mr. Kinglake intended to reserve the right of changing his publisher irrespective of any breach of contract.

—We see announced in the English papers two books of American origin. "One of the best belles-lettres writers of America" is the description given by the Publishers' Circular of Mr. H. T. Tuckerman, whose "Collector"—which we take to be a book which in this country was called "The Criterion"—is just issued by J. C. Hotten. Doctor Doran furnishes an introduction. Lieutenant-Colonel Von Scheilha, who is styled in the advertisements "Chief-Engineer of the Department of the Gulf of Mexico of the Army of the late Confederate States of America," has written a "Treatise on Coast Defence." It is based on the official reports which our naval officers made between 1864 and 1865. The author, a German military man who early offered his services to the rebel authorities, claims to have been entrusted with the whole scheme of defending the coasts of the Confederacy, and declares that in particular the fortifications in and about Charleston harbor were confided to him.

—Among other English works recently published or soon to appear, we notice the names of these: Bell & Daldy intend issuing, as a companion to Professor Pearson's "History of England during the Early and Middle Ages," a volume of "Historical Maps, with Indices and Explanatory Essays." Students of English history will feelingly appreciate this help, the very first of the kind that has ever been offered them in connection with English history, though such maps are common enough in other European countries. As may be supposed, there is just now "activity," as the business men say, in Ritualistic literature—that is to say, in literature which, whether or not written by "advanced" men on "advanced topics," is of interest to Ritualists, lay and clerical. The Rev. W. B. Marriott, in his new "Vestiarium Christianum," traces the history of the origin and gradual development of ecclesiastical dress from the Apostolic age to the present time; Mr. Hotten publishes "Lives of the Saints," with fifty illuminations, mostly colored by hand, with letterpress enclosed in appropriate wood-cut borders; an even more beautiful "Saint Ursula, and the Story of the Eleven Thousand Virgins," which is to be adorned with illuminated miniatures; and, finally, Messrs. Lovell, Reeve & Co. announce "Sacred Archæology"—prepared by the Rev. M. E. C. Walcott—a dictionary of vestments, furniture arrangement, ritual symbolism, ceremonial traditions, and other characteristics of "the Church Catholic in all Ages." In this city, by the way, at Pott & Amery's, we see a book by Bishop Forbes, of Brechin, which is likely to attract a good deal of attention in Church circles. It may be described as a two-volume development of Tract Ninety, giving, like that famous document, a Catholic interpretation to the Thirty-nine Articles. Composed under what may be called "the supervision" of Doctor Pusey, and with his help, the book is as late a last word as Ritualism has authoritatively spoken. Books of more general interest are Doctor Stirling's "Critical Essays on Jerrold, Tennyson, and Macaulay;" Nettleship's volume of essays on Robert Browning's poetry, a subject on which there is dearth of good criticism, though Mr. Walter Bagehot has treated it, and the Contemporary Review has recently had some more than tolerable articles in relation to it; a new volume of poems by Mr. Morris, which is called "The Earthly Paradise," and consists of tales in verse; a collection of pieces by Alexander Smith; a collection entitled "The Proverbs of Scotland;" a volume by Mr. William Tallack, who thinks he has for the first time definitely and minutely traced, mainly to the early Baptists, the doctrine and constitution of Quakerism (S. W. Partridge & Co.); and a work which we have already mentioned—two volumes by Sir E. Creasy, entitled "A History of England from the Earliest Times to the end of the Plantagenet Dynasty"—and as to which we may add that the author intends it as the commencement of a complete history of England, to be contained in a moderate compass, and adapted to the wants of the general reader.

—The rapid increase in the value of choice works has just been illustrated by an instance occurring at the recent sale of a library in England—that of B. G. Windus, Esq. He owned a copy on large paper of Doctor Dibdin's "Antiquarian and Picturesque Tour in France and Germany." We believe there never were more than a hundred of these copies. The work was printed in three very thick octavo volumes, and in Mr. Windus's copy the three had been extended to six, by insertion of proof-engravings, etchings, private plates, and so forth. Twenty years ago, at the sale of Mr. Eyton's library, it was bought by Mr. Lilly for £63. He disposed of it for £100. A few days since, in the competition at the sale of Mr. Windus's collection, Mr. Lilly, wishing to get it again into his possession, was obliged to pay for it no less than £240. The same sale is said to have afforded many other exemplifications of the truth that luxurious books are getting to be such luxuries as only the very rich can afford. This, we take it, is true of other choice works as well as those on which have been expended taste, time, pains, and money in "mounting," "inserting," and so on, for the number of men who form libraries goes on increasing daily. One would imagine, too, that the manufacture and sale of fac similes must in this state of things assume larger and larger dimensions, and soon become almost a business in itself. They so far discredit the saying, "Similis non idem," that bibliomaniacs not too maniacal and not too rich may not only acquiesce with a good conscience, but even rejoice, in their multiplication.

—Mr. Browning's letter to a London evening journal, informing it that Mrs. Browning's father was not a "retired merchant," but, on the contrary, was a "private gentleman," has called out among us some comments not wholly favorable to the writer. As men go, even men of genius, one may without too much grieving admit as parts of their characters little unexpected traits not altogether pleasing; it has not been found that necessarily our heroes must be perfect. But though this is so, and we may well enough concede that our fine clay is clay, it is not clear that in this particular instance there is as yet absolute need of admitting the humanity of our idol. Nothing very sad has happened if Mr. Browning has shown a sensitiveness we were hardly looking for as regards the social position of the woman he married. But it is to be thought of, too, that everything relating to Mrs Browning is matter of literary history; Mr. Browning may, it is possible, still be taking that view of his letter which we took at first reading of it—that a mistake of fact was to be corrected. Meantime we still have "Saul" and "Bishop Blougram's Apology."

—Admirers of the poet Schiller may have their choice of two very desirable new editions of his complete works. The well-known house of Cotta, which no longer has a monopoly of them, is publishing one, to be edited with great care by a number of scholars, and printed with extreme accuracy. The other will be issued by a firm in Hildburghausen, in nine volumes, of which Heinrich Kurz will have, or rather has had, the critical preparation. This edition, besides aiming to embrace writings which have not hitherto been collected, is remarkable for showing the author's poetical elaborations (Bearbeitungen von Dichterwerken), whenever the differences are important. Thus the "Robbers" and "Fiesko" have two, and "Don Carlos" three elaborations. The text, also, is to be carefully corrected. Six of the nine volumes are required for the poetry alone. Under each division the chronological order is to be strictly adhered to. The edition will consist of thirty parts, issued semi-monthly, and will be somewhat cheaper than Cotta's.——A German translation of a series of Dutch novels relating to the Dutch possessions in the East Indies ("Indischen Bibliothek;" Leipsic: Denecke) appears to open to a wider circle of readers some excellent descriptions of a society not too well known to the world in general, and hardly so much as heard of by us in America till the translation of Mr. Dowes Dekker's "Max Havelaar." The third volume ("Ostindische Herren und Damen," by J. Ten Brink), which is partly connected with those which precede it, introducing some of the same characters, is said to be a very realistic performance. It deals with the upper business circles of the Dutch East India Company in Batavia, the heroine being a lovely young governess exposed to the snares of a cunning and villanous "junker." The author paints to the life, avoiding exaggeration on the one hand, and flattery of the national pride on the other.——To throw light on the hitherto obscure history of the astronomer Kepler, Messrs. Reitlinger, of Vienna, Neumann, of Regensburg, and Gruner, of Ulm, have united in preparing with extraordinary industry a biography which, for one thing, removes from Magstadt, in Würtemberg, the honor of being his birthplace, and assigns it to the town of Weil. Mr. Gruner has charge of the monument to Kepler which is to be erected next year from a design by Kreling, of Nürnberg.——In a work published at Breslau, Dr. Johannes Schweikert takes the ground that the cholera is a paralysis of the capillaries of the mucous membrane, and, in its higher development, of the whole sympathetic nerve. He controverts the hypothesis which attributes the disease to the want of ozone or to a fungus growth, indicates what should be the treatment from his point of view, and adduces its success as tested by him during the last visit of the epidemic.

TAINE'S ITALY.*

A FEW years since M. Taine, appointed to a professorial chair in the School of Fine Arts in Paris, made a journey to Italy to put himself in the humor for his office. The result, in the course of time, in addition to his lectures, was two large volumes of notes, letters, and journals. The first of these, "Rome and Naples," has just been translated for the American public. Whether it will be largely read in this country we are unable to say; but it is certain that M. Taine deserves well of English readers. He is the author of a really valuable history of English literature, and he has taken the trouble to arrive at a more intimate knowledge of the English mind than members of one race often care to possess of the idiosyncrasies of another. Add to this that he is one of the most powerful writers of the day—to our own taste, indeed, the most powerful; the writer of all others who throws over the reader's faculties, for the time, the most irresistible spell, and against whose influence, consequently, the mental reaction is most violent and salutary—and you have an idea of his just claim on your attention. M. Taine's manner and style are extremely individual, and it is somewhat odd that being, as he is, a great stickler, in literary and historical problems, for the credit of national and local influences, he should personally be a signal example of their possible futility. He is scarcely a Frenchman. Not that he is anything else; but he is before all things the brilliant, dogmatic, sombre, and (from a reader's point of view) extremely heartless offspring of his own resolute will. His style, literally translated (and Mr. Durand is very literal), makes very natural English. It has an energy, an impetus, a splendor to which no words of ours can do justice. It is not delicate, courteous, and persuasive like that of several of the most eminent French writers of the day—notably MM. Sainte-Beuve, Renan, and Cousin—it is vehement, impetuous, uncompromising, arrogant—insolent, if you will. The affirmative movement of M. Taine's mind is always a ringing hammer-blow. Every proposition is fastened down with a tenpenny nail. Finally, of course, this is very fatiguing; your head aches with the metallic resonance of the process. It is the climax of dogmatism. There was something ironical in M. Taine's being appointed professor; he was professor from the first, by natural right. His whole tone is didactic; every sentence comes ex cathedra. But with the essential energy and originality of his mind he invests the character with a new dignity, and reconciles it to the temperament of a man still young and audacious.

He has, intellectually, nothing of professorial dryness or prudery. Of all writers he is the most broadly picturesque. He throws into his language a wealth of color and a fulness of sound which would set up in trade a hundred minor poets and story-tellers. The secret of the power which he exerts on the mind, or on many minds, at least, we take to be the union of this vast current of imagery, of descriptive vigor and splendor, and of sensuous susceptibility with great logical precision and large erudition. He describes a figure, a costume, a building, a picture, not only with all the richness of his imagination, but with the authority and prestige of his knowledge. The pictorial element in his style, its color and rhythm, is not the substance of his thought, as in so many charming second-class writers, but its mere vestment and gait. Nevertheless, we admit that, to our perception, in spite of his learning, his logic, and his merits as a metaphysician, or rather an anti-metaphysician (whatever they may be), he remains pre-eminently an artist, a writer. If we had doubted of the truth of this judgment, we should have been convinced by that singular work, recently published, "Notes sur Paris: Opinions de M. Thomas Graindorge." Of feeling in the work there is none; of ideas there are very few; but of images, pictures, description, style, a most overwhelming superabundance. The same relation between the two elements of his genius appears in the "History of English Literature." In his appreciation of certain writers, the faculty of perception, apprehension, without being absent, is quite lost to sight in the energy of the act of portraiture. There are a series of pages on Shakespeare which, although full of controvertible propositions and precipitate formulas, form to our mind a supremely valuable tribute to his genius, inasmuch as of all attempts to appreciate and measure it they are the most energetic, unreserved, and eloquent. They form a direct homage to the immensity of the theme; they are almost as vast as silence; they are, in short, on the Shakespearian scale. The nurse of Juliet is not assuredly distinguished on the immortal page by a more animated and furious loquacity than M. Taine exhibits on her behalf. But an example is more conclusive than our own logic, and we find one to our hand in a striking passage in the second volume (Florence and Venice) of the "Voyage en Italie." This passage is interesting as showing, as it seems to us, the thoroughly unreligious cast of the author's mind (for we know few writers who appear to find it more natural to speak of a religion—no matter which—from a distant external standpoint), and then its gravity, melancholy, and hopelessness, and then, finally, its supreme delight in the literary form. It begins, if we are not mistaken, in a moral key, and ends in an artistic one. It is tragical, but it is perfect, consciously perfect. We translate, premising that the author is speaking of the impression produced by certain primitive frescoes in various Italian churches, buried under the work of later painters, and restored to light by the excavation, as one may call it, of the subsequent applications of color:

"You raise your eyes then and find before you the four edifices of old Pisa, lonely on a square where the grass grows, with the dead paleness of their marbles outlined against the blue divine. What a mass of ruins; what a cemetery is history! How many human palpitations, of which there remains no trace but a form imprinted on a block of stone! What a careless smile is that of the peaceful sky; and what a cruel beauty dwells in that luminous dome, stretched over the decease of successive generations like a canopy at a common burial! We have read these ideas in books, and with the pride of youth we have treated them as mere talk; but when a man has gone over half of his career, and, retiring within himself, he counts up all the ambitions he has strangled, all the hopes he has plucked up, all the dead things he carries in his heart; the magnificence and the hardness of nature appear to him at once, and the heavy sob of his inward obsequies suggests to him a deeper lamentation—that of the great human tragedy which unfolds itself from age to age to lay low so many strugglers in a single tomb. He stops, feeling upon his own head, as upon that of others, the hand of the fateful powers, and comprehends his condition. This humanity, of which he is a member, has its image in the 'Niobe' of Florence. Around her, her daughters and her sons, all her loved ones, fall unceasingly beneath the bolts of invisible archers. One of them is prostrate on his back, his bosom tremulous with a piercing wound; another, still living, lifts her useless hands toward the celestial murderers; the youngest hides her head in the robe of her mother. She, meanwhile, cold and still, erects herself hopeless, and, with her eyes raised to heaven, gazes with wonder and horror upon the dazzling, deathly nimbus, the outstretched arms, the inevitable arrows, and the implacable serenity of the gods."

M. Taine may certainly be said to belong to the materialist school of thinkers. He is no sentimentalist; in the way of sentiment he rarely treats us to anything lighter than the passage just quoted. To his perception man is extremely interesting as an object of study, but he is without sanctity or mystery of any sort. He takes a positive satisfaction in reminding the reader of the purely objective and finite character of his organization, and he uses for this purpose a special vocabulary. "La tragédie, la comédie humaine," "la colonie humaine," "la plante humaine," "la machine humaine," these expressions continually recur. M. Taine, in effect, studies man as a plant or as a machine. You obtain an intimate knowledge of the plant by a study of the soil and climate in which it grows, and of the machine by taking it apart and inspecting its component pieces. M. Taine applies this process to the human mind, to history, art, and literature, with the most fruitful results. The question remains, indeed, with each reader as to whether, as the author claims, the description covers all the facts; as to whether his famous theory of la race, le milieu, le moment is an adequate explanation of the various complications of any human organism—his own (the reader's) in particular. But he will be willing, at least, to admit that the theory makes incomparable observers, and that in choosing a travelling companion he cannot do better than take him from the school of M. Taine. For, in fact, you can do your own moralizing and sentimentalizing; you can draw your own inferences and arrange your own creed; what you wish in a companion, a guide, is to help you accumulate data, to call your attention to facts. The present writer observes everything, and selects and describes the best.

M. Taine rapidly traversed Italy, and began his journey at Naples upward. The early portion of his book is pervaded by that strong feeling of joy natural to an ardent dogmatist at the prospect of an unexplored field. He describes the city of Naples with singular vividness; its radiant, transparent, natural loveliness, the latent tokens of its pure Greek origin, the traces of the Spanish dominion, the splendor and squalor, the sensuality in manners and art and religion. Nothing grand, nothing Gothic (even remotely, as in Northern Italy), nothing impressive and mysterious. Parisian light and gorgeousness, and careless joyousness and superstition, form the substance of his impressions. Having described a church bedizened with a wilderness of florid ornament in the artificial Italian style of the seventeenth century, he opens a vista to thought at the close of the chapter by touching with eloquent brevity upon a passionate and sombre Spanish painting: "The breath of the great period still stirs the machine; it is Euripides, if it is no longer Sophocles. Some of the pieces are splendid; among others, 'A Descent from the Cross,' of Ribera. The sun struck upon the head of Christ through the half-drawn curtain of red silk. The darksome background seemed the more mournful beside this sudden radiance of luminous flash, and the dolorous Spanish coloring; the expression, here mystical, there violent, of the passionate figures in the shadow gave to the scene the aspect of a vision, such as used to people the monastic, chivalrous brain of a Calderon or a Lope." These few lines are assuredly picturesque writing; but it seems to us that they serve to illustrate the difference between the picturesque as practised by a writer with his facts in hand, and one who has nothing but fancies. At Naples, however, M. Taine found but few paintings, and these were to be his principal concern. En revanche, he gives us, apropos of the Greek and Roman relics of the neighborhood, some admirable pages on "Homeric Life and the City of Antiquity." It is not until he reaches Rome, Florence, and Venice that he really plunges into his subject. Here we are unable to follow him. We can only recommend him to the attentive perusal of all persons interested in the history of art, and gratified by the spectacle of an indefatigable critical verve. M. Taine is guilty, doubtless, of many errors of judgment; but we strongly suspect that the great masters—Michael Angelo, Raphael, Leonardo, and Titian—have never been more correctly, as well as more ardently, estimated. Several of the great painters of the second rank—notably, Veronese and Tintoretto—are celebrated with a splendor of coloring and a breadth of design which recall the aspect of their own immortal works. Finally, we cannot help laying down our conviction that M. Taine's two volumes form a truly great production; great not in a moral sense, and very possibly not in a philosophical, but appreciably great as a contribution to literature and history. One feels at moments as if, before this writer, there had been no critics, no travellers, observers, or æsthetic inquisitors. This is, of course, a mistake, and we shall like no genuine critic the less (we personally, on the contrary, from the character of our sympathies, feel that we shall like him the more) for giving M. Taine his liberal dues. It is inexpressibly gratifying—fortifying, one may say—to see a writer, armé en guerre, fling himself into his subject with such energy, such fury. It is an admirable intellectual feat. M. Taine is a representative of pure intellect, and he exhibits the necessarily partial character of all purely intellectual estimates. But there are days when we resort instinctively to an intellectual standpoint. On such days our author is excellent reading.

My Husband's Crime. By M. R. Housekeeper. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1868.)—A lady was, to quote her own language, "located as a boarder" at a pleasant farm-house. One day she read a novel, the autobiography of a woman "who had lived, loved, and suffered." The book enchained her attention, and when she closed it, "without stopping to consider the expediency of the matter" she resolved to present her own autobiography to the public immediately. For why, she questioned, should not my history be as interesting to others as that of this heroine is to me?

Caroline's father was a Manvers and a Bostonian. He was of a family of immense antiquity. He had a family tree, of which Caroline, as a modern Bostonian, speaks with indulgent playfulness. He had family pride, of which, as a Manvers, she speaks with profound relish. No Manvers had ever been known to discredit the name, and this undoubtedly was at the bottom of all the pride, and the fact of dating away back to the "best blood of England" had nothing to do with it. Caroline's mother was a Winthrop, and also highly respectable. The family is wealthy and well known when the story opens. Disgrace and ruin are brought upon them by the villany of a Puritanical Winthrop, Caroline's uncle, who absconds with the money of the firm. This disaster is followed by the death of Caroline's mother and all her sisters but one. Mr. Manvers only lives to repay his creditors, which he does in a very honorable way; but his two daughters are left penniless, and, despite the universal respect in which they had hitherto been held, absolutely friendless.

Nothing could better illustrate the proverbial cruel coldness of Boston than the very reprehensible and east-windy manner in which these gentle orphans were treated. In this strait, Caroline conquers the Manvers pride and writes to a friend of her father's for counsel. The benevolent and rich old gentleman comes to her aid and proposes immediate adoption and ultimate legacy. This offer being promptly declined, the old gentleman agrees to find her a place as a saleswoman with some "pleasant, reliable man." Caroline is soon installed in the cloak department of Nettleby & Son's warehouse. It is a retired spot. The other girls do not like it. She is grateful for its seclusion. But admiration pursues her. She is annoyed by the notice of her beautiful hand, which she is told indicates "blood." She is still further vexed by a proposal of marriage from the handsome junior partner. She prefers Mr. Harrington, the "governor," with whose sister, the head of the cloak department, she is intimate. She had been pining in loneliness about a year, beguiling her evenings with reading theatrical advertisements and wishing her lot was like that of other young ladies, when, by a pure accident, these intimate friends found she was living alone with a little sister and called on her. They brought her out, as it were. They invited her to a gorgeous soirée at their boarding-house, where some ladies performed upon the piano and a young man on the flute, and she lost herself, entranced. The day after Mr. Nettleby's proposal she stopped to overhear a thrilling account of it given by himself to his father and Mr. Harrington. That evening, even the "companionship of her innocent Agnes" was too much for her, so she sends her out to tea. By an almost preternatural coincidence Mr. Harrington seized the opportunity to drop in and propose. Of this interesting and even beautiful occasion no particular is omitted. We think we never read of a better "developed" kiss. A happy silence ensued, broken at last by him as he murmured, "My Caroline, this expressive silence is very sweet, and yet, exigeant as yourself, my heart craves words to satisfy its longing. Speak, dearest; tell me that I am loved." Even after marriage, Caroline is pursued with admiration. Her husband's gifted brother successfully poisons her mind against her husband, until, his motive being revealed, she is led to exercise a grain of sense and examine into the alleged "crime," which of course proves to be a gross invention. It almost seems as if the wife must have desired to be misled, to have been affected by so flimsy a deception and so feeble an Iago. Her husband's jealousy of Nettleby has even a weaker cause. When Mr. Nettleby invites the whole family to a "petite souper," he believes something dire is intended, so he remains at home and gloomily goes over the store accounts. But it is his loss, for Mr. Nettleby had a French waiter and flowers and perfumery for his guests, and it reminded one of the party of the "tales of English high life of which we read."

The life of an American shop-girl might have been the ground-work of an American novel of excellence and distinction. "My Husband's Crime" is neither excellent nor distinctive, nor, we are sure, American. Mr. Fay's illustrations, however, are American work of which there is no need to be ashamed. They are not all equally well cut, nor, of course, equally interesting. They show, though, fairly enough, his strong points and his weak ones. Careful study from life based upon a decent regard for the text, an unusual facility for representing form and attitude, and great versatility in modes of drawing upon the wood—these are qualities which distinguish Mr. Fay at his best from his fellow-designers in this country. They appear to perhaps as good advantage as anywhere in this volume in the illustration that faces page 70—"I threw myself upon the bed," and in that opposite page 101—"You shall not leave me," a very natural rendering (among other things) of the folds of a dress. The artist would appear to have engraved these himself. He is weakest in expression, and is seemingly conscious of it, as he seldom presents a full or even two-thirds front face, most of his figures showing either their profile or their back hair.

Theoretical Astronomy relating to the Motions of the Heavenly Bodies. By James C. Watson, Director of the Observatory at Ann Arbor, and Professor of Astronomy in the University of Michigan. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—This work embraces a systematic derivation of the formulæ for calculating the geocentric and heliocentric places, and determining the orbits of planets and comets, for correcting approximate elements and computing special perturbations, including also the theory of the combination of observations and the method of least squares, together with a complete collection of auxiliary tables and such practical directions as are necessary to guide inexperienced computers. The author has embodied in his book the latest researches of the greatest masters of the science, and much valuable material collated from the current periodical literature of the subject, and especially from the scientific journals of Europe, and has thus produced a vade mecum both for amateurs and professional astronomers. The volume begins with a statement of the law of gravitation and the two fundamental axioms of mechanics, and from these, by pure analysis, the solutions of the various problems are systematically evolved. In the chapter devoted to the theory of the perturbations of the heavenly bodies we notice, in addition to the results caused by the action of gravity alone, a development of formulæ for determining orbital changes which might be occasioned by a resistance due to a supposed ethereal fluid pervading all space.

It is well known that the idiosyncrasies of different observers and the irregular errors arising from the abnormal state of the atmosphere, the imperfection of the instruments employed (whether eye or telescope or meridian-circle), and various other attendant causes and disturbing influences, conspire to render observations of the same phenomena, in a certain sense, heterogeneous. Professor Watson's volume contains very full and explicit directions as to the best methods of combining such observations according to the theory of probabilities. As a specimen of elegant and accurate mathematical printing, the work reflects credit on the publishers and does honor to American typography.

Cakes and Ale at Woodbine. From Twelfth Night to New Year's Day. By Barry Gray. (New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1868.)—Is there anywhere, in his sophomore year or elsewhere, any young essayist who fain would try his hand at ye concoction, in the approved manner, of your jollie wassail bowl of lukewarm literary milk-and-water? Such stripling we would monish, on the faith of a true man who, in his day, has toped much and is exquisite in his potations, that he betake himself with what speed he may to the Woodbine Cottage; to the fellowship, or fellowshyppe, of "Barry Gray" and "Genial Jack," and "The Magnificent" and "Quaint Tom," and "The Gay and Festive Tomaso"—which roaring blades are possessors of the authenticate and veritable recipe. They roar gently, too; simple hearts be they; honest men that love quiet and fright none, so that he who seeks them may keep a good heart. Let the varlet but bring with him a good English, or even American, edition of "honest old Izaak's" "Complete Angler," and free shall he be of their merrie companie. And to be full brother of the guild, no more is needed than that he should learn to troll a well-conceited stave about the buttery and the pasty, and Mr. Taylor's brewerie at Albany on Hudson. To be sure it is no harm to know furthermore that Twelfth Day, being the twelfth after Christmas, appropriately winds up with its cakes and ale the holiday festivities; and that it is the festival of Epiphany; and that it is a pity that we should nowadays care so little for the spiced ale and the Twelfth cake with its ring, and the merrie revels of the olden time. But all this can be got out of a stray copy of any Church Almanac, and the acolyte can get it up in odd minutes after initiation. Seriously, the book is too ——very, very genial to talk about.

The Æneid of Virgil, with explanatory notes. By Thomas Chase, A.M. (Philadelphia: Eldridge & Brother. 1868.)—We have here the second in order of the series of school-books known as "Chase & Stuart's Classical Series." The Cæsar we have previously noticed. We are glad to be able to speak favorably of the editorial labor in the preparation of the notes, which are partly original and partly selected from various commentators. The difficulties presented are, for the most part, fairly met and disposed of with a brevity and clearness unusual in American text-books. We regret that only a portion of the author is included, as a thorough student needs the whole text for reference and comparison, and the whole of Virgil is required in the preparation for college, for which, we presume, the book was chiefly intended. We object, also, to the principle upon which the text has been made up by selection from various editors without furnishing sufficient indication of the authority by which it is supported. On the whole, however, this book seems to us superior to any edition of the "Æneid" heretofore used in our schools.

We are disposed to call attention here to what has long seemed to us a mistake in the principle upon which our American text-books are generally prepared, though it is by no means specially illustrated in the one before us. Our text-books are of an elementary character; they presuppose not merely a want of information in the student with regard to the subject, but an incapacity to acquire with profit at that period of his progress the methods by which the results given by the editor are attained. In the case of a doubtful construction or interpretation, for example, the editor has reached his conclusion by a comparison of similar instances in the same or different authors. In a regular edition the most important passages of this kind are generally cited, and the student is enabled to make the comparison for himself. We believe that by the application of this system early in the course the pupil might gain much useful discipline in methods of study, discipline which would be of infinitely greater value than mere facts committed to memory. Discussion of the text and of the more recondite philological questions might be avoided, except that, where no recognized text is followed, the variations should be noted. In any other respect, we do not see why a school edition of an author should differ materially from those prepared for more advanced students, except in greater fulness of detail, especially in questions of syntax. Such a system, while evincing a respect for the intelligence of American boys far more just than is shown by the present one, would do much to foster from the outset habits of exact scholarship, in which our American boys are generally deficient.

A Sister's Bye-Hours. By Jean Ingelow. (New York: George Routledge & Sons. Boston: Roberts Bros.)—Most of the stories contained in this volume are written in the first person, although the speakers vary both in sex and condition. "Poor Mat," or "The Clouded Intellect," is one of the exceptions, and has been already printed separately. Its appearance marked a very great advance on the part of the author over her crude "Studies for Stories," and its companion pieces confirm the talent which had before been doubtful. Almost any grown person may derive pleasure from these artistic little narratives, of which the style is generally excellent, and the descriptions of nature a happy compromise between the writer's poetic feeling and the restraint that belongs to prose. But we suppose they are designed rather for the young—children of from twelve to fifteen, or even younger, to whom they will be perfectly intelligible, and to whom they may be recommended without reserve. There is an absence in them of that too formal piety which characterized unpleasantly the "Studies for Stories," while they abound in genuine religion and in practical moral examples that cannot fail to elevate. Some of the social distinctions which are brought out incidentally of course are native to England and do not find their counterpart here. One story, nevertheless, "Marked," is meant to be purely American, and is, all things considered, a very creditable success. It is a tale of slavery and of fugitive slaves, and while it lacks nothing in sentiment lacks little in local flavor—is, perhaps, as clever a fiction as could be written on the other side of the Atlantic. The action and the plot are very well wrought. "The Black Polyanthus; or, Prejudice," is complete in its conception and execution. It ends most effectively without hint of a moral, but the lesson which closes abruptly with the words, "Miss Palmer had died that morning at seven o'clock," will linger long in the minds of those who have read it.

Fine Arts.

FORTY-THIRD EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

SECOND NOTICE.

THE exhibition, alluded to in our last, of the pictures of Mr. William Page was held in the gallery of the Tenth-Street Studio Building last winter. There were perhaps twenty pictures, of which the most important two, not even excepting the copies from pictures by Titian, were two admirable portraits. For the Titian copies—one from the Flora, one from the Bella Donna of the Louvre, and one from the Venus of the Tribune at Florence—reproducing for us pictures of unsurpassed, and except by their fellows unequalled, pictorial and artistic merit, are yet reproductions only, and reproductions of a somewhat foreign, bygone, exotic type. Better than most men Mr. Page has felt the true charm and power of the great art of Venice, that unrivalled school of painting whose united and harmonious excellences are best seen in the works of Titian; better than any one, perhaps, he has seized, analyzed, and partly recomposed, in these copies, the physical parts of Venetian painting. But however great the value to students of art of such works as these, which to some extent can show, in the absence of Titian's handiwork, what are the qualities which make Titian immortal, yet for the time, and for men of the time, the portraits are the best, as being of equal technical merit, and as being, besides, modern, contemporary, comprehensible, and, therefore, instructive. The two at the Tenth-Street Gallery were of life-size and nearly full-length; one of them the painter's own likeness. They were powerfully painted, simple and satisfactory pictures, the drawing was easy and natural, the laying on of color was, for modern times, done with surpassing dexterity and rightness of method. The four portraits, by Mr. Page, which now hang in the South Gallery of the Academy, are only heads, but they have many of the excellences of his larger works. In regard to the difficult point of resemblance, the only judges are those who have long and intimately known the person portrayed; because it is not the face as the stranger accidentally sees it which the painter tries to reproduce—the photograph can do that, but cannot do what the painter must do:

> "Suppose I've made her eyes all right and blue,
> Can't I take breath and try to add life's flash,
> And then add soul and heighten them three-fold?"

It is safe to say, however, of at least two of the four faces that they are excellently like. In other respects, that is, as works of art, these four pictures are all fine; in contrast with most other American portraits, admirable; nor are there, since Furness's death, any American portraits exhibited which are on the whole so good. And, considering the work of a celebrated Frenchman, the two portraits by Mr. Cabanel which this exhibition contains are in all important respects far inferior to Mr. Page's work. Polished minuteness is not necessarily nor generally excellence; nor is there anything in the tone of color adopted by Mr. Cabanel, in common with many modern French painters, which can lend any charm to his pictures.

Of other portrait-painters, Mr. Hicks seems to have a faculty for seizing a likeness, and most of his pictures of this and of former years are of unmistakable identities; but further than that their merits are not prominent or unusual. Those exhibited this year are simple, and are not disfigured by elaborate backgrounds of ugly detail. Mr. Huntington's pictures are even less agreeable, because the figures are, in nearly every case, in some stiff attitude, immediately suggestive of the studio and the sitter's chair, and because invested with that coldness of color peculiar to this painter, of which we have several times spoken.

Other portraits, especially some large ones in the South Room, are noticeable for their failure to be what at least a portrait ought to be—simple and quietly arranged and presented. The air of self-assertion and "bounce" about two or three of the worst of these is entirely ruinous to whatever poor merit as portraits they otherwise might have had.

Mr. Johnson's largest picture, "The Boy Lincoln," is perhaps an ideal portrait; but this is its least claim upon our admiration and gratitude. As a delightful and characteristic picture of a typical American youth, reading by the fire-light of the farm-house kitchen-fire, it is welcome to all who love pictures with meaning and sincerity behind them. The head is nobly imagined. Mr. Johnson's smaller work, the little boy who has come the first to the school-house of a winter morning, lighted the fire, and is warming himself by the stove as it slowly grows hot, is of the same character. To dwell upon the excellences of thought and of expression in these pictures, slightly painted as in most respects they are, would take more space than we can give. Mr. Johnson's painting we have often spoken of as imperfect in the most essential respect; but his conception of his subjects and his power as a draughtsman are worthy of the highest respect and admiration.

Mr. Hennessy's large picture, "Spring Time," has some serious technical defects, especially of drawing; among others is, curiously enough, George Cruikshank's almost constant mistake of setting the eyes too high in the head. The drapery of the figure is very careful in drawing and good in flow; but it is not quite a living or even a human body over which it is disposed. The modelling of the bust and arms is very weak. On the other hand, the apple trees in the middle distance, and the flowering branch that occupies the near foreground, are very delightful, and the color of the whole picture is pure and pleasant; not complete, not forcible, not great color yet, but a good study of blue and pink. If proof were wanted, which we think it is not, that Mr. Hennessy, up to this time, is more of a painter of landscape and of inanimate nature than of figures, it could be found in a comparison of the three pictures in this exhibition. No. 518, "Apple Blossoms," is an excellent picture of its class.

Mr. J. F. Weir, who, two years ago, exhibited the large picture of the interior of the Cold Spring Foundry, and the casting of a gun, has been among the machine-shops along the East River, and has painted "The Forging of the Shaft." This, also, is a large picture, and as carefully elaborated as the other—better than the other in many respects, but not better in the one point in which that other was most faulty, namely, in color. Both these pictures are too commonplace, so to speak, in this matter of coloring; there are no surprises in either, nor anything in any way different in hue from that which the spectator is accustomed to. But in the semi-darkness of these great founding and forging sheds, lighted up now and again by the fierce glare of melted iron, there are strange and not to be anticipated effects of shadow and of color. Nor is it only in such subjects as these that the inexplicable and novel is the only true aspect; in all things that art has to do with, the inexpressible shades, the hues without a name, the effects that no reasoning about reflections can explain, are those which are the truest as well as the most beautiful. These large pictures by Mr. Weir are very interesting studies of real life—historical art of great value, but they would be nearly as good if engraved as they now are painted. The only part of this composition where the use appears of a full palette is in the white hot shaft and thin bright flame that surrounds and clings to it.

Mr. Boughton sends a pleasant little picture, containing something of that Breton costume which he is fond of. It is perhaps not very recently painted, and is certainly not in his best manner. Mr. Beard contributes two pictures of "Morning in the Prairie" and "Evening in the Prairie," but the birds have all the appearance of studies from stuffed models, and the conception and treatment add little to the interest of the subjects.

Among the pictures of childhood, one of the best is "Poor Pussy," by Mr. Perault, in which, with poor and negative color, there is much else that is good. The cat is squeezed up as cats are by children, and is bearing it as cats bear such treatment from children. Mr. Winslow Homer, one of the strongest of American figure painters, has taken to exhibiting in Harper's Weekly, and that is well, but Mr. Homer has claims to the rank of a colorist, and, as such, is much needed here. His slight contributions to this exhibition remind us that he is at home once more, and that good pictures may be expected from him.

OLDEST INSTITUTIONS

Of the kind in America, having been chartered in the year 1841, and commenced business in May, 1845.

During the twenty-three years of its existence it has issued policies upon the lives of more than

and has paid in losses $5,000,000 to the families and representatives of those who have deceased while members of the Company.

Special care in the selection of its risks, strict economy, and a safe and judicious investment of its funds, emphatically characterize the management of this Company.

Policies are issued in all the favorable forms which experience has indicated as favorable to the assured, and can be made payable at a specified time during the lifetime of the assured or at death. Premiums may be paid annually, semi-annually, or quarterly.

An increase of over SIX MILLION DOLLARS in the Assets during the past four years has been attained, notwithstanding that nearly TWO MILLION DOLLARS for Losses, and over ONE MILLION DOLLARS for Dividends, have been actually paid out during that period.

On January 1, 1868, the Company had, after providing for the reinsurance of all its risks, and the payment of all its liabilities,

A Divisible Surplus of $1,642,425 59,

RAVEN & BACON
(Established 1829),
Warerooms 644 & 646 Broadway, N. Y.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PIANO-FORTES, WITH THEIR PATENT COMBINATION SOUNDING-BOARDS.
Patented August 14, 1866.

This invention, introduced exclusively into our Pianos, is of the greatest advantage to the tone of the instrument, as it affects the sounding-board, the very soul of the Piano, and produces thereby a pure liquid tone greatly superior in quality and power to that of the ordinary Piano. The sounding-board, released from its connection with the piano-case, and resting upon under sounding-boards, is relieved from the rigidity caused by such connection, and its vibratory quality increased.

Our Pianos are first-class in every respect, and purchasers will have not only our own guarantee as to their quality, but also the guarantee of the reputation of the instrument, obtained from the experience of our patrons who have used them for a generation. All lovers of this eminently household instrument, as well as parties proposing to purchase new Pianos, are invited to call and examine our assortment.

"Dr. Denniston's 'Home for Invalids' at Springdale, in the beautiful environs of Northampton, continues to be a satisfactory place to recommend sick persons to, especially those requiring rest, quiet, time, pure country air, a modified and rational water-cure treatment, and, with all, the advice and care of a scientific and experienced physician. Dr. Denniston is himself one of the wisest and most experienced medical men in the Connecticut valley, and his establishment is delightfully located, and fitted with every requirement for the comfort and improvement of an invalid."—Springfield Republican.

The Week.

THE bill admitting Arkansas back into the Union passed the House on Friday with little opposition, under the "previous question," administered by Mr. Stevens, who, however, allowed a little debate on it, giving twenty minutes to Mr. Woodward, ten minutes to Mr. Paine, and ten minutes to Mr. Pike. Two or three Republicans voted against it—among them Mr. Spalding—because they were not satisfied of the wisdom of "the fundamental condition" of the enabling act, which prohibits any amendment of the Arkansas constitution at any time disfranchising any citizen or class of citizens to whom it now gives the franchise, except for common-law felonies. The objections made to this are, that it is not constitutional to impose such a condition, and that, if it were, it would be unwise to bind a State in perpetuity never to establish, say, an educational test, no matter what evils were found to result from ignorant voting. It is, in other words, the embodiment of the à priori plan of government in the fundamental law of the State, and a formal and solemn refusal to allow human experience to have any influence in shaping its legislation on the most important of political questions. The matter is, however, of not as much importance as it seems, inasmuch as the present bill does not settle it finally. Should Arkansas ever change its constitution in defiance of the condition, and its members in consequence of this be excluded from Congress, the question would come before the whole people of the Union, who would decide it according to the circumstances of the case. Still, Mr. Spalding's desire for discussion and time for consideration was natural, and the reply of Messrs. Boutwell and Stevens, that members had had printed copies of the constitution in their possession for a month and did not need any more time, was hardly conclusive. If a member had had it for a year, he has still the right to have his opinion changed by debate or to try and change that of others. Mr. Stevens said, however, that "he had reasons for wishing the bill to pass on that day which he did not care to mention," so he forced it through. This observation of course took the matter at once out of the region of forensic controversy and transferred it to that other region from which Mr. Stevens has of late derived so much of his political wisdom, and in which nobody can gainsay him.

On Wednesday week Mr. Stevens got leave to make an unnecessary "personal explanation" of his part in the Alta Vela matter; but, on account of the unparliamentary language of parts of his speech, he was not allowed to finish it. Next in order came one of the frequent Democratic resolutions, which propose that the House, truly penitent for its late vile language, desires to withdraw the tenth of the impeachment articles, which relates to Mr. Johnson's indecencies. Mr. Spalding closed the day with a sound speech against one form of repudiation—payment in greenbacks—once momentarily popular in Mr. Spalding's State among the Republicans, and now given over to the Democrats. On Thursday, Mr. Pike, of Maine, of the Committee on Naval Affairs, offered a resolution, which the House passed by a vote of 92 to 39, requesting the President to send war vessels into Canadian waters for the protection of American fishermen, who are threatened, it appears, with a tax of four dollars a ton levied by the Dominion of Canada. Mr. Robinson, of Brooklyn, who has earned a peculiar reputation, offered a resolution proposing that the "Secretary of the House"—an officer as yet non-existent—should expunge the impeachment resolution of February 24, and send copies of the expunging resolution to every living representative of the Johnson blood. Mr. Donnelly made a sensible speech on the question of the sale of public lands. On Friday the most important business of the week came up—the bill for the admission of Arkansas, which was forced through the House in the course of an hour by Mr. Stevens. The fundamental condition which the Committee on Reconstruction have put into the bill will, doubtless, lead to conference committees when the bill comes before the Senate, and in the Senate it will doubtless get something like a tolerable amount of discussion. Under the operation of the previous question, the House passed the bill by 110 yeas to 32 nays. On Monday Mr. Stevens introduced a bill doing the same thing for North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana.

The taking of the verdict in the impeachment case is postponed until Saturday—unfortunately, as we think, because it keeps the country so much longer in suspense, and because it give three days more for the play of corrupt influences on the senators. It appears very probable that the necessary two-thirds vote cannot be obtained on any one article. The latest calculation we have heard of, and that in which we place most confidence, gives twenty-two for acquittal, or three more than are necessary; and there is little doubt that the postponement is mainly due to the discovery of this by the majority, and their reluctance to give up all hope of a different result.

The largeness of the vote for acquittal is probably due to the wide difference of opinion amongst senators on different articles. There are perhaps enough of them agreed that Andrew Johnson ought to be convicted, but they differ as to the articles on which the conviction ought to rest. On the strongest one of all, the second, those senators who loudly repudiated in the Senate, at the time of the passage of the bill, the idea that the Tenure-of-Office Bill was intended to cover Mr. Stanton's case, of course will vote for an acquittal. They could not vote otherwise on that article without, as Mr. Stevens says, consigning themselves to "a gibbet of everlasting obloquy." Of course many articles have lost all importance whatever—the tenth, for instance. That has been ruined by the Donnelly-Washburne "difficulty" and the Butler-Brooks "difficulty." If report speaks truly, too, the largest vote in favor of conviction will be on the second and third articles, which Mr. Stevens has pronounced of absolutely no value. In fact, the indications now are that instead of the Republican senators voting en masse for conviction, several will vote for acquittal, and amongst them Fessenden and Trumbull.

What has most contributed to this unexpected result it is difficult to say; it must be ascribed to a variety of agencies, no doubt. One reason why it is unexpected is that the Washington correspondents, and the more uproarious Radical newspapers, never could or would believe that the process was a judicial trial, or that the Senate were sitting for any other purpose than the execution of the party will. They therefore have trained themselves into considering a vote for acquittal as a piece of political treachery, of which no ordinarily prudent man could be guilty. The main cause of the result itself we hold to be an honest difference of opinion, on the part of men of legal training, as to the nature of very obscure and ill-defined offences, as to the interpretation of the articles, and as to the force of the evidence—differences such as we see occurring every day amongst men of education, on all sorts of subjects. Another agency which has no doubt contributed to the result is the disgraceful language of some of the party papers—notably the New York Tribune, and of a portion of the Managers. The American Senate has hardly yet sunk so low as to contain no man whose spirit was not roused by the unparalleled threats and bullying of which it has been made the object. Some allowance, therefore, must, we think, be made for simple irritation, in enquiring into the causes of the split in the Republican vote. We are bound to add that the widespread hostility of the senators to the Honorable Ben. Wade has also had something to do with it. We do not defend their want of elation at the prospect of seeing this great and good man elevated to the presidential chair, all the less, because they themselves, in a moment of wretched panic, put him on the road to promotion. We simply state the fact; we leave it to others to characterize it, begging them to remember, however, that senators are human.

The effects of Mr. Johnson's acquittal, if acquitted he be, will be varied. Its effect on the South will unquestionably be bad. The spectacle of "the greatest criminal of the age," Verres, Caligula, Charles I., James II., and Philip II. rolled into one, and the appearance of three or four Republican senators suspended on "a gibbet of everlasting obloquy," or making their way home on "a long and dark track of infamy," will not be a pleasant one for the North; but we believe the North can bear it without serious damage. We sincerely wish to see Mr. Johnson out of the White House, but we wish to see him put out by honorable means, of which neither the country nor the party need feel ashamed. But when we see such means used as accusing a man like Trumbull of taking money for his vote, as the Tribune has done, one begins to feel that the party will rather lose than gain by success. Moreover, it is doubtful, and very doubtful, what effect the presence of Mr. Wade at the head of affairs would have between now and November. One is made all the more apprehensive on this point by the men and the doctrines which the impeachment has thus far brought to the front. Its failure would at least have the good effect of sending the War Horses out to grass, and putting an end to the reign of violence, we were going to say, of terror, in which the voice of reason and conscience is drowned by senseless clamor, slander, and vituperation. We hope those senators who are being exposed to it will bear in mind what they owe to their own consciences and to the country, and be neither ashamed nor afraid.

The climax of rant and Jacobinism was reached Wednesday week, when the senators were denounced in the grossest terms for clearing their galleries of a crowd which had interrupted their proceedings by making a dismal noise, intended to signify applause. The famous correspondent of the New York Tribune has informed the world that "generally the manner of the senators" on that occasion "was offensive," and that the departing crowd "made various comments by no means flattering on several of them." The clearing of the galleries he calls "the exit of the people from their own chamber."

Of the five governors-elect of reconstructed States, four are Northern men and one is, we think, a Southerner. W. W. Holden, we believe, was born in North Carolina. But Bullock, of Georgia, is a Northerner. Warmouth, of Louisiana, who was a soldier in the war, and who is a ready speaker and has been an active politician among the negroes, is an Illinoisan by birth. Mr. Harrison Reed, too, is a Western man, and before he was governor of Florida, was, we think, one of the direct-tax commissioners for that State. General Scott, of South Carolina, a clear-headed, practical man, in the prime of life, a good soldier, and as sensible in political ideas as he was in the field, is a Westerner of the Westerners. He, at any rate, will disappoint us if he does not turn out a good governor. But certainly it is to be wished that the South could furnish her own rulers—and that she cannot and ought not is by no means certain. Nothing but trouble can come of the elevation of that class of people who have gone South to push themselves into offices that at home they could only sigh for. Some of them are the most odious people in the world. As to the other features of the political situation at the South, the following news seems correct. The Georgia senators will be Republicans, for the Legislature is not, as was reported, Democratic. The vote for Bullock is much less than that for a new constitution, which is ratified by about 18,000 majority, while the governor's is about 7,000. Four Republicans and three Democrats go to Congress. Florida's three representatives and two senators are sure to be Republicans, the Reed ticket having been officially reported successful. And, generally, Virginia is almost the only Southern State which the Republicans may not count on—for the moment. What may be the look of things by next November we propose to consider soon at greater length. That universal negro suffrage has for any very long time added ten States to the Republican strength, it would be foolish to believe; but that the party comes out of this struggle of the past five years with two or three new States securely its own, we think is certain.

Illinois bids fair before many years to surpass most other States in the Union in all that constitutes both a great political and great commercial community. Its press, certainly the Radical portion of it, already in many most important particulars excels anything we have in this part of the world. The Chicago Tribune, for instance, upholds extreme Radical opinions with logic, decency, moderation, and thoughtfulness, and proves that yelling, hallooing, extravagance, and vituperation are not necessary either to pecuniary success or great influence. The State has now acquired another claim to distinction by being the first in which the Republican party has, through its convention, taken bold and decided ground against repudiation under whatever form, and this without any "ifs" or "buts" or other qualifications. The platform calls for reduction of taxation through reduction of expenditure; denounces all forms of repudiation as "a national crime," which is exactly the term to use, though it is the first time we have seen it; advocates the application of all surplus funds to the purchase of the Government bonds in open market—another good idea which has the merit of offering those who want to have the debt paid off in greenbacks an opportunity of seeing their desires realized without cheating anybody, though we doubt whether this would give them any satisfaction. It draws attention, also, to the important fact that the public debt is not due, and that therefore all discussion about the payment of the whole principal is premature.

It is beginning at last to be fully recognized in England that the real price of labor is not what employers offer, or working-men are willing to accept in one locality in ignorance of what is passing in others, but that it can only be ascertained, like the price of most other commodities in our day, by putting the whole labor engaged in any particular business against the whole of the capital, and by steady and persistent haggling on one side or other. About 40,000 men, colliers and iron-workers, have been on strike in England for some time past.

A portion of these were operatives engaged in a particular branch of industry, and struck because of the introduction of machinery, and they were actually supported in their strike by contributions of money from the engineers who made the machinery. A more remarkable illustration of the way in which all classes of laborers now make common cause in keeping up wages could hardly be afforded. The London Times, in an article of unusual suavity of spirit towards the workmen, even admits that strikes are the laborer's natural "higgling of the market," instead of denouncing them as a mixture of crime and folly, as was the fashion with political economists a few years ago. It has been suggested, however, that the "higgling" might be done peacefully and without loss by representative bodies chosen by both masters and workmen, meeting in what might be called 'a labor exchange,' and debating points in dispute. The plan, as we mentioned some time ago, has been tried at Nottingham with perfect success, where the lace-makers and hosiers have established "Boards of Conciliation," which have completely put an end to the strikes by which the industry of the town had been disturbed for many years, and it is said the Lancashire disputants, amongst whom the great strike now rages, are about to avail themselves of this experience.

The English Trades Unions propose to hold a congress in Manchester some time next month, to which all trades are invited to send delegates. The meeting of the Trades Unions' Council at which the call was issued was attended by a Mr. J. W. Hill, of Boston, Mass., who made a long speech, in which he described the condition of the working-classes in this country, and we imagine considerably astonished their English brethren by informing them "that their social comforts were far below those of the English artisans; that in many parts of the States they were in perfect bondage, and entirely subject to the will and caprice of the capitalists; and that their habitations were mere pigsties in comparison with those of the industrious classes of the old country." The report in which we find the foregoing is a condensed one, to be sure; but after making all due allowance for this, we fear Mr. Hill has been using a traveller's privilege a little too freely, and we trust those who know him in Boston will ask him to make good his statements, or make the needful corrections in them.

There is probably no question in European politics—possibly no political question whatever—which will occupy so much of the attention of the world during the next twenty years as the Panslavic question. Its shadow is already spreading over the whole European continent. With the view of putting our readers in possession of its leading features, and enabling them to follow coming events in Europe with a more intelligent interest, we publish an article to-day, to be followed by another next week, giving a brief account of the rise and progress of the movement and of its actual condition, which we commend to their attention.

We have received since last week the financial statement made by Count Cambray-Digny before the Italian Parliament. The problem presented to him by a resolution of the Chamber, passed March 14, was, between savings and increased taxation, to add $20,000,000 to the annual revenue. The estimated deficit for the coming year is, however, $48,000,000. M. Digny calculates, if all his proposals are carried out by the Chambers, that he will, between savings and additional taxes, add $37,000,000 to the revenue. He anticipates, too, from increased returns from taxes already in existence, about $2,500,000, reducing the deficit to about $8,000,000, which would not be formidable, and which the mere return of confidence, produced by the realization of these plans, would, no doubt, speedily cause to disappear. There could hardly be a more painful illustration of the disorder into which Italian finances have fallen than the fact that the Pope's paper money now brings a premium in the King's paper money.

The event of the week in France has been the reception of Jules Favre at the Academy, an occasion which derived double interest from the fact that he is even more prominent as a politician of late years than as a lawyer or literary man. M. Cousin, his predecessor in his chair, was his subject; and the theme of course gave him an ample opportunity for the laudation of liberty of thought, and for the vindication of the claims of human reason to the control of the affairs of human society. Of course, too, the discourse was full of side-thrusts at the Imperial régime. He took firm ground, and ground that sorely needed to be taken, against the prevalent tendency to treat the will of the majority as something supreme in the state—as more than will, as reason and justice themselves—and set out in eloquent terms, as Hobbes and Burke have done before him, the subordination of the popular will, as well as the will of individuals, to "reason and the will of God," the incapacity of majorities, however great, to make anything right which is not right in itself, or to give moral force to any legislation or any system of government for which no sanction can be drawn from any higher source.

The Army and Navy Journal insinuated pretty strongly, when the news of Prince Alfred's having been shot first came, that his "dissoluteness" had had something to do with it, and that the British Government, "having control" of the telegraph, had, in order to cover up his shame, charged the crime on the Fenians. The Journal is usually guided in forming its conclusions by reason and fair play, and therefore we venture to suggest to it, without in any way making ourselves responsible for the Prince's "manners and excesses," or without in any degree changing our opinion of the Fenians, that it would be well, as a rule, when you hear of a man's being shot in the back, to presume, until the contrary is proved, that he did not deserve it. Most men who are shot by assassins have done nothing, or next to nothing, to expose them to that particular form of punishment; and even royal libertines are entitled to the benefit of the presumption thus raised. It turns out now that in this case the assassin was a Fenian, probably a commissioned Fenian, and we wish that the reputation of his brethren made it probable that he was a demented Fenian.

As friends of progress, and persons who grieve heartily over everything that makes the bad man scoff at the progressive party as having feather-headed leaders, foul-mouthed, not careful about the truth, and so on, we have been looking with anxiety through the last two or three numbers of the Anti-Slavery Standard and the Boston Commonwealth, hoping that we should find profuse and contrite apologies from both the editors—or rather from the editor of the Commonwealth, and an editorial correspondent of the Standard. Both these journals copied a savage story, which read as if it might have been written for the Independent by Colonel Forney, about a Mr. Johnson who, because he was a Northern man, was threatened with death by some of the undergraduates of General Lee's college in Virginia. And yet now, the Commonwealth and Standard said, Northern people are asked to aid this college! Both journals proceeded to make remarks to which we, as our habit is, paid close attention, and the tone of which recalled vividly that of a couple of minor prophets. Mr. Beecher, whom we had previously admired, was thus rebuked:

"We did not expect logic in Beecher, but we might have hoped for some instinctive sense of right and wrong. We know he is only useful to play on a stringed instrument, and not at all to sit in the Sanhedrim. The same blindness which gave money to a Tract Society that preached slavery, and fancied the gift to be proof of a catholic spirit, now turns to aid a college which is moulding cruel, bloody men into rebels and negro-haters, crying out all the while as it hurries on, 'See how magnanimous I am.'"

The Commonwealth was nearly as severe, and quite as effective on our mind. Horace Greeley, Cady Stanton, the stalwart-souled Parker Pillsbury, the discreet and even-minded Octavius Frothingham and Roswell Hitchcock, as well as Ward Beecher, were admonished for "flapdoodle philanthropy"—a term which threatened to destroy what little respect we had left for them after they had been pronounced unfit for the Sanhedrim, illogical, moulders of bloody men and rebels, destitute of conscience, and so on. The Tribune came to their assistance, though, in a day or two. It published a letter from Captain Lacey, now for years a sound Union man and protector of the negroes, which gave point-blank denial to the tale on which were founded the strictures we were so sorry to see. Our faith in the men above-mentioned was put upon its old basis. But as yet there is not a word in the way of apology from our two misleading guides.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

WHAT WAS THE IMPEACHMENT?

THE great objection which we, in common with so many others, had to impeachment when it was first talked of, was that it would either be or seem, not a criminal trial, but an exertion of party strength against a political opponent; that, therefore, it would form a dangerous precedent, and that the position of the Republican party was such that it could not afford to establish dangerous precedents. That party was and is in a majority at the North; after the readmission of the South, no matter what arrangements it may now make, its supremacy may be lost; the union of the Southern whites with the Democrats, all test-oaths and restrictions and conditions to the contrary notwithstanding, may before long give them, for a season at least, the controlling power in the Government; and it is a power which we firmly believe they will, when they get it, use for evil. Therefore, we believed that in all that the Republican party did now, it should have an eye to this contingency, and that it should be careful about manufacturing weapons which the Democrats might use.

To this it was replied that impeachment would not be a party measure; that it would be a judicial proceeding; and that the Republican party had no more right to shirk it in Mr. Johnson's case than the district attorney has a right to shirk the prosecution of a counterfeiter. Anybody who will take the trouble to look over the journals which advocated impeachment at the outset will find that this was the exact ground they took. We combated their position by denying that the prosecution of a criminal was always an imperative duty; we said it had to be decided solely with reference to the good of the community, and that we were not bound to prosecute Andrew Johnson for high crimes and misdemeanors, even if he had committed them, if it appeared that the nation at large would suffer more than it would gain by it; and we denied that he had at that time committed any offence which merited any greater punishment than could be inflicted by the popular vote.

He used the Federal patronage, as all his predecessors had done since Jackson, for the support of his own political opinions. What he did in this way owed all its guilt, not in our eyes, but in those of men who were clamoring most loudly against him, to the fact that his opinions were no longer those of his party. We thought the use of the Federal patronage for the support of any opinions whatever was an abuse, and we thought that his resort to it furnished a capital opportunity for effecting a thorough reform in the Civil Service, such as Mr. Jenckes was working for, and such as the Commissioner of Revenue urgently recommended. Congress, however, was not willing to do this. It confined itself to putting a stop to his removals, and securing to the party the control of the patronage by passing the Tenure-of-Office Act. That act did not, in our opinion, go far enough to meet the case, but it was a step in the right direction, and we hailed it as such, and waited for better times. It was not intended to apply to Mr. Stanton's case; that was openly proclaimed by its promoters in both Houses, and was not denied. It was simply intended to put a stop to Mr. Johnson's electioneering razzias among the minor officials.

He broke the law after it had been passed over his veto, and after he had acknowledged its validity by making a suspension under it, and he was at once impeached. We then had nothing or only little to say. The doctrine he asserted in breaking it seemed to us one that Congress could never admit, and he proved himself so incorrigibly foolish and obstinate, and had done so much mischief, that we felt that if he could through a fair trial under legal forms be got rid of, he had better go.

Then, however, when all was ready, and the articles filed, the "original impeachers" abandoned their old position. They said it was not a trial at all, a judicial proceeding of any kind, on which they were entering; that the Senate was not a court; that it was not bound by any laws, rules, or precedents; that it was simply a minister charged with the execution of the popular will against an enemy of the state. Its right to acquit was denied before it had heard the evidence, or the respondent's case. The Republicans, also, were threatened with infamy in case they acquitted; one of the managers in express terms "dared" them to acquit; and, finally, the New York Tribune formally announced that it was altogether a party proceeding—the mere execution of a determination to which the party had already come, and that any senator who refused to carry out this determination would be expelled from the party, and that all talk about the sanctity of their oaths was "cant." To crown all, a leading Republican lawyer, who accepted a retainer from the President, and helped to conduct his case for him, has been denounced as a "traitor," and even as being guilty of personal baseness. In fact, the twisting and turning, the shifting of ground, the treatment of the Senate one day as a court in order to shut out exculpatory evidence, the next day as a mere minister of popular vengeance in order to let criminatory evidence in, the confusion of law and morals, the elaborate and daily attempts to darken counsel in advance of the decision, the threatenings and revilings directed against everybody who treated the proceeding as a judicial one, which have marked the course of a portion of the Republican press throughout the trial, have furnished one of the most discreditable chapters in the history of journalism.

It appears, therefore, that if those who first clamored for impeachment as a criminal prosecution in accordance with the forms of law had had their way, there would have been nothing whatever of a criminal prosecution about it. It would have resembled an act of attainder in everything except the penalty, and would have furnished a precedent which all parties, the worst as well as the best, could have used at will; under which a Congress like that which was to have met in 1861 could impeach and depose a President like Mr. Lincoln, for no better reason than that they thought him a dangerous man. We are glad to say that they have not had their way, and although they have done all that lies in their power to disguise the proceeding and make it appear a mere pouring out of popular wrath on an unworthy head, and although we fear their performances may prove some time of great value to the Democratic party, and may prove a delusion and snare to posterity, the Senate has kept the mischief within the narrowest limits. The "guilt" or innocence of Mr. Evarts of course turns altogether on the character of the proceeding. Harper's Weekly and the Independent have both been discussing his case, and on opposite sides, during the past week; and as they start from diametrically opposite premises, they have naturally reached diametrically opposite conclusions. Harper's Weekly evidently considers the impeachment a judicial proceeding, and therefore thinks Mr. Evarts has done right, both as a counsellor and as a politician, in appearing for Mr. Johnson; while the Independent, evidently regarding it as a mere exertion of party strength to get rid of an obstacle or a public enemy, looks on Mr. Evarts's course as a mere desertion to the enemy.

We confess we do not know what way there is of settling the question. If anybody says it was not a trial, in spite of the oath, of the testimony, of the presence of the Chief-Justice, of the arguments of counsel, and of the language of the Constitution, he cannot be convinced, and Mr. Evarts must take his epithets and swallow them. Our own opinion is that he was perfectly right; that in appearing for Mr. Johnson, and putting his case before the court to the best of his ability, he rendered the Republican party and the country at large a greater service than he rendered his nominal client, because he helped to give a dignity and decorum to the proceedings, and, what is of more importance, weight to the decision. It was well that a leading Republican lawyer should appear on the President's side, if for no other reason, for the very grave one that his appearance strengthens the presumption which we should all eagerly uphold, that the senators sat as judges and not as partisans.

His case suggests one other remark, but a remark that will probably have more force, now that all is nearly over, than it would have had a week ago. Can any party afford to treat its leading men as part of the Republican press has been treating leading Republicans during the last few weeks? Senators of the highest character, who, in being simply honest and in having a mind of their own, render more service to the country than fifty thousand of the windy blatherskites who assail them could render by working hard all their lives, have been abused like pickpockets, simply because they chose to think. We have, during the last week, heard language applied to Mr. Fessenden and Mr. Trumbull, for instance, which was fit only for a compound of Benedict Arnold and John Morrissey, and all their colleagues have been warned beforehand, that if they pleaded their oaths as an excuse for differing from anybody who happened to edit a newspaper, they would be held up to execration as knaves and hypocrites. Now, the class of men who are most needed in our politics just now are high-minded, independent men, with their hands clean, and souls of their own. The errors of judgment are worth bearing with for the sake of their character. Yet this class is becoming smaller and smaller, falling more and more into disrepute. The class of roaring, corrupt, ignorant demagogues who are always on "the right side" with regard to all party measures, grows apace; and, if we are not greatly mistaken, if the Republican party does not make short work with them before long, they will make short work of it. Whatever damage it has suffered, it has suffered at their hands, and yet it is they whom there is just now a tendency to cherish and put forward. If the party means to live, it will do well to honor its ablest and most independent men, and even to bear with their faults. The glibness and zeal and uproariousness may help it to achieve temporary triumph, but for long steady wear, for long retention of popular confidence, commend us to those who are not afraid to say no when the newspapers say yes, and who occasionally have the frankness to confess that they prepare their own morality.

A NEW FIELD FOR FANATICS.

It is a very interesting question what are the grounds of the prevailing belief that the Legislatures of almost all the States, and even the House of Representatives at Washington, are open to bribery and corruption. There are no published statistics on the subject, except perhaps those contained in Mr. Parton's article, in the North American Review, on the legislation of Albany, and those only applied to a single State; yet you will not easily persuade an intelligent American that his representatives are men distinguished for scrupulous honesty in their administration of public affairs and appropriation of public moneys. "The Connecticut Legislature!" said a Connecticut citizen to a gentleman of our acquaintance, who was speaking of the reasons which might influence that body in favor of a certain measure or against it, and, sitting down with an air of derisive bonhomie, joined his hands, making a hollow between the palms, winked, beat his knuckles against his knees, so as to produce the sound of rattling coin, and said, "There 's the Connecticut Legislature." Mr. G. W. Curtis, too, told the other day, in his address before the Alpha Delta Phi Association, of his having recently seen a gentleman of much political experience take out a roll of bank-bills from his pocket in the lobby of the capitol at Albany, and, holding them up to the bystanders, exclaim, "There 's the logic for legislators." We repeat that there are no statistics showing that so much money was paid for the passage of this bill, or how much it took to defeat the other; but, nevertheless, the feeling that legislation may be bought and sold grows upon Americans. The other day we had an account of the passage of the Pacific Railroad bill, given by one of the members of the body which passed it, which might have called a blush even to the cheek of a female lobbyist. It appears that the lobby went en masse into the House, and there, the two bodies uniting, very much as in the case of a joint vote by the Senate and House, passed the bill. Now, no one knows that any money was used in this case; there is no evidence that bribes were taken or offered; it may have been that the ladies of the West were so deeply interested in the connection of the Pacific with the Atlantic that, in the very fulness of their hearts and emptiness of their pockets, they rushed to Washington, where a winning freedom of manner and confidence in their kind found them a way to the scene of debate and then ensured their welcome.

We have no desire to enter at length into the reasons which lead us to the conclusion that this prevalent belief in the venality of legislatures is well founded, but they are, in brief, as follows: In the first place, there is every reason why, if the facts were otherwise, the people should be delighted to dwell upon them; the people gain nothing from dishonesty in the legislature, and gain still less by representing an honest legislature to be venal, so that there is no temptation to distort the truth. In the second place, though statistics cannot be obtained, the experience of every American is so varied, that he is likely from time to time to be brought into contact with his representatives, and to know in a general way their reputation for fair dealing—much more likely than in England, for instance. Thus there may be a trustworthy impression as to the character of legislative bodies, even without many published facts. In the third place, the ill odor which hangs about the "politician's" life in America is good ground for admitting beforehand the possibility of a taint. Our legislators come from a class sunk so low in public estimation that to say of a man, "he 's a politician," is synonymous with saying "he has his price," and it is politicians, of course, who govern us. These three reasons, we think, furnish sufficient support for a belief in the probable truth of the charges. But it is not so much to these reasons that we wish to call attention, for few persons any longer deny the facts, as to certain very curious theoretic consequences which flow from them.

The system of government under which we live, it cannot be too often repeated, is a representative one. By the theory of such a government, it brings together in a small compass the political energy, the political ideas, and the political morality scattered throughout the country. A thousand men whose convictions are similar select the most fit among them to represent and advance those convictions. This delegate sympathizes in the main with his constituents, the chief difference being that he will generally be morally and intellectually superior to the mass of them. The members of the convention which framed the Constitution, for instance, afford almost perfect types of the kind of representatives the theory demands. It is not necessary that the governing body should mirror the whole character, virtue and vice together, of the constituencies; in fact, to mirror is the last aim of representation, and the representation of vices is undesirable. Political ideas held by large masses of men are to be furthered by a single man, and that man is to unite all the good qualities of character which a governor should possess. He is to be higher, not lower, than his constituents.

It is evident to what conclusion we are brought. If the gentlemen who sell laws at Albany and elsewhere are our representatives, then so much more are we proved knaves than they. If they are venal, we are more so. They are our representatives, we are their constituents. But this is sheer absurdity; for every one is clear upon the point that the great mass of the people are fairly honest. We do not find, on the whole, that swindling and chicane are the rule in everyday matters; that trustees mistake their cestui que trust's pocket for their own; that physicians are in the habit of prolonging disease, or lawyers litigation, for the sake of increased fees. Debtors are not in the habit of falsifying accounts, nor do we find witnesses constantly swearing to the truth of such falsifications. Perjury is not rife among us; the average American citizen who takes an oath sticks to the truth. It is not customary for Americans to bring their souls to market, nor will you find it easy to persuade your friend that another friend is dishonest. Confidence is a plant of slow growth, yet one of the most prominent traits which recent travellers have observed in the American character is the trait of confidence; and, unless we are fools, we must have a reason for that confidence, drawn from experience; and further, that reason must be that we have found one another generally worthy of it.

What, then, is the explanation of the phenomenon? It is, we believe—paradoxical as it may sound—the over-intensity of the public conscience.

There seems to be an indifference to the general character of representatives, provided they are sound on one or two points on which the popular conscience happens for the time being to be thoroughly aroused, and this indifference begins to show itself even in parts of the country in which hitherto general character has been of considerable importance in all walks of life. The cases begin to multiply in which we see highly moral constituencies represented by men who are not only unscrupulous, not only far below the average of the electors in regard for principle, but who are notoriously so. In fact, voters are fast losing the old excuse of their own ignorance for the badness of their representatives. Bad men no longer have to be unknown in order to get into Congress or the State Legislatures; cases are multiplying in which disreputable antecedents not only prove no bar to nomination or election, but prove a help, because their very unscrupulousness seems likely to increase their value as partisans. We might cite illustrations, but it would not strengthen our argument, but might weaken it by laying ourselves open to the charge of personal hostility.

The country has now for forty years been engaged in vigorous efforts to get rid of slavery and of the doctrine of the right of secession, and greater evils than these could not befall any country. The labor spent in destroying them could not have been better spent. But now that the struggle is over, we find ourselves very much in the position of the Roundheads at Marston Moor, where Cromwell, after carrying everything before him, returned from the pursuit only to find the other wing of the enemy in possession of the field, and plundering his baggage. We are face to face with an evil, less revolting than slavery, but more insidious; and though perhaps not so full of immediate danger to the Government, not less sure of breaking it down in the long run, if allowed to go unchecked. There is hardly a legislature in the country which is not suspected of corruption; there is hardly a court over which the same suspicion does not hang. A recent writer in Harper's Monthly, arguing strongly against the right of the Supreme Court to pass on political questions, gave as a reason why the Court was no longer entitled to the respect which was paid it forty years ago, that the character of the bar throughout the country had been so lowered by the elective judiciary, that the materials for such a bench as existed in Marshall's day were no longer to be found. Many of the recent appointments to the Federal bench, too, seem to indicate a total forgetfulness of, or indifference to, the necessity of either character or learning for the office of judge—witness Judge Busteed, of Alabama; Judge Underwood, of Virginia. We are credibly informed, too, that a short time ago Mr. Greeley made strenuous exertions to procure the appointment of Mr. Robinson, the Fenian Member of Congress from Brooklyn, to the Judgeship of the Eastern District of this State!

Now, if any reformers are looking forward regretfully to the period when, the negroes and women having been established in full possession of their political and social rights, there will be no more work left for them to do, we advise them to be of good cheer. There has never been so much work to do, and it is work in some ways more difficult and delicate than the anti-slavery work, because it involves the pursuit of an impalpable evil, the existence of which, notorious though it be, it is difficult to prove, and the friends of which, though they may not be as influential as those of slavery, are, at the North at least, more earnest, indefatigable, and unscrupulous. The popular notion that this evil can be suppressed by good legislation, for instance, as the new constitution proposes, enabling the bribee to give evidence against the briber, or by the creation of new and formidable penalties, we hold to be a pure delusion. Corruption has been reduced to an art, and a large part of the art consists in the destruction of evidence; moreover, the agents of the law themselves, the very men who have to put it in motion, are, in the great centres of corruption, at least not unfrequently hand-in-glove with its violators.

A remarkable illustration, in fact, of the worthlessness of legal penalties in the absence of proper courage or conscience on the part of the public, is apparent in this city. There are certain judges on the bench whose corruption is not only generally believed in, but is within the knowledge of many members of the bar. Every day that these men remain on the bench they do something to sap the very foundations on which society rests. There is a remedy provided for cases of this kind—viz., impeachment. It would, if half the stories told be true, be successful in the cases we have mentioned; but nobody can be found, either lawyer or layman, to come forward and put the law in motion. The older men are too busy; the younger men too poor; and even respectable and high-minded men, who never miss church on Sunday, are getting into the habit of protecting themselves against judicial iniquity by the use of the devil's own weapons. When one looks on all this, one can hardly help listening with astonishment to the trumpets and shawms which the enthusiasts are sounding over the downfall of Andrew Johnson.

Before we can hope for any reform, voters must compel nominating conventions to consider general character, and not soundness of opinion on one or two questions, in making their nominations. The way to do this is by the liberal use of the "inalienable right" of "scratching." We must scratch freely, even though we are told that the result of defeat will be the ruin of the country. It is very hard to "ruin the country," and no party is very seriously injured by a little check of this sort. But that "scratching" may be effective, it must be done with knowledge. We must know whom to scratch, and this knowledge can only be supplied by some sort of volunteer organization, like the Citizens' Association in this city, whose business it will be to follow politicians up, keep their delinquencies recorded, and reproduce them as frequently as may be necessary. The curse of political life is the capacity of the public and the newspapers for forgetting. There is no knave or drunkard who, by keeping quiet or displaying extraordinary zeal on some special occasion when the popular mind is greatly excited, may not hope to have all his past sins buried in oblivion, and to be able, with the assistance of his followers, to browbeat and silence any single man who attempts to expose him. Witness the Copeland-Banks embroglio in Massachusetts two years ago; witness the Glenn case in the New York Legislature the other day.

Of course, such a duty would be in the highest degree repulsive. Of course, nobody could undertake to perform it without exposing himself to such a shower of dirt as has probably never been witnessed; but then the repulsiveness of the work of reform has never left us without plenty of reformers. The more danger, the more honor, is a cry as well known in this field as in that of actual warfare; and there is hardly a doubt that anybody who enters on it, however trying it may be at first, will find himself in a very few years not a martyr but a hero, for he will have at his back, once he has proved his courage and constancy and purity, that popular devotion to the great interests of morality and religion before which so many evils have already gone down, and before which this one, too, is certainly destined to perish. But he must make up his mind that it will not do to be a preacher simply. He may preach till the crack of doom against corruption in general, and all the greatest knaves will occupy the front seats in his congregation without stealing a cent the less. He must be a detective as well, and the burden of his discourse must be, not simply that picking and stealing are bad things, but A. and B. are scoundrels, and at such a date and in such a place stole, or forged, or lied, or wallowed in the gutter, or behaved like ruffians.

LORD BROUGHAM.

By the death of Lord Brougham, the world has lost the ablest and most effective, as well as the last survivor of the tribe of reformers who sprang up in England at the close of the last century, and whose labors, bequeathed to other hands, have just culminated in what is the final triumph of their doctrines—the passage of the late Reform Bill. He was before all things what is now, we might almost say technically, called a "radical"—that is, an uprooter of abuses. In fact, he was the archetype of radicalism. He was as near perfection in his peculiar line as it is permitted to human nature to approach perfection in any line. The smallest addition to his virtues, or the slightest diminution of his defects, would have spoiled him for his work. His pretensions to universal knowledge brought on him for half a century the scorn and sneers of men of real knowledge. It was wittily and bitterly said of him, when he was presiding over the Court of Chancery, "that if he only knew a little law, he would know a little of everything;" but he knew enough law to be a very effective law reformer. Had he been a great lawyer, the chances are that he would have been as energetic in defending abuses as he was in overthrowing them. He knew a little of physical science, and thought he knew a great deal; but had he known a great deal, he would never have been heard of at the bar or in the House of Commons. What he did know simply increased his efficiency as an advocate, and furnished one more outlet for his insatiable activity of mind. The same thing may be said of his attainments in moral and political philosophy. He had a tincture of both, but produced nothing that anybody now reads, and clearly never had more of either than was sufficient to give him confidence in himself in his forensic contests, and it did not need much to do this.

This confidence, too, he possessed naturally in such quantity, and it was combined with so much restlessness, as to make him at once "a terror and a delight" to his quieter, more fastidious, and more thorough friends like Francis Horner; and it even tried the nerves of the more balanced and indulgent Romilly. Horner said of him, in 1802, when they were both on the threshold of their career, and Brougham had just sold his first book to Longman: "Should an active scene be opened to Brougham, I shall tremble with anxiety for some time, though it is what I very ardently wish. His information on political subjects is now immense, . . . but his ardor is so urgent that I should be afraid of his being deficient in prudence. That he would ultimately become a leading and predominant mind cannot be doubted, but he might attempt to fix himself in that place too soon." In fact, as years rolled on and his confidence acquired a solid basis of success, it assumed proportions that, had he been a man of smaller powers, would have made him intolerable. It did raise up for him a host of enemies, and, in combination with what must, after all, be called his shallowness, would have robbed his sunset of brilliancy had the result of his labors been less great. But, then, without it he would not have been the man he was—that is, the most fearless, the most energetic, and perhaps at the same time one of the most effective constitutional agitators that has ever appeared.

Then, too, he was wanting in taste and tact, and the want of these is a terrible want in any man who proposes to make a figure in politics in an old society. His displays of this defect throughout his long and brilliant career were frequent, and for his friends and coadjutors a very painful spectacle. Perhaps the most memorable example of it was the attack he made on the Prince Regent in opposing an increase in the salary of the Secretary of the Admiralty in 1816, in which he described him in much the same terms as those in which Tacitus describes Tiberius in his retreat at Capreæ. Many who would have voted with him were so disgusted that they got up and left the House; others who only wanted a good excuse for not voting against the ministry went away also; and the motion was defeated, and solely, the best judges believed, owing to Brougham's rant, the ministry was saved. This performance wrung even from the kind-hearted Romilly the exclamation—from him a severe condemnation—"How much it is to be lamented that his [Brougham's] want of judgment and of prudence should prevent his great talents and such good intentions from being as great a blessing to mankind as they ought to be!" Nevertheless, this bluntness of perception, this thickness of the skin, this vehemence which carried him over all conventional barriers, this want of the finer kind of sympathy, much as it marred him on particular occasions, was certainly a help on the whole. To be a reformer at all in England in Brougham's early days required not courage only—for a man may be courageous and yet suffer too keenly for mortal nerves to bear it very long—but that coarseness of fibre which is to the mind what a good digestion is to the body; which hardens a man against the chill winds which blow from small reverses, small snubs, and sudden bursts of unpopularity. He probably felt as comfortably after the defeat of the motion on the salary of the Secretary of the Admiralty as he ever felt in his life; probably thought he had done a very fine thing, when all his friends were thinking what a magnificent ass he had made of himself; and was probably as fresh, as cheerful, and as ready for work on the following morning as on any morning of his life. Horner or Romilly or Mackintosh would almost have been confined to his room for several days after such an exploit.

Of his courage it is almost needless to speak. That a great deal of it might have been called animal courage took away nothing from its value. He was courageous not simply as a man whom conscience drives out upon his duty as with a flaming sword. Courage of this kind abounds in all walks of life, and is the natural result of high moral culture; but it does not always make a man a radical. There are many who deny Brougham the possession of it; but luckily for his fame—and luckily, too, for his country—even if he had it not he did not need it. He had, at all events, that other, and for a reformer even more valuable kind, which consists in simple love of strife. Few men probably ever felt more keenly the gaudium certaminis. He sailed about everywhere and in every weather with his decks cleared, his ports open, and his guns run out, and no calculation of odds or chances ever caused him to decline a combat. Let us add that he was, until his descent from the woolsack, a formidable foe. His activity—which he once illustrated by writing five reviews for the Edinburgh while travelling between Ratisbon and Venice on a pleasure trip—and his immense power of apprehension, armed him with a supply of general information such as hardly any reformer has ever been able to boast, and this saved him from those small overthrows to which reformers are so constantly exposed at the hands of officials and men of detail. He was not strong as a logician. His legal arguments were apt to be disjointed and desultory. They were wanting in precision, in clearness, and in symmetry; and exhibited, like the arguments of most encyclopædic minds, more industry in collecting facts than capacity of digesting them; but his blows, when delivered, were apt to be tremendous. They often, in dealing with small matters, fell short from mere exaggeration, to which he had a true radical's proneness; but it was his good fortune, through most of his life as a reformer, to have to deal with monstrous abuses, about which hardly any invective could be too strong, and for which hardly any coloring could be too high—and all Brougham's coloring was high.

It has been urged against him that he was over-ambitious, and pursued office with greater keenness than became a scholar and a philanthropist. To this the answer is, of course, that he sought no office which was not in the line of his career, and to which his achievements and reputation did not fairly entitle him, and which he did not fill with credit. He was generally considered a far worse Chancellor than Eldon; but if the end of equity be the decision of human controversies and the diminution of human misery, and not the sharpening of legal wits, he was a far better one. There was no department of the law, too, which he did not either, while at the bar or on the bench, do something to reform. And it must be remembered of him, that all the arts by which he rose were manly arts. He owed nothing to favor, and was constitutionally incapable of intrigue. He became an assailant of abuses when to become an assailant of abuses meant the surrender of all hope of promotion. Moreover, we have never known exactly on what principle a philanthropist, any more than other men who do good in their day and generation, is expected to root out from his heart all desire of earthly honors. When it was discovered, after the publication in 1860 of his letter to Mr. Seward dissolving the partnership of Seward, Weed, Greeley & Co., that Horace Greeley in his hot youth had cherished unsatisfied longings for a post-office, a great many people were shocked and disappointed; but it was the most natural thing in the world. The best men labor from mixed motives; and he does all that society has any right to expect of him who makes the noblest motives the most powerful. If there are in any pursuit fixed rewards for success, apart from general esteem and the applause of one's own conscience, the man who, following that pursuit, does not desire them, has nothing to boast of. He differs from, but he does not excel, his neighbors.

Brougham had multitudinous faults, but they were faults without which, as we have said, he could not have done the work that was set him to do, and they were faults that ought hardly to be mentioned in talking of a veteran who labored in England sixty years ago for the abolition of the slave-trade; for the reform of the bloody criminal code; who voted in a minority of eight with Romilly, in 1812, for the abolition of flogging in the army; who was the friend of Poland after the triumph of the reaction in 1815; who thundered against slavery in the West Indies till it, as well as the slave-trade, had perished; who, during a long and busy professional life, always found time for the cultivation of literature and science; who never ceased to labor with tongue and pen for the promotion of popular education; and who for nearly forty years was the man in all England to whom the poor, the weak, the helpless, the oppressed of all colors, climes, and causes addressed themselves first, and with most confidence, when seeking aid or redress.

He was the last survivor of the small band of brilliant men who started the Edinburgh Review, and made it so soon "the terror of quacks and impostors" in literature, and of that large and more brilliant band who raised and upheld the standard of political reform during the dark years of the French war. Many of them served the cause with more discretion, but none with more energy and efficiency than he; and it is singular that he who crowded the labors of many lives into one—whose ceaseless activity appalled his companions in the race—should have been the last to go to rest. They have all left famous names. Brougham, Smith, Mackintosh, Horner, Jeffrey, Romilly, Wilberforce, were men who would make any age illustrious, as they indeed made theirs; and the more illustrious, because they all, except perhaps Brougham, united talents of the highest order with lives of singular purity—of some, Romilly and Horner, for instance, we might almost say of singular austerity. And yet not one of them has done anything to enlarge the boundaries of human thought, or increase the stores of human knowledge. Their highest merit and their great title to remembrance is that they were patient, able, highly educated, courageous sappers of time-honored abuses; in other words, that they passed their lives in trying to save men from outrageous cruelty and injustice at the hands of their fellows. That such should be, after all, the story of their lives; that this, and only this, was the work which such men found to do in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, and that it still absorbs the energies of the very best men of all civilized countries; that the work of reform should still be so largely the work of destruction, and not of construction—only deepens the deepest of all mysteries.

PANSLAVISM.

I.

THREE families of nations, all belonging to the Indo-European grand-division of mankind, the Slavic, the Teutonic, and the Romanic, can be said to rule the globe in our times. They may be designated as the eastern, the north-western, and south-western branches of that grand stem, into which countless centuries of growth have ramified it, and around which cluster numerous minor offshoots of the same, as well as some detached from different trunks. All the north of Asia, from Behring's Straits and the mouth of the Amoor to the Ural, and almost all Europe east of the Baltic and the Adriatic, and of a winding line connecting these two seas, belong to the Slavic race, which has absorbed or entirely overpowered the Finns, Lithuanians, Crimean Tartars, Circassians, Bashkirs, and numerous other tribes, and closely encircles the Magyars, Roumans, Albanians, and others. The rest of Europe and almost the whole of America, unequally divided into northern and southern halves, Australia, parts of Africa and Southern Asia, and almost all the islands of the seas, are held by the Teutonic and Romanic nations, who have absorbed, exterminated, or subjected, among others, the Basques, the Celts, the aborigines of this continent, the Hindoos, and the Malays. Their flags float triumphantly over all the oceans. The Sultans of Turkey and Morocco, the formerly impenetrable empires of Cathay and Japan, yield to their dictates; the Arab and the Egyptian construct their canals; the Kabyl and the Abyssinian vainly oppose their arms.

Of these three dominant families of nations, the Teutonic is throughout in a flourishing condition. It embraces the most enlightened and progressive, the most industrious and active, the freest and richest nations of the earth. Each of its members is independent and sovereign in the land it inhabits. All enjoy self-rule and constitutional freedom, though under manifold forms: republican democracy in the United States and Switzerland; democracy combined with monarchy in Norway and Denmark; liberal aristocracy in England; and mixed constitutionalism in Holland, Sweden, and Germany. Although some of these nations, like Holland and Sweden, have already played more conspicuous parts in history than they do now, none is in a condition of internal decay; only their external relations are changed. Almost all are advancing with the hope of a still brighter future. Their religion, with few exceptions, is the Protestant.

The Romanic family consists mainly of nations that have passed the zenith of their glory. Some of them show evident marks of decay, if not of incurable rottenness. Such are Spain and Portugal, which, after centuries of world-wide fame and power, have nearly succumbed to the internal infection of bigotry, pride, and luxury, combining to produce an unparalleled system of royal and clerical despotism. Their former colonies, now independent states, founded on a substratum of an inferior race, seem to be decrepit in their very infancy. Italy and Roumania struggle hard, and not without foreign aid, for regeneration after ages of degeneracy. France alone, the leading Romanic state, stands erect and powerful in the foremost rank of civilized nations, though, as many believe, on the very verge of decadence, the forecast shadow of which is already traceable in the character and spirit of her people. Most of the members of this family are convulsed by frequent revolutions, which seem only to displace tyranny, and but rarely inaugurate a normal rule of freedom. Their movements are unsteady, their aims indefinite and vague, their culture superficial. Progress and reaction alternate, each running into excess. Every nation, however, is independent, except the Roumanian, which is autonomous but tributary. The Catholic religion prevails in all, with the same exception.

More peculiar still is the general aspect of the Slavic family. It consists not of nations uniformly free and advancing, nor of nations decayed, decaying, or in the throes of regeneration, but of one great overshadowing empire, and of a large number of minor peoples and tribes whose political life has been cut short by external violence before internal decay set in. That empire is Russia, which contains the only independent Slavic nation. The western and southern Slavi, who, during the great migration of nations, had spread as far as the lower Elbe, the head-waters of the Danube and the Drave, and beyond the Balkan, the Isthmus of Corinth, and even the Hellespont, early in the Middle Ages founded independent kingdoms and principalities near the shores of the Baltic, the Adriatic, and the Euxine, on the Vistula, the Elbe, and the Danube, and on both sides of the Carpathians; but, disunited among themselves, often fighting one another, and feebly organized, they gradually receded before mightier neighbors, and finally succumbed to the superior culture and discipline of the Germans, or to the impetuous valor of the Hungarians and Turks, Poland alone falling under the strokes, chiefly, of a Slavic people, the Russian. The too far advanced Slavic populations almost entirely disappeared; those established between the Oder, the Elbe, and the Saale, with the exception of the Wends in Lusatia, were Germanized after long struggles; those on the upper Save, Drave, and Mur shared nearly the same fate; the Great-Moravian empire, founded by Svatopluk, east and west of the Carpathians, fell, about the year 900, under the sword of the Magyars, who had then for the first time entered and occupied Hungary; Croatia was annexed to the latter country about the beginning, and Slavonia about the middle, of the twelfth century; Serbia was conquered on the battle-field of Kosovo, in 1389, by Sultan Amurath I.; Bulgaria was subdued soon after by his son Bajazet, and Bosnia, after various vicissitudes, by Solyman the Magnificent, in 1528; Bohemia, the oldest Slavic kingdom, virtually lost its independence on the death of King Louis in the battle of Mohács (1526), fought against the last-named Sultan, when for a second time it reverted to the house of Austria, and it lost its freedom when, after the battle of the White Mountain (1620), the Emperor Ferdinand II. tore its charter of liberty, as forfeited; last of all, Poland, having flourished for eight hundred years as an independent and mighty kingdom, was divided by three neighboring powers, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, toward the close of the last century, and all its subsequent attempts to recover its independence have proved futile and self-destructive.

When Poland fell, all national pulsation seemed long to have ceased among all other Slavic populations of the west and south. The Bulgarians, Servians, Bosnians, and Montenegrins—the latter with some intervals—had so long groaned under the Turkish yoke; the Croats and Slavonians, the Slovacks in north-western, the Ruthenians in north-eastern, and the Rascians in southern, Hungary, had so long been ruled, led, or oppressed by the Magyars; Dalmatia had become so much Italianized by Venetian influences; the nobility and urban populations of Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Styria, and Illyria so much Germanized under the house of Austria, that the remembrance of the free national past seemed to live among the Slavi of all these countries only like "an ancient lay." Any lingering hope of resurrection appeared to most observers an idle dream. But when Polish liberty succumbed, French liberty became triumphant over all its enemies, and commenced convulsing Europe with the ideas of popular rights, independence, and national regeneration. Shock followed shock. From the Seine and the Tagus to the Pruth and the Niemen the existing order of things was shaken to its foundations. The people everywhere became conscious of their rights and power. The new gigantic structures raised by victorious France, in their turn, crumbled under the pressure of popular enthusiasm. The people fought against Napoleon in Spain and in Tyrol; the people were appealed to against him by Czar Alexander and by Frederic William in 1812 and 1813. On the fall of the great conqueror, the people almost everywhere demanded their rights. Spain, Naples, and Piedmont rose to strike for liberty in 1820, though in vain. A Greek hetairia raised the standard of Hellenic freedom in Moldo-Wallachia; the Peloponnesus and the islands followed, and Hellas revived. Poles and Russians conspired, separately and jointly, for the overthrow of despotism. Another regenerating movement, though of a different character, begun simultaneously with the fall of Poland, took place in Hungary. Roused from a long slumber by the centralizing and Germanizing attempts of Joseph II. (1780–1790), the Magyars not only reasserted their national autonomy on the accession of his brother and successor, Leopold II., but also began with equal enthusiasm, ability, and success to revive, cultivate, and spread their own Turanian tongue, and to revindicate for it the place which the Latin had occupied as a parliamentary, scientific, and international medium in their assemblies and public institutions. All these movements could not but react upon the Slavic race, and rekindle the latent sparks of national consciousness even in the most oppressed and most neglected of its members.

Where religion aided to set those sparks ablaze, the first movements immediately assumed the shape of insurrectionary outbreaks. The Servians and Montenegrins, aided or instigated by Russia, were the first to strike for independence—the former under the lead of Czerny George and then of Milosh Obrenovitch, the latter under their Vladika, Peter Petrovitch I.—and, fighting long and bravely, conquered a partial national autonomy even before the outbreak in Greece—an autonomy which Servia, under the sons of those two kneses, has not only succeeded in defending, but also in considerably enlarging. Next followed a general literary movement, aiming at a revival of all the Slavic tongues and the development of Slavic literature throughout the Austrian empire and on its Turkish borders. Of this movement Pesth, Agram, Vienna, Prague, and Moscow became the centres. Journals, schools, libraries, and archives were founded. Eminent writers, like the Serb Karajitch, the Slovacks Kollar and Schafarik, the Moravian Palacky, subsequently historiographer of Bohemia, and the Croat Gaj, writing in various Slavic dialects and in German, not only roused the spirit of their compatriots to a consciousness of their own genius and the knowledge of their past, but also attracted the attention of Europe.

But the respective spheres of these and similar writers were too narrow, the population speaking their dialects too poor and too ignorant, to support so many literatures and institutions. This circumstance was, perhaps, what mainly suggested to Kollar the idea of a union, for literary purposes at first, of all the Slavi. In a German work on "Literary Reciprocity between all the Tribes and Dialects of the Slavic Nation" (Pesth, 1831), he endeavored to prove to the Slavi of all countries that their various idioms, of which the Russian, the Polish, the Bohemian (or Czechic), and the Servian are the principal, differed no more from each other than did the Attic, the Ionian, the Æolian, and the Dorian dialects of the ancient Hellenic, the differences of which did not prevent the Greeks from developing one grand literature or from essentially forming one grand nation. The same path of glory, he argued with fervor and eloquence, was open to the Slavi. The institutions, the literary products, the idioms, the thoughts, the genius of all the Slavi had only to become the common property of all, and they would excel the rest of the modern world as the Hellenes excelled all other nations of antiquity. This dazzling idea was received with acclamation by all the Slavi, except the Poles, who, having risen in insurrection against Russia in 1830, were just bleeding away under the sword of the only independent Slavic people. But when the struggle was over, some of their exiles, and among them their great poet, Mickiewicz, joined in the general chorus. Literary union and linguistic fusion became watchwords, and were carried into effect to a certain degree, chiefly among the Slavi on the Save and lower Danube and on both sides of the western Carpathians. Alphabets being assimilated, slight grammatical distinctions dropped, and words exchanged, the dialects of Servia, Croatia, Slavonia, and Dalmatia were nearly melted into one Illyrian language, and the Czechic became the common tongue of the Bohemians, Moravians, and Slovacks.

THE DECLINE OF THE NOVEL.

THE young man of literary aspirations who came up to London in the days of Elizabeth and James found the companies of players his best publishers and the theatre his field of fame. It was the time of the drama's reign, and there was hardly a pretender to the throne. When James's son was beheaded the drama also was deposed, and when his grandson was restored to Whitehall the drama—which also was none the better for its sojourn in foreign parts—came back with him and likewise enjoyed its own again. But, like the political restorations, the literary restoration was followed by a forced abdication, and the literature of England, like England herself, passed under the dominion of the adopted foreigner. The reign of William of Orange was the beginning of a period in English literature which may be described as the reign of the translation. From his time on through that of Anne and two of the Georges, was the period when the authors of Greece and Rome were done into English. Tradition still put into the pocket of the literary adventurer coming up from the provinces or the universities the tragedy or comedy that was to make his fortune, but generally the young man's allegiance was soon transferred from the manager to the publisher. If he had little genius of his own, he set about earning the reverse of Durham's compliment to Cowley:

> "Horace's wit and Virgil's state
> He stole, but did not emulate," or he leased himself to a bookseller and became an "eminent hand." If he were a man of native ability, still he had to follow the classical fashion—make love with the help of Venus, lash the town with adaptations of Juvenal, laugh at it in imitations of Horace, lampoon his enemies as Atossa and Sporus, teach criticism out of Quintilian, and agriculture, as Evelyn would have had it taught in his projected technical school, out of Varro and Calamella.

Between the second of the two periods, which we have roughly described as the dramatic age and the age of the translation, between this and the present time, which we call the period of the ascendancy of the novel, there was an interregnum when the crown was, so to speak, in commission; when the authority of the kingdom was wielded by a regency of which, as regards power and influence, the members were nearly equal. The novels of Fielding, Richardson, and Smollett; the social, moral, and humorous essay—descended from the noble house of "The Spectator," once near the throne; the political pamphlet and gazette; the controversial or doctrinal religious treatise—each of these had pretensions to the chief place quite as great as the translation could offer, perhaps greater, at the moment when, as the eighteenth century ended, two more powerful claimants, one shortly after the other, appeared in the field. Genuine poetry, brought forward by Thomson, Cowper, and Burns, made a bold push for the throne, and was, indeed, momentarily set upon it by help of Byron, Scott, Moore, Southey, Coleridge, Campbell, and their fellows. But almost immediately she yielded to Scott and his host of followers, who gave us for our ruler the prose fiction, our de facto monarch at the present time.

But it may fairly be questioned, we think, if the empire of the novel is not now beginning to decline. Its life, of course, is not threatened; the question is only of the continuance of its predominance and supremacy. From the dawn of literature there have been stories, and, till the end of time, the story-telling instinct will exist and be powerful. Each age will delight to see its characteristic features set before it in the portraits of individual men and women; man will always be fascinated by the vivid portrayal of human passions, and interested in analysis of the characters, and narrations of the fortunes and misfortunes, of beings who can be made to seem to each man more like himself than the actual beings whom the sight of his bodily eye conceals from him. We may be sure that the novel in its essentials will never cease from among men. But, if we understand the matter, the novel, never again perhaps to be less than powerful, has been paramount and sovereign so long, not in virtue of what it is essentially, but by reason of other causes, the operation of which is of late beginning to be less influential.

Once the theatre in London, as once in Athens, was the field for literary activity, because the stage furnished then the best and almost the only opportunity for the publishing of thought. Afterwards literature in England was chiefly translation, because the largest audience within reach of the literary man was composed of the court, the bar, and the universities, and the demand of the audience was for classical literature. The limits of the audience had gradually been enlarging and gradually had included greater and greater numbers of that class whose most pronounced literary inclination is a liking for stories, when there appeared opportunely a writer whose genius for story-telling was nothing less than marvellous; and since Scott then elevated the novel to the first place in literature it has been maintained there by an almost unnumbered host of able writers, whose efforts have been spurred by the requirements of a constantly increasing multitude of novel readers, until now there is hardly a character within the range of humanity, or an incident possible of occurrence in our civilization, or that of any historic period, which has not been presented to our attention over and over again with every degree of ability; but, of course, oftenest by unskilful artists. What "cause" is there which has not been treated of by the democratic, or aristocratic, or Cæsarist novelist; or the Pedobaptist, or Catholic, or Rationalist, or Ritualistic, or "muscular Christian," or "nervous pagan," or mystical novelist; or the woman's spherical novelist; or the totally abstinent or bacchanalian novelist; or the musical novelist; or the Pre-Raphaelite, or shaping-imagination, or Gothic, or classicist novelist; or the military or naval novelist; or the mediæval, or prophetic, or realistic, or observant novelist; or the Hebrew, or Anglo-Saxon, or Norman, or Oriental, or Aboriginal Indian novelist; or the phrenological, or fox-hunting, or gambling, or bigamist, or forging, or murdering, or saintly, or diplomatic, or federal, or secessionist, or Jacobite, or Puritanical, or villatic, or romantic, or medical, or horsey, or some other sort of a novelist? There is literally no end to the varieties and sub-varieties of sociological, artistic, scientific, theological, political, historical, and other sermons, which now for a quarter of a generation have been preached to the world under cover of the life and adventures of the two lovers, their parents, friends, and enemies.

There may be a Frenchman to come who will discover and ventilate some fresh, yet unknown improper relation of the sexes. And incest was hardly exhausted by Chateaubriand. And the great American novel remains still unaccomplished. For years we have had Mr. Street, an author favorably situated at the head of sloop navigation on the right bank of a stream which shames the Rhine; and Mr. Whitman has for years contemned the comma and every badge of our subserviency to foreign literature, but still we are without anything that can be called the jubilant, expansive novel of Libertad and These States, and which does justice to the new human and topographical nature discovered by Columbu sand invented by Thomas Jefferson. But if we except these two, why should we not say that all possible fields for the novel writer have been so often cropped, as the farmers say, that nobody will be able to get much from any one of them unless he is a cultivator of very rare ability; one of a hundred thousand; a man able to put into the ground as much as he expects to get out of it, more than a dozen ordinary farmers would be worth if all their possessions were taken together.

One is justified, then, in taking it for true that just now all possible methods of working up the novelist's materials are familiar to the point of weariness, and that there is in the mind of the reader a sort of disgust—perhaps only sub-conscious in many cases, only momentary in many cases, and in some cases not just—at the very appearance of the novelistic poem. And probably it is true, too, that the literary insufficiency of the vast majority of mechanical people who set themselves to producing what has long been the most popular of literary products, has had the effect of indisposing really able, ambitious workmen to range themselves as fellow-workmen in the decaying fraternity. But on these two reasons, as not going very far towards the root of the matter, we are not inclined to insist with any strenuousness. Looking further for a cause of that decline in the novel's authority which we seem to see, we settled on what we think the real one. It is possible to make a rough but not false division of the public interested in general reading into two classes, of which the superior is that whose tastes and wishes give direction to the literary activity of the better sort of writers, while the inferior is composed of persons seeking merely for amusement, and satisfied with the service of writers correspondingly inferior. Of course, let us here remark, we speak in a very general way—of what is called general literature, of the mass of workers in general literature, and of its readers in the mass. Now, just at present that class of general readers who have some claim to be called thinkers, have begun to discuss earnestly—that is to say, with a view of forming opinions, with a determination more or less definite of acting on the opinions they may form, with a wish, then, for exactness as regards facts and arguments—thus we say, they have begun the discussion of a vast number of difficult questions, questions which, for a generation or two, while yet they were new and in the merely picturesque stage, made the subject-matter of the novel, and also were the cause why the novel supported itself so long in the position where the great founder of its dominion was able to place it. Because these questions were in the picturesque stage, the novelist seized upon them; because they were new to the public, their devotees turned novelists in order to put them in a pleasing form before the audience which it was hoped to persuade, or whose attention, at all events, it was desired to gain.

This attention has been gained, and the discussion of so many of these questions has been entered on, and entered on so seriously, that, apparently, we are on the eve of radical changes, or, rather, we are, apparently, on the eve of the beginnings of radical changes, in the structure and even the very foundation of our social and political system. The woman-question, which once Miss Mulock gently agitated, is nowadays debated in the legislatures of two countries; trades-unions and co-operation occupy the minds of responsible senators instead of confusing the readers of "The Wandering Jew;" the negro is the State in many parts of the country where once he was a happy, dancing figure in "The White Slaves" and "Uncle Tom's Cabins as they are," and sits in political conventions and divides parties in States where, not so long ago, his most eye-filling position was that of a Gospel-saint or an Old-Testament prophet in the genuine "Uncle Tom's Cabin" or the "Dreds;" the troubled seeker of Newman's "Loss and Gain" is to-day represented by the Ritualist who confounds Convocation and editorially hopes for an invitation for Bishop Coxe to go with Archbishop Manning to the next general council; the right of the former party-of-the-second-part in a courtship to be the party-of-the-first-part, once asserted by implication only in the "Cousin Stellas" of ten years ago, is to-day supported by weekly papers with regular, or irregular, financial articles and all the political news. We are all getting to be sociologists, and sociology now leaves the novel where it used to amuse us, and which it used to make so interesting and important, and becomes the staple of the more serious, earnest, regularly appointed "organ of opinion."

The successor of the novel, in the chief of the literary places of power, will doubtless be the family of weekly and monthly journals. It is a family of respectable antiquity. When the novel was but a humble dependant upon the romance, the periodical devoted to literary and social subjects suddenly gained a very honorable and influential position, which, to be sure, was not, in Addison's time, capable of permanent occupation. It existed, however, and existed in good repute beside the other forces over which the translation dominated; and in the half-century since the novel attained the highest rank, has gradually been drawing to its standard greater and greater numbers of the ablest writers, till now, in this age of business done by steam and telegraph; in this age, therefore, of news brought by steam and lightning from every quarter of the earth; in this age, therefore, of business newspapers read daily by millions who more and more insist that the daily newspaper shall more and more exclusively devote itself to news; in this age which naturally, then, makes of the newspaper a type to which literature naturally may and, indeed, necessarily must conform itself if it is to reach the reader—in this age the quarterly, monthly, and weekly press, aided by its kinship with its immensely powerful unliterary brother, seems destined to an easy conquest of the throne.

That this is well, we are optimistic enough to believe. In Adam's fall we sinned all, to be sure; but it was once for all, we imagine, that the race then made universal lapse; since Adam's day, when we have moved altogether it has been upwards, we suppose, towards laudable ends, and with tolerably good results. At any rate, it is permitted to hope so; and as to the matter in hand, we presume the decay of the novel and the rise of good essays in magazines—or in weekly papers, say—does not make very forcibly in favor of the pessimist's view. However, the question of the loss and gain to literature consequent on the change of dynasty which we expect, we do not intend considering at present. To such ambitious writers as do not possess special qualifications for creating what we have called the essential novel, who is not a heaven-born genius in the story-telling way, or in the invention of characters, or in the analysis of the soul of man—to such writers we feel like saying that, should they very much longer continue coming up to market with novels in hand, they will very probably—almost certainly in fact, and sometime soon—find themselves arrived a day too late for the fair.

ENGLAND.

London, April 24, 1868.

In my last letter I made some remarks as to the present position of the House of Lords. Rather a curious illustration of that position has just occurred. Lord Cranborne, formerly Lord Robert Cecil, has now, by the death of his father, become the Marquis of Salisbury. The newspapers have devoted leading articles to him precisely as if he had been removed by death instead of elevation. They speak as the contemporary press might have spoken of Merlin after he had been put to sleep by the wiles of Vivien. He has gone to a serene atmosphere, where he may smile in secret, looking over the weary combatants far below him stirring up their little gains of office or party for supremacy. And indeed Lord Cranborne's removal to another sphere of action is really a change of some importance to the personnel of the House of Commons. He occupied rather a singular position, which at this moment has earned him more candid praise from his opponents than he would otherwise have received. Whilst the mass of his party have followed Mr. Disraeli's lead into strange places, he has remained faithfully standing upon the ancient ways. That an ordinary, dull, honest Tory should denounce the new constitutional theories of his nominal leader is by no means surprising; but Lord Cranborne, though thoroughly honest, is by no means dull. Though he could hardly be called in the highest sense of the term an eloquent speaker, he had a very remarkable power of bitter sarcasm. Standing immovably, in an almost slouching attitude, on the floor of the House, with his hands in his pockets and his head drooping on his breast, he used to pour out a string of bitter epigrams, which were the more piquant from the heaviness of his manner. He had the credit, besides, of being a very able contributor to anonymous literature. In his late denunciations of Mr. Disraeli's tortuous policy he had spoken the mind of the few faithful remnants of his party, and had, of course, conciliated Mr. Disraeli's thoroughgoing opponents. In a higher sphere of duty he had gained considerable credit by his short official career as Indian Secretary. He has gone to the House of Lords with the credit of an able administrator and a powerful leader in party debates. Whenever parties are reconstituted on the old basis he will have a chance of displaying his abilities of the former kind, but as a debater his talents will, of course, be thrown away.

That a statesman should be considered as eclipsed, if not extinguished, by being thus "kicked up-stairs" is remarkable enough as an illustration of the present state of the House of Lords. Yet another moral may be drawn as to the rival assembly. It is beginning to strike some people more forcibly than of old that, after all, it is not very wise to make the power of tickling the fancy of the House of Commons a necessary condition for governing the country. That the House of Commons should be our real sovereign is right enough; but it is not so plain that the present system is defensible by which it has encroached upon executive functions. A man may be an excellent minister who is quite incapable of leading a debate, and it is still more plain that a body of from six to seven hundred gentlemen is totally unfit to arrange all the complex details of administrative measures. In short, the House of Commons tries to discharge an enormous quantity of business which is altogether beyond its capacity. A very able paper in the Fortnightly of this month, by Mr. Harrison, the best writer amongst the Comtists, puts this in a forcible way; and it is worth studying as an illustration of the tendencies of a rising political party. Meanwhile it is being illustrated still more effectively by the present condition of political warfare. The present session should have been a fruitful one, according to promise. As matters go, the sluices of talk have been opened to such an extent that it seems very doubtful whether any result whatever will be reached. The Irish Church bids fair to stop the way for an indefinite time to come. It is true that the question is far larger and more complex than might be supposed at first sight. There are so many vested interests to be satisfied, so many intricate ties between church and state, that it requires rather a system of legislation than any one or two legislative acts to reduce the church to a mere voluntary body. And when we have got beyond the simple destruction, it is still more difficult to say how the distribution of spoils is to be satisfactorily managed.

The problem is, of course, soluble by men with the will to solve it; but if the solution is to be discovered by a committee of 658 distracted gentlemen, if every one of them is to have unlimited power to say all that he thinks and to make use of every conceivable pretext for delay, it is difficult to say when we shall see daylight. Meanwhile, the House has no attention to spare for less absorbing topics. Education, Irish and Scotch Reform bills, and innumerable other questions, some of them of first-rate importance, are left to shift for themselves. Matters will be hardly expedited by the proposed step of the Liberal party, who, it is said, on I know not what authority, are about to move a vote of want of confidence. Should they succeed in turning out the ministry, it takes three weeks to get in another; and after that there is little enough time left before our legislators will find it necessary to begin shooting partridges. In short, it seems only too probable that Parliament will show once more what a strange machine it is for grinding out indefinite quantities of useless talk, and either postponing all useful business or despatching a few fragments in a hurried scramble at the end of the session.

One important subject was discussed last night with less than usual animation. Mr. Ward Hunt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought forward the budget in a speech of unusual dryness. Mr. Gladstone, being a genius, always made a great oratorical display on these occasions, and contrived to throw a certain interest round vast jungles of figures and round the details of spirit duties or taxes on dogs. Mr. Disraeli, being a genius of another kind, rejoiced in the contrasted excellence of a studiously simple and unadorned explanation of the finances. Mr. Ward Hunt, not being a genius at all, but a plain, solid country gentleman, was simply dry and uninteresting. The days of brilliant budgets, large surpluses, and remissions of taxation are over for the present, in consequence of the pervading commercial depression. Moreover, the Abyssinian expedition, though proceeding far better than it promised at first, is calculated to cost us at least five millions sterling. The consequence is, that we shall have to pay an additional twopence on the pound income tax, and may think ourselves very fortunate if we escape a deficit with that additional resource. There is no other feature worth remark; a good deal of time was consumed in discussing the propriety of a tax upon sheep-dogs.

The great event of the last fortnight has been the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland. They have been well received, have been presented with the due quantity of addresses, and been warmly cheered in the streets. The Prince has attended horse-races, and been inaugurated as a Knight of the Order of St. Patrick. If the Irish people continue to be discontented after this, to get up Fenian disturbances, and complain of the church and the land-laws, they must be grossly ungrateful—or the Tory papers are very much in the wrong.

A curious cause célèbre is going on just now, which is worth a moment's notice. The great leader of the spiritualists, Mr. Home, has got into a very awkward mess. He persuaded an aged and confiding widow to give him £30,000 down, and to make over to him £30,000 more in the event of her death; the presents being made in obedience to her late husband's spirit, who spoke through Mr. Home. The lady was persuaded by other spirits, speaking through abler mediums, that Mr. Home was a humbug, and called for her money back—a civil request with which he refused to comply. She has applied to the Court of Chancery, and Mr. Home's defence is that the lady made him the gift in expectation of marrying him. The case has already lasted three days, and it is likely to last for some time longer. What the result may be is, of course, doubtful; but it will scarcely be very creditable to Mr. Home's disinterestedness. Such an exposure ought to be a good thing; but I know more than one person of education and presumable sanity who still proclaim their belief in the genuineness of Mr. Home's inspiration.

THE ILLINOIS REPUBLICANS ON REPUDIATION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Western men seem disagreed as to whether the West is or is not in favor of repudiation. In forming your judgment, you will no doubt examine the reasons on which their conflicting opinions are founded.

Your correspondent, J. S. Palmer, in the Nation of April 30, furnishes an example of the art of proving anything by anything—quidlibet per quodlibet ars probandi, to run the risk of misquoting Latin. Because Ohio will not permit negroes and transient whites to vote, he concludes that she favors robbing in the form of repudiation. By equally good reasoning it may be shown that Ohio is also in favor of polygamy, that Minnesota is about to adopt cannibalism, and that Michigan seeks to have the American people restricted to a vegetable diet.

In support of my own opinion, I ask room for the following resolution, adopted among others by the Illinois Republican State Convention, which was held in this city yesterday:

"That we denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime; and that national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the utmost good faith to all creditors, at home and abroad, according to the letter and spirit of the laws under which it was contracted."

This is the latest official expression of Western sentiment on the subject known to me; and it tends to show that Western repudiation exists only as a phantom.

LITERARY.

A SUBSCRIPTION book-publishing firm in Hartford—Messrs. S. M. Betts & Co.—has in preparation a book of "Entertaining and Authentic Biographical Sketches of Celebrated Women of the Present Day," the biographers also being entertaining persons eminent in the world of letters, and the book bidding fair to be one that will delight the class of readers whom the publishers have in view. Fanny Fern will discourse of Gail Hamilton; William Winter, of distinguished actresses; E. B. Huntingdon, of Mrs. L. H. Sigourney; Theodore Tilton, of Elizabeth Cady Stanton; Mrs. Stanton, of the Woman's Rights Movement and its Champions; J. S. C. Abbott, of the Empress Eugénie; "Miss Mary A. Betts, a rising young authoress," of Camille Urso. Among names like these, we see that of Mr. T. W. Higginson, who will furnish memoirs of Lydia Maria Child and Margaret Fuller—something like a subject, and put into hands with something like fitness for the labor. Mr. Greeley will write of Miss Alice and Miss Phœbe Cary; and since his remarkably good after-dinner speech at Mr. Dickens's dinner, there really is no telling whether he may not burst upon us as an able critic of poetesses. Mr. Parton is to do Jenny Lind, Queen Victoria, Florence Nightingale, and Fanny Kemble. It becomes an interesting question whether "to benefit the people" a writer does not do better by working as hard as he can at the highest work he can do, than by doing work of the kind of which these "Famous Women" will be composed.——Messrs. Taintor Brothers & Co. announce "Happy Hours, a Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle," compiled by Howard Kingsbury and the Rev. Mr. A. A. Graley.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce "King Sham and Other Atrocities in Verse, including a Humorous History of the Pike's Peak Excitement," by Laurence N. Greenleaf, and "Reminiscences of European Travel," by Doctor A. P. Peabody, of Cambridge.——Belknap & Goodwin, of Hartford, have agreed with Mr. Charles Lanman for the publication of a new and improved edition of his "Dictionary of Congress and the General Government." It will be sold by subscription, and makes its appearance about the 1st of July.

—The movements of some of our city publishers this spring deserve mention. The most extensive] of all is that of the Appletons, who abandon Broadway and rented chambers for the huge and costly establishment of their own on Grand Street, corner of Greene. By this change they lend a moral support to other houses in the same vicinity—on Greene Street, Messrs. Ivison, Phinney & Blakeman, opposite John F. Trow's printing establishment, which immediately adjoins the Appletons' property; on Broome Street, Messrs. Hurd & Houghton and Leypoldt & Holt, with Blelock & Co., on Mercer Street. Mr. W. J. Widdleton, hitherto just behind the Appletons, has removed nearly in a straight line to 27 Howard Street, by which he casts his lot with the publishers to the east of Broadway, the nearest of whom are Thomas Nelson & Sons, Grand Street, and George Routledge & Sons, and W. A. Townsend & Adams, Broome Street, with their neighbor, Mr. J. W. Bouton. J. W. Schermerhorn & Co., on the other hand, desert Broome Street for much larger and permanent quarters at 14 Bond Street, near C. B. Richardson & Co., adding to the group of which Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. and G. P. Putnam & Son were the original members, and which is also now increased by Mr. James Miller, who is removed to 649 Broadway, nearly opposite Scribner's, and not far from Ticknor & Fields's Agency on Bleecker Street. Mr. David G. Francis, who used to share the chamber occupied by Mr. M. W. Dodd at 506 Broadway, has removed to the ground floor of the Mercantile Library Building on Astor Place and Eighth Street. Immediately next to him are Messrs. John Wiley & Son, who have left the dangerous proximity of Barnum's Museum. Down town, Mr. Allan Ebbs goes from Broadway to 75 Chambers, Mr. A. Denham from Cortlandt Street to 49 Barclay, and Messrs. Wynkoop & Sherwood from Beekman Street to 106 Fulton. All these changes, so far as we have had an opportunity to judge, are for the better in every respect. Taken together, they indicate the tendency observable in so many kinds of business towards the upper part of the city, or, rather, away from the lower.

—Yale College has just published a "Manual of the Jarves Collection of Early Italian Pictures deposited in the Galleries of the Yale School of Fine Arts. Being a Catalogue, with descriptions of the Pictures contained in that Collection, with Biographical Notices of Artists and an Introductory Essay, the whole forming a brief guide to the study of Early Christian Art. By Russell Sturgis, Jr." We give the title in full, partly because it describes the contents of the work, and partly because this manual is unique in the art literature of this country. The opening essay treats of the difficulties of collecting the works of the old masters and schools, the false pretensions of many vaunted collections, and the growth, grounds, and certainty of the criticism applied to pictures at the present day, to determine their age and authenticity. Then follows a short sketch of the condition of Italian art prior to its revival in the eleventh century, with which the Jarves collection begins. Next come the pictures in chronological sequence, with exact details of their size, material, and the color employed, and a sufficient description of the objects represented, with various comments, illustrations, and references to standard works on art. When the known painters are reached, which happens with Giunta da Pisa (No. 11), Mr. Sturgis's practice is to give first the painter's name and the date when he flourished, next a short biography of the man, and lastly, a list of his pictures, described as stated. The collection includes 115 specimens of Italian art, coming down to the middle of the seventeenth century, with one each of the Spanish and Dutch schools (Velasquez and Pieter Breughel), and two of the German (Albert Dürer and Hans Holbein). A few pages at the end are devoted to reproducing certain documents and the preface from Mr. Jarves's catalogue of 1860. An index of names and topics concludes this highly creditable attempt to condense, for the use alike of visitors to the Jarves gallery and students of historic art, the knowledge necessary for complete enjoyment or complete understanding.

—On a recent visit of the Massachusetts Legislature to the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy at Cambridge, Prof. Agassiz delivered a brief address, setting forth what the institution, with its limited space and resources, had already accomplished, and what he should be able to make of it if supported. More than thirty of the graduates from his instruction have won honorable positions in various scientific undertakings. Fourteen have become professors, five are curators of institutions similar to the Museum, four are editors of scientific journals, four are conducting geological surveys of great interest. As for the collection at Cambridge, it has reversed the habit of sending specimens to Europe for identification: Europe now comes to us. When its abundant material is arranged, if it ever is—and we hope Massachusetts will liberally permit it—as Prof. Agassiz designs, there will be, connected with the main entrance, a room presenting a synoptic arrangement of the contents of the Museum: the leading groups of the animal kingdom, in their natural relations. "By the side of the complete animal shall be its skeleton, to explain its natural structure; its fossil representative, to tell something of its history in the past ages; its embryo, to illustrate the story of its growth." Corresponding to each of the four sides of this room will be added a separate room for the classes singly, viz., the vertebrates and mammalia, birds, reptiles, and fishes; mollusks; articulates; and radiates, with all the fulness, richness, and diversity possible. An attempt will also be made to exhibit the distribution of animal life on the surface of the earth, the succession of animals in their introduction, and the embryological series. No museum has ever been founded upon this plan, nor has any in Europe the facilities for carrying it out. The one at Cambridge has, and, thus perfected, it will, says Prof. Agassiz, place science in America fifty years in advance of the Old World.

—A correspondent of the Historical Magazine makes an addition to the list of recorded Americanisms in more or less common use, by giving us a number of Dutch words which, he says, one may still hear as colloquialisms in the houses of some of the descendants of the early settlers of New York. Most of them will not be recognized at all by the average New Yorker of to-day; in fact, most of them are not in any true sense Americanisms, but are mere foreignisms, so to speak, imported to our soil and never naturalized. There are three or four of them, however, which have established their position as parts of our speech, though none of them is yet admitted into literary English, and only one, perhaps, deserves to be so admitted. "Snoepen" is defined as meaning "to eat dainties in secret." In a child's poem, by Mr. Theodore Tilton, we think it is that "snooping" is used to describe the behavior of a small kitten. Kittens go about with their heads down, sniffing this thing and that, with those queer little quick sniffs, as if everything their noses touched were very hot or very cold, and generally moving with that air of secretness and carefulness noticeable in such young cats as are not in a fit or riotous. As thus applied, the word seems justifiable and even cleverly onomatopoetic. It will be new to most persons to hear that "blatherskite," which seems as Irish as the Hill of Howth, is from the Dutch "blatherenschuyten," a noun meaning "a bragging, boastful fellow." Among us the derivative is, we should say, used most often to designate the bragging and not the bragger; and often it is used as an adjective. "Week" in Dutch is our "soft" or "weak," and the fish known in our local markets as "week-fish" doubtless bears now the name he earned in the frying-pans of New Amsterdam. What is to be said of "hunkeren" we hardly know. It is set down as signifying to hanker after anything. It would almost seem that a bold use must be made of "superbaton," by which figure Father Tom on a certain evening convinced the Pope that black is white and conversely, if we are to derive our political "hunker" from "hunkeren." Our "hunks" might have come from it. But probably it did n't, we make haste to say, that no philological mind may be offended by mere guesswork. That "hanker" itself is of Dutch origin seems not doubtful. "Hutselen" is admitted by the dictionaries as the word from a form of which, or from which itself, we get our "hustle." Finally, "Housatonic" another correspondent declares a Dutch and not an Indian word. It means, says Mr. E. A. Smith, of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, "the winding river of the west."

—One of the latest of that class of new words which science coins, and literature finally has to adopt, is "nekrosoziac." The word is given to the recently invented process of embalming, if it may be so called—a process by which the body is preserved for any length of time, undisfigured, even unrigid. It is simply washed over on the outside with a certain preparation into which carbolic acid, we believe, enters largely as an ingredient. A very brief and not satisfactory paper on the subject appears in the number for May 2 of the Philadelphia Medical and Surgical Reporter. There are two or three other articles of general interest. One is a paper relating the experience of an enquirer who has made attempts at solving the problem of how to produce the sexes at will, and who gives some interesting experiments, but seems ignorant of the fact that his theory is not a new one. Dr. Braman, of Brighton, Massachusetts, sends a letter in regard to the signs of death by drowning, and, among others, speaks, without describing it, of a very singular expression which he has noticed in the faces of drowned men, and of which, one would suppose, mention ought to have got into literature. We do not remember to have ever met with it. Neither have we ever anywhere seen it in print—what wreckers and sailors assert—that the bodies of drowned men, when they rise to the surface, are found floating with the face downward, while the faces of women drowned are turned toward the sky; nor do we know if it is true. From another article it appears that some one in England has invented a cheap and harmless substitute for the weed which, Professor Van der Weyde says, does "more harm among the male population of our country than any other substance existing," except alcohol. Rosemary is a principal ingredient in the counterfeit chewing tobacco; another is lavender; others are hyssop, common thyme, origanum, tussilago, tartara eutraxia—innocuous plants of the class of pot-herbs or the class of toothsome disguisers of unpleasant medicines. Of course, the professor says the manufacturers of chewing tobacco have neither care nor regard for anything but the gratification of the morbid appetite of "the devotees of this crazy and disgusting habit"—namely, tobacco-chewing. So to the poorer, more insipid kinds of tobacco they give a flavor by treating it with a "sauce" of which the component parts are as injurious to men as were the gay yellows and reds and greens and blues which the confectioners used to produce in their candies by using sulphide of mercury and arsenite of copper and chromate of lead, and other virulent poisons, to employ which now adays, in England at least, is to commit a misdemeanor. Corrosive sublimate is sometimes a part of the sauce for our "honeydews" and "Maydews" and "solaces," and other "fine-cuts," to say nothing of compounds of antimony and sulphate of iron, potassa and alumina, or of the lead of the tinfoil in which the packages are wrapped, and bits of which are apt to get into the mouth of the too greedy or too careless chewer, whose slender means forbid the purchase of tobacco of the better brands. Mr. Trask, of Fitchburg, would do well to put in circulation Dr. Van der Weyde's little article.

—Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, in his recently published "Historical Characters," speaks of Talleyrand's wife, an East Indian woman who had previously been the wife (divorced) of a M. Grand, and whom most readers know as the mistress of Sir Philip Francis. Sir Henry says of her that she was "as remarkable for being a beauty as for not being a wit. Every one has heard the story of her asking Sir George Robinson after his man 'Friday.' But M. de Talleyrand vindicated his choice, saying, 'A clever wife often compromises her husband; a stupid one only compromises herself.'" But M. Amadée Pichol, who is the editor of La Revue Britannique, writes from Paris to his "brother editor" of the Times, maintaining that Madame de Talleyrand was probably not a stupid woman, and saying that for his part it seems to him not less than extraordinary that she should be asserted such on the sole strength of an anecdote which, some thirty years before the lady was born, was related of a French abbé. In support of his side of the question, he cites a note appended to a letter written by Horace Walpole to Sir Horace Mann, in the year 1741. The note speaks of a "long Sir Thomas Robinson"—whom Walpole used to call "Robinson Crusoe," on account of his uncouthness of manner and dress. On one occasion, this gentleman went to Paris to visit his sister, and appeared suddenly among her guests in his travelling costume, of which a postilion's cap was a conspicuous part, and of the rest of which a very large part was a pair of buckskin breeches, and a very small part was a short green jacket of great tightness. In sincere surprise at the sight of him, the abbé above-mentioned enquired of him if he really were the Robinson Crusoe so famous in history? In what edition of Walpole's letters M. Pichol finds this note he does not say, nor whether the editor who wrote it lived forty years before or forty years after the birth of the lady. However that may be, another correspondent of the Times offers other evidence of her want of brilliancy. Moore, the poet, when in Paris in 1821, dined with her, and in his journal speaks of many stories of her niaiserie as being current. Once, when she was asked what countrywoman she was, instead of saying, "Je suis des Indes," she said with truthful infelicity, "Je suis d'Inde" (dinde). Moore sat next her at dinner, and thought her talk silly. She indeed talked much of "Lalla Rookh," but that probably did not greatly elate its author; for the story of Robinson Crusoe he had heard as follows: Talleyrand one day informed her that Denon would dine with them, and bade her read up his little work on Egypt so that she might say civil things to the writer; he added that he would leave the book on his study-table for her. But it happened that when Madame went to her literary labor she found on the table a volume of Robinson Crusoe, which she proceeded to peruse with great attention, and at table M. Denon was hospitably pressed with questions about his afflicting sojourn on the desert island, his manner of life there, and so on. Not without perplexity, he made such replies as fortune favored him with, and only became fully aware of his position on hearing the princess's exclamation, "Eh puis, ce cher Vendredi!" which informed him that he was taken for "Robinson Crusoe," and the tale of Crusoe's adventures for matter of fact. "The Historical Characters," by the way, appears in this country as numbers 948 and 949 of the Tauchnitz collection. Talleyrand, whose life fills the whole of the first volume, appears as "The Politic Man;" William Cobbett is "The Contentious Man;" Canning is "The Brilliant Man;" and Sir James Mackintosh "The Man of Promise." The essay on Talleyrand seems to us considerably the best, but all are instructive, and writing more entertaining we have not lately found. The author speaks of having begun a good many other similar essays, and one on Sir Robert Peel he seems to have completed, and to intend publishing.

"OWEN MEREDITH'S" "CHRONICLES AND CHARACTERS."*

Some ten years ago M. Victor Hugo began a poetical performance characteristically large. It was nothing less than a poem that should paint the race "simultaneously and successively, under all its aspects—history, fable, philosophy, religion, science, summed up in one single immense movement towards the light; which should reflect in a sort of dark-and-light mirror that great image, one and multiple, sombre and radiant, fatal and sacred—Man." Possibly he owed his scheme to Eugene Sue's "Mysteries of the People." But that legendary romance was less daring in conception than the "Legend of the Ages." Sue intended simply to illustrate by historical examples the theory of history which we may suppose held by an angry, not too wise, much too amatory, humanitarian and socialist theorizer. Hugo's plan was as much less feasible than his as it is less easy to interpret all the history of all things in all past ages and the present age, than it is to distort some few particular passages in history. Mr. Robert Lytton has been seven years at work on his "Chronicles and Characters," he says; and he says, too, that it was "many years" ago that he first projected the work, but we fancy the paternity of the idea on which it is founded, or professes to be founded, is to be credited to the French poet. Not that it is a matter of much consequence; Coleridge, amid the exaltations of opium, never dreamed of a wilder literary impossibility than giving poetic unity to a vast mass of poems which should be a history of civilization past, present, and to come.

Let the poet be secured who possesses the universality of knowledge necessary for such a work, and let him also have the profundity of philosophy necessary for working in a field where and still our cyclical Poem of Man would be to seek. For our own part, we should be inclined to insist that, in addition to his learning and wisdom, the poet of such a poem should possess the gift of prophecy. For when is there that point of time at which the present seems the perfect; when it does not rather seem the past, as yet unperfected, formless, mostly unintelligible? If to this question the answer is, Never, and heretofore that has been the answer, the cyclical poem will of necessity be a poem with no end, utterly incapable of producing an impression of wholeness. The cyclical poet, writing at any given period, will find himself able to trace with certainty the meaning of history, as far down as to the point when the compends of history that he studied in school leave off interpreting, and very little further. Platitude and truism will beset him on the one hand, and on the other hand is the bewildering Present with the inscrutable Future beyond her. Platitude and truism, we say—for the universality of the poet's knowledge will, it is likely, be got at the expense of its novelty and freshness; the person who nowadays takes all learning for his province is sure to turn out a learned person of a very provincial sort.

> . . . "It tasks a century's search to espy > What oft a moment drops in passing by,"

But, granted the poet, there will then be need of a new made reader; not to say a new poetic art. For, as the readers of poetry go now, the cyclical poem, if it were to appear, would surely fail of appreciation. Just in so far as the individual poems comprising the series were good, would the attention be hopelessly drawn from the general scope of the whole mass and its leading idea, and the cyclical poem would be resolved into its constituent parts. Each individual poem would weaken the claim of the congeries by just so much as it, separately, had strength and value. The cyclical itself would have no chance of even momentary existence, except as the poems comprising it were devoid of life. But if the poems composing it were devoid of life, the cyclical would be dead already.

Mr. Lytton's work, to be read with any pleasure at all, must be read as a volume of pieces, each of which is to be judged on its own merits apart from its place in any general scheme. No one, we should say, will be able to discover other proofs that "Chronicles and Characters" is a poem of human nature in all its historic developments, than can be drawn from the fact that the author writes about many persons of many epochs. The political, the theological, the sociological student of mankind—any, whatsoever student of mankind—will turn to it in vain for anything like a complete, or even at all coherent, view of the development in history of the set of ideas in which he may happen to be interested. He will find certain commonplaces, expressed sometimes well, sometimes ill—the general reader's and shallow thinker's talk about this and that "representative man" or representative epoch, and he will find no more than this. If he does, he will find more than we have been able to find, and we have faithfully complied with the requirement which the author makes in his preface, where he speaks of that "patient perusal which he claims as preliminary to any final judgment of a work which has occupied nearly seven years of his life." Nor have we ever "held shares in any Joint Stock Company for the formation of Opinion with Limited Liability." If we know what such shareholding is, we are incapable of the action.

As for the reader of poetry, who forgets the ambitious plan on which Mr. Lytton wrote, or into which he fitted his pieces after they were done, and takes the poems as minor poems merely, we can promise him some, but not very much pleasure from a perusal of them. It is not using words unjustifiably harsh to say that modern English literature may be searched in vain for so systematic a borrower of other men's ideas and expressions as "Owen Meredith" was and Mr. Lytton is. Where he got the general plan of his work we have seen. In the separate chronicles we may see, further, that his habit of borrowing amounts really to infatuation. Apparently he takes because he must, and is regardless of detection. There are hardly fifty lines together in his writings that are not almost more noticeable as a specimen of plagiarizing than as anything else. From head to foot he is literally clothed with what he has filched from Mrs. Browning, Shelley, Keats, Tennyson, Swinburne, Robert Browning especially, and other poets almost innumerable. The "Gyges and Candaules" is one of the most successful pieces in the two volumes. It has, to be sure, no value which entitles it to one of the three places which Mr. Lytton devotes to Greek history; still, if the author had chosen to treat of the sequel of the tragedy, he might have illustrated the Greek notion of destiny, and, for the rest, the incidents of the fabulous tale are striking enough to account for his choice and justify it. But Mr. Lytton does nothing with the events consequent, or supposed to have been consequent, upon the folly of Candaules and the crime of Gyges. He merely makes an open and palpable imitation of Keats's "Isabella," taking parts also from Shakespeare's "Rape of Lucrece," or rather giving suggestions of that poem. "Opis and Arge" is full of Tennyson's "Vision," and Browning's "Saul," and the sort of "thoughts" by the use of which Mr. Lytton's father in his novels reveals himself to the young as a pallid but profound philosopher. "Thanatos Athanatou" is a hollow, windy, dramatico-lyrical poem, full of "voices"—"A Voice from the Temple," "Voices of Saints Arising," "Voices of Angels of the Watch," "Inorganic Voices," of "The Darknesses," of "The Silences," of "The Deedless Ones," and so on—and imitates Mrs. Browning's "Drama of Exile" and Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound." "The Apple of Life" is perhaps already known to our readers, for it has once before been published in this country. In that poem, also, there is imitation of Browning, "Saul" being used freely. Borrowing from the "Solomon's Song" is, we suppose, permissible; but it seems not well to put into the mouth of an Egyptian harlot words showing familiar acquaintance with peculiarly Hebrew ideas and localities. "The Trial by Combat" recalls two of Browning's pieces—"Childe Roland" and "In a Madhouse Cell." "Melancholia" was suggested by Albert Dürer's picture with that title, and is an attempt at interpreting its meaning—an unsuccessful attempt, which offers us once more that tiresome, false theory which sees necessary connection between genius and disorders of the bowels and stomach. "Misery" emulates—we do not know if we are to say copies—the squalid idyls of Mr. Buchanan, but wants the qualities which make the reader of Mr. Buchanan feel that the poet has himself been harrowed by that which he uses for the harrowing of the hearts of others. It recalls Sydney Dobell too, and is cleverly done. 'The Duke's Laboratory" imitates Browning's "Last Duke" and other poems of Browning's; "Atlantis," which is in praise of this country, in parts imitates Tennyson's verses beginning "Of old sat Freedom on the heights;" Tennyson and Browning appear in "Last Words of a Sensitive Second-rate Poet," and Browning is copied in "A Beaten Army." It is giving a specimen rather too obviously favorable to our own side of the case to offer in proof of the charge of imitation a stanza from this last-mentioned piece. But it is only to the too great obviousness of the imitation that a critic of our criticism could make any valid objection, and while we warn our readers that proofs of the author's borrowing are not in all cases to be found staring the reader so plainly in the face as in this particular instance, yet we affirm that proofs substantially as conclusive are to be found in each case which we have mentioned, and that there is literally no end to the proofs discoverable in the book, that Mr. Lytton is to be described as essentially an imitator, a more or less honest borrower, at the very best a most unfortunate unconscious plagiarist. This is the specimen; every one will recognize in it Browning's "Lost Leader" in another form:

> "We have struck our last blow, we have spent our last shot now,
> And we pour here in protest the last drops of life.
> All save man's honest right we have lost, they have got now;
> And theirs is the triumph while ours is the strife.
>
> . . . . . .
>
> "And so man puts upon us no claim to diminish
> Our claim upon God which is perfected thus:
> Here our least gain begins where their greatest must finish;
> They, the debtors to earth for what Heaven owes to us!" etc., etc.

"Orval, or the Fool of Time" we have not read. It is a social and domestic drama which, with the author's translations from the Latin, French, Italian, Servian, and Danish, follow the "Chronicles and Characters." Of the Chronicles and Characters it is true to say in general that Mr. Lytton covers more ground in them than he did in his works put forth under the name of Owen Meredith, but that the scope of his poetical talent appears no larger than it appeared before, and that he simply has made it more certain than before that his place is among the eighth-rate poets of the day in England.

INVISIBLE POISON.*

Not long ago we had the pleasure of noticing a little book by Dr. Winslow, on light and health, the object of which is to show the relations of the one to the other, and to point out the fact that in all large cities, by the crowding together of houses, and the filling up of open spaces, the health-giving rays of the sun are almost entirely shut out. We have now before us a work which treats of the relations of air to health, and of the general apathy on the part of the public in regard to the necessity of receiving pure air for vigor of body and mind.

All of us admit that pure air is conducive to health, but most are willing to put up with its absence till summer comes, when we can live with the windows and doors open, or can by a trip into the country neutralize, as many suppose, all the injury that we have suffered by breathing, month after month, day and night, impure air. Did people generally know what impure air is here in the city—in our houses, counting-rooms, lecture-rooms, churches, and places of amusement—they would certainly make a greater effort to avoid it; and, in the erection of all edifices, ventilation would be seen to as of primary importance, and not neglected almost altogether, as it is at present.

Our blood boils within us when we read of such acts of inhumanity as the imprisoning of one hundred and forty-six Englishmen in the Black Hole at Calcutta, a room eighteen feet square, and with but two small windows, and of the death, after terrible torments, of all but twenty-three in less than twenty-four hours; or of the suffocation of seventy persons confined below in a steamship, with the hatches down, during a storm in the Irish Channel some years ago. For the perpetrators of such deeds we think no punishment too severe, and yet many people treat themselves not very much better every day. They suffer from headaches and general debility, and their minds work sluggishly; but how often do they attribute all these to the impure atmosphere in which they live? How few realize that scrofula, consumption, and kindred diseases germinate and flourish in a confined air, and once having sprung up become almost ineradicable.

We are of opinion that much of this apathy or ignorance arises from the fact that many people believe carbonic acid to be the chief impurity in vitiated air, and that a gas which we can not only with impunity drink down, as in many mineral waters, but with benefit, cannot produce lasting injury though taken into the lungs. That carbonic acid is not the only poison in air that has once been subjected to the process of respiration, has been proved in various ways. In his admirable treatise on Hygiene, Dr. Hammond gives an experiment of his own, made for this purpose. He confined a mouse in a glass jar, so arranged that carbonic acid was absorbed by baryta-water as fast as generated, and fresh air was constantly supplied, and yet this animal died in less than forty-five minutes.

If carbonic acid is not then the only or chief cause of the impurity of confined air—air breathed over and over again in crowded rooms—what other source of poison have we? In the "Archives Générales de Médecine," for November, 1867, there is an article by M. Lemaire on "Miasmata of the Healthy Human Body." In the atmosphere of soldiers' barracks he found a host of living animalcules, such as bacteria, vibriones, ovoid monads, diaphanous bodies, and various other infusoria, which in the open air could hardly be detected. Whence came this life, and by what was it sustained? As minute particles of steel may be found in the air where the knife-grinder is at work, or as coal-dust mingles with the breath of the miner, or the ocean spray is carried off by the wind, and, even for miles inland, not only the salts of the sea, but all the minute infusoria and spores of plants found in sea-water occur, so the loose or decomposing matter along the course of the respiratory passage is breathed out and floated off into the air. Not only the cells which line the air-tubes are constantly being thrown off, like those of the skin, together with the remains of food lodged in the cavities of teeth in all stages of decomposition; but wherever there is ulceration or serious disease of the throat or lungs, pus cells, the débris of morbid tissues, and even the elastic fibres of these organs, are breathed out. If we would know what are the constituents, in a great measure, of the atmosphere of a crowded, badly ventilated room, we need only reflect that what each one does or might expectorate differs in no respect whatever from that which is actually with every breath forced out in the form of vapor. Filter such an atmosphere, and you may make a pill which no one would willingly take.

It is in the midst of this floating organic matter that the vibriones, bacteria, and so on, are developed with astonishing rapidity, and all combined are taken into the lungs and exert a poisonous influence, either by coming merely in contact with the moist tissues of these organs, or by passing directly through their thin walls and working as ferments, or in various other ways, on the blood. It is not only through the lungs that this vitiated atmosphere acts, but through the skin, and the popular fear of contagion, where there is disease of the external parts, as of the eyes, is without doubt founded in truth.

Besides the two classes of poisons to which we have specially alluded, existing in most crowded rooms, there are organic emanations given out in the sweat and from various parts of the body, some of which are quite characteristic, and a host of substances used as perfumes, hair dyes, and cosmetics. That some of the latter are injurious to the health from their volatile nature, is proved by their effect on the poor girls who are engaged in their manufacture. They lose their own "bloom of youth" whilst preparing it for others, and suffer with all the various symptoms of lead poisoning.

We might add greatly to this list of noxious elements which are poured out constantly into the air of all crowded rooms to be breathed over and over again, when there is not a proper attention to ventilation; but we certainly have said enough to satisfy all that carbonic acid is not the only impurity to be taken into consideration under such circumstances.

It is astonishing with what pertinacity the pernicious emanations of healthy or diseased human bodies cling to the furniture, walls, or bedding of rooms; and certain contagions will sometimes linger about a place for months. A ward in the New York City Hospital, where there had been hospital gangrene, is a striking instance. Though all the bedding and furniture were removed, the disease attacked other patients who were placed in it; and as whitewashing and thorough cleaning of the room were not found to be effectual in destroying the seeds of the disease, nor even the scraping off of the plastering, the entire walls were torn down and renewed before the taint was got rid of. Dr. B. W. Richardson, in his "Clinical Essays," gives an equally interesting instance of the kind. In the thatched cottage of a laborer in an English village, one of the four children was struck down with scarlet fever. The other children were immediately removed to a neighboring village, but after the lapse of some weeks one of them was allowed to return home. Within twenty-four hours it was seized with the disorder and died. The cottage was now cleaned thoroughly and lime-washed, and every article of clothing washed or burned, and four months elapsed before either of the remaining children was brought home. Then one child was allowed to return, but only to share in a few days the fate of the others. The doctor believes that in this instance the thatch was the lurking-place of the poison.

But, knowing the necessity of pure air for retaining health, it must be confessed that, in our large cities, with all our modern improvements to contend with, it is nevertheless a very difficult matter to obtain it. Most of our houses have running through them not only a system of pipes, unavoidably more or less leaky, for gas and refuse material, but also others for supplying each room with hot air from a furnace invariably imperfect. The cold-air box of this modern convenience opens, not infrequently, either into a damp corner, filled with rubbish covered with mold, or else on the street, on a level with the sidewalk, where the dust is drawn in to be aided in its decomposition by the heat of the furnace, and to be poured out with its gases into every room. The most careless observer must have noticed of what nature the dust of our thoroughfares is in the main composed We have only to give a glance at the rows of dirt which lie along the curb-stones or the basements of the houses on a windy day, to discover the particles of comminuted hay, oats, and straw which tell the whole story. And besides these indoor comforts, we have a vast net-work of sewers running through all our streets, and pouring out constantly streams of health-destroying gases and vapors.

But in spite of these difficulties, more can be done by the public and by the individual for securing for all a better atmosphere; and if Mr. Leeds's little book were carefully read by every one, we should in a short time have, at least in most of our houses, a great improvement in this respect. In these three lectures, delivered winter before last before the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia, it is shown that ventilation is not such a complicated scientific subject that only those who have paid special attention to it can understand it; but that all have it within their power, at little or no expense, to ensure a comparatively healthy atmosphere in their dwellings, even in large cities. The first lecture is devoted chiefly to considering the evils of foul air; and in the second and third the effect of heat on the movements of the air, and the various ways of constantly introducing it into our houses, are discussed. All is presented in a clear, easy manner, and many of the points are illustrated by striking but simple experiments. The book contains several colored diagrams, showing the movement of the air in rooms heated and ventilated by different methods; and we believe that no one can take it up without finding much of interest in it.

The Story of Waldemar Krone's Youth. By H. F. Ewald. Translated from the Danish. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—Waldemar Krone, the hero of this novel, is a Danish youth, whose character, had it not been conceived by a Dane, might be supposed to have been constructed with the design of confirming a statement of Buckle's, to the effect that the inhabitants of the northern regions of Europe, like those of the southern, "are remarkable for a certain instability and fickleness of character." Besides this central figure we have two heroines, one of whom regards Louis XIV. as the noblest person in all history, and who, after treating Waldemar with alternate warmth and coolness, finally discards him as the appointed time for their marriage approaches; and another, whose unfaltering devotion to the hero, from the first page of the book to the last, is in the end appropriately rewarded by becoming his wife. There are also an eccentric baron, two or three nobly descended and slightly tiresome old gentlemen, and a morose and man-hating infidel, who is left, in the last chapter, on the high road to more faith and better manners. The novel is not, on the whole, to be described as entertaining reading. We get from it almost no idea of Danish manners and customs, some account of which might have been interesting. The author was flying at higher game, and endeavoring to give his readers some notion of the interior life of his characters. Either his analytical powers are not very great, or he was unfortunate in his choice of subjects. If one did not cherish the theory that life amounts to pretty much the same thing under all circumstances, and that one has but to "suck the sweetness of those consuetudes that lie nearest," in order to find the appetite for sweets very well satisfied, it would be quite possible to draw from the "Story of Waldemar Krone's Youth" the conclusion that life in Denmark is rather slow. There remains the alternative of supposing that Mr. Ewald is no more to be credited with close observation than with critical insight—which alternative we propose, in the interests of the aforesaid theory, to accept.

A VOLUME FOR EVERY AMERICAN LIBRARY.

The undersigned have peculiar pleasure in announcing a new volume, by an American author, on American Ethnology.

The Myths of the New World.

A Treatise on the Symbolism and Mythology of the Red Race of America. By DANIEL G. BRINTON, A.M., M.D. 8vo, $2 50.

The author has, in addition to his own investigations, collected the most important results of previous American and European study, and, without slighting any scientific requirement, has presented the most valuable and profound conclusions on the subject in a manner to interest the unscientific reader. Table of contents sent on application.

WHERE IS THE CITY?

Israel Knight, a young man just approaching his majority, opened his Bible at Ezekiel xlviii. 35, and read, "And the name of the city from that day shall be, The Lord is There." Reflecting upon this, he said: "Oh! that I might find the city with that name!" The fact that, somewhere, there is a church, a peculiar people, whose name is rightly "The Lord is There," was impressed upon his mind, and he determined to search for it. In his "Way to the City" he relates his experience among the Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Quakers, Swedenborgians, Spiritualists, Universalists, Unitarians, and how he finally found the city with the name, "The Lord is There." The author writes in a very forcible and popular style, giving many "hard hits" in a good-natured way. This will secure him a large circle of readers, especially with all who are looking toward a visible unity of the Church.

In one volume, to match those popular books, "Ecce Homo" and "Ecce Deus."

The Week.

About the only thing accomplished by Congress in the past week has been the passage by the House of the joint resolution restoring North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, on Thursday, after one day's debate, by 108 to 35. Mr. Stevens got a special condition affixed in the case of Georgia, exempting debts to loyal men from a certain provision of the new constitution. Whether this will be more efficacious than the fundamental condition as to civil rights remains to be seen. Mr. Wilson introduced the same resolution in the Senate, but it was not considered; and the bill admitting Arkansas, though referred to the Judiciary Committee and reported back, got no further. In the Senate, too, Mr. Forney sent in his resignation, which Mr. Cameron would have accepted with alacrity, but which was laid on the table. The rest of the proceedings, in both Houses, related almost exclusively to impeachment. The scandal of the Missouri delegation's letter to Senator Henderson was very properly noticed in a resolution of enquiry offered in the House by Mr. Woodward, but rejected, first, on account of its form, and afterwards, when modified so as not to imply guardianship of the Senate, on account of its substance, by a party vote. It charged "an indecent and corrupt combination"—corrupting would, perhaps, have been a juster epithet—to influence the judgment of a Senator. But in the same session (on Saturday) Mr. Bingham was granted the new powers which he asked for the Managers, to enquire into the "improper or corrupt means that have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment." On Monday, Mr. Eggleston, with the approval of the Missouri delegation itself, proposed a committee for enquiry into the conduct of those gentlemen, and the House assented. Mr. Boyer failed to get in a seemingly equitable resolution that, for the purposes of the bribery investigation now devolved upon the Managers, their number should be increased by two taken from those Representatives who had voted against impeachment. In the Senate Mr. Buckalew made some effective remarks against the conduct of the House in undertaking to investigate the behavior of Senators, and in the course of the discussion which followed, Mr. Doolittle testified anew to the President's integrity, who, he said, in rhetoric a little out of joint, "has that which belongs to those who come into the world with their souls lighted up with the stamp of God, nobility, and honesty." Little else than brawling was done in the House on Monday—that little being the presentation of the reports on providing for the purchase of Alaska. On Friday the House listened with attention to a speech of Mr. Garfield's on the currency.

The Impeachment ended—we presume it is safe to say so—on Saturday, in the defeat of the eleventh article by a vote of 19 to 35. The eleventh article was considered the strongest, and was therefore submitted first as a test. Strange to say, it does not charge Mr. Johnson either with the violation of the Tenure-of-Office Act simply, or with violent language simply, but with having violated the act this year, "in pursuance of" certain declarations made in 1866. Mr. Ross, of Kansas, turned the scale in favor of acquittal, and has accordingly taken Mr. Johnson's place as "the greatest criminal of the age," Mr. Johnson being now in the second rank only, along with Trumbull, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, and the others. All doubtful senators appear to have been pursued relentlessly night and day during the week before the vote, and badgered about the verdict, probably often into a state of complete bewilderment. Accordingly, there are various stories as to divers promises made by Mr. Ross to vote on both sides, but it is, of course, pretty certain that most of them have no better foundation than expressions made use of to get rid of intolerable bores and secure a little repose for overtaxed nature. Still, as hopes were entertained of Mr. Ross to the last, his vote filled the impeachers with rage, and has, of course, also consigned him to "everlasting infamy." The only question now is how much he got for his verdict? Our opinion is that he got nothing—that he is so horribly wicked that he perjured himself out of pure "cussedness," thus showing that not only has he no regard for his country, but is utterly indifferent to the future of his family. He got one most amusing telegram before he took his final plunge into iniquity, announcing that "Kansas had heard the evidence," and demanded conviction. When one reads this, and thinks of the mental condition of the man, or men, who sent it, and remembers that the dissentient Republican senators have probably been receiving such telegrams by the half-dozen for the last week, and that General Schenck actually telegraphed to Rhode Island ordering a batch of them for special use in Mr. Anthony's case, one feels as if the Impeachment Trial ought to be dramatized, for it certainly would furnish the materials for what the play-bills call a "side-splitting farce."

This vote is generally considered as settling the fate of impeachment, although the court has only adjourned till the 26th instant, and the other articles are still pending. But they are cobwebs in the estimation of the impeachers compared to the eleventh, and therefore will, doubtless, not be pressed. There seems to be some infatuation about the matter still lingering in the House, however, for Mr. Bingham and Mr. Stevens have begun an enquiry into charges of corruption against the Republican senators who voted for acquittal. The latter says that "no one doubts that there has been somewhere great, manifold, deep damnation," and that "this"—whatever it may be—"is the greatest of all mysteries." He also added, in reply to an enquiry from Mr. Ross "whether senators would be justified in perjuring themselves for the purpose of procuring a conviction of the President," that "he di not think it would hurt them."

The subject was discussed in the Senate, some members thinking such an investigation by the House insulting to the Senate. Mr. Sumner defended its propriety, and in fact necessity, and seemed to feel very solemnly about it. He said, "They knew from the evidence" (the trial is still pending, be it remembered, and Mr. Sumner is sitting in it as a judge) "how utterly unprincipled and wicked the President is," and then went on to insinuate that there was no knowing what his agents were up to. He quoted in support of these insinuations an article from the World proposing to raise money to buy up for the President those Republican senators whose term was near expiring, and by way of deepening the horror of the occasion said "he understood that this paper had throughout the trial sustained the President day by day, insisting that he was not guilty." This was very shocking, but Mr. Sumner of course knows that in morals, as well as in law, it is worse for a paper to insist throughout a trial that a defendant is guilty than that he is innocent, and this the Tribune did, in Mr. Johnson's case, with a foulmouthedness and indecency the World has never approached; but not one word of reprobation has its conduct drawn from any Republican senator. A little sense of humor is not a bad thing for a politician, and it would not have taken much to prevent Mr. Sumner from treating the World's proposal seriously. An arrangement to bribe a senator is not begun by an article in a newspaper calling for subscriptions, and it is not respectful to the average Republican voter to ask him to roll his eyes in horror over it.

The torrent of vituperation directed against Messrs. Trumbull, Fessenden, and Grimes has ceased, owing to the indignation it has excited throughout the country, and the certainty it revealed that if they were driven out of the party they would take with them nearly everybody and everything that keeps it alive. In fact, if they and their friends were gone, the party would perish incontinently, unless indeed, like St. Denis, it possesses the faculty of walking about with its head under its arm. The party is now indebted to these gentlemen for one of the most brilliant incidents in its history, and one which reflects more credit on it as a party than any other. To have been able to keep such men in its ranks gives it a fresh title to public confidence, and their course will do a great deal to neutralize whatever bad effects the failure of the impeachment may produce.

The course of the Tribune in the matter has been thoroughly characteristic. It tried to disgrace the press and disgrace the country during the week, not only by attempting to convert a judicial proceeding into a riot of perjury and partisanship, but by holding some of the purest and most distinguished men in the country up to the execration of the world as scoundrels. It declared them "infamous;" insinuated that Mr. Trumbull had been bribed by the "whiskey ring;" and allowed its correspondents at Washington to sit in the gallery of the Senate and sketch even the personal appearance of Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Grimes in the language of mingled hate and ruffianism. The Brooklyn Union well says of a part of its performances:

> "The absurdity of the Tribune's article of this morning is only equalled by its atrocity, and that is unparalleled in Northern political journalism, or in civilized journalism anywhere."

And Harper's Weekly also truly points out how fitting a termination this is to the Tribune's course during the rebellion. "A soldier in peace and a citizen in war," it was timorous and vacillating while the cannon were sounding, and pluck and persistence were before all things needful. When peace was restored, and there was occasion for civil prudence, for caution, for reflection, and for intelligent doubt, it began charging like a fury, and with an apparent determination not to be taken alive. It has supported every bill and resolution, good, bad, and indifferent, that any Radical chose to introduce into Congress during the last two years, and has declared the passage of each one essential to the salvation of this afflicted country. It was opposed to impeachment while impeachment was spoken of as a judicial proceeding; but when it took it up, it apparently determined to "put it through" as a great "Wade movement," and pronounced anybody who refused to vote the eleventh article a liar and scoundrel, and proposed to drive out of the Republican party its most respected members. All this lasted till Saturday morning. On Monday the frenzy was apparently over, owing to the unmistakable marks of reprobation that were coming in from every quarter, and it retracted as regarded Messrs. Trumbull and Fessenden, and declared impeachment a mistake. It is almost cruel to comment on this extraordinary performance. It is decidedly humiliating to have to do it, and the only thing that makes it worth while doing it is that this remarkable paper is the apostle and guide of nearly half a million of people. But this very fact apparently makes it all the more reckless in the use of its peculiar weapons, and all the more impervious to all forms of attack except "stops." With a man who thinks folly can be turned into wisdom by getting a good many people to listen to it, there is even less use in arguing than with "the master of thirty legions."

If the vote on Saturday should prove to be the close of the impeachment business, it will leave two persons in a very awkward position: one is Mr. Stanton, the other is Mr. Wade. The impeachers have, in any case, virtually abandoned the article which charges Mr. Johnson with a high crime and misdemeanor in removing Mr. Stanton, and yet it was on the supposition that it was a high crime, and that the Senate thought so, that he agreed to "stick." If the Senate now refuses to convict on that charge, what is to become of him? As regards Mr. Wade, the failure would prove doubly unfortunate, inasmuch as there does not seem to be much disposition on the part of the Chicago Convention to nominate him for the Vice-Presidency—a fact which makes the crusade against Messrs. Trumbull and Fessenden look all the more sinister, and, in default of his accession to the Presidency by the sentence of the "High Court," he goes out of public life next year. We observe that Mr. Trumbull complains that the president of the Senate does not "see" him readily now when he rises to speak, a fact which makes us fear that the great man is in a bad temper.

A meeting was held in this city last week for the organization of a movement in favor of laying on import duties for revenue, and not for protection. It was remarkable for having a considerable number of speakers who have hitherto been prominent in connection with moral and social rather than financial reform properly so-called; and as some of them were D.D.s and others LL.D.s, the Iron Age blasts them utterly by printing their titles in italics thus, Doctor. Men who feel strong rarely call in the aid of typography to rout their opponents. But the new society will hardly accomplish more than the Free-Trade League has accomplished, which is very little, unless it devotes itself to the whole question of financial reform. Taxes might be laid on only for revenue, and the country not be a whit better off than it is now. The presence of the "Doctors" was to us a most satisfactory sign, as it shows that the philanthropic world is turning to new fields of labor; and there is no reason why its zeal, directed to questions of taxation, should not accomplish as much as it has in some others. Mr. Atkinson, who is not a philanthropist, made a very hard-headed and effective free-trade speech, and what was ominous, too, for protection, there was a force of professors in the audience. Protection is in fact losing, or rather has lost, all the colleges except Harvard, and nearly every young man one now meets is a free-trader.

Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, made, on Friday last, a speech on the financial situation which is very much too good to be allowed to be buried in the columns of the Congressional Globe. The Boston Loyal Publication Society, which is devoting itself now to financial questions, ought to rescue it and spread it broadcast over the country. We do not remember to have often seen a better specimen of clear statement or of happy illustration, and nobody who has yet spoken or written on this subject, as far as our knowledge goes, has shown a firmer grasp of sound principles. He argued strongly in favor of a settled policy of some kind as the first step towards a restoration of the currency to a sound basis, and drew attention to a bill introduced by himself in February, providing for the gradual redemption of legal-tender notes in gold, beginning December 1, at the rate of one dollar and thirty cents in paper for one dollar in specie, and gradually declining at the rate of a cent a month to par in June, 1871. The bill is, however, his weak point, for we do not well see why anybody should surrender his bills at 30 per cent. discount, when by waiting a few months he can sell them at par. Most of Mr. Garfield's doctrines have been from time to time supported in these columns, and they are, of course, in the main old ones, but they are the result of human experience tested by human reason; and his constant expressions of respect for these two great factors of politics, and the attention with which he was listened to, give us a fresh reason for believing that we are fast approaching the close of the War-Horse régime, and that the age of practical and instructed statesmen is at hand.

The majority of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs have reported in favor of the appropriation to pay for Aliaska. The arguments in favor of that course were ably presented by a correspondent signing himself "Y." in the Nation of April 30. The minority of the committee have also reported, alleging that as the Russian Government knew that the House had the constitutional power to refuse payment of the money before it completed the bargain, there would now be no breach of faith in not paying it; and that, in short, Aliaska is a worthless and troublesome acquisition. It ought to be said that, if there could be a case in which the House would be justified in withholding an appropriation, for money promised by treaty, it would be in a case like this, in which, at a time of great financial embarrassment, the Executive has purchased a tract of wild territory not contiguous to our frontier, possessing no extraordinary natural advantages, and which is sure to fall into our hands by the time it becomes worth having.

The Chicago Convention has met, and the nomination of Grant seems, at this writing, a foregone conclusion. In fact, the only fighting is over the Vice-President. Mr. Johnson's retention of the Presidential chair removes all danger of serious disturbance in the Treasury Department. Wade's accession would, as far as this is concerned, have been an unmitigated misfortune, as he is just in that particular stage of ignorance on economical questions in which a man is confident and obstinate. General Grant's choice for the Treasury would probably now be Mr. Holt, who, if he did not work miracles, would do what is in finance the next best thing—keep things quiet.

The New York Times discusses the question who, of the batch of "criminals" produced by the trial, "is the prominent, unequalled, unapproachable American criminal," and suggests a certain resemblance between Mr. Ross and Sennacherib, the Assyrian king. We have been considering the measure of criminality carefully ever since Mr. Boutwell compared Mr. Johnson to Verres, and are satisfied that the depth of a man's guilt can be got at algebraically. You can reach it either by weighing him or by ascertaining the distance he was from home when he committed his principal crime, or, as in Mr. Boutwell's example, by calculating the superficial area of the territory which was the scene of his misconduct. We suppose he ought to have his election between being weighed or having his distance from home computed. The original impeachers are of opinion that the personal feelings of the dissentients towards Mr. Wade influenced their votes, and ought, therefore, to be considered in estimating the degree of their guilt. We presume, however, that their feelings towards Mr. Wade were not stronger than Mr. Wade's feelings towards Andrew Johnson, and yet that did not prevent the "Old War Horse" from voting against the said Johnson, well knowing that the consequence of a verdict of guilty would be to put the said Wade in the Johnsonian shoes, and give him a large salary, a free house, plenty of rewards for his friends, and more friends than he has ever had in his life. Yet we have not yet heard Mr. Wade accused of corrupt motives. His vote was one of the most indecent incidents of the last shameful week. On seeing with what a brazen front he cast it, one can hardly help feeling amused by the pertinacity with which his friends have claimed for him the credit of a delicate determination to take no part in the verdict. Mr. Wade himself evidently has never been troubled with scruples on this point, though we confess we were cheated into the belief that he was.

It is now settled, by the Queen's reply to the address of the House of Commons, that she is not going to interfere in the quarrel between the Ministry and the Opposition, but will let them fight it out; and at the close, as her constitutional duty is, side with the strongest. Mr. Disraeli has apparently not the smallest intention of resigning, and does not appear disposed to try the chances of a dissolution until it comes next year in the ordinary course of things. In the meantime Mr. Gladstone is pushing on with the disestablishment of the Irish Church as effectually as if he were in office—perhaps even more so, as he is less trammelled, and has a less heavy burden of responsibility. The success of the Abyssinian expedition helps the Ministry, and yet does not, because it throws fresh discredit on the military system at home. The work has been done by an educated Indian officer with no connections to speak of, a kind of person whose successes are a kind of scandal at the War Office.

Barrett, the Fenian, who was the only person convicted of a share in the Clerkenwell explosion, set up a very good alibi, as alibis go, consisting of the testimony of several shoemakers and of an editor from Glasgow, who swore he was there on the day of the explosion. The jury did not, however, believe them. The evidence for the prosecution, as to his identity, was doubtful, of the three witnesses who swore to it, two having hesitated or changed their minds. He has been respited for a week, doubtless with a view to further enquiry. Burke, the ablest of the leaders, has also been convicted, and had a slight forensic scuffle with the judge before receiving sentence. At political trials in Ireland, when the prisoner is asked, after the verdict is brought in, what he has to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon him, an old custom allows him to deliver a gorgeous harangue, tracing the history of the country, with a suitable running commentary, from the landing of Strongbow down to the close of the year preceding the trial. Burke, it appears, showed signs of a desire to adhere to this practice, but it clashed with Baron Bramwell's notions of propriety, who lost his temper, and, having the gaoler on his side, silenced the prisoner on all points, except points of law. The impression left by the scene on the public does not seem to have been pleasant. All accounts from Ireland agree in declaring that the pending legislation against the Church establishment is killing Fenianism, and bringing the main body of the Catholics back to the paths of constitutional agitation. But it is not unlikely, on the other hand, that it will start and stimulate a large emigration on the part of the Protestants, to whom Ireland, with Catholic equality, will not be endurable.

It is very difficult to say how things are going in France. There is an incessant discussion raging about the probabilities of war, but the political condition of the country is curiously illustrated by the fact, that there are no data in the possession of the public for the formation of an opinion. The only source of information about it is the tattle and gossip of the hangers-on of the Tuileries and of the War Office. Fancy what a state of things this is for business-men! What makes it all the more embarrassing is that the Minister of State, M. Rouher, and the Minister of War hold different views—or at least express different views. M. Rouher predicts peace, but Marshal Niel says he is not so sure about it. In the meantime, there are now nearly 1,200,000 men under arms, and of course this of itself furnishes a constant temptation to fight.

The news of the success of the English Abyssinian expedition, strange as it may seem, has been received by the opposition in Paris as a piece of excellent political news, as it suggests a contrast with the Mexican expedition undertaken by France. To be sure, Theodorus was a much less formidable enemy than Juarez, but then the English had to penetrate an unknown country of peculiar difficulty, and make their roads as they went. However, as may be imagined, those who extract political significance from the comparison are not careful about making it very accurately or justly. The main point is that an enterprise undertaken by a despotic government in France against a distant and semi-barbarous power failed, while an expedition undertaken by a constitutional government against a somewhat similar enemy succeeded. The inference they suggest is obvious.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE RESULT OF THE TRIAL.

THE vote on the verdict, even if it has not resulted in conviction, has abundantly justified the House in impeaching the President. When thirty-five out of fifty-four senators pronounce him guilty, it would be absurd as well as unjust to say that there was not "probable cause" for instituting the prosecution, and one may take this view of the matter even after making some allowance for the influence of party feeling and political excitement. The trial of a President by the Senate for offences committed in the course of a long quarrel with Congress touching the limits of his power under the Constitution cannot be a fair one in the sense in which we speak of a fair trial before an ordinary tribunal, where the accused and the judge have never previously had any relations whatever. The Senate, being a branch of the legislature, must have many imperfections as a court of justice; to expect that it will not, is to expect that senators will prove themselves more than men. All the public can ask of them is that they will make all possible efforts to rid their minds during the trial of pride, prejudice, and passion, and govern themselves to the best of their ability by the law and the evidence. That in the present instance they have done so we have never seen good reason to question, and we therefore think their action a sufficient vindication of the action of the House in preferring the charges. One may still doubt the policy of its course, but one cannot accuse it of mere vindictiveness, or mere subservience to party spirit in pursuing it.

The failure to convict is to be regretted for several reasons, but that it leaves Mr. Johnson in the Presidential chair we no longer include amongst the number. In the first place, it is not unlikely that during the remainder of his term he will behave well; in the second, even if he should desire to do mischief, his powers of mischief now, as we have already pointed out, are almost nil; and in the third, if he should commit fresh follies and extravagances, although the scandal will be great, it will be more than compensated for by the fact that they will help the Republican party during the coming campaign. His last follies helped it materially in 1866. Moreover, after the exhibition we have had during the last week or two of the taste and temper of the men who would in case of his deposition have had charge of the Government, it is difficult to believe that the country would have gained by the change, and it is quite certain that the party would have lost by it, for it would have had to bear the burden of their indiscretions.

But the acquittal, although the largeness of the vote for conviction may justify the House morally, is not likely to strengthen the confidence of the country in the judgment of the majority. Moreover, it has some tendency to create a certain amount of confidence in the President's judgment. It leaves him less hopelessly in the wrong than he seemed six months ago, and it leaves him in possession of the honors of the field. His escape, to be sure, has been very narrow, but in politics, as in war, an inch of a miss is as good as a mile. He was, before the trial, in the position of a man whom Congress might crush, but would not; now, he is in the position of a man whom Congress tried to crush, but could not. It is certainly not Congress that has gained by this change.

The House, too, did not shine on the trial. It was not well represented. It tried hard to have the case tried on high moral grounds, or on grounds of general expediency; and yet it put in the forefront of its battle a lawyer whose opinions on high moral questions, or questions of general expediency, nobody heeds, and whose forte lies in his sharpness as pleader in courts of law, and whose want of manners, or rather want of decency, throughout the case gave the President a constant advantage, which increased up to the very last day. Moreover, the Managers were overmatched throughout in learning and ability. There is no use now in passing this over without notice. The contrast was patent to everybody throughout the trial, and was a constant subject of comment. What the Managers wanted in law and logic they had to make up by warmth of language; but this, though useful in a short case, is not effective in a trial protracted over several weeks, and before a tribunal of elderly men hardened to rhetoric, and in whom the fires of enthusiasm have long died out.

What has made the effect of acquittal most injurious, however, has been the conduct of a portion of the Radical press and politicians towards those Republican members of the court who were not satisfied by the evidence and the arguments of the President's guilt. To fail to convict at all was rather mortifying, of course; but to fail after having spent a week in holding the most honored of the party leaders, its wisest heads and purest characters, up to execration as perjured villains, is more mortifying still. Happily the great body of the party, certainly all the intelligent portion of it, and all its most influential and respected newspapers, made a determined stand against this amazing burst of folly, and thus saved the party from damnation—and, let us add, from well-merited damnation. For a party which coolly informs the world that its most trusted, longest tried leaders and counsellors—men honored for their learning, ability, and integrity—have committed perjury while sitting as judges in the highest court known to the law, and have accepted bribes from the "whiskey ring" as the reward of their baseness—as the Tribune and some kindred sheets informed the public every day during the past week about Messrs. Trumbull, Fessenden, and others—of course ought not to exist any longer. To vote its ticket after such a revelation would be a degradation of the deepest kind. It would be useless for the Tribune to assure us that all the other politicians of the party were honest except these. Nobody could be deceived in this way. Fancy following Messrs. Butler, Stevens, Logan, and Horace Greeley with implicit confidence, after Trumbull, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, Fowler, and Van Winkle had turned out shameless and corrupt scoundrels. The party would have had to be broken up as an abomination. No men in it have given such guarantees of honor, and purity, and zeal as the so-called "traitors." If these be false, it is imprudent to ask the country to trust any others the party can produce.

The more we look into this crusade against the fair fame of the dissentients, the more reason we find for feeling thankful that the main body of the party refused to share in it. As all our readers know, what brought impeachment down on Mr. Johnson was his violation of the Tenure-of-Office Act in removing Mr. Stanton and appointing General Thomas Secretary ad interim in his place. The other charges, including that of bad language in 1866, made in the articles, except the slender one of trying to seduce General Emory, were all brought before the House by the Impeachment Committee six months before the present articles were filed, were fully discussed, and it was solemnly declared by a large majority that they were insufficient to sustain a prosecution. When, however, he removed Mr. Stanton, the House agreed that he had at last done the deed which brought him within the meshes of the law, and voted for impeachment for this act, and in consequence of this act, and this only. Afterwards, and just before the filing of the articles, Thaddeus Stevens secured the addition of the eleventh article, which charged that the removal of Mr. Stanton was a high crime and misdemeanor, committed "in pursuance of" his declaration, made a year and a half previously, that "Congress was not the Congress of the United States, but only of a part of the States, thereby denying and intending to deny that its legislation was obligatory on him." The object of this article, therefore, was to connect the removal of Stanton in February, 1868, with a speech delivered in August, 1866; and this was an afterthought, too. It was not on this that impeachment was first voted; it was on the removal of Stanton taken by itself, as a violation in terms of a valid law of Congress. Now it is admitted that large numbers of the Republican senators would vote "not guilty" on the charge of violating the law in removing Stanton and appointing Thomas—that is, on the very charges which produced the impeachment. In fact, these charges, it now appears, are considered to have broken down in the course of the trial, so that a Republican senator may vote "not guilty" on them without laying himself open to the suspicion of corruption. Mr. Stevens, indeed, has declared that they have no weight; that the real weight is in his article; and his article was submitted first to the vote as the strongest and therefore the best test.

The position of Messrs. Trumbull and Fessenden's assailants, therefore, is just this. A Republican senator might say on his oath, and yet be an honest man, that the removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas did not constitute a high crime or misdemeanor; and he might say on his oath, and yet be an honest man, that the wild speeches of 1866 did not constitute a high crime or misdemeanor; but if he says on his oath that he believes the removal of Mr. Stanton in February, 1868, was not done "in pursuance of" a plan formed by Mr. Johnson in 1866, and of which the only evidence is a fragment of a stump speech made in that year—popularly supposed to have been delivered under the influence of whiskey—although Mr. Johnson has ever since gone on acknowledging the validity of Congressional legislation day by day in the ordinary course of business, he must be a corrupt scoundrel—bribed to violate his oath by fraudulent distillers. His guilt is evident; he is not only to be driven out of the party, but to be held up to execration as a dishonorable man. This is a strictly correct statement of the case. This is the charge against the dissentient Republican senators, and the whole of it. There is not nearly as much reason for suspecting a man's good faith who refuses to convict on the eleventh article as on the second and third, on simple grounds of evidence. The reason why the eleventh article has been made a test of morals is the will of the extremists. They choose to consider it so, and "there's an end on't." They say simply, "To this article we require your adhesion; on the others we give you your liberty. Vote it, or we blacken your character to the extent of our ability." We cast no imputation on anybody who voted guilty on that article; but we venture to say that the number of trained lawyers who could do so is small. Few, we venture to say, swallow it who have not worked themselves into the state of mental inflammation which seems to be endemic at Washington, and of which Mr. Boutwell offered such a striking symptom when he showed that Andrew Johnson's guilt was greater than that of Caius Verres by showing that the superficial area of the United States was greater than that of Sicily.

We believe, for our part, that the thanks of the country are due to Messrs. Trumbull, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, Fowler, Van Winkle, and Ross, not for voting for Johnson's acquittal, but for vindicating, we presume nobody but themselves knows at what cost, the dignity and purity of the court of which they formed a part, and the sacred rights of individual conscience. They have afforded American young men an example such as no politicians have ever afforded them in the whole course of American history, and at a time, too, when the tendency to put party claims above everything is rapidly increasing, and when we are adding to our voting population a vast body of persons on whom the great laws of morality sit only very lightly, and for whom party discipline has, of course, the attraction it has everywhere and always for those who have little other discipline to guide them.

The issue of the impeachment trial was no doubt important as regards the actual political situation; but the greatest of all questions for the American people is, whether amongst all the troubles and changes of this and coming ages the popular respect for the forms of law, for judicial purity and independence, can be maintained. As long as it can, all will go well, whatever storms blow; whenever the belief becomes general that a court of justice, and especially a "High Court," can be fairly used, whenever the majority please, as the instrument of their will, it will make little difference what its judgment will be or who fills the Presidential chair.

THE NEW CONSTITUTIONS OF THE SOUTHERN STATES.

The time seems close at hand when many of the Southern States, having complied with the Reconstruction Act, are to rejoin the ancient sisterhood. The votes upon the new constitutions have been scanned with only a passing interest, which has yielded to the more engrossing topic of impeachment; while the constitutions themselves, and the very important facts to which they bear witness, have been honored with a transient glance of kindly recognition by a few only of the many who should be their warm supporters at the North. While the Democratic press has dealt in wholesale abuse, most Republican papers have seemed by their silence to admit that they had no case, and meant to let the matter go by default. Yet, to the careful observer, the composition not only of the constitutions, but also of the conventions which draughted them, offers perhaps the most satisfactory proof yet obtainable from actual experience of the soundness of the policy of Congress. Not to leave this statement unsupported, we propose to bring together in a compendious form the results of a pretty thorough examination into these matters—results both interesting and valuable, and which can hardly fail to bring conviction in their train.

First, then, to show the component elements going to make up the conventions themselves. It is well known that their members were chosen by the combined votes of blacks and whites, without either educational or other proper restrictions—a system which, according to the Democratic soothsayers, is to inaugurate and for ever ensure negro dominance. The canvass on the part of the Republicans was active and thorough. The negroes were in the first flush of power, of the extent of which they were fully informed. Yet they used it in a manner and with a moderation which surprised many even of their admirers. Here are the statistics. In Virginia, North Carolina, and Mississippi the black delegates were outnumbered by the white "Conservatives," so-called. In all the States except Louisiana (where the yellow fever had frightened multitudes of whites from the State) and South Carolina, the black members were in so small a ratio as to be, by themselves, utterly powerless. Save in the two above-named States, the proportions ranged from a minimum of one-fifteenth in Arkansas to a maximum of about one-quarter in Florida. These figures certainly show that, however resolved any white faction may have been to represent the dividing line as one of color, no considerable number of the blacks pursued the same illiberal policy; an immense majority of them must have thrown their ballots for white candidates; and a not inconsiderable minority actually sinned on the other side, and conferred their suffrage on thorough-paced "Conservatives"—a technical appellation the force of which is well understood. To our mind this last fact appears a much sounder proof of the intellectual unfitness of the blacks for suffrage than any other charge against them which has yet been sustained by proof.

To epitomize any considerable number of these constitutions would, in our space, be quite impossible. We select, therefore, as fair specimens, those of Alabama and of Florida. Alabama was the first State in the field, with a constitution quite as Radical as any since published, and subsequently invested with a peculiar interest by reason of the struggle over its adoption, and the practical lesson taught by that struggle. Curiously enough, it differs very little, in most respects, from its predecessor, which was so satisfactory to its opponents. It is true that it establishes universal suffrage for whites and blacks without any tests whatsoever; but it is equally true and evident that the trial of this theory in the Southern States is now a matter of sheer necessity, which cannot be evaded; and this is the only radical innovation in the entire document, unless the formal abolition of slavery and the recognition of the supremacy of the National Government may strike some minds as such. In its other parts, all the topics of the old constitution are touched upon, and all the views and principles of the old constitution are fully retained; the two run in quite parallel and similar courses until the subject-matter of the old one is exhausted. Then, indeed, we find certain additions; but they are objectionable only on the ignoble basis of a systematic obstruction of all progress whatsoever in civilization. They lie mainly in Articles XI. and XII. The former of these is a very long and thorough series of enactments concerning education, establishing a most complete system of universal popular training, and providing ample sources of revenue permanently to maintain the same in vigorous working order. The latter creates a Bureau of Industrial Resources, with large powers and correspondingly extensive and important duties, among which are the discovery and investigation of all the material resources of the State, and the general diffusion of information concerning them, and also concerning improvements in machinery, agriculture, manufactures, and the like. The great majority of the persons framing this document were native Alabamians, whose lot had been, and was to remain, inseparably bound to that of their State, and whose honest object it clearly was to keep all of good that was transmitted to them from the past, and to engraft upon it all the improvements suggested by later years.

The constitution of Florida has more points of interest and novelty, and presents more matter for astonishment, than any of its fellows. In the convention about twenty out of eighty members were blacks. Yet the constitution probably surpasses in conservatism that of any State in the Union. A stable, and what is usually called a "strong," administration must, one would say, have appeared to these politicians to be the summum bonum. Thus, the governor and senators hold office for the unusually long term of four years, and the members of the Assembly for two years. The executive arm is further strengthened by the privilege of appointment, in conjunction with the Senate, to nearly every office of power, trust, or executive importance in the State. On the other hand, the Legislature is limited to an annual session of only sixty days, unless specially convened by the governor, when it may hold another session of twenty days. The governor appoints, and the Senate confirms, the judges, of whom those of the Supreme Court hold their position for life or during good behavior, and those of the Circuit Court for eight years. The customary Governor's Council or advisory board is, in this State, a cabinet proper, in which sit a Commissioner of Immigration and a Superintendent of Public Instruction; and to judge from the duties mapped out for this latter functionary, he will be the busiest and one of the most powerful officials in the State. Due provision is made to prevent bribery and tumult at elections; and principals and seconds to duels or challenges, and persons interested in any election bet or wager, are denied the right of suffrage. Neither was this convention slow to learn the lessons of the very latest passing hours of the age; they enact that officers may be impeached for "drunkenness, gambling," and "any conduct detrimental to good morals." Lastly, we notice the provision, which we have not seen in any other of these documents, to wit: that after 1880 the Legislature shall pass laws requiring educational qualifications in all persons voting for the first time after that date. While Democrats, who have probably never been at the trouble of reading this constitution, are loading it with unlimited abuse as the characteristic work of Radicals and demagogues, many Radicals, as Radicals, might criticise it with some asperity on quite opposite grounds; but we will content ourselves with showing the ludicrous impossibility which our opponents would find in making out a case if they would submit to the ignominious drudgery of discovering facts, and to the petty trammels of those facts when found.

One is irresistibly tempted to compare this constitution of Florida with that recently prepared by a purely Caucasian convention for submission to the people of this State. We are, of course, aware that the latter is not considered by the best of its framers as by any means perfect, or as anything more than the best attainable; but it is the work of white men, and of white men of whom a very large number doubted the propriety of ever letting negroes vote at elections, except under a property qualification, and this in a State in which nothing is required of electors of any other race except the possession of the human form and the male sex. Now, we are bound to say that, tried by any of the known tests—history, experience, or principles of human nature—this Florida constitution is not only a better one than the one we now have in this State, but, on the whole, better than the new one which, after twenty years of experiment, has been offered for our acceptance by the flower of the white portion of the community.

THE RAILROAD FRATERNITY.

The question of railroad management has lately attracted a large share of public attention. The great Erie quarrel, the New York Central monopoly, the various legal controversies arising from the doubtful action of several other companies, the violent fluctuations in the market price of many of the leading stocks, the repeated issue of large amounts of fresh shares by prominent lines, the awful accident at Port Jervis, and many similar events, have caused a great deal of enquiry, and nothing but the more exciting and pressing political events could well have stifled the general spirit of investigation.

To discuss the question intelligently, it is necessary to understand thoroughly that there are three parties in interest: first, the owners of the road, whether they be holders of bonds or of shares, who are believed to have something to say in the matter; second, the general public who travel and send freight over the roads, who are believed to have no voice or power whatever, but only a purse to deplete and a body to mangle; and third, that large class of individuals who, for want of a more expressive designation, are generally styled "the railroad-men." These railroad-men form a fraternity, a secret league, a united body, bound together by a bond, not acknowledged nor even fairly understood by themselves, but nevertheless real and substantial. This bond is none other than their acknowledged hostility to the general public and to the great mass of railroad stock and bondholders. The class of railroad-men consists of and comprises the great majority of the officers of all the railroads in the country, the presidents, vice-presidents, the acting directors, the engineers and superintendents, all the great railroad builders and contractors, the owners of rolling-mills who furnish railroad iron, the builders of cars and of locomotives, the land agents and land speculators, the great lobbyists and getters of land-grants and subsidies, the capitalists who advance the money, and the speculators who deal in the stocks. To these are added a crowd of hungry hangers-on, lawyers, judges, writers for the press, and petty politicians—the whole forming a grand army, or rather a series of grand armies, each under some tacitly acknowledged leader, all operating under the well-understood code of warfare known as railroad tactics; knowing no laws save railroad laws, and knowing these only to evade them; acknowledging no morals save railroad morals, something entirely apart from all other morals; all bound to live on the common enemy—the public, and to live well, and to accomplish it by the forcible or treacherous control of every highway and by-way of communication throughout the country. No generation of feudal barons in the fourteenth century were ever bound together by stronger ties of common interests than those that bind together the railroad-men of the United States in this nineteenth century of ours. No generation of feudal barons lived more openly or undisguisedly by force and fraud than do the railroad-men of our times. It is true the old barons ruled their countries sometimes well, more often ill, and hence may be thought to have done some good. But the railroad barons are also thought to serve the state by managing the railroad lines, and it is to the general prevalence of this belief, aided by their own audacity, that they owe their power.

To many readers this may seem a fancy sketch. But it is a simple statement of facts. There are unquestionably railroads honestly managed, and there are undoubtedly many honest men sitting as directors in railroad boards who are totally ignorant of the cheats practised under the shield of their honest names. But these are the exceptions, not the rule. Corruption taints the very birth of nine-tenths of the roads. The charter to build a road, however much needed by a community, is scarcely ever obtained without a great amount of log-rolling and generally of actual bribery. The charter, when obtained, has a cash value, and the men who own it receive from the company which is supposed to build the road a large amount of the company's stock for procuring the charter, in addition to the repayment of their actual outlay "for legislative expenses." The company thus starts with a portion of its stock given away before it has really come into existence. It has then to organize by electing directors. It is necessary to secure the services, or at least the names, of "prominent railroad-men" to give credit and standing to the enterprise. Neither their services nor their names can be had without payment. A number of shares are respectfully tendered to, and generally accepted by, each of them, and permission is graciously given to use their names as directors of the new concern. One-half or one-third of the authorized issue of stock is thus often disposed of without any "value received," before the existence of the company is made known to the public. And now the road is to be built. The "prominent railroad-men" introduce "well-known contractors," who undertake to grade the road—that is, to construct the road-bed and lay the ties—at a given sum per mile, and to take in payment the first-mortgage bonds of the company at seventy cents on the dollar, provided the company will undertake to "make a market" for the bonds. The price contracted for per mile is, of course, sufficiently large not only to secure the contractor against loss by the bonds not bringing the stipulated price, but also to enable him to divide the profits of the contract with the "prominent director" who procured it for him. Of course, no bargain to this effect is made; it is quite unnecessary. Among "railroad-men" of good faith the thing is perfectly well understood, and any contractor who failed to make things right with his friends in the board would be immediately denounced to all railroad-men as unreliable and unsafe, and would be for ever cast out from the community of railroad-men, and never be able to get another contract. The same course precisely is pursued with the contractors for the iron and for the engines and everything else, and when the contractors get through they have generally received a one-thousand-dollar bond, of the market value of seven hundred dollars, in payment of labor and material worth perhaps five hundred dollars, the difference going into the pockets of the various "eminent railroad-men" connected with the enterprise. In this way the company has contracted a debt of one thousand dollars for which it has received value to the extent of five hundred.

The next step of the board of directors is to comply with that part of their agreement with the different contractors by which they bound themselves to "make a market" for the company's bonds. It is here that the services of "eminent financial men" connected with the enterprise come into play. By dint of judicious use of editors and reporters, the public is gradually prepared for the appearance of these bonds in the market. One of the eminent financial men is the treasurer and bond agent of the road. He generally agrees to buy of the company a round amount of the bonds at sixty or sixty-five cents on the dollar, provided the company will not sell any thereafter at less than seventy cents. At the expense of the company the bonds are largely advertised, the advertisers generally paying for a liberal amount of editorial and reporters' puffing. Every director, every contractor and mill-owner, has an interest in praising and endorsing the bonds; they recommend them to their banks, their brokers, to the insurance companies and trust companies in which they or their friends happen to be directors, and they do so with a certain degree of good faith, for the bonds are as good as the generality of railroad bonds, and the price is sure to advance. In this way a certain amount of the bonds is placed upon the market, and actually sold at seventy cents on the dollar. The company then at a convenient moment discovers that the bonds are selling faster than the money is required to construct the road, and the price of "this desirable security" is advanced to seventy-five cents on the dollar. Of course the eminent financial men who bought the bonds at sixty-five cents, and their friends who bought them at seventy cents, have made a very good thing out of it, and are, of course, warmer friends of the road than ever before, and can safely recommend the bonds as an excellent investment. After a while it is rumored that the company is again selling more bonds than it wants, and that the price is to be still further raised. Of course it can never be known how the secret got abroad, but it is apparently well authenticated; those who are fortunate enough to be posted buy more bonds at seventy-five cents, and sure enough before long the secret is made public by extended advertisement, and no more bonds will be sold at less than eighty cents. This operation is repeated two or three times, or as often as the market will bear it, and the market value of the bonds is "made," as agreed with the contractors who undertook the building and equipping of the road.

The road is then rapidly pushed forward, and if it runs through desirable territory, and is carefully laid out and well and honestly built by the contractors, and reasonably well managed and run by the directors, and no one else allowed to pilfer from it, the chances are ten to one, such is the need of railroads in our rapidly-growing country, that the road may be able to pay the interest on its first-mortgage bonds and never belie the statements of those who sold the bonds, nor the anticipations of those who bought them. But it will nevertheless be true that the road will be mortgaged—and this is the case with nine roads out of ten—for more than double its real cost, and generally more nearly for three times its actual value. Unfortunately the probability is that the road will not be managed as honestly as it should be—the temptations to be honest are nowadays so inadequate, while the temptations to be a smart "railroad-man" are, under the circumstances, almost irresistible.

We have seen how a large part of the stock has been disposed of. It is in the hands of legislators, lobbyists, editors, of the original owners of the charter, the eminent railroad-men who form the board of directors, all of whom obtained the stock without paying for it, but all of whom would like to see the stock valuable and salable in Wall Street or elsewhere. As long as the road is mortgaged for more than its full value, and does not earn more than enough to pay expenses and the interest on its mortgage bonds, there can of course be no dividends paid on the stock, and stock that does not pay dividends, or is not likely soon to do so, will not sell for a great deal anywhere. Here is where the temptation to be dishonest becomes almost irresistible. If only one or two dividends on the stock could be paid, the stock would readily sell for fifty to sixty cents on the dollar, and prove a liberal remuneration to the holders for their services in getting the charter or in lending their eminent names to the enterprise. A dividend must be declared, whether earned or not, and the money must be provided, honestly if possible, but generally otherwise.

A road that is in fair running order can be kept in equally good order by the expenditure of a given percentage of its receipts, say sixty per cent. If less is spent on it, it will deteriorate a little, slowly but not perceptibly, save to the experienced eye. If a good deal less is spent on it, it will run down more rapidly, but need not necessarily become unsafe, unless the neglect is long continued. The commonest policy for raising the money to pay a dividend is to cut down the expenses on the road to the lowest possible limit, so as to make a show of increased net earnings for some months, boldly to assert that the road is making far more than its expenses and interest on its bonds, and then divide the surplus as a dividend upon the stock, which then immediately acquires a market value and enables the holders to sell out wholly or in part. It is evident that this operation cannot be repeated, for whatever amount has been cut down from the expenditures for repairs must very soon be put back into the road, and even largely increased, to prevent the line from going to ruin. The consequence is, that after declaring a forced dividend the road will be more urgently in need of money than ever before. If there are no more bonds to sell, money will be borrowed on the general credit of the road, and the money so borrowed will appear, if it appear at all, in the next annual statement under the heading of "floating debt," and will not be very readily understood by the majority of the outside stockholders. Or else, under the pretence of extending the line or laying a double track, or of otherwise improving the property, a fresh amount of stock will be issued and secretly sold to the unsuspecting public, who think they are buying the old stock on which the company has just shown its ability to pay a liberal dividend. In the meantime, the eminent railroad-men in the board who know that this additional amount of stock is about to be issued, and that it will, of course, depress the price, sell through their own brokers for their private account large amounts of the stock, and after the fresh issue has become known and the price depressed, they buy their stock back again for much less than what they sold it for. After awhile the credit of the road becomes so bad that it can neither borrow money on its credit, contract floating debts, nor sell more stocks or bonds. The road is then allowed to get into very bad condition. Port Jervis accidents become more common, the reputation of the line is injured, its traffic declines, its income is no longer sufficient to pay expenses and interest on its mortgage bonds. Then the mortgage is foreclosed, the property sold at auction; if fortunate, the road sells at its full value, the amount of the mortgage is not fully realized, and the millions of stock held by the unsuspecting public are swept away and vanish into thin air.

We have purposely painted in strong colors, but there is no exaggeration in what we have written. While there are many well and honestly managed roads in the country which will pay dividends, and earn them too, through panic, famine, or pestilence, there are many roads in a tenfold worse condition than anything we have described; roads whose colossal proportions will some fine day tumble about the heads of their owners with a terrible crash; roads whose semblance of prosperity has been barely sustained by the most able railroad tactics, during a period of feverish activity, paper-money expansion, and general well-being, but which cannot bear up under any long continuance of the present general depression.

As far as the evils under which our present railroad management labors affect the value of the property of railroad stock and bondholders, the remedy lies in the hands of the stockholders themselves. But the evils we have described have an influence on our national well-being far beyond what arises from their mere financial effects, and thus come directly and prominently within the sphere of practical statesmanship. Railroad legislation is one of the great socio-political questions looming up in the immediate future. It is a question not confined to our country alone; the same question is being actively agitated in England as well. It is, in fact, only one of a series of questions that are forcing themselves at this time upon the attention of all peoples of Anglo-Saxon race, and that will probably involve in their settlement some serious changes in the whole spirit of our domestic policy.

Probably no people of either ancient or modern times has given as complete a trial to the "no government" theory as that theory has received at the hands of the people of the United States. Nowhere has the policy of laisser aller had as full sway. Never has faith been more unlimited in the virtues of public opinion. Nowhere have equally magnificent results of private enterprise furnished illustration and proof of the folly of entrusting to governments what can be accomplished by individual effort. Yet with all this experience, with all this unlimited faith, amounting almost to a national principle of law, with all the resultant successes, there is, nevertheless, a growing disposition to return to the old-fashioned belief that, after all, government is not a bad thing in itself; that there ought, after all, to be responsibility attached to the actions of all men; and that somewhere the power must reside to enforce that responsibility. We are being gradually, not by theoretical arguments but by the invincible logic of bitter practical experience, educated to the conviction that public opinion, while immensely effective for doing evil, is, at times, utterly powerless for good; and each day now brings us a fresh example of the way in which great private enterprises, such as railroads, can be perverted into engines of the most tyrannical injustice, into means of gross official and private corruption, and into reckless instruments of destroying human life by wholesale. In England, where the "no government" policy has never attained to the same development as with us, the reaction has yet set in earlier, and for some years past there has been an active agitation of various practical suggestions looking towards an increased government control or a total absorption by the government of several important interests, notably life insurance, telegraphs, and railroads. In the discussion of these questions we are behind England, although everything indicates that we are rapidly travelling in the same direction; and it is safe to assert that, for the present, the "no government" theory has exceeded its tenable limits, and that we are at the beginning of a decided reaction. Only a few weeks back we had occasion to refer to a proposition for placing all the insurance companies under the control of the General Government, to be exercised in a manner somewhat similar to the present control over the national banks. Since then a bill has been introduced into Congress providing for the purchase of all the telegraph lines in the United States and for their management by the Post-office Department. And now we find, almost hidden amid the rank overgrowth of impeachment oratory, a resolution of enquiry into the condition of the railroads in all parts of the country. Let us hope that this enquiry may be the beginning of a thorough reform of everything that is objectionable in our present system.

MR. EVARTS AND HIS TRADUCERS.

When two or three Congressmen and several newspaper editors denounced William M. Evarts for acting as counsel for the defence in the late impeachment proceedings, spoke contemptuously of his services as a mere matter of "hire," called him a "hireling counsel," and accused him in coarse terms of betraying his party, we said to ourselves: "These are things which gentlemen do not say, and which no men say who comprehend the duties of a lawyer; let them pass." It was perfectly proper that honorable members who could enjoy the eloquence of Mr. Donnelly, and who have on more than one occasion made the galleries intolerable for ladies not hardened to Washington life, should be disgusted with Mr. Evarts.

But the Independent of last week, while devoting two columns to the extinction of Mr. Evarts, lays down a new rule on the subject of professional duty which calls for notice, because some simple people are likely to be deluded by it on a matter of even more importance than Mr. Evarts's reputation. According to this authority, Mr. Evarts might conscientiously "defend the lowest villain who ever stabbed a fellow-creature in a midnight brawl," and no one could censure him; but in "shielding a renegade President from the righteous and avenging judgment of the American people," he undertook a task "unpatriotic and base," "shocking," "indefensible," "disgraceful," and we know not what beside.

Whether rightly or wrongly, it is at least certain that the House of Representatives refused to impeach Mr. Johnson for anything short of a crime. He has been tried exclusively upon charges of misconduct which involved either the direct violation of a statute, or some grave moral delinquency. The Senate has not for a moment been called upon to investigate his errors of political judgment. The task which Mr. Evarts assumed, and which is so "shocking," "base," and "disgraceful," was therefore simply that of defending the highest citizen, in the highest court of the land, against charges of crime. If he had defended the lowest citizen, in the lowest court, against charges of the same character, or a thousand times worse, his act would be perfectly proper; but having done for Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, what he might without reproach have done for John Nokes, forger or thief, he is to be damned to endless infamy.

Perhaps it is we who are losing our senses; but if not, this is democracy run mad. Under such a rule the worst classes of society would be the most privileged. A lawyer must enquire, before undertaking to defend a party accused: "Is he sufficiently low, his character sufficiently bad, and his crime sufficiently great, to justify me in taking up his case?" Here, for example, in a neighboring city, an infamous and therefore influential politician is charged with murder. His conviction would be a severe blow to the political faction of which he is an ornament; his acquittal, by fair means or foul, a triumph for them. Yet no one will breathe a word of censure upon any counsel who may defend his cause. Mr. Evarts might do this with impunity. But if the accused is respectable and wealthy, and the crime with which he is charged comparatively venial, the question becomes a difficult one; while if he is at the head of the nation, the path of duty is plainly in the opposite direction.

Not content with denouncing the act of Mr. Evarts in general terms, the Independent joins in the vulgar assertion that he sold his opinions for hire, and even specifically charges him with being "bribed." It is a matter within our own knowledge that Mr. Evarts lost more than thrice the annual income of any ordinary lawyer by attending the impeachment proceedings; in other words, that he declined business vastly more remunerative, for the sake of conducting Mr. Johnson's defence; and, moreover, that Mr. Evarts has received no fee whatever for conducting it. This is a fact which Mr. Evarts would not condescend to state himself, and one which we should not be at liberty to mention had we learned it from him. We are almost ashamed to defend him at all against such coarse imputations; but unfortunately many well-meaning persons are deceived by them; and we must take this liberty with private affairs for the purpose of vindicating not a single member of the bar, but the whole bar itself—the profession upon whose independence, honor, courage, and zeal the whole world must rely for the security of justice.

Setting aside all insinuations of this unworthy character, there remains among many good people a vague impression that lawyers cannot act conscientiously in defence of clients whom they believe to be wrong. This impression naturally leads to a belief that lawyers must necessarily be dishonest, since they cannot always choose the side which they believe to be justly entitled to success. Every lawyer knows very well that this is an erroneous view. There is scarcely any case presented to the courts which has not two sides, for each of which a great deal may be truly said. And it often happens that a cause which the lawyer employed in it believes at first to be unjust, eventually proves to be a just one. We have known some very marked instances of this kind in which, if the lawyers employed had acted upon the popular theory of their duty as honest men, they would have committed a gross wrong.

It is the business of a lawyer to collect all the facts and the law which tend to favor his client, stating nothing untruly, but stating only his client's side of the case. It is the business of the judge, after this has been done on both sides, to decide upon the whole case, and the more thoroughly both the opposing advocates do their duty, the more easily can the judge ascertain what is exact justice.

This duty every lawyer owes to every citizen who desires his services. Eminence in the profession only increases the obligation of a lawyer to take every case which is offered him upon his usual terms, and to the extent of his physical power. Men like Messrs. O'Conor, Evarts, Field, Stanbery, and their compeers have no moral right to refuse their aid to political opponents, when tried before courts of justice. Suppose that when, in times not long passed, Wendell Phillips was indicted for conspiracy to rescue a fugitive slave, all the lawyers of Boston had refused to defend him, on the ground that they thought him to be an enemy of the Republic, what would the Independent have said of them? Suppose (as was nearly the case) that when John Brown was brought under "the righteous and avenging judgment of the people" every lawyer in Virginia had refused to defend him, would not another indignant protest have made its way into Mr. Phillips's orations? Yet every lawyer in Virginia was as thoroughly convinced of the guilt of John Brown as any editor now is convinced of the guilt of Andrew Johnson. And the political necessity for conviction in the former case was tenfold greater than in the latter.

It is said that Mr. Evarts was required to render a political service. This is entirely untrue. His services were purely legal. The only value of his political status was in the guaranty which it afforded of such caution and impartiality in his statements as would secure for him a respectful hearing at the bar of the court. This was of immense value, undoubtedly, but it was an advantage to which Mr. Johnson was entitled, and which could do no injustice to the prosecution. In spite of the confident assertions to the contrary, made by editors who do not understand the men, we have no doubt that William Curtis Noyes, if living, would have done exactly what Mr. Evarts has done, and that Charles O'Conor would have done the same thing for Abraham Lincoln, if he had been called upon to do it. We should lament the decline of professional honor at our bar if we believed that its leaders would refuse, under the influence of political prejudice, to perform their legitimate duties.

THE DUTY OF DOING ONE'S BEST.

THE "elevation of the masses," that is, the diffusion amongst them not only of political power, but of such material comfort and intellectual light as our civilization supplies, having become the great work of the day, it is curious to see what a rush there is into it, and what an effect it is producing on literature and science and art. Until the close of the last century literature existed only for scholars, and literary works were marked by a polish and elaboration which, as critics are constantly informing us, have almost entirely passed away. Afterwards writers addressed themselves to the upper classes, people of sufficient wealth to have plenty of leisure, and sufficient taste to make it necessary to take some pains in supplying wares to them, although they were not as exacting as the readers of Milton and Clarendon's day. But now nearly everything that leaves the press is intended for "the million," or, if it is not, it is very soon adapted to "the million" by the issue of abridgments or of "people's editions." The supply of the wants of "the million" is proving a more attractive field both for capital and for inventive genius than any other. Two-thirds, at least, of the brain power of every civilized community is absorbed in the simple work of cheapening things—of finding out ways and means of placing them within the reach of a greater number of people. This is true of nearly every branch of industry; but it is doubly true of literature. There is, perhaps, no field of industry in which so great an effort is now made after diffusion. Periodical literature is the principal product of this effort; cheap publications of all kinds form another. But cheap publications were common, and the taste for reading widely diffused, for many years before much pains was taken to improve their quality. Scholars and literary men of the best class long held aloof from them. Even the newspapers for many years after they had come into general use were for the most part filled by persons whose follies and ignorance have left a stain on the press which, in spite of its prodigious improvement in every respect, it has not yet succeeded in wiping out. The monthly magazines were, until very recently, few in number, and their circulation was comparatively limited, and they were not intended to be and did not succeed in being popular, in the more recent sense of the word. The cheap weeklies, of the class of which Chambers's Edinburgh Journal was the prototype, until very recently had no contributors who had made any figure in any other field, or were capable of any other kind of work.

Of late, however, a determined effort, and in a certain degree a successful one, has been made by publishers on both sides of the water to get writers who have already achieved renown as authors, or orators, or politicians, or philosophers to contribute articles on all sorts of subjects either to widely-circulated periodicals or to books intended to be popular—that is, to be bought and read by persons of limited education. In England the monthly magazines are now so numerous and so cheap that they can no longer be called a middle-class luxury. They are in everybody's hands; and although there is a very fair amount of really careful writing in them by persons who have something to say, and only speak about what they understand, the competition between them is so great that they are being forced into supplementing the indispensable serial story by the use of "names"—that is, the publication of costly but worthless articles written by persons of high repute for other things than magazine writing. Tennyson has been recently writing something under this head which we are afraid to characterize. Gladstone has been discussing "Ecce Homo" also in Good Words, a cheap religious periodical of wide circulation.

In this country the practice is still more common. The New York Ledger may be said to have begun it by getting Edward Everett to write a series of papers on all sorts of subjects; but after that it spread rapidly. There is hardly a man of eminence in the country, who has any facility in composition, whose contributions may not now be found either in religious newspapers, cheap periodicals, or the books got up to be peddled in the country districts. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred these contributions are below criticism, and are, in fact, too bad to be of much service to any human being. They are apt, too, from the necessities of the case, to treat of subjects with which the writer possessed no familiarity, and, to do him justice, with which he does not profess to have any familiarity. The publisher wants his name for his advertisement and his title-page, and he and the publisher together work themselves up into the belief that anything from his pen must do service to people who do not read much, and who, on account of his reputation, will pay attention to what he says—whatever it may be. The writer, too, being human, and generally in want of money surrenders readily to the plea that in this democratic age it is the duty of the highly cultivated to spread the results of their culture before the multitude; that the great work of our day is the diffusion of knowledge; and that none can do this so well as those who have been most successful in accumulating it. As soon as your professor or "belles-lettres scholar" hears this, and learns that by contributing a short treatise on early rising, a little blast against tobacco, or an analysis of the waters of the Dead Sea, with his name attached—for the name is even of more consequence than the article—he will not only receive a hundred dollars, but be entitled to the credit of having given one turn to the crank of modern civilization, he sits down and "strikes off" his piece with infinite relish. In fact, some men are now doing so much of this sort of work that it must, and does, make serious inroads on their time, and of course the result, in aught but money, must perforce be left to the imagination.

Of course there is a very large body of writers for popular periodicals and for book-peddlers' literature who, in doing this, are doing what they are best fitted for, and on whom therefore we simply bestow our blessing. Our object in touching on the subject at all is not to upbraid them with the poor quality of their wares, but to suggest to men and women who have made their names worth buying by achievements of real value, the possibility that when they are scratching off slipshod contributions, either on subjects which they only understand very imperfectly, or on which their say is not a whit more valuable than the say of hundreds of their neighbors, who are capable of nothing better than treating it, they are not doing their duty. We doubt very much if any man who has closely examined the needs and tendencies of modern democracy is not satisfied that what it wants most of all, and is likely to want, is not diffusers so much as accumulators; that its danger is not that the intellectual or moral wants of the many will not be satisfied, but that their cravings will not be intense enough, and their standard not high enough. Of diffusers of knowledge there is not the least chance of a scarcity. One of the first things that everybody does who feels the least leaning towards literature is to seize on some other man's ideas, and, having watered and otherwise disguised them, to hawk them about for sale. In this, as in most other branches of industry, there is a perfect glut of middlemen or distributors, and the work is certainly done passably well. When a publisher wants, for instance, for a book to be sold by agents, a chapter on the domestic life of Queen Elizabeth, or on the noses of eminent statesmen, there is no reason whatever, as far as the quality of the article is concerned, for his procuring it from Mr. Motley or Chief-Justice Chase. The first lively "magazinist" of his acquaintance will do it just as well—in fact, we make bold to say considerably better—so that the masses will not suffer by the compiler's being utterly unknown to fame, and never having done anything to entitle him to be known.

But what the publisher wants is the name. True; but should the author lend him his name? No; for two reasons. If the name is intended to make that salable which would otherwise be unsalable, by leading people to expect the commodity to be of a higher quality than it really is, the use of it is a fraud, to which the owner should not lend himself. If, on the other hand, the work can be just as well done by some other person as by the owner of the name, and the owner of the name can do some other work much better, he is cheating the country and the race by not doing the latter. This brings us to the pith of our argument. We believe it to be the duty of every man to do his best, and his best only, and his best always, and we believe that it is by doing this that he renders most service to humanity, and does most for the elevation of his own character. There are cases, of course, in which men of extraordinary powers and acquisitions can not so well place the results of their labors before the general public as through the instrumentality of their own tongues or pens. Agassiz, for instance, is one of these, and therefore he is doing his appointed work not less on the platform than in the museum or laboratory. And generally wherever anybody, no matter what his attainments are, has extraordinary powers of statement or elucidation, combined with mastery of a difficult subject, his place is in the forum no less than in the closet; he ought to be found in the "enterprising and entertaining weekly" as well as in the ponderous folio. But when a man who is passably at home in political economy and jurisprudence, and whose researches on these subjects are of real value to the world, tries to persuade himself that he can do good by laying down his regular pursuits to occupy himself with writing articles on market-gardening, he deludes himself. Or if an astronomer of celebrity should undertake a series of papers in a Sunday-school magazine on the Milky Way, he would certainly be guilty of great waste of time, and of waste of very valuable powers. Instead of helping the race, he would be injuring it. There is no saying one hears oftener than that all labor is honorable, and there are few sayings more fallacious. All labor is not honorable. Labor is honorable only when it is the best labor of which the person engaged in it is capable, and when the doing of it is imperative. Moreover, all labor is not always honorable in the same degree even then. Nothing but a total want of respect for and appreciation of the human mind—the greatest of God's works—will lead anybody, for example, to place a manual employment on the same level in dignity or respectability with an intellectual one. A man grooming a horse, though he were doing it with all his soul and for God's glory, would not be doing as honorable a work as a man who was calculating an eclipse. There are degrees in the value of labor, as well as in the value of human beings. The meanest and poorest of human beings has something in him worthy of respect; the lowest kind of labor, if done in the right spirit and for the right reason, is honorable; but a noble and pure and cultivated human being is more valuable, judged by any standard, than any other, and the more exertion of the human faculties is involved in any employment, the more respectable will it be. So that if we saw Sir Isaac Newton taking a quarter of an hour from the "Principia" every morning to black his boots, the proper remark to be made would be not, "What a fine fellow Sir Isaac is!" but, "How can Sir Isaac be so silly? he can get his boots blacked for a trifle by a man who can do that better than he, and who can do nothing else."

The work of civilization—that is, the work of making the human race wiser and happier—is best done, like all other work of difficulty and delicacy, by a division of labor, and the more the labor is divided, the better will the work be done. Naturally, as civilization advances, it is divided more and more, and this division, were men wise, would be regarded with nothing but satisfaction. The whaler, who passes his prime in frozen seas storing up oil for the scholar's lamp, gains, and his children gain, by the scholar's researches. He loses, and his children lose, if the scholar uses the lamp to light him in making pantaloons. So, also, we are all gainers by having Chief-Justice Chase attend closely to the decision of contested suits in the Supreme Court. When he left the bench a year ago to teach negroes their duties under the Constitution, we were all losers, because that work could have been done by others. When, too, a good historian and an erudite professor occupies himself in writing entertaining twaddle or easily collected information for a speculator's book or for newspapers, he for the time being quits his post and leaves a portion of his real work undone.

Moreover—and this consideration is perhaps a higher one than the consideration of what a man owes to the rest of the race—every one owes it to his own character to do everywhere and at all times his best. His best will, of course, vary in excellence, and there are times when one is incapable of doing anything well, and when, nevertheless, it is imperative that one should keep working; but if we have to do bad work, it ought to be in our own line, and in the presence of familiar standards. If a minister must twaddle, let him twaddle in his own pulpit, with all his excuses in the way of weariness, or anxiety, or natural deficiencies ranged around him in their places. If the lawyer must talk slipshod folly, let it be in court, where there is some chance of its furthering the cause of justice or helping his own interests, and where he will, at all events, be conscious of his shortcoming, though it be in never so slight a degree. When a great author or statesman feels the need of putting down some crude thoughts or ill-digested information on paper, let it be in his own memorandum-book, so that it may serve afterwards for suggestion, for reproof, or for instruction. But do not let any one cart the stuff down into the forum, and call the people about him and say, "I am the well-known Robinson; my regular business is teaching school, but I have felt that the world would be the better of it if I made a few pairs of boots. Here they are; outwardly they do not look as good as if they were made by a bootmaker, and I doubt if they are as good for ordinary uses. Still there must be some virtue, surely, in boots made by a teacher, and I recommend you to purchase them and see. You will, at least, find them interesting." Now, not only does this performance lead Robinson's friends and pupils to doubt whether there be such a thing as excellence attainable in any vocation, or, at all events, whether absorbing devotion be necessary to attain it, but it leads Robinson himself to feel that all things are possible to him. When his man of business tells him the boots have gone off like wild-fire, fifty pairs a day, he naturally begins to consider himself equal to anything; instead of growing in modesty he grows in confidence, and his last end, instead of being better, is worse than his first.

MONEY AND THE MINISTRY.

To the Editor of the Nation:

I am a minister's daughter, grand-daughter, wife, and so on, through almost every shade of clerical relationship and connection.

From an early age (say my sixth year, when I was presented with a pair of No. 7 ladies' kid gloves—black at that, if bitter memory does not mislead me—in which my little claws were, perforce, sheathed every Sunday, in certainty that should the donor, whose pew adjoined the minister's, miss the grateful vision of ten limp finger-ends dangling abjectly to his honor, it would be a casus belli in the parish) I have intended to publish, the day before my death, a folio containing some of the things I have wanted to say, but have been prevented from saying by the fact that I was in the ministerial succession. But the date of this prospective issue being uncertain, I venture to speak now on a single point of interest to minister and parish.

The majority of the laity, and here and there a clergyman, deprecate the mention of money in connection with the relationship between pastor and church. It is, forsooth, so unique, so sacred as to be out of the range of the vulgar considerations of prudence, humanity, and common honesty.

I have heard of an enfranchised clergyman acting as a member of an ecclesiastical caucus which was discussing, among other items, the annual stipend to be paid a new pastor, who adjured the session never to believe that the amount of salary they should offer would influence in any degree the decision of the favored candidate. But why should it not? The subtraction of a very few hundreds—in some instances, of a few tens—may make all the difference between an anxious, constrained life and a life sufficiently free from care to secure independence of spirit, the easy working of the mind, proper provision for the physical necessities of a minister and his several dependents, with the privileges of charity, and now and then a mite for art and letters.

Indifference on this point is not a badge of spiritual exaltation, as many maintain, but the contrary. Hear St. Paul: "If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith [not glorified it], and is worse than an infidel."

The publicity of the life of a clergyman and his family requires no proof. The sanctities of birth, marriage, and death, when known to be, or to be anticipated, beneath his roof, are sanctities no longer. The last farthing of detail is rigorously exacted for common circulation in the parish, and any reluctance thereto is ascribed to a sinful pride or want of confidence. "He don't seem to throw himself onto the parish," was one of the graves charges which a disaffected faction in a certain church were able to bring against their young pastor. He had done his work bravely and devotedly, as all admitted, but too reticently for their liking. They wanted to hear from his own mouth just how many pounds of flesh he was losing weekly in their service, and how many pounds he had not bought in the market which he needed to have bought; and had they heard these and other like pathetic statements from his trembling lips, they would doubtless have made up a purse which would have figured in the columns of a religious paper among the "Sunny-side items." Heaven destroy the mark!

The extent to which a minister is required to "throw himself onto the

SPECIAL NOTICE.

HAVING changed their mode of mailing the paper to all except New-York City Subscribers, who will continue to be served by carriers, the Publishers of the Nation wish to call attention to the meaning of the printed labels substituted for the previous written address.

These bear not only the Subscriber's name and post-office address, but the date to which he has paid for his paper; and the change in this date will hereafter be a valid and sufficient receipt for moneys sent in renewal of subscriptions. From them is apparent, at a glance, the precise relation of the Subscriber to the Publishers, and the latter would express the hope that arrears as soon as revealed will be paid up. When the label antedates the current issue of the paper, it may be regarded as a bill.

Any errors which may be observed in the address, and any discrepancies between the account on the label and the last receipt of the Publishers, should be promptly pointed out to them for correction; as well as information given of any undue irregularity in the mailing.

Money should be sent, when possible, by money-order through the post-office.

parish," in many cases, may be guessed from a single example: A young clergyman had just buried his young wife. In the early freshness of his grief he was waited upon by one of his deacons, with the announcement that Brother Smith had left his church and gone to the Methodists, "and Brother Smith does say that you—his own minister—have hurt his feelings so that he never can get over it." The tender-hearted shepherd was touched by this imputation and eager to atone to the aggrieved sheep for any unintentional wrong he might have done him.

"So up he took his little crook, Determined for to find him"— which he did, sulking over some job of his trade of house-carpentry.

After an expenditure of much affectionate entreaty and skilful cross-questioning, the minister elicited the following: "Well, the fact is, I knew there was n't much chance of your wife's getting well, and so I went to work two or three weeks before she died, so as to have it all ready, and made just the prettiest coffin for her that ever was turned out in this town. I 'd took her measure a hundred times sitting right back of the parson's pew, you know. I did n't say nothing about it to you beforehand, 'cause my woman had a notion it would sort o' cut you up. I do n't know why, but when I heard that you 'd telegraphed to Boston for one of them new-fangled burying concerns, I must say I felt as if I could n't set under your preaching no longer"—and "set" he did n't.

But offensive and torturing as the house-top proclamation of a minister's domestic concerns and most sacred interests may be, I desire that it may continue, and, if necessary, increase, till the obtuse majority shall perceive the absurdity and the wickedness of "settling a minister" upon an inadequate salary, to be, at the best, eked out by gratuities and hap-hazard "donation-parties," and supplemented, by way of a sop to conscience, by a subscription to the fund for superannuated clergymen and the widows and orphans of clergymen. Let not only the amount of each minister's salary be published abroad, but also the rates of house-rent, domestic service, schools, markets, etc., etc., in the town, and the income-tax of his parishioners. If he has incurred debts for his education, his library, the recovery of his health, give them the benefit of printer's ink. Recently in a country parish near us a clergyman actually offered his entire salary to any householder among them who would board him and his small family. As no one was willing to do this for the sum offered, I suppose the mercenary creature either took a clerkship or went to some more remunerative parish.

If any minister is the recipient of a donation-party, "surprise" or otherwise, let all its items appear, prefixed by a statement of just how much of the salary was over-due at the time of the free-will offering; how much money was jingled in the wincing pastor's ears by the jocose brother appointed to the presentation; how many of the "material comforts" remained undevoured or unmussed after the sated flock had departed; how abundant and how suitable to the average taste of cultivated men and women were the odds and ends of apparel and ornament left behind. And yet by no alchemy of print or photography could that be reproduced which often transforms gifts, in themselves desirable, into an insult and a curse. I mean the tone, the accent, the general expression and intent of the giver—this indelible impression is the one secret of many a minister's life.

How would you, who are a merchant, receive a company of your most obstinate debtors who should "surprise" you some evening by assembling at your house with the gifts of a few dollars, a few eatables (I am assured by a truthful friend that her father received during one week of a depressed pork season fifty spare-ribs), a light-blue dress for your brunette wife, and a bizarre hat for your dainty little daughter, "The Prince of the House of David," and a few other works of like inspiration, for your library, etc., etc., and all offered as so much supererogatory charity—the mere overflow of beneficent souls upon whom you had no claim? Why, if you were a poor man, and had no expectation of justice from them, you would—at least after a little experience—receive them as many a minister is obliged to do. Those few dollars are little compared with the man's rightful due, but they may purchase a new life-lease for his worn-out self or his wife, or supply some absolute need. He learns to bow his thanks courteously, and tell his thoughts to no one but his God.

But these gratuities are often given in earnest affection, and with gracious delicacy—this I can testify after much experience and observation; but better far that they should be rendered needless and unknown. A gift from friend to friend, be he minister or layman, is one thing, and a gratuity from parishioner to pastor quite another. Let the salary itself frankly express all that the parish are able to do for the man of their choice, and let him buy his own food and clothing, manage his living, and bury his dead how and where he please, with no restrictions save those which bind any Christian man, and let him do something (more or less as the parish and he are able) to provide for the future of his wife and children, which every man who is a man claims as his right and privilege.

Having entrusted to a man the cure of souls, you surely can trust him not to waste his substance in riotous living.

Not long ago a distinguished layman closed an eloquent remonstrance against the proposed increase of a minister's salary with the following aphorism, which I wish might be blazoned before the eyes of all whom it may concern:

"The strength of the Church has been the poverty of its clergy!"

To whose credit is this, pray? If it be true, and such magic strength lie in poverty, then let the pews hasten to share the tonic with the pulpit, and usher in the millennium. But until this consummation is reached, let every parish hesitate, for its own sake as well as his, to grind down its minister to bare necessities, so as to defraud him of all ability to exercise one of the manliest, most ennobling of virtues—self-denial.

ONE WHO HAS SUFFERED.

LITERARY.

"PRINCE CANICHE," a translation of the "Le Prince-Caniche" of Edouard Laboulaye, is to be published by Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son.——Under the "Authority of the House of Bishops" the Rev. Mr. W. S. Perry, of Litchfield, Connecticut, announces his intention to continue the publication of the manuscripts, transcribed from English records, which contain so much material for the history of the Episcopal Church. Dr. Hawks, recently deceased, was his associate editor in the preparation of the "Documentary Annals of Connecticut," which are already published, and there remains for Mr. Perry the editing of one volume devoted to Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, two volumes relating to Massachusetts, one to Rhode Island, two to New York, one to New Jersey, two to Pennsylvania, one to Delaware, one to Maryland, one each to the Carolinas, one to Virginia, one to Georgia and Florida together, and one to the Church in general. These works, of undoubted value, are to be sold to subscribers.——Messrs. R. W. Carroll & Co., of Cincinnati, announce an English and a German campaign "Life of Grant," from the pen of Mr. Edward D. Mansfield, the "Veteran Observer" of the New York Times.——In the periodical called the Proceedings of the Essex Institute, for the second quarter of 1867 (April, 1868), the editor announces the conclusion in his next issue of the directory which has been for some time appearing—"of American Naturalists, so far as it has been in the power of the Editor to obtain them." Name No. 1369—the last published—is an R, and perhaps the last under that letter.

—Captain G. H. Preble, of the United States Navy, is collecting material for a history of the American flag, and has succeeded, he says, in getting together a good deal of anecdote, incident, and evidence concerning its origin, its transmigrations (?), and its first appearance in various parts of the world. He begs persons in possession of information illustrative of its early or later history—especially of its history during the civil war—to communicate with him, addressing him at Charlestown, Massachusetts. He informs the Historical Magazine that he has now no doubt that the stars and stripes were first displayed on the Thames by the ship Bedford, of Nantucket. The Bedford was a whaler which left Nantucket under a pass from Admiral Digby, and arrived out on the 3d of February, 1783, twelve days before proclamation of peace was made, and only a week after the London newspapers had got hold of the terms of the treaty. In the London Political Magazine of February 7, of the year above-mentioned, is a passage which reads as follows:

"THE THIRTEEN STRIPES ARE IN THE RIVER. Mr. Hammet begged leave to inform the House of a very recent and extraordinary event. There was, he said, at the time he was speaking, an American ship in the Thames with the thirteen stripes flying on board. This ship had offered to enter at the custom-house, but the officers were at a loss how to behave. His motive for mentioning the subject was that ministers might take such steps with the American Commissioners as would secure free intercourse between this country and America."

It is a curious fact that the Maria, a vessel that has been named by some writers as a contestant for the honor due to the Bedford, and which certainly was in the Thames in the course of the year 1783, is still afloat and in use. The Confederate States cruisers forced the old ship to take refuge under the Chilian flag, and she now sails from Talcahuana as a whaler. But the first display of the thirteen stripes in England was not from the mast-head of a vessel. When the king, on the 5th of December, 1782, in his speech from the throne, recognized the existence of the United States as a nation, Mr. Copley, the painter, who was among his hearers, went home and put the new ensign into the background of a portrait—that of Elkanah Watson—which he had upon his easel at the time. He had kept the background unfinished, reserving it as a place "to represent a ship bearing to America the intelligence of the acknowledgment of American independence with the rising sun of a new-born nation streaming from her gaff."

—We suppose the law printed below to be the first "dog-law" ever passed in this country; though it is possible that unprinted records may contain an earlier. Mr. George H. Moore ought to be delighted with it. Certainly it shows that the Puritan, though his descendants in our day, animated by a sectional spirit, used to object to the chasing of negroes with bloodhounds, did himself rear hounds for the purpose of ranging the woods in pursuit of dark-colored persons. That the Puritan dog was employed to the end that his bigoted master and strait-laced mistress and the young Puritans might not be waked in the night to have their scalps stripped off their skulls is nothing to the purpose, perhaps. The act was passed by the Massachusetts General Court in 1706, and reads as follows:

"An Act for the Raising & Increase of Dogs, for the better Security of the Frontiers.

"Whereas upon Tryal lately made of Rangeing and Scouring the Woods on the Frontiers, with Hounds and other Dogs used to Hunting, It has proved of great Service to discourage and keep off the Indians,

"For Encouragement, therefore, to Raise and Train up a greater number of Dogs, to be improved.

"Be it Enacted by His Excellency the Governour, Council and Representatives, in General Court Assembled, and by the Authority of the same, That such Person and Persons living in any of the Frontiers within this Province, who shall take, keep, and raise up any Whelp of the breed of the Hounds, and have them at all times in readiness to attend the Hunt Serjeant, or others improved in that Service, when they shall Come to such Town, and require the same, shall be allowed and paid out of the Publick Treasury the sum of Five Shillings Per Annum, in consideration of their care and charge, for the raising and keeping of every such Dog. A Certificate thereof from year to year to be transmitted to the Commissary General, under the hands of the Commission Military Officers, and the Town Clerk of such Town.

"Provided, This Act shall continue in force for the space of three years next coming, if the War with the Indians last long, and not afterwards."

Possibly the Rocky Mountain legislatures might with advantage take a leaf out of the Massachusetts statute-book.

—Mr. J. S. Mill sends to the London Daily News a letter concerning Mr. Goldwin Smith and a certain critic of his in the Quarterly Review. The reviewer uses this impudently humorous language in reference to Mr. Smith's intended departure from England and residence among us:

"He has even announced his intention of turning his back upon an unthankful country, although his friends console us in an amusing aside by assuring us that he does not mean it. 'I am going,' cries the principal actor; 'but not if you elect him to Parliament,' whisper his friends to the audience. The little play reminds one of the wandering trader in a rural fair, whose threatened departure is only to be checked by the crowd buying up all his brass chains. This peculiar clanship of the radicals is constantly of the utmost service to them. They take it in turns to help each other. If one man bids a loud adieu to his native land, the others stand by to tell us his price for remaining."

Besides its other faults, this passage, Mr. Mill says, contains two or three "distorted statements." For one, Mr. Smith leaves England only temporarily. He comes here to study our political life, and has not given up his "unthankful country." Secondly, his country is not unthankful, and Mr. Smith has given a "determined rejection" to proposals that he should stay in England and take a seat in Parliament. Mr. Mill himself has been made "the medium through which the Liberals of a metropolitan constituency have vainly endeavored to induce Mr. Smith to consent to be put up for it," and it is within Mr. Mill's knowledge that other such offers have been made to him and have been in like manner declined. It is in one of the essays in the "Three English Statesmen"—in the essay on Pym, if we remember rightly—that Mr. Smith speaks of the journals of the aristocratic class as having been at that time quite as brutally violent and unscrupulous in their way of handling their political opponents as the journals of the lower classes. The remark remains just if made general. The bad behavior of both classes of journalists illustrates, we suppose, the same general principles—one which we here to-day see illustrated in the newspapers of the extreme men in American politics, as well and as often by the Anti-Slavery Standard as by the Mobile Tribune or the press of Richmond. Both alike allow feeling to enter, in too great force, the domain of reasoning. In Mr. Smith's own case, the Quarterly Review writers on radicalism are not more unfair, and are not unfair for a different reason, than (e.g.) Mr. R. J. Hinton, who not long since could see English timidity and besotted regard for prescription in the innocent remark with which the "Three English Statesmen" begins, "Let us not glorify revolution," because, says Mr. Smith, it is the business of true statesmanship to bring about by gradual processes that which even the most beneficial revolution can bring about only by violence—violence that is sure to have some effects which every sane man must deplore. Mr. Smith's friends in this country did not need to hear, but will be glad to hear, Mr. Mill's vindication of his friend.

—Now that American publishers are beginning to release us from the constant necessity of paying for cloth bindings which we do not want, it may interest our readers to see how binding is regarded in France, where only school-books are published with more than paper covers. We may have the same feelings about a bound book twenty years hence. The following fragment is from an article by Charles Asselineau in the Bulletin du Bibliophile:

"Molière was right in saying that it was something to be bound, even in calf. A book which is not bound is not a book; it is 'a pamphlet,' which one forgets in a railroad car or a cab, which one lends, which one leaves on a garden-seat, where it gets wet, or on a toilet-table, where it gets soiled, which the chambermaid, who finds it under a chair, tears up to kindle the fire. Bound, it is another thing. A book bound is a book which one has read and which one wishes to read again, which one keeps for days of sadness or ennui. It is one of the family, a friend, the friend who never changes, always ready to converse, to instruct, and to console. Now that everything is printed—which is doubtless the reason why everything is printed so carelessly and on paper so well fitted to kindle the fire—binding has become for authors what printing used to be, a decisive test, the patent of durability.

"In reading the latest work of a novelist, of a poet, of a historian, or a critic, I no longer say, 'Will it be the rage? Will it be bought?' but, 'Will it be bound?' And even at the theatre, listening to a new play, I do not ask whether it will be printed—that is already done before the rising of the curtain—nor whether there will be a jam at the door, and, as the formula is, 'The treasurer will rub his hands at the hundredth representation.' I ask, 'Will this play become a book; will it be read and bound?' And you may be assured this is to-day the true, the most reliable criterion. Do you wish to strike the literary balance of the year? Make two piles of the books which you have received or bought during twelve months; put on the left those which you abandon, on the right those which you destine to the book-tailor. . . . The first are trashy, ordinary books, the pleasure or the weariness of a day. The others are the suggestive, the substantial ones; they have made you think, muse; they have instructed or charmed you, and consequently the master pronounces that they are done in a workmanlike way. The touchstone of works of the mind at the present day is no longer, as it once was, the stamp of the royal censor, nor the imprimatur; it is not the puff in the journal, nor the advertisement, nor the seal in the colporteur's permit. It is the chisel, the punch, of the binder. He, the fine fellow, is the one who, without suspecting it, distributes praise and life. He is the true critic and the true censor. Whatever is thought of my book, however severe upon it the public and the Aristarchus of the street-corner have been, however cool the journal, however niggardly the purchasers, let me see it cuirassed with two sheets of pasteboard, bound or only half-bound in morocco, or even in calf, and I am content; I am certain to live—at least fifty years. Fifty years! the immortality of a civilized world."

—On the 7th of April the Italian Senate was notified of the appointment by the crown of twelve new senators. One of the twelve names was that of Signor Antonio Panizzi. It is hardly saying too much to say that wherever the English language is spoken, certainly it is not saying too much to say that wherever there are careful students of English literature, Panizzi is known as having been for many years the able and learned librarian of the British Museum. Not only his learning, but his administrative ability and his social influence, stood that institution in good stead. Indeed, it is said that but for his tact and energy, and the high esteem in which he was held by the great as well as by the cultivated, the funds required for the library of the British Museum very probably might never have been got from the House of Commons. Signor Panizzi's services to the world of letters in England are, of course, not the cause of his political advancement. But while in England he was as serviceable to his country as any ambassador could have been, and, indeed, was honored as being a true ambassador from the greater Italy than the Italy of contemporary politics; from the Italy of history, illustrious in whatever pursuit taxes human energies. He represented the Italian mind in some of its highest characteristics. The report is that the failing health of the new senator will probably prevent his entering actively on his political duties.

THE SPIRITUAL EXPOSITION AT PARIS.*

The Great Exposition of 1867 represented modern civilization under its industrial, inventive, and artistic forms. It presented to the eye the results of discovery, application, skill, in completed fabrics of infinite skill, but it exhibited few processes in detail, nor could it display the spiritual forces which had fashioned and applied these countless products of the useful and beautiful arts. But while the material exposition was on view in the Champ de Mars, there was in preparation a higher view of French civilization—l'Exposé des travaux de l'Esprit—an exposition of what had been accomplished by French scholars in the world of letters and of ideas, especially in science, pure and applied, in erudition and historical criticism, and in intellectual philosophy; and the spiritual progress of France during the past twenty years is now spread before the world in a series of reports issued with the direct sanction of the Government.

These reports cover a wide range in the topics thus indicated, and are most voluminous in the departments of physical science; but as our object is not to notice them at length, but simply to illustrate their method and value, we shall speak particularly of the historical and philological sciences, as possessing a more rare and curious interest. At the instance of the Minister of Public Instruction, the Institute of France, in a semi-official way, through members of its several academies, undertook the preparation of reports covering the interval between the two great Expositions. In the departments of history and philology, the memoirs, prepared by specialists in each topic, were edited collectively by M. J. D. Guigniaut, Secretary of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. While the immediate object of each report is to show what France has accomplished for its specialty during twenty years past, yet a brief sketch is also given of the history and literature of the science, and liberal credit is given to scholars of other countries. Thus one finds in each memoir a complete outline of the subject of which it treats, sketched by the familiar hand of an adept, a reference to the leading scholars in this branch of study, and to all works of importance pertaining to it, including essays, reviews, and minor papers.

One volume, for instance, contains nine distinct memoirs, by as many specialists, upon studies relating to Egypt and the East. First among these is an essay by Count E. de Rougé upon the present state of Egyptian studies; and if any reader of the Nation is yet sceptical concerning the positive value and definite results of Egyptology, this calm and careful résumé ought to satisfy him that the elements of scientific certainty have been reached by the school of Champollion. In the art of deciphering hieroglyphics, the progress of the last thirty years has been truly marvellous. Texts have been classified in epochs, according to their style; many of the most important treasures in papyrus, of different museums, have been published, and monumental inscriptions of great value carefully transcribed; analytical translations have been subjected to the severest criticism, and doubtful readings have either been verified or corrected by subsequent discoveries; the Coptic language has been explored for illustration of the old Egyptian; grammars and dictionaries have been prepared; and, at last, the bilingual monument lately discovered at Tanis has furnished the most exact and unexpected verification of the system of deciphering the hieroglyphics, even at its contested points. In thirty-seven lines of hieroglyphic text with seventy-seven of Greek translation, there is not found one contradiction or disproof either of the method of decipherment or of its particular applications!

The period covered by this memoir has witnessed a decisive progress in our knowledge of early Egyptian history. The invasion and conquest of Egypt by a nomadic tribe of Arabs, commonly known as "The Shepherds," is fully established from monuments in the vicinity of Tanis, and not only the titles but the very features of the invaders have been recovered. The deliverance of Egypt from these invaders—either by Tothmes III. or Ahmes I.—is marked by the new epoch of monumental art at Thebes, and the ocular testimony of the monuments is confirmed by papyrus records. The greater part of the lists of the earliest dynasties of Manetho has been restored by means of the recent discoveries at Abydos, by MM. Duemichen and Mariette, although some questions of chronology are still indeterminate.

More marked has been the progress in our knowledge of the arts, literature, customs, and religion of the ancient Egyptians. Art has been classified in periods or styles, less prominent indeed, but scarcely less intelligible, than those of Italian painters, or of Gothic architecture. Poems, narratives, tales have been translated from papyrus rolls, which had remained unread for thousands of years. The Book of the Dead, now fully deciphered, puts us in possession of the most important articles of the Egyptian faith, especially the unity of the Supreme Divinity, and the immortality of the soul.

The deciphering of cuneiform inscriptions is described by the well-known expert, M. de Saulcy, under the general title of "Assyriology." This field has yielded results less rich and copious than that of Egypt, because its materials are far less abundant. But already a grammar and a dictionary have been published, and many important inscriptions deciphered.

M. Munk, an Orientalist of repute, furnishes the memoir upon Semitic studies as prosecuted in France since 1840—the Hebrew, the Phenician, the Aramæan, the Syriac, the Himyaric, the Ethiopian, and the Assyrian. M. Fulgence Fresnel regards the Ethiopian or Ghez, which is still the learned language of Abyssinia, as an offshoot of the Himyaric, transported into Africa from the south of Arabia. It is to be hoped that the British conquest of Abyssinia will contribute somewhat to the extension of ethnology and philology.

In the study of the Arabic language France has furnished the illustrious names of Silvestre de Sacy, Étienne Quatremère, Caussin de Perceval, Reinaud, de Slane, Renan, and others, whose translations of Arabic works, and memoirs upon special points of Arabian history and literature, constitute quite a library of themselves. The conquest of Algeria by France gave a new impulse to Arabic studies, and the French language is now rich in works on Arabic grammar and lexicography. The report upon this branch of philological science is from the pen of M. Defrémery.

One of the most interesting contributions to the history of philology is M. Dulaurier's report upon studies in the Armenian, a field in which he himself is an enthusiast. These studies are of particular value to the historical interpretation of Christianity—since the Armenian literature is to a large extent religious—but they have contributed also to the elucidation of general history and chronology.

In Chinese literature, who should represent France but Stanislaus Julien, the worthy successor of M. Abel Rémusat? Through the liberal support of the French Government, M. Julien has been able to publish several important Chinese works, with elaborate commentaries, one of the most curious and instructive of which is the journal of the celebrated Buddhist pilgrim, Hiouen-thsang. Some of M. Julien's labors have brought advantage to French industry—as, for instance, his "History of the Manufacture of Chinese Porcelain," which contains a description of the porcelain wares of different periods, and of many ingenious processes before unknown in Europe.

A memoir on Sanscrit and Comparative Philology closes this series of reports. A special report is added, however, upon the progress of Archæology by M. L. F. Alfred Maury: Numismatics—Grecian, Italian, Roman—of the Republic and the Empire, Byzantine, Syrian, Oriental, Iberian; Ancient Metrology and Glyptic; Sculpture, Bronzes, Terra Cotta, Vases, Pictures, Mosaics—these are the topics that are presented, with a distinct outline of each, and with continuous reference to the best sources of information.

Thus, in these reports, one has a panoramic view of the intellectual activity of France during the first half of the nineteenth century; and this exhibit, in connection with the history of science in Germany during the modern period, now in course of publication by the Munich Academy, will put one en rapport with the scientific spirit of Europe since the Reformation.

* "Recueil de Rapports sur les Progrès des Lettres et des Sciences en France. Publication faite sous les auspices du Ministère de l'instruction publique. Paris: à l'imprimerie Impériale. 1867."

THE POODLE-PRINCE.*

This story is of a young prince who, by the saving transformation of a good genius, has his first lessons in ruling corrected at every stage by a short though generally painful experience, as a dog, of the real nature of the government to which he has succeeded. It is a satire upon centralization in general, but particularly that which prevails in France. In form it is a fairy tale, consisting of the love of Jacinth for Tamaris, and of Narcisse for Giroflée. The scene is the kingdom of the Gobemouches, (simpletons), adjoining that of the Cocqsigrues (fiddle-faddlers), whom the prince is tricked into making war upon, winning the battle of Necedad (sheer stupidity), and annexing four rather desirable provinces, of which the people "had nothing in common with their conquerors, and even had a standing hatred of them, besides differing in language, religion, and customs." The Gobemouches pride themselves on being "la grande nation," but "they never know over-night what they will do on the morrow, and they forget on the morrow what they have done over-night." With them, also, "what woman wills God wills, and what woman sees she persuades her husband to see." For them, the more noise the more pleasure. When Jacinth ascended the throne, they let loose (déchaîna) in the public squares every sort of trumpets, trombones, cymbals, tymbals, drums, and tamtams. Viewed as a whole, trompeurs, trompês, trompettes was the summary of the nation. Their extravagance was seen in the fête which was given by the city of Plaisir-sur-Or to the youthful sovereign. "They had worked a fortnight to consume in four hours the taxes of half a year." The queen's regency before the prince came of age was intolerable to them, not only because they were at peace with all neighboring nations, and every man planted his cabbages and talked and acted without molestation, but because there was an annual excess of revenue over expenditure, which was stupidly employed in wiping out the public debt and lightening the imposts. Their capital city was a miracle of uniformity. All the houses in the same street resembled each other; "the same height, same style of roof, same number of stories and of windows, same blinds, same balustrades, same doors; the only difference was in the numbering; say, a palace, a convent, a hospital, or a barrack five leagues long." The police saw to it that everybody went to the right, and kept step with his own line, and nobody could cross the street except to return home or take a side street, and even then must ask leave of the authorities, who, when not occupied in this surveillance, offered their arms to the ladies—as, in the palace garden, they swung the skipping-rope for little girls and their nurses. Every Gobemouche, further, from the lowest to the highest, wore on his sleeve a badge which indicated at a glance his origin, station, and domestic circumstances. For instance, to take a high example, Minister Touche-à-Tout (Finger-in-Everything), wore $625, $5^{2}29^{6}$, 3'56, which meant that he was born in the province formerly called Fauconville, January 18 (O. S.), the year of the world 7810, was now a widower with one child, a grand proprietor, and an official of the first rank.

* "Le Prince-Caniche. Par Edouard Laboulaye. Cosas de España." Deuxième édition. Paris. New York: F. W. Christern. 1868.

The figure by which the prince was designated was zero. Jacinth did not understand why, until he attempted to get rid of a pack of dogs which his prudent mother kept in the royal apartments in order to conceal his unannounced metamorphoses. Touche-à-Tout protests that the affair is delicate and requires time. "Sire, there are a master of the pack and two assistants—functionaries who have committed no fault; the administration is under obligations to them." Jacinth suggests that the dogs might be sent au diable and the master retain his title and his pay. "Impossible! there can be no pay without a function; it would be illegal, the law is explicit. . . . The master of a pack is of little consequence, but, however little, the moment he makes part of the administration he becomes sacred. He cannot be touched without alarming all the servants of the state. Better a hundred times preserve a useless function than dismiss a functionary and offend the army which has received him into its ranks." Of these civil functionaries the Gobemouches are blessed with 413,394, divided into paid, supernumerary, and aspirant. They are regularly promoted at a rate which compels 229.90 nominations to be made every day, which the prince must sign without examining. But in spite of their number and their vigilance, the individual Gobemouche has many opportunities, between the cradle and the grave, of escaping them. To fill some of these gaps in a paternal government Touche-à-Tout proposes a law for the universal inspection of youth from one to ten years of age. The first article creates one male and one female inspector for each of the cantons of the state—i. e., 66,666 inspectors of the second degree; the second article creates 3,000 male and female inspectors of the first degree, to inspect the foregoing 66,666; the third article creates 300 inspectors-general to inspect the foregoing 3,000. In time, the minister thinks, the Gobemouches will no longer be spoken of as a nation, but as a regiment! Quel idéal! Already they have an official morality, an official philosophy, an official history, official truth. The court journal is styled la Vérité officielle. When the prince first became a poodle, la Vérité reported that "the king, welcomed by the people with a mad enthusiasm, had experienced so lively an emotion as to impair his health." When Touche-à-Tout had resigned the office of premier, and his resignation had been accepted but his recall afterwards brought about by intrigue, la Vérité of the following day announced that "yesterday rumors of a change of ministry were current. There is not a word of truth in them." On the eve of war with the Cocqsigrues, speaking of a pretended review of the army at the camp of Canonville, the official journals said: "Happy the country that amuses itself with innocent pleasures, and in which the cannon thunders only to carry to heaven the joy of a people in transports!" In a week the frontier had been crossed, and six hundred thousand armed men were making forced marches to cut each other's throats.

Jacinth, having by the aid of "dog-sense" penetrated the mystery of his government and witnessed the misery it entailed upon his people, begs his fairy godmother to aid him in procuring a constitution for the Gobemouches. She summons Aristotle to an interview, and he, having divided all peoples, politically, into Barbarians and Greeks—that is, the races made to obey, as opposed to those made to govern themselves, or, in other words, civilized peoples—enquires to which the Gobemouches belong. Jacinth greatly fears the Barbarians, as the Gobemouches do not govern themselves, and among them men have more authority than the laws.

"'Is every citizen a soldier?' asked Aristotle.

"'No; there is a standing army.'

"'Barbarians,' said the philosopher. 'Do they choose their magistrates by popular suffrage and for a limited time?'

"'No,' said Jacinth.

"'Double Barbarians," rejoined the philosopher. 'Do they themselves decide in criminal processes?'

"'No,' said Jacinth.

"'Threefold Barbarians,' rejoined the philosopher. 'Do they meet together freely to consider public affairs? Have they the right to criticise every morning the acts of all their magistrates?'

"'Not always,' said Jacinth.

"'Fourfold Barbarians,' rejoined the philosopher. 'Is there a system of general education without distinction of fortune or birth?'

"'No,' said Jacinth.

"'Why, then, bother me, young man?' said the sage, with a frown. 'Govern as the great king of the Persians does; lead under your crook this bleating flock; build palaces, make war, indulge all the passions of your heart, but have no concern about governing men; there are none in your empire.'"

Jacinth finally fixes upon a charter which is a mixture of the Constitution of the United States and that of its republican offspring, Liberia.

As will have been seen, it is a long way from Rogeard to Laboulaye—as long, almost, as from 1848 to 1868. The corollary of "Les Propos de Labiénus" should have been the barricade and the Marseillaise; the lion of the Latin quarter and the eagle of the Tuileries aux prises. "Le Prince-Caniche" is none the less a freeman's apology for living under a despotic régime, but it is addressed to the reason, not to the spirit of revolt and vengeance. Cæsar, too, more than Cæsarism, was the aim of Rogeard's fierce sarcasms. "Poisoner of peoples," head of the "organized banditti whom history will style the Bonaparte gang"—such were the bitter personalities of a February revolutionist, in striking contrast with the philosophic irony of the professor. Both are radicals desiring the same end, but differing as to the allowable means of attaining it. Satire, Laboulaye says in his courageous preface, is the only weapon that succeeds in France. It is at least, for the French genius, one of the most powerful. To handle it so skilfully as our author is not given to every writer. A work more open in its essence to the condemnation of the censor of the press can scarcely be imagined, nor one less likely to be condemned. "Whoever," is the closing caution of the author, having this personage in view,—"whoever seeks here for allusions may eat 'em with his bread." Others besides the friends of centralization will undoubtedly discover "allusions." In the dog-pound, Jacinth is set apart by a doctor who is in the habit of coming there for subjects for vivisection, and wishes to use the poodle in solving the mystery of the Frigard tragedy (not named, of course). "The case is of a woman who some say has been poisoned, others suffocated; to-morrow we shall have clear minds on the subject; I shall first poison this pretty brute and then strangle him. The experiment will be one of the highest interest." And the Darwinian theory of selection is embodied in another statute proposed by Touche-à-Tout, "for the amelioration and regeneration of the canine race." Other allusions to recent events will reward the search for them, and the story is fuller of meaning than can be detected in one or two readings. The chapters which seem to us particularly enjoyable, after the preface, are those on political eloquence (chap. v.) and the political influence of dogs among the Gobemouches (chap. xii.) There are but one or two which seem to be tributary to the story rather than to the satire.

BARNES'S HISTORY OF THE THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS.*

This book has much disappointed us; not so much by what the author has done, as by what he has failed to do. We turned over its six hundred and odd handsome pages, expecting to find a book enlivened with personal sketches, biography, and criticism. The eighteen steel portraits seemed to promise something of the sort. Here, thought we, is our "historic Congress," commemorated in fitting historic style; the characters are clearly delineated, and set in the framework of the great events in which they bore part. On the contrary, the substance consists of extracts, abridged but not condensed, from long speeches delivered in Congress by members of the two great parties; its only personal sketches, huddled together at the end of the volume, consist of the baldest outline of the birth, education, and official career of each member, and as much space is given to the obscurest as to the most distinguished. Out of the 576 pages which form the body of the work less than 66 consist of original matter.

Nevertheless, the book performs for us a very essential service, and for this we are well-disposed to thank its author and publishers. To those who would dismiss it as "merely a rehash of the Congressional Globe," we have to say that we know of nothing which more heinously needs "rehashing" than the seven ponderous and closely-printed quartos which loom huge upon our vision from the library shelf, and constitute the works of the Thirty-ninth Congress. Add to these the thirty-eight Congresses which fill up three-quarters of a century back, and the result becomes overwhelming.

The Congressional Globe grows like a huge, unwieldy snow-ball with each revolving winter, till it has become the butt of unhappy editors, the despair of our public men, and the harvest of the paper-dealer. Who is sufficient for these things? Will not some patient and kindly hand abridge for us the sayings and doings of each Congress, as Mr. Barnes has abridged the 10,000 columns of this one into one modest octavo? Benton's "Abridgment of Debates" only comes down to 1850, and needs, besides, to be itself abridged.

We have met Mr. Barnes once before in literature. His book, "The Body Politic," which was published in the West some two years since, was a thoughtful, though fanciful, treatise, drawing numberless analogies between the human body and the constitution of the state. In the present work his style has improved in clearness and vigor, and is so uniformly good that we regret the more his plan of letting his subjects do all the speaking, while he abstains from giving us a full and connected narrative. His preliminary sketch of the memorable organization of the first Congress after the war, is well done, the salient points standing prominently out, while trivial details are suppressed. Could not our author have done the same by each great debate?

In the absence of any pen-portraits of his characters, we must not withhold a word of commendation for the engraved portraits which our author puts before us, and which afford almost "speaking likenesses" of their subjects. They are far superior to the average of such engravings, bearing no affinity to the distorted resemblances of public men which abound in the "pictorials," and disfigure most of our "war literature"—such, for example, as we see in Mr. Reid's "Ohio in the War."

We must say a word about the peculiar index to the work. It is compiled upon principles the reverse of praiseworthy. The person to whom it was entrusted evidently lacks all idea of what alone makes an index valuable, viz., that it should be inclusive of all subjects or catch-words of importance, and exclusive of all trivialities and non-essential words. There is a "biographical index" and an "analytical index," both of which should have been thrown into one alphabet. Then, in the biographical portion, there is an array of figures after each name referring to the pages on which the subject is noticed, without the slightest indication of what the subject-matter is about which he there speaks. This needlessly protracts the labor of reference. In the "analytical index" we have the following specimens of analysis:

"Sun obscured by congressional acts, p. 337.
"Stars of heaven and the constellation of the States, p. 144.
"Koh-i-noor of blackness, p. 407.
"Boyhood of Mr. Saulsbury, p. 193.
"Sarsaparilla and the ballot, p. 163."

Turning in some bewilderment of mind to the pages indicated, we find on p. 337 that Mr. Chanler, of this city, predicted of the Constitutional Amendment: "Sir, this measure, if passed, will tend to obscure the sun from which the liberties of this country derive their nourishment, the brilliant orb, the Constitution," and so on; that Mr. Garfield invoked "the stars of heaven to illustrate our constellation of States;" that Mr. Sumner, after exhausting epithets against the Constitutional Amendment, called it "the very Koh-i-noor of blackness;" while Mr. Trumbull spoke of negro suffrage as a remedy for negro distress, as "the most sovereign remedy that I have heard of since the days of Townsend's sarsaparilla." And this it is to be "analytical" in the making of indexes!

We conclude by assuring our readers that, notwithstanding all faults and shortcomings, of which we have spoken freely, the book under review is a valuable contribution to our current political literature. It gives a clear account of the origin of the Civil Rights bill, the Freedmen's Bureau bill, the constitutional amendment fixing the basis of representation, the Tenure-of-Office bill, the bill to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States (commonly called the Military bill), and the other measures for which the Thirty-ninth Congress will be remembered in history. It also commemorates the ten vetoes which met, but failed wholly to overcome, these measures.

Not Wisely but Too Well: A Novel. By the author of "Cometh Up as a Flower." (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.)—As we remember it, "Cometh Up as a Flower" was a nice little story. It had, to be sure, plenty of faults, both of style and sentiment, but then it was autobiographical in form, and the faults were in very good harmony with the character of the supposed writer—a girl between sixteen and nineteen years of age. To girls of that age, with a sentimental cast of mind and an over-familiar acquaintance with the literature furnished by the circulating libraries, to quote is as natural as to breathe, or to underscore heavily the most touching passages of their favorite authors. The book gave, however, no indication that this adaptation of means to ends was to be credited, as intentional art, to the author. Still, had she given us no successor to it, she might have reaped the benefit of the doubt as to whether she were gifted with a nice perception, or simply with a wise reticence. As the case stands, it is quite safe to deny her either quality. Her new book is a moral tale of the kind with which Mr. Lawrence has made novel-readers tolerably familiar. Its plot is, in fact, almost precisely similar to that of "Sword and Gown." The technical morality of the book is all right. Notwithstanding the ardent and over-mastering passion of the heroine for her married lover, the fear of eternal punishment proves sufficiently strong to restrain her from running away with him. She betakes herself, instead, to alternate flirting and tract-distributing, finding not much comfort in either variety of dissipation. The hero being brought finally to much such an agonizing and untimely end as that of Guy Livingstone, the heroine becomes a Ritualistic Sister of Mercy, and remains such, although apparently without the consolations which might naturally be supposed to be derived from that vocation, until "He who is always reading over the long muster-roll of human names came to the name of Kate Chester, and she, hearing, rose up—yea, rose up very gladly; and having ended, whether well or ill, her day's work, passed as we, knowing not, yet hope, 'To where, beyond these voices, there is peace.'" We quote, in order to show what mastery of style may be acquired by unremitting study of such a model as Mr. Lawrence. There are other things, even less desirable, to be learned from him—how, for instance, to paint a love which shall claim to be spiritual and pure, while the words bestial and selfish, though perhaps a trifle harsh, would still describe it more accurately—and the author of "Not Wisely but Too Well" has paid quite too great an attention to the lesson. When a man sins in this way, it is not difficult to characterize him; but when a woman is the offender, one's critical duties become more difficult and more delicate. It would be of no use to counsel a writer whose books meet with a ready reception from the public to give up writing until she has either more years or more wisdom; it would very likely be equally useless to counsel her to alter the plan of her reading—to give a less undivided admiration to Tennyson—and to study life with a view to discovering whether love has not in it some nobler element than passion, and duty, and self-sacrifice—some virtue more elevating and more consolatory than she at present dreams of.

Vulgarisms and Other Errors of Speech: Including a Chapter on Taste, and one Containing Examples of Bad Taste. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1868.)—This book is open to the objections which may be brought against most books that treat of errors of speech. It is sound enough whenever the particular error it is dealing with is a perfectly obvious one; but when the point discussed is really difficult, we find a failure in knowledge and acumen. Of old it was known as a trick of the race of commentators to avoid the shaky places in their path, and to build vast bridges across tracts where, without any of their help, we all could have passed dry-shod, or which we all could have avoided. Especially is this likely to be true of verbal commentators, who so often are such because they are men ungifted with the powers of mind, and incapable of attaining the degree of information requisite to the handling of topics more weighty and universally interesting. Yet as language is nothing but as it is the instrument and expression of thought, it is plain that an unlearned or feeble-minded man must be but a bad critic of words. And besides the fact that he is generally uninstructive, except to people whose bad example is not dangerous, the verbal critic is pretty sure to be, for other reasons, an unpleasing creature. He is so apt to be opinionated and arrogant, and his scorn of men less exactly ill-informed than himself is usually so oppressive and exasperating, that friends of humanity naturally desire to nip him in the bud, so to speak, and browbeat him, and insult him, and resist him. The mistaken man who says "pled" when he means "pleaded," and habitually talks of "pants," is, after all, a fellow-being; and one can hardly stand by and see him made the victim of the haughty critic's contumely. The latter ought to reflect on what he himself might have been had he not had two or three winters' schooling. However, one's hatred of tyranny ought not to blind one's eyes to the despot's good points, if he has any. Let us say, then, that the book before us will prevent the properly heedful reader from saying "our mutual friend," and will teach him how much more refined it is to say "our common friend." If it also teaches him that it is very wrong and ridiculous to say "he is prejudiced in favor" of this or that—why probably it would teach him differently if the teacher were wiser. This, at all events, is true, that, on the whole, one may say of it that among its probable readers the good it will do will outweigh the harm; and though we have no high opinion of the service such a treatise can render the cause of pure English, it is certain that the people are not few whom an instructor not overwise may perhaps save from the commission of blunders that make the blunderer somewhat ridiculous. Perhaps, we say; for it is doubtful if direct instruction can be of much service to persons who, for one or another reason, have failed to form tolerably good habits of speech. For another class of persons—those whose habits in this respect are not perfectly good, but still may be called good—a work of the same general kind, but of a higher order, is the right thing—such a work as Mr. Grant White's "Words and Their Uses," which is not yet published in book-form. Mr. White's zeal, if sometimes it is, as might be expected, a little amusing, is yet never a zeal without knowledge; and often he displays a great deal of accurate knowledge and a great deal of acuteness. His writing is almost sure to be pleasant enough reading, and a style subjected to his rules could hardly fail to gain in correctness, and consequently in force and beauty.

NEW WORKS JUST PUBLISHED.

A New and Peculiar Novel.

Travels by Sea and Land of Alethitheras.

This work, by an experienced prose-writer, whose name is a profound secret, takes the very widest range in its sarcastic philosophy, and combines with the humorous adventures of genuine travel the interest of a fictitious tale of passion. It is full of truth, though satirical; and satirical, because it is so full of truth. It is printed in the usual style of our press, and put at the moderate price of $1 75. 12mo, of over 400 pages, morocco, cloth bevelled. Sent, postage paid, on receipt of price.

Tinted paper, 12mo, 250 pages, extra cloth, beveled edges, price $1 75.

Sent free by mail on receipt of price.

This very remarkable book is one which is destined to exert a striking influence on the current of human thought relative to the Natural History of Man. As bold as Darwin, and treating of a kindred subject, Dr. Page is even more interesting, because he writes upon a topic which more intimately concerns the human race.

The Week.

THE report goes that Congress is to sit till after the Fourth of July. What with impeachment and the Chicago Convention, the course of business during the week just passed lends confirmation to the rumor. On Wednesday week, Mr. Ingersoll, of Illinois, made some remarks to the editor of the Chicago Republican, who permitted himself to make some "conspicuously inexact" statements about Mr. Ingersoll's connection with the impeachment affair. No quorum was present, and the House soon adjourned. On Thursday the Senate was in session, and there was some debate as to whether the House had been violating the privileges of the Senate and insulting that body by its course in regard to investigating the vote on acquittal. The debate was full of the bitterness with which the last stages of the impeachment affair have unfortunately filled some of the Senators even; but Mr. Henderson was sustained in the position he had taken. He had been before the committee for examining the conduct of the Missouri Representatives, he said, but looked on the Managers' summons as an invasion of the privileges of the Senate, and should not obey it. On Monday last Mr. Trumbull gave notice of his intention to call up the bill for admitting Arkansas. Mr. Drake gave notice of an amendment to be offered, the gist of which is that Arkansas may come in when her present Legislature has bound her to adhere perpetually to her present constitutional provisions as to suffrage. The army appropriation bill was passed. In the House, Mr. S. F. Cary, the member from the Cincinnati Congressional district, kept his pledges to his constituents by offering a resolution declaring that the five-twenty bonds must be paid in greenbacks, or else both the letter and the spirit of the laws creating the debt are violated. Mr. Chanler introduced a resolution to the effect that this is a white man's government, and calling on all men to take notice that if they are not descended from "our European forefathers" they must recognize the fact that they are justly in jeopardy of having their right to vote taken away from them at any moment. The Committee on Elections are to ponder this averment in their hearts, and sometime they are to make a report upon it. The same Committee have just reported Mr. Delano entitled to the seat now occupied by Mr. Morgan, of Ohio. Mr. Schenck gave notice that the new Internal Tax bill is ready for discussion. Mr. Butler, from the impeachment Managers, acting as an investigating committee, made a report which reminds one of the rumors that reconciled us to the old Impeachment Committee's continuing in existence for so many months. It was always on the point of revealing enormities—"damning proofs" were within six or seven days' reach. The House accepted Mr. Butler's report, and agreed to a resolution that a Mr. C. W. Woolley, who had been contumacious, should be arrested and compelled to tell how he had used certain moneys.

The Senate has again voted on the impeachment articles—this time on the second and third—and with the same result as before. It has now adjourned, as a court, sine die. We shall, therefore, hear no more of impeachment, and we are glad of it. After what has happened, a verdict of guilty could have had no moral weight. The first adjournment of the court not only deprived the process of all value, but converted it into a national scandal and disgrace. The less said about it now the better, but we hope if there have been any attempts to bribe they will be ferreted out and the authors punished. The Butler investigation has thus far fastened suspicion on two of those who voted for conviction, a circumstance which we trust will not delay or impede enquiry. But no censure or punishment will be complete which does not reach the Missouri delegation, General Schenck, and the author of the Kansas telegram to Mr. Ross. The punishment of these last three offenders ought not to be so severe, perhaps, as that of bribers in money, but ought not to differ in kind.

Secretary Stanton's resignation was inevitable after the President's acquittal, and was not delayed. The position in which he now finds himself is such as every Republican must regret, and is one of the most unpleasant consequences of the confusion caused in the public mind by the Tenure-of-Office legislation.

The Chicago platform and nominations and the whole proceedings of the Convention seem to give unqualified satisfaction to Republicans, or at least to those Republicans who speak about them. The platform touches nothing that were better left alone, and speaks strongly on the one point on which strong speech was needed—the relations of the party to the public credit. The treatment of impeachment and of the regulation of the suffrage seems to indicate great weakness on the part of the extreme Radicals—the Spencers, Logans, and Cochranes, in fact, seem to have exercised no influence on the Convention and took no prominent part in its proceedings. The leading actors before the public were Carl Schurz and General Hawley, whose radicalism is undoubted, and whose character reflects credit on the party. The Soldiers and Sailors' Convention, which met in Chicago just before the nominating Convention, discharged a good deal of wrath on the heads of the Republican senators who voted for acquittal on the impeachment trial, but their resolutions were too violent to do anybody any harm, while they must have relieved those who voted them considerably.

The committee appointed by the House to investigate the charges of corruption made against certain Senators in connection with the impeachment trial has been pursuing its labors through the week, and made its report, through Mr. Butler, on Monday. Owing to the fact to which we drew attention last week, that only one side is represented on the committee, all persons opposed to impeachment being excluded from it, and that it is composed exclusively of gentlemen whose political fortunes and reputation are dependent in a great measure on the President's conviction, and whose passions as against him, and all his friends and supporters, have been strongly excited by the events of the last few weeks, the enquiry is wanting in all the characteristics of a judicial investigation. There has been no cross-examination of the witnesses; the evidence to be produced has all been selected by Mr. Butler and those who feel with him. He has seized the telegrams in the Washington offices, produced such as he pleased, and suppressed such as he pleased, and has, in fact, in his report, regulated the light thrown on the evidence in such manner as suited him. We say this not for the purpose of insinuating that he has not discovered any facts of real importance, but for the purpose of preventing the public from even allowing him to suggest inferences. He is to be trusted just as far as his facts go, and not one hair's-breadth further. He promised monstrous revelations with regard to Mr. Johnson's crimes, when the great impeachment investigation was set on foot a year ago, but, as our readers may remember, when the report made its appearance his hints and insinuations were found to be quite baseless.

What appears from his report, and from the evidence he has produced, is simply this: That a number of persons, amongst whom Charles W. Woolley, a Kentuckian, practising law in Cincinnati; Sheridan Shook, a collector of internal revenue in this city; Hugh Hastings, an editor, now said to be connected with the Commercial Advertiser; S. S. Cox, Sam. Ward, and a person named Adams, said by some to have been in the Confederate, and by others in the Union, army, were, during the week immediately preceding the vote on the verdict, greatly occupied and excited about impeachment; that some of them were in Washington and others in New York, and they kept telegraphing to each other in a mysterious and suspicious way, indicating the existence of negotiations with some person or persons with regard to impeachment, and the movement to and fro of large sums of money apparently as part of the same transaction; that the purchase of certain senators was openly proposed by Adams to Collector Smythe of this port, and that Mr. Smythe, instead of thereupon kicking him out of the office, informed him that he would "consult" Thurlow Weed on the subject, and did consult him accordingly, and introduced Adams to him; that Thurlow Weed advised Mr. Smythe to have nothing to do with the business. Mr. Weed, nevertheless, afterwards discussed the same subject at his room in the Astor House with Shook and Woolley, and a certain Webster, and then and there the sum was named ($30,000) that would be necessary or sufficient to purchase three votes. Mr. Weed, also, was during the same period the recipient of telegraphic despatches from the same parties in Washington, and though he professed not quite to understand the despatches, he knew they concerned some movement with regard to impeachment. But the effect of his avowals on these points is marred, and our impression of the general character of the enquiry confirmed, by such episodes as this. Mr. Weed is under examination:

"Q.—Did Hastings make any report when he came back to you? A.—Yes; he told me he had been in Washington.

"Q.—Excuse me; I do not ask what the report was? A.—If you ask me literally if he reported to me when he came back, I say no.

"Q.—Did he see you after he came back? A.—Yes.

"Q.—Did he make any statement upon his visit to Washington. A.—Yes.

"Q.—How soon did he return? A.—My impression is in about two days; I am not quite sure."

The important thing here for the public is of course what Hastings said; but Mr. Butler, with the habits of counsel strong upon him, suppresses it, thus raising the suspicion, which may be unfounded, that it would injure the case he is building up; for this is really what he is doing. Woolley appears to have prevaricated, contradicted himself, and withdrawn himself from examination on false pretences. Altogether, no matter what the general value of the report may be, enough appears in evidence to make it imperatively necessary for the Senate to probe this matter to the bottom. Let us add, that unless Collector Smythe can show that Thurlow Weed's evidence with regard to him is false, his continuance one day longer in the public service is a scandal and insult to every decent citizen.

Mr. Sam. Ward, whom Mr. Butler's report deals with somewhat sharply, as a participator in the alleged bribery and corruption, writes a bitter and amusing letter to the World, of Tuesday, explaining the charges against himself. He says he explained his telegraphic ciphers to Manager Butler under protest, and that he left the committee "absolved by these conspirators from any complicity with the phantoms they are pursuing." He says, too, that he gave Mr. Butler a cigar, who smoked it pleasantly, and with all outward appearance of goodwill towards the donor; that Mr. Butler also produces one telegram of his which looks suspicious, but does not produce the following one which explains it; that he never received any information as to the sale of gold by the Government from Mr. McCulloch; that he sold gold short "at the coruscation of the Butler-Wade conspiracy," but "took it in" when he heard Senator Grimes was worse, and made hardly enough on it to pay for the box of cigars of which he gave Butler one. If Mr. Ward's statements are correct, and we know of no reason for doubting them, they only confirm our suspicions as to the way in which Mr. Butler is conducting this investigation, and we sincerely regret, for the sake of the party, that it has been allowed to fall into his hands. The quibbling way in which he replied to Mr. Baker's protest against the composition of the committee—Mr. Baker is a staunch Republican—will deepen the anxiety with which all intelligent members of the party watch his performances.

The investigation has brought out one rather amusing incident, in the shape of a charge of corruption against Senator Pomeroy, of Kansas, whose righteousness in voting for conviction has furnished such a pleasing contrast to Mr. Ross's depravity in voting the other way. The charge is that, before making up his mind on the eleventh article, Senator Pomeroy tried to find out how much he could get for voting for acquittal, and only became satisfied of Mr. Johnson's guilt when his enquiries proved unsatisfactory. The fact is that when you set up a committee like that now sitting, and charge it with the duty of hearing any denunciations of any Senator that anybody pleases to make, it is sure to be provided with work, and we should not be at all surprised to hear that testimony had been offered showing that Senator Sumner had sold his vote to the Honorable Ben Wade for the last edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," bound in calf. Curiously enough, the only Senator whose personal interest in the result of his vote was enormous and notorious was Mr. Wade himself, and there is probably nobody filled with more holy wrath against Trumbull and Fessenden and the like. His vote, however, was not only an offence against decency, but against human society. A judge who votes in his own cause, if there be such a thing as natural laws, violates one of the most sacred of them. Mr. Wade's vote was, in fact, as far as our knowledge goes, an unprecedented scandal. A good illustration of the way in which rumors are concocted against character has been afforded in Mr. Henderson's case. The report after the vote was that he was one of fourteen Senators who had dined with Chief-Justice Chase, for the purpose of getting up a "new party," with the Chief-Justice as the head of it, and the dissentient Senators, of course, prime movers in it, being filled with hatred and envy of Mr. Wade. Mr. Henderson proved that he was the only Senator who dined with the Chief-Justice on that day; and that he had never had any communication with him on the subject of a new party, nor had the Chief-Justice ever tried to influence his mind on the subject of impeachment. From the leading part which dinners and suppers play in the foul charges which are constantly made against the Chief-Justice and other judges and Senators who do not happen to agree with Messrs. Butler and Stevens as to the eleventh article, one can hardly avoid the inference that in the minds of a portion of our Radical brethren regular meals, if at all of an elaborate character, are associated with moral depravity, and that a party of gentlemen can hardly meet at a good dinner without being "up to something." Without committing ourselves to a defence of dinners of a festive character, or, in fact, to the consumption of more or other food than is necessary to sustain nature, or to the consumption of any food while seated, we can assert positively that Conservatives and Anti-impeachers do frequently dine together for the mere purpose of innocent enjoyment, and without committing any worse offence than temporarily banishing from their minds the consideration of the welfare of the entire human family. Sydney

Smith said of Francis Horner "that he was so extremely serious about the human race that he was forced to compose his face half a street off before he met him." This state of feeling in one man may pass; but if a whole political party were to get into it or cultivate it, they would soon find the world too frivolous to be lived in or improved.

The Philadelphia Daily Evening Telegraph of April 28, to which our attention has only just been drawn, copies, in a very conspicuous place, an article from the Round Table on "Negro Suffrage," and ascribes it to the Nation. As the opinions contained in the article are diametrically opposed to those we hold, and as they are stated in a way which we should be very sorry, for intellectual reasons, to acknowledge as our way, the fathering of the article on us is not only uncomplimentary but injurious. We trust the Telegraph will, therefore, do justice to us, as well as to the author of it, by stating conspicuously where it came from.

The Polish question has apparently entered on a new phase. Prince Ladislaus Czartoryski delivered a speech at a recent meeting of the Polish Historical Society in London, as a deputation from a similar organ in Paris, in which he developed the Polish plans and expectations. He drew attention to the vigorous Panslavic propagandism which Russia is now carrying on along the Danube, and maintained that, should the ideas of "young Russia" ever be realized, 100,000,000 of one of the most gifted of races would be united under the sway of an absolute military monarch. On the other hand, should the Prussian programme be carried out, Germany will form another great monarchy of nearly 70,000,000 of a race of still greater powers and in a higher state of civilization. This consummation reached, Europe would virtually consist of but two states, and thus one of the most valuable guarantees of freedom and progress be destroyed. The remedy, says Prince Czartoryski, is to build up a third great monarchy on the Danube to interpose between these colossi. For this Austria offers the basis, and the Poles can render powerful assistance in the work. Moreover, Austria being separated at last in interest as well as in feeling from both Prussia and Russia, her partners in the crime of the partition, offers the Poles an asylum and rallying ground in Galicia, in which they can set up their old altars, keep alive their language which Russia is now making a desperate effort to extinguish, and prepare the way by practice in government and close alliance with Hungarians to bear their part in the next great shock of arms in Eastern Europe. Unless some such plan as this can be carried out and Austria saved and strengthened, Prince Czartoryski thinks Russia will one day encamp "on the shores of the Adriatic and at the foot of the Alps." Whatever may be the general value of these anticipations, there is no question that the concession of autonomy to Galicia, or even its enjoyment of its present constitutional government, does give the Poles such a base of operations as they have never had since the extinction of their nationality.

The news from Germany indicates increasing uneasiness in the relations between Prussia and France. Two recent incidents have done much to increase it. The "Customs Parliament," a body which meets simply to regulate the fiscal relations of the German states both north and south, all now being members of a Zollverein, or Customs League, has shown marked symptoms of a tendency to become something more than a regulator of import and export duties. The speech of the King at the opening, and the language of many of the members from southern Germany, gave strong indications of a tendency on the part of this organization to bring about a closer political union between North and South Germany than the mere alliance, offensive and defensive, which now exists. The French Government are making stout attempts to conceal or deny its existence, but the opposition is again taking the alarm, and its newspapers have begun to prophesy the speedy consolidation of all Germany under Prussia, and to taunt the Government with its blindness and imbecility in not seeing what is coming or making any effort to oppose it. The other incident is the extraordinary cordiality of the reception recently given in Italy to the Crown Prince of Prussia. He has taken such pains to make the cordiality marked and conspicuous that it is impossible to avoid seeing in his visit a political demonstration, and Bismark begins to be suspected by some of the shrewder Italian politicians of desiring to goad France into taking the initiative in hostilities by marked manifestations of affection for Italy, just as Cavour goaded Austria in 1859 by his hugging of France.

The French press bill is now before the Senate, but the newspapers have ceased commenting on it, on the ground that the arguments of senators are sure to have no weight, and that no matter how they argue the result will be the same. There is a strong opposition to it, however, from the members of the extreme reactionary party, who say that its passage will lead to the early overthrow of the government, as a free press would "corrupt" universal suffrage, and lead the ignorant masses to vote against the Empire. The way in which the debate on this bill in both Chambers has brought out the real views of the Imperialists with regard to universal suffrage is very interesting. They now make no secret of their looking on the popular vote as the leaders of the Democratic party in this country look on it, as safe and respectable only in so far as it is a blind confirmation of the opinions and policy of a few educated chiefs. Universal suffrage exercised by a thinking, reading people they regard with horror, and do not deny it. The Liberals, even those who were most opposed to the extension of the franchise before Louis Philippe's downfall, have now, however, embraced the universal suffrage with great ardor, and are turning on the Cæsarists their own guns. "Let us have universal suffrage," say they, "but let it be real. The numerical majority shall set up and cast down as they please, but everybody must have an equal chance of influencing them. Nobody must be gagged or called to account for anything he says to them. The préfets must not have a monopoly of advice or persuasion." M. Duverger de la Hauranne has been writing strongly in this sense in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and, barring some very foggy passages on that very foggy subject, the "natural right" of voting, he writes with great force and clearness, and certainly sketches a programme from which the Imperialists have more to fear than anything the Liberals have yet attempted. In the debate on the press bill in the Senate, M. Segur d'Agouesseau frankly informed that body that if it passed the bill it would "commit suicide." One sign of the times of some value has just appeared in an election to the Council-General of the Department of the Deux Sèvres, where the Government candidate was defeated by a majority of 1,496 to 688, in spite of a circular addressed by the préfet to the schoolmasters, marked "private and confidential," directing them to canvass for the government candidate on the ground that his rival was opposed to "a government which defends the bases of social order." In three more important elections to the Corp Législatif, though the Government carried two, it did so by greatly decreased majorities, in spite of vigorous exertions on the part of the préfets.

M. Léon Plée, a Paris journalist, has been amusing himself with getting up a pamphlet, containing what he calls the "Curiosities of the (French) Budget." Some of the items are interesting. The legislature costs the country $2,921,182; but the Emperor costs it $5,000,000, the amount of his civil list. Supposing him to be worth, as a law-maker, the whole Corps Législatif, Senate, and Ministers of State put together, which we do not think is estimating him at all extravagantly, there still remains an outlay of $2,000,000 for the merely ornamental part of him, which, considering the comfort that it gives the French people, is certainly not dear. They like the "Chief of the State" to cut a good figure, and are willing to pay for the luxury of seeing him splendidly arrayed and lodged and attended. Louis Napoleon has an immense advantage over the Orleans dynasty in understanding this peculiarity of his subjects, and accordingly denies himself nothing. Probably nothing did more to shake Louis Philippe's throne, by loosening his hold on the imagination and taste of the French people, than his simplicity of living.

THE PLATFORM AND THE NOMINATIONS.

THE last two nominations for the Presidency of the Republican party have had one excellent characteristic, in that the nominees were well-known men who had given tangible proof of a high order of administrative ability. Whatever may be thought of the system of nominating conventions in general, it is quite certain that no other system could have done better in 1864 and 1868 than select Lincoln and Grant for the Presidency, and no other system could have acted on a better principle of selection than that which guided the choice in these two cases. The latest nominations for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency have had another excellent characteristic in that—one might almost say for the first time since the manufacture of candidates was reduced to an art—"the claims of localities" have had no influence upon them. Grant has owed nothing to the fact that he comes from Illinois and Colfax nothing to the fact that he comes from Indiana, and neither has found his path impeded by the consideration that both are Western men. In short, Andrew Johnson, if he has done no other good, has taught the party a pretty sharp lesson, both as to the importance of the Vice-President and the danger of selecting him on complimentary or geographical grounds. We have, in fact, at last got two candidates for the highest places in the Government who owe their nomination to their own qualities and career simply, and one of them enjoys the singular and unprecedented distinction of having been selected without ever having made a speech, and without concealing his intention of never making one. It is impossible not to see in these facts evidence of the inroads which the rationalistic spirit bred by the war is making on the old political traditions. Not only have the old considerations had little influence on the nominations, but the old political managers have had less than usual to do in drawing up the platform and conducting the preliminary deliberations. Most of the great party sages of eight, or even four, years ago were absent from the convention. Its spirit and springs of action were supplied by younger men, to whom the ancient canons and the ancient ways were a scoffing and a byword. Men like Hawley and Carl Schurz, who were on this occasion high in the party councils, would eight years ago have been looked on as babes, and their talk as babble, and their ideas as visions.

Moreover, in spite of the prodigious amount of noise made during the last year by the "War Horses," we find neither in the nominations nor in the platform much, if any, trace of their influence. A man more decidedly distasteful to them than Grant it would be hard to select. Most of his most prominent characteristics are to them evidences of either weakness or immorality, and his reticence they consider either a vice or a disease. They were wildly opposed to his pretensions two years ago, and have only come over to him owing to his quarrel with Johnson, and the backsliding or misfortunes of their own favorites; but his character they do not admire, and never will. They are accepting him as they accepted Lincoln in 1864, as a horrible necessity. Mr. Colfax is much nearer their ideal; but then he is nearer everybody's ideal, because he has few salient characteristics, and has the happy knack of being all things to all men. Their peculiar ideas, too, have found no expression in the platform. It strongly endorses the Congressional plan of reconstruction; but it repudiates the idea of taking the regulation of the suffrage out of the hands of the States, and it opens up a prospect for the South not of perennial persecution and subjection, but of as early a removal of all political restrictions and disabilities as the state of the country will show to be safe. Moreover, instead of proposing "to take all seeming or actual wrong out of the public debt," as Messrs. Butler and Stevens proposed, by paying off the public creditors in rag money, manufactured by the Government, in accordance with the letter of the law, it proposes, in the heartiest and most emphatic language, to pay the debt in the spirit as well as in the letter of the law, as men of honor pay their debts, and not as sharpers pay them. In other words, it silences, as far as the Republican party is concerned, the repudiation cry in all its forms, and even administers Senator Sherman an indirect but well-merited rebuke in pointing out that the best way to effect a conversion of the bonds at a lower rate of interest is to improve the national credit. In fact, his plan of lowering the rate of interest to be paid by the Government by throwing doubts on its willingness to pay the rate it has already agreed to pay, was a striking illustration of the imprudence of hoisting one's sails before one knows for certain which way the wind is blowing.

The weak points in the platform are luckily mostly unimportant ones. If it pleases anybody to have it said that the thirty-five senators who voted for Mr. Johnson's conviction were right in so voting, we see no good reason for not saying it. Nobody, as far as our observation has gone, has ever blamed them. We should be very glad if we could attach a little more importance to the opinion of the Convention upon the force of the evidence in a case which they did not hear, and on points of law which they have never studied; but there is no harm that we know of in their making up their minds on both one and the other, and speaking it out, particularly as their doing so probably prevented the utterance of imputations on the character of the minority in the Senate and the committal of the party to a course which would have damned it. Republicans can least of all men afford to say, solemnly and calmly, that a trial in which the judges are sworn to decide "according to the law and the evidence," and in which witnesses are examined on oath, and the accusation is presented in distinct and definite articles, ought to be made a party proceeding. Such performances as this must be left to the Democrats and "them that hate the light."

The section in which mention is made of the corruption of the public service is, we confess, the only one that has thoroughly disappointed us, because it is both evasive and misleading. Mr. Johnson is no doubt responsible for some of this corruption, but for a very small amount after all. The great body of the cheats with whom the civil service is infested are persons who have been put into office on the recommendation of Republican politicians, whose suggestions Mr. Johnson could not, if he would, have disregarded. In fact, the influence of any President in this matter is very small. Nearly all appointments are in the hands of Congressmen, and the last thing these gentlemen think of enquiring into is the character and competency of their nominees. Mr. Johnson has no doubt retained bad men in office, knowing them to be bad, and appointed men with every reason to believe that they were not good, but then all Presidents have done this; all Presidents will continue to do it till the system is changed. Mr. Lincoln made many execrable appointments, and we should probably have never heard of Mr. Johnson's shortcomings in this respect if he had not quarrelled with the party. We do not dwell on this matter in a carping spirit. We may safely appeal to every honest politician in the country, and to every honest official, and to every man who has ever looked into the subject, to say whether he believes that any change of President will render the civil service of this country anything but a sink of corruption until the whole system of appointment is changed—and the system of appointment will never be changed till some party is found patriotic and high-minded enough to say that, for the sake of the country, it will surrender the means of rewarding its adherents and punishing its enemies involved in the control of the public patronage. The Republican party is not prepared to do this; we are not prepared to say that it is strong enough to do it; but we cannot help protesting against its attempt to shift the whole responsibility of the abuses on Mr. Johnson's shoulders. He is probably not even indirectly responsible for the loss of one-half of one per cent. of all the money stolen from the Government. Moreover, as we have taken the liberty of pointing out not long ago, vague denunciations of corruption in general deceive nobody, scare nobody, and do no good. All parties make them. The Democratic party will make one next July. They are all sure to meet with a hearty response, the voices of the thieves being always loudest. What we want is a definite plan of reform. Of that, one does not hear a whisper from any convention.

The resolution directed against the doctrine of indefeasible allegiance is, of course, only a kind of feu de joie. That particular doctrine has, just now, no defenders. The British Government is ready to surrender it on demand; the Prussian Government has surrendered it; and the French do not assert it. The trouble is that nobody here seems to be in any particular hurry to have it settled. It was owing to Mr. Wright's zeal and activity that negotiations were begun on the subject with the Prussian Government, Mr. Seward rather hindering than helping him by discharging spherical bombast at all the nations of the earth through the New York Herald. The prompt settlement of the matter on a rational basis would also deprive Mr. Banks of his sole occupation, and he naturally lends no aid to anything of the kind; and it is to be hoped the formal utterance of the party on this subject will hasten legislation or negotiation.

It is impossible to say that the Convention has dealt with the suffrage question resolutely or sufficiently. It may be imprudent to talk now of the assumption of any power to regulate it on the part of Congress, but it ought to be said in clear terms that the question will never be settled, and agitation about it will never cease, and the condition of the South will continue to be a perplexity and burden, until limits are set by the Federal Constitution to the disfranchising power of the States. Conditions in the enabling acts will not hold water for many years, and Southern politicians will not give up what they consider the cause of the white race till they are robbed by a Federal prohibition of the power of disfranchising for anything but ignorance, or of treating the ignorance of a colored man as any greater disqualification than that of the white man. Nothing short of this will be a final settlement.

Nothing could have been better, however, than the spirit of the Convention or of the platform. No political party has, on the whole, ever set before itself nobler aims, or chosen wiser ways of attaining them. There has never been a platform which has had less to fear from the scrutiny either of the practical man or the theorist. It is impossible to read the speeches addressed to the Convention by General Hawley and Carl Schurz without feeling that any organization to which its leading men can speak in this strain must be capable of great things, and that the spirit, whatever it was, which gave the war its glory and sanctity, and brought it through many failures and many abuses to a triumphant issue, still lives in the party ranks, and will let perish none of the good things the armed struggle has accomplished, nor ever despair of adding to the number.

THE CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

Taking advantage of the comparative lull in the ordinary business of legislation, Mr. Jenckes on Thursday week introduced his bill to regulate the civil service of the United States. He reported it from the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, and he supported it by a speech which was reported in the telegraphic summary as having occupied an hour, but not one word of its contents or of the scheme of the bill was given. The plan is substantially that of Mr. Jenckes's original bill on this subject. It creates a department of the civil service, to be presided over by the Vice-President, with a board of four commissioners, to be appointed for five years. Their duties are, first, to prescribe the qualifications requisite for an appointment into each branch and grade of the civil service; next, to provide for the examinations and periods and conditions of probation of all persons eligible and presenting themselves for admission into the civil service; third, to establish rules for applications, examinations, and appointments; and finally, to examine personally, or by persons by them specially designated, the applicants for appointment into the civil service of the United States. The act then goes on to provide for the order and manner in which appointments to the civil service shall be made from those who have passed the prescribed examination and probation.

The proposed law is clear and simple, short and to the purpose, free from preambles and provisos, and it is so plain that he who runs for office must hereafter read it, and understand it. The army of office-holders now in place, and of their prospective successors, must look upon it as their shibboleth, and learn from it how to live and die in office. Of the greatness of the task which he has undertaken Mr. Jenckes shows a thorough comprehension. He proposes utterly to destroy the great American curse of party patronage. He says, on the eve of a Presidential election, that it is for the interest of the country to pass a law which will forbid the removal of fifty thousand officials as the result of a change in the political complexion of the Government. Not content with a theoretical discussion of the merits of a permanent civil service, Mr. Jenckes tells us that he has taken the testimony of the greater number of the chief officers in the existing civil service, and he gives us the result. The Committee on Retrenchment have received reports from 446 officers confirmed by the Senate, in all branches of the civil service, whose subordinates within the operation of this act number 12,819, and of these officers 362, having 11,561 subordinates, express themselves decidedly in favor of the proposed reform. Of the residue, 12 officers, having 143 subordinates, express a decided opposition to it, and the remainder either do not answer the vital questions at all or answer them evasively.

With such facts, plainly and tersely put, as they are in this speech of Mr. Jenckes, it is easier to find forcible arguments in support of the measure than to educe them from our general and theoretical belief in its efficiency. What are the substantial rewards which Mr. Jenckes promises for the fruits of his bill if it be made law? Double the amount of the present service at two-thirds of the present cost; a saving in the expense of the collection of the revenues of one-half the fifteen millions which it now takes; and, finally, an addition of revenue from the subjects of taxation proposed to be retained by the Committee of Ways and Means of fifty millions in the internal revenue and twenty-five millions in the customs. In short, the country will be richer by a hundred millions every year if it adopt a law which will do more to elevate the politics of the country from the great Serbonian bog in which it is now bedraggled and bemired, more to make statesmen of our politicians, financiers and economists of our revenue officials, more to save the people from corruption, more to preserve the Government from mischief, more to renew and restore and sustain the virtues of the Republic, than all the legislation of the last decade.

With a Constitution purified from slavery, with a Government under it that has undergone the throes of civil war, of dissensions between its co-ordinate branches, and with a people honestly and heartily in earnest to maintain both the Government and the Constitution, there is still a vice in the administration of the laws which almost palsies them. This mischief lies in the shifting, changing, uncertain, and gradually decaying condition of our civil service. Up to the breaking out of the rebellion it mattered little how the officers of the United States exercised their functions, for the Government was seen rather than felt, it was an idea rather than a fact. All this changed with the rebellion, with the enormous efforts of the Government to maintain itself, with the burdens put on the people by the success of these efforts, and with the taxes and the vast addition of revenue and outlay that were then voluntarily assumed. The task of adjusting these burdens to our capacity, to make sources of national income without destroying national wealth, has tested the fitness of our political system to do this work. In any other country than our own, with its youth, its wealth, its vigor, its unlimited expanse of territory, its growing tide of emigration, the Government would have broken down. That it will not do so now may well call forth all our gratitude. That it may be strengthened and fitted for the work that it has yet to do, in developing the power and capacity of the country in industrial and in other directions, there must be a reform in that one thing which has hitherto been the pitfall of every political party, and the blighting curse of the young men who belonged to one or other of the great armies of our Government by parties. This reform is, as we believe, effected by Mr. Jenckes's bill—at least it is aimed at; and as tentative legislation has been the best thing that we could get in other matters, so it may be the best, or in the end it may secure us that which is best, in our civil service.

As we have remarked elsewhere, every party and every politician is ready enough to denounce corruption in the abstract. Nobody will ever have the hardihood to get up and defend the appointment of dishonest men to public offices, or the practice of cheating the Government. There will never be a party avowedly and notoriously held together by "the cohesive power of public plunder," and which it will be sufficient to turn out of office in order to secure purity and efficiency. Therefore, when a party passes resolutions against corruption in general, as the Republican party has just been doing, it merely fires blank cartridge. It makes a fine, exhilarating noise, but it does not hurt or frighten the knaves. Under the present system no party can be honest, because no party can change human nature. Therefore, the public ought not to be, and we trust will not be, content any longer with vague denunciations of fraud. It ought to demand practical measures of reform, set down in black and white. It ought not any longer to put up with windy abuse of Andrew Johnson or of the Copperheads. In this kind of work no knave ever is, or ever will be, found wanting.

This bill of Mr. Jenckes's we hold to be the first and greatest of the measures of reform now before the country—the one on which most is dependent not simply of money, but of public and private morality. He has worked long and hard at it, and it is a kind of work with which the regular party managers have, as a rule, little sympathy. He is not likely, we fear, to succeed without active and outspoken support from the public, and we trust he will receive it without stint in season and out of season, especially from that large class of young men who are now interesting themselves in politics, under the influence of the wider knowledge and higher aspirations which the war has bred. We trust, too, that he will be of good cheer. If political progress consist, as we believe it does, in the greater and greater subjection of human affairs to the control of enlightened reason, the future belongs to him and to such as he, and not to the windy declaimers who, while holding the great horn of humanity with one hand and blowing it lustily, generally hold with the other a leash of hungry peculators, to be let loose at every convenient opportunity on the unfortunate tax-payer.

PANSLAVISM.*

II.

The idea of Kollar, thus put into practice, was the first germ of Panslavism. From a literary union of all the Slavi there was, in thought, only one step to a political union. This slight salto was soon made by the Slavic agitators, who were secretly, and for obvious reasons, aided by Russian agents and subsidies, and here and there also by Austrian agencies, desirous to counteract the growing power of the Hungarian nationality. It was easy to prove from history that it was weakness arising from disunion among the Slavi which had subjected them and kept them subject to the sway of the Germans, the Hungarians, and the Turks; that it was through union alone that they could revindicate the prominent position due them by right of numbers and by right of history among the great races of the European world. Germany and Italy, too, after similar experiences, were striving for union. But as in Germany and Italy two opposite courses were pursued, by various political factions, toward the same aim—an agitation for democratic union through revolution, and an agitation for monarchical union through the houses of Hohenzollern and Savoy respectively—so the Panslavistic world soon split into a democratic party, aiming at a republican confederation—the result of a general revolution—and a Russian party, aiming at a union created and headed by the Czar. The democratic scheme, which could be achieved only by the total or partial breaking up of Austria, Prussia, Russia, and Turkey, and against the opposition of both Germans and Magyars, was adventurous and perilous in the extreme, and almost chimerical. The other was decidedly more practical, but it lacked the concurrence of all true liberals and Poles, who dreaded in the event of its success the final absorption of Poland and all other Slavic nationalities in Russia, the victory of Czarism over all its enemies, a centralism worse than that of the Roman emperors, and the triumph of Eastern barbarism over European civilization. But as long as the question remained, so to say, a theoretical one, the Panslavistic movement proceeded almost in harmony, the anonymous author of the "Pentarchy" (Leipsic, 1839)—an agent of Russia—the above-named Slavic writers, and a host of others, among whom we find the Poles Mieroslawski, Libelt, Wielopolski, and the late Count Adam Gurowski, contributing to its advance from various stand-points.

But powerful events soon made this Slavic movement one of the highest importance. The revolutions of February and March, 1848, convulsed the west and centre of Europe, shook the thrones of Austria and Prussia, and gave all power into the hands of the people. In Austria the Hungarians were the first to profit by this change, turning it to the advantage both of liberty and of the Magyar nationality. This led to violent anti-demonstrations on the part of the Croats, Slavonians, and Rascians, who demanded constitutional changes incompatible with the integrity of Hungary. The Austrian government, or rather the court of Vienna, not at all surprised by these dissensions and wranglings, secretly fanned them into a flame which kindled an internecine war of races, in which the Romanic Wallachs, too, took part against the Hungarians. In the meanwhile the Poles of Posen had risen against the Prussians, and had been defeated. Galicia, exhausted by the massacre of her nobles in 1846, remained inactive. The Bohemians now hastened to take the lead in the Slavic movement. A general Slavic congress, convoked by Palacky and others, assembled in Prague. The tendency of the time made it a democratic and revolutionary gathering; no Russians, except exiles, appeared. But before any important resolutions could be formed a collision between some Czech youths and the Austrian troops, under Prince Windischgrätz, led to a bombardment of the city, the disarmament of the Czechs, and the dispersion of the congress. Emboldened by this victory and by others in Italy, the Austrian government now threw down the gauntlet to Hungary, and ordered the Ban of Croatia, Jellachich, to invade that country at the head of a Slavic army. The Hungarian constitution, the only sheet-anchor of liberty in Austria, was to be put down by semi-barbarous Slavic hordes. At this critical juncture the chasm which separated the two Panslavic camps became apparent. The Czechs, deeming it possible to establish the predominance of the Slavi in Austria, declared in favor of the government, defended by the Croats and Rascians; the Poles, burning to revenge the wrongs of 1846 and to destroy one of their three oppressors, flocked to the banners of Hungary and freedom. And thus, throughout the Hungarian war of 1848 and 1849, Slavi fought against Slavi. The first practical attempt at Panslavism ended in smoke—in the smoke of bloody battle-fields. Russia finally decided against Bem, Dembinski, and Kossuth, and victorious Austria deceived the Croats, Rascians, and Czechs. When the victory was complete, Austria's last word was—Germanization without liberty.

But Magenta and Solferino, in 1859, revenged Temesvár and Világos. Hungary was to be conciliated, or the empire would perish. The House of Hapsburg vacillated and hesitated, until Königgrätz, in 1866, put an end to vacillation. Both Hungary and Galicia were conciliated, the Magyar and Polish elements, united with the German, forming the basis of the liberal system inaugurated under the lead of Deák and Beust; the Czechs and the South-Austrian Slavi were spurned. The Czechs, who even during the Polish insurrection of 1863–64 partly sympathized with Russia, and their southern allies, who had been long dreaming of a South-Slavic empire, to consist of parts of Austria and parts of Turkey, have now turned their eyes towards Moscow and St. Petersburg as the Mecca and Medina of the Slavic world. On their part, the Russian people and government, exasperated by their defeats and humiliations in the Crimean war, by the ingratitude of Austria, and still more by the threats of Western interference in favor of Poland which became loud in 1863, have now, almost without reserve, espoused the cause of Panslavism, in its Czaric form, expecting through it to revenge past insults, to extinguish the last vestige of Polish nationality, to extend the limits of Russia to the Adriatic and the Bosphorus, to rule, and even to regenerate, Europe. A grand Panslavic gathering, convoked and fêted last year at Moscow, at which even Palacky and Rieger, formerly leading liberal members of the Austrian Parliament, appeared as representatives of Bohemia, and at which high imperial dignitaries spoke in the name of Russia, has made it manifest to the world how far things have gone on both sides. The absence of the Poles, however—only Ruthenians representing, or rather misrepresenting, the Polish provinces—and some later demonstrations of even Czechic opposition, like the recent brilliant pamphlet of Fric, have made it equally clear that the Panslavo-Czaric coalition is far from being acquiesced in by all concerned.

But so much is certain, Panslavism has long ceased to be a chimera. It has become a live idea, agitating eighty millions of people—we exclude the Poles—and perhaps destined soon to shake the world as terribly as Islamism did in the seventh, and again in the fifteenth, century. Of those eighty millions of Slavi, two-thirds, united under the sceptre of the Czar and the emblem of the Greek cross, backed by twenty million fellow-subjects of different race but mostly of the same creed, and aided by ten million Roumanian and Greek co-religionists in Turkey and Austria, are to call to arms—if not to regenerate and annex—almost all the rest of the Slavi (embracing nearly as many Greeks as Catholics), leading them to a deadly strife against Turks, Hungarians, Germans, and Poles. This struggle, if successful, whether ultimately resulting in the regeneration and independence of the south-western Slavi, or, which is more likely, in their subjugation by Russia, would in any case bring about the total ruin of the Moslems in Europe, the fall of Hungarian liberty and supremacy, the extinction of the Polish nationality, the breaking up of Austria, and the destruction of German civilization in the East; it would replace the crescent by the Greek cross on the dome of St. Sophia, would convert the Euxine into a Russian lake, and make the Czar, whose Cossacks even now guard the banks of the Amoor, the Araxes, the Jaxartes, and the Tornea, the most powerful ruler that ever wielded a sceptre.

Victorious Panslavism, therefore, means not only death to Turkey, Hungary, Poland, and Austria; it also means the domination of Russia and her Church, without a rival able to cope with them, in both Asia and Europe; it means Russian sway over the Aral and the Caspian, the Euxine and the Archipelago, the Baltic and the Adriatic; it means the pressing back of the eastern boundaries of Germany and a menace to her independence. Hence the constant dread of Turkey; hence the opposition of Austria to every step taken by Russia, openly or covertly, in the direction of the Danube; hence the alacrity of the Hungarians and Poles to meet the liberal, and this time sincere, advances of the house of Hapsburg; hence the jealous alarms of France and England, and their readiness to stand by Austria and Turkey; hence the activity of the Catholic clergy in opposing and baffling the intrigues and plots of Russian emissaries in Galicia, Bulgaria, and Hungary; hence the hesitation of Prussia—though she might at first gain by the fall of Austria and the extinction of Poland—to conclude a defensive and offensive alliance with her powerful eastern neighbor, a hesitation which may also keep the new Prince of Roumania—a Hohenzollern prince—from throwing himself into the arms of the Czar.

Will all these opposing forces, coupled with the financial weakness of the Russian empire, long prevent the Czar from crossing the Rubicon, and casting the die of war, urged on, as he is, by vistas of glory, the sting of opposition, and the fanaticism of his people? Will those opposing forces long remain in harmony, or will awakening mutual jealousies paralyze their action? Will an accident bring about the long-delayed fatal collision? Into which of the scales is Prussia likely to throw her weight? Into which is victory likely to throw hers? All these and many similar questions involuntarily present themselves, but it is beyond our powers, as it is beyond our province, to answer them.

POPULAR MOVEMENTS.

If you say to any young American between the ages of twenty-five and thirty that you lament the lack in America of leaders; of men capable of restraining and educating as well as sharing popular feeling; that you are sorry not to see a larger class composed of men like the Adamses and Jays of a former generation, the chances are ten to one that he will reply to you somewhat in this strain: "My dear sir, that is no longer necessary; the day of leaders of the people has passed, and the day of popular movements has arrived. It was very well in times when 'the people' meant an uneducated, thoughtless throng that they should be guided to the attainment of desirable objects by men of commanding intellect and temper, but now that the people are themselves enlightened and liberal, no such necessity exists. The people nowadays know what they want far better than any individual, and the proof of this is that all the great movements of to-day are popular in their origin and popular in their management. We know very well that our legislators and governors are rather the executors of our will than stimulators of it, and this is because we are our own legislators and governors. When anything is to be done, the people know and do it."

There are, however, many strong reasons for not yielding entire assent to this theory. It is a little curious, to say the least, that so important and interesting a theory as this one of movements en masse should gain so little ground in departments of human affairs not political. For certainly if in the most complicated of all secular arts leaders are no longer requisite, they cannot be needed in the rest. Yet we do not hear that war can be waged without generals—at least we have not heard any suggestion to this effect since Grant and Sherman and Sheridan showed us how well war with generals might be waged; we do not even hear that an exploring expedition can be successfully made without a chief, nor that a ship can be well sailed without a captain; shareholders in railroads find that a board of directors is necessary for efficient management, and it is generally admitted that those railroads are best managed which have the best board of directors. We may obtain instruction in this matter from children, who will tell any one that there is no game of base-ball without a captain of the nine, and no victory at hockey or foot-ball without leading minds—perhaps not aristocratic, but certainly leading. Is politics, then—a much more complicated game than either hockey or war—the only department of human activity where no organization and no management are required, where the most fitting act, as it were (and this is a metaphor very frequently in the mouths of those who believe in the theory of popular movements), is the act of surging? We do not deny at all that leaders, if they exist in America, must be sought generally outside of the places where politicians are to be expected—must be sought in the lyceum, in newspapers, and in magazines—but it is unfortunate and a mischief that they should so rarely be found anywhere else.

But these are general considerations. If you mention them to the young American to whom we have referred, he will admit them, but will still contend that you cannot point to any single important movement in American politics which has taken place of late years that has not been popular in its inception, organization, and issue. And it is precisely this assertion that seems to us contradicted by many recent facts. It is to these facts that we must turn. The anti-slavery movement, to begin with, is commonly cited as an example of popular movements, notwithstanding the fact that the anti-slavery agitators were for a long time the most unpopular and the most bitterly hated men and women in America; that this popular party were a mere handful in the midst of multitudinous opponents; that their popular tenets were unanimously denounced as immoral and subversive of order; that their popular presses were destroyed, and their popular leader mobbed in the streets. Did Mr. Garrison, when a rope was tied round his body, and he was dragged through Boston, believe that he was only witnessing a testimonial to the popularity of his principles? On the contrary, those were the days when it was said that there was a "great popular movement against the Abolitionists, sir;" and now that the Abolitionists have triumphed, the discovery has been made that the great popular movement was in favor of, not against them. The fact of the matter is that there was no movement at all; there was nothing but stagnation until men of leading minds and tempers were found, as Garrison, Phillips, and John Brown, to set the current of popular will flowing. It is very true that these men were not in places of political prominence, and that the men who were in the places of political prominence became less and less strong as the anti-slavery agitation became stronger, thus furnishing support to the fancy that there were no leaders in the country; but leaders may, as we have just said, be in one place as well as another—may be in Congress, on the stump, or conducting newspapers. Reconstruction on its present basis has been said to be another instance of popular management of popular measures, but reconstruction has been carried out as a corollary to the war, chiefly by the same leaders who attempted the solution of the main problem; and even in reconstruction we can recollect a time when the popular movement, or at any rate its direction, was so uncertain that a few gentlemen who were very much interested in the question thought it necessary to meet at Faneuil Hall, in Boston, and made speeches and passed resolutions, certainly intended to do the work of leadership, and as certainly having this peculiarity, that the ideas contained in them were destined to be embodied in subsequent Congressional enactments.

Take a more recent instance. A few months since two demagogues tried to persuade the country that there was a popular desire for repudiation, and for a little while there seemed a good deal of doubt whether the attempt would not be successful. For a short time there seemed to be no movement at all; people were pleased or shocked, amused or alarmed, but nothing was done. General Butler prepared an argument of amazing force and conclusiveness, showing not only that dishonesty was legal, but that it was moral. What followed in one small State is very curious. While some persons were assuring their neighbors that a "great popular movement" in favor of repudiation was setting in, and others were deploring the absence of leading minds, and hopelessly regretting the decadence of American statesmanship, there appeared in the Boston Advertiser one or two letters signed with the initials "W. E." It is hardly too much to say that for Massachusetts the question of repudiation was settled by "W. E." There was seen in his letters a knowledge of his subject, a practical sagacity in dealing with it, and an honesty which won him a hearing, and, a hearing once obtained, the same qualities gave him the victory over his antagonist. Now, very few people knew "W. E.," or even knew who "W. E." was, and those who did know have, for the most part, very likely by this time forgotten what part he took in the debate on the payment of the five-twenties. He was not in Congress, not even in political life, not even a lecturer. Correspondents of newspapers are not recognized as a political body by the Constitution; and yet he did the work of a political leader. He furnished the people within the range of his influence with facts and arguments which required time, patience, and an educated mind to gather, all the more so because the subject to which they related had been obscured by the advocate of the repudiationists, while his reasoning was charged with the energy which is drawn from and also carries with it conviction.

It is said that the second election of Mr. Lincoln and the nomination of General Grant are examples of popular movements, and those who dispute the general theory are asked to show who, if not the people at large, were the leaders in them. The arguments already used incline us to believe that there were leaders—such as editors, contributors, and correspondents of newspapers and magazines, public speakers and lecturers not in political life, private speakers and writers and lecturers also. But we do not need to dwell very long on this, because in each case there was one leader, specially prominent, whose leadership was half the battle—in the case of Mr. Lincoln the leader was Mr. Lincoln, and in the case of General Grant the leader was General Grant. In 1864, a man who had won the admiration of the people by the careful management of the most intricate affairs of state, their respect by the qualities of character which he had displayed in a position exposing him to anxious watchfulness and sharp criticism, their sympathy by his own sympathy with them, was President of the country. A new President was to be elected, and the question in every one's mind was whom to elect. Now, it is very true that Mr. Lincoln did not publish a card recommending himself to the suffrages of the people; but, as plainly as any words could have said it, he said: "Elect me again, and you have a continuity of administration in the most difficult crisis of the war, when it is most needed; fail to elect me, and there is no certainty what the future will be. My arguments are my past government and what you know of my character." Mr. Lincoln was the most effective leader in his own election. And so also will it be with Grant. Grant never speaks or writes when he can avoid speaking or writing; he is not in political but military life; and it is argued from these facts that he cannot by any reasoning be shown to be a political leader. But he is saying, to all intents and purposes, every day of his life: "You want a cool, firm, quiet President, pledged to carry out a certain policy. Elect me, and you have one. Fail to elect me, and there is no certainty what you will have." There is no argument more effective than this, and there is no more effective way of putting it, for a man already well known, than not putting it at all. It seems clear, when the matter is regarded in this light, that Grant himself is the chief mover in Grant's nomination.

One unfortunate result of the prevalence of this theory of popular movements has been the diffusion of the notion that it matters comparatively little who have charge of the national affairs; it is becoming more and more common for persons of intelligence and patriotism to believe that the aggregate sense of a thousand untrained minds is a better test of the value of a political measure, or even of a legal opinion, than the individual sense of a single trained mind. We could not have a better proof of this than the evidence afforded by the resolutions lately adopted by mass meetings for the purpose of coercing Senators into voting for the conviction of Mr. Johnson. The resolutions state that in the opinion of the meetings the Managers of the Impeachment have made out their case—which is nothing less than saying that the passers of the resolutions are more competent to decide upon the value of evidence which they have not read, and the bearing of law which they have not studied, than men who have heard every tittle of the one and carefully examined all the points of the other. When the Senate is a court, if the people en masse are thought fit to exercise the functions imposed by the Constitution upon a judicial body, we may expect an early application of the principle to other fields. And a sign of that approaching application may be seen in Ohio, where a Democratic popular movement is on foot to impeach certain judges who recently decided a law passed by a Democratic legislature to be unconstitutional. Hitherto law has been felt to be a branch of knowledge over which the people had no power except in the way of legislative change.

JOURNALISTIC DRAMSHOPS.

We once, during the war, attempted to attend a political meeting at the Cooper Institute in this city, but were unable to obtain admission owing to the crowd, so we occupied ourselves with the proceedings of the outsiders who were assembled round a platform in the street, under the glare of a calcium light. The night was fine and warm, and there were a large number of persons sauntering about the open space, but the audience in front of the platform was small and listless. The orator was, nevertheless, working with all his might, and was dealing, as well as his physical powers would let him, with some of the weightiest problems of human society; but neither his loftiest flights nor his deepest descents seemed to produce much impression. Suddenly, having occasion to chastise some of the villains of the opposite party, he betook himself to a liberal use of the terms "damned" and "damnation" and "be-damned," and forthwith there was a general rush from all quarters of the square to the platform, and he found himself in less time than we have taken to describe it addressing a large and eager and interested body of his fellow-citizens. As long as he cursed and swore they hung on his lips, but when he dropped down to the ordinary level of his discourse and became simply didactic or argumentative, the listeners once more fell away, and he was soon wasting himself on the original band of disciples. A second outburst of profane commination produced a similar result, but the evanescence of his triumph seemed to dishearten him, for he did not try the successful vein a third time, and his peroration was delivered to a mere group including two policemen.

The incident furnishes a good illustration of the value of the principle on which the law is based which in this city—and for aught we know in others—closes the grogshops on election day. Men, of course, are prone to drink merely to kill time, but they are never so prone to drink as when they are greatly excited. The craving of gamblers for stimulants is one of the most familiar features of life in the great "hells." The numerous glasses of cognac which the man who has staked the remnant of his patrimony tosses off, thus adding fuel to the flame which is already devouring his brain, have heightened the horror of readers of "tales of real life" for many a year. In fact, there is nothing that the mass of men like as much as excitement, and one of the peculiarities of excitement is, that all excited people crave more of it. The Sixth Ward politician, when he is roused by the political feeling, finds his craving for whiskey absolutely intolerable, though there is no day on which his nerves need less stimulation than election day. The same thing is true, mutatis mutandis, of better educated—nay, of highly moral and religious people. When their blood is up, their everyday meat and drink become insipid. When they are agitated by a great political crisis, for instance, Reason assumes the appearance of an old grandmother seated in the chimney-corner, and advising them not to get wet feet and to avoid draughts. The arguments that were before good enough for ordinary use, by the aid of which, in fact, they were brought to the very position in which they stand, begin to taste like cistern-water after a warm day; the man who counsels reflection or forethought is regarded as a mere pedlar of simples, herb-tea, and the like, which may do for babes and women. Men need something stronger, and off they go to the nearest dramshop, which means in politics and literature the nearest newspaper office or hall in which the cursing and swearing vituperation of the wicked is served out to customers.

There is never any scarcity of these dramshops. Political and literary whiskey is just as plenty as the physical whiskey of the "rum-holes."

There is a certain class of newspapers and orators who keep a large quantity of it "in bond" during quiet times; but as soon as an election or an impeachment draws near, or a backslider has to be hunted down, they bring up their barrels and get their jugs ready, put in a fresh dash of alcohol, stick a placard in their window calling attention to their various drinks, which, however, they facetiously call "justice," "patriotism," "consistency," "fidelity," and so forth; the ingredients of all being the same, the difference of flavor being due simply to difference in proportions. During the impeachment, as might have been expected, they have driven a roaring trade. They have not for many a year made such efforts to satisfy their customers, and their customers have never before been guilty of such deep debauchery. During the ten days between the close of the case and the vote on the verdict they seem to have made arrangements to supply nothing but undiluted spirits, and the effect of this on the thousands of weak heads which thronged their bars may be readily imagined. In fact, the trade of ministering to popular passion has never worn a more repulsive aspect.

We are not, as our readers know, admirers or defenders of Andrew Johnson. We have our doubts whether the introduction into this country of the English system of turning the executive out of office whenever it lost the confidence of the legislature would work well. But there is much to be said in its favor; and if the elevation of men like Mr. Johnson to the Presidential chair, or the recurrence of crises like the reconstruction crisis, was likely to be frequent, we should unquestionably witness its introduction with rejoicing. But whether Congress ought or ought not to have the power of turning the President out of office was not the question by which the country was agitated two weeks ago, when our journalistic groggeries were supplying us with their strong drink. The question was whether it was right to clothe the mere execution of the will of the majority with the forms of a judicial enquiry; whether, after you had sworn men to act as a court, and to decide according "to the law and the evidence" on certain definite articles of accusation, after hearing the accusers and the accused, it was right for these men to act under the bidding of persons out of doors, who had taken no oath, knew nothing of the law, and had heard no evidence; whether it was right for them to sit and listen to the case with a determination in their minds to convict in any event; whether it was right, after all was over, for them to agree to set aside the conclusions of their reason and their conscience on the solicitation of unknown bodies of irresponsible persons, transmitted by telegraph?

It is generally considered painful to witness crowds of half-drunken Democrats going to the polls in New York to vote they know not for whom, and care not for what, provided the Democratic stamp be on the ticket. But the pain is lessened to any intelligent man by the reflection that they are ignorant; that they are learning; and that, after all, their vices leave the great springs of the national morality unpolluted. It is to us a far more painful spectacle to see the educated and "moral," as we have seen them during the last few weeks, drunk with the whiskey of folly and partisanship, making desperate efforts not to turn a bad man out of the Presidential chair—that is all right—but to convert judges into partisans, and to familiarize the popular mind with the spectacle of "verdicts" (vera dicta) cast under instructions from distant stumps, bar rooms, and newspaper offices. Whoever has shared in this work has endeavored to pollute the public morality at its very source. Courts are in every community the guardians of the fundamental idea on which all civilized societies rest—the idea of justice eternal, unchangeable, admitting of no modification; the idea, in fact, in which the human approaches closer than in any other to the Divine mind, through which the Divine government is most nearly reproduced on earth. Anybody who does anything to lead people to doubt its existence, or to doubt its value, or to disregard the forms which human experience has found to be necessary for its protection and perpetuation, is guilty of the gravest offence which a man can commit against his fellows. Societies may flourish under any form of government; but no society has ever flourished, or ever will flourish, in which the courts are shams, and the forms of law serve only as faded memorials of a better state of things. The "greatest criminal of the age," therefore, is not Andrew Johnson. Nothing that a poor Tennesseean tailor, ill-educated, ill-bred, raised to dignity by an accident, can do or say can shake the foundations of a political and social fabric such as ours. But when people are found amongst its moralists, sages, and philanthropists to talk of judicial independence as "treachery," of oaths as "cant," of corruption as a "duty," and when legislators are seen approaching a judge asking him to withhold his vote in a case he has sworn to decide, the real, double-dyed, unmistakable "criminals" are before us. Such conduct as that of the Missouri delegation towards Mr. Henderson ought to be legally punishable. To approach a Senator on the subject of his decision in a case pending in the "High Court," with the view of influencing him either by threats or promises or persuasions, ought to be a penitentiary offence. We say this deliberately and advisedly, and if impeachments were to be of frequent occurrence, which is not at all likely, legislation for this purpose would be the imperative duty of Congress. If such scandals as have marked the Johnson trial cannot be prevented in any other way, the "High Court" ought to be abolished, and the President made removable by joint resolution.

The press, as a general rule, has acted admirably. We know of no paper which makes a profession of putting thought into its articles, or of applying principles to politics, which has opened a bar and supplied grog to its customers during the late crisis. The leading retailers of strong drink have been old topers who even in the quietest times are themselves constantly fuddled, and whose sole idea of a journalist's duty seems to be that of acting as custodian of the private bottles of the habitués of their bar. The only difference between their behavior in ordinary times and their behavior in times of excitement is, that in the latter they draw from the cask and serve neat in jugs. There is one class of persons who are, if possible, more laughable and contemptible than they, and that is the large class of feather-headed but excitable persons who pass their time during stirring periods in running from one newspaper office to another, giving utterance to their weak convictions and their milk-and-water indignation by stopping one daily paper and taking its rival. They swear by the Tribune till Mr. Greeley bails Jefferson Davis; then they run to the Times till Mr. Raymond seems lukewarm about the New Hampshire election; then they run back to the Tribune, but feeling after each change as if they had given a striking proof of elevation of character. What adds to the interest of the process is, that the newspaper which gets them is frequently cheated into the belief that their coming over to it is conclusive proof of the soundness of its position. A large flock of them appear during the first week or two, for instance, to have gone from the Chicago Tribune to the Chicago Republican, owing to the former having stood by the minority of the Republican senators, though differing from them in its conclusions as to Mr. Johnson's guilt, and the Republican seems to have recorded their names in its books with as much satisfaction as if their adhesion made error for it no longer possible. The fact is, that any journal which finds its office filled with these worthies ought strictly to examine its ways. It may, of course, be in the right path, but their smiles are enough to excite suspicion in the mind of any prudent man. Their applause is generally due to their love of stimulants, and their change of papers is in nine cases out of ten a kind of moral "bender." After a few weeks they gather themselves up, pump on their heads, change their linen, and go back to their old ways, and very probably their old reading, and in two or three months will laugh with you unblushingly over their own excesses and hallucinations.

ENGLAND.

London, May 8, 1868.

The Irish Church question has already provoked outbursts of party spirit of greater bitterness than any which have been known in England for the last twenty years. As it is likely to be discussed for some considerable time to come, we have before us a pleasant prospect of vehement agitation and dogged opposition. A great public meeting was held on Wednesday for the purpose of discharging all the conservative big guns at the heads of the enemy. The Bishop of Oxford spoke, as usual, eloquently, and also, as usual, intemperately, and with that unctuous platform rhetoric which in a less reverend orator might perhaps be described as appealing to Buncombe. The Bishop of London—one of our most candid and in every respect most estimable prelates—and the Archbishop of York spoke with great force of the undeniable practical difficulties to be surmounted. Even Dr. Stanley, the excellent Dean of Westminster, spoke, I am sorry to say, on the conservative side. It is pleasant to add that the audience succeeded in roaring him down, because it shows that he was too liberal for their taste. Indeed he is a thorough liberal in his general tendencies, though his liberality is of the stamp which can reconcile itself to certain orthodox limits. Besides these great ecclesiastical luminaries, there were dukes, earls, and social celebrities in abundance. In short, a simple-minded member of Parliament asked Mr. Gladstone last night whether he meant to persevere with his resolutions in spite of such a weight of authority; and if the influence of bishops and deans, mixed with that of dukes and earls, would afford a sufficient guarantee for the permanence of our ancient Establishment, the Church of Ireland would be safe. Unluckily, we are only too well accustomed to the defeat of such authorities not to draw a favorable omen from their dogged opposition. The Church of Ireland will perish, and the peers both lay and temporal, will be taught one lesson more; but the battle will be long and savage.

The House of Commons is already vehemently excited. Last night's debate was only one in a series of fierce tussles between the opposite parties. Mr. Gladstone's last two motions—affirming the desirability of immediate legislation—were carried without opposition, the Government having had enough of adverse divisions to learn wisdom. But a debate arose on a further motion to the effect that none of the funds of the Established Church should be handed over to the Roman Catholics. The Liberal party were divided amongst themselves on this point, and some animated sparring ensued. Mr. Disraeli taunted his adversaries with quarrelling over the plunder; Mr. Bright told Mr. Disraeli that he had been at once "pompous and servile;" Mr. Disraeli replied by insinuating broadly that Mr. Bright was not a gentleman; and other little pleasantries passed showing abundantly the difficulty which our legislators already feel in keeping their tempers. The state of the case is indeed unprecedented, and the Government have succeeded in thoroughly rousing the indignation of the House of Commons. The two divisions in which the Government was conclusively defeated would naturally have led to one of two results—a dissolution or a resignation of the Ministry. It is plain, however, that there would at the present moment be great practical inconvenience in either course. A dissolution always amounts to a heavy pecuniary fine; and, at the present moment, would be specially annoying to members, because the new constituencies under the Reform Bill receive their rights on the 1st of January next. A new appeal would necessarily be made to them, and, therefore, a dissolution now would imply two general elections in the course of a year, with enormous waste of time and money. A change of ministry would equally involve the waste of the present session; and as every one feels that practically very little progress can be made with the Irish Church question this year, it would be desirable, on general grounds, that the Ministry should be able to hold on, discharge the pressing business of the time, and appeal to the country as soon as the new constituencies can be qualified to act. The battle, however, has proven so warm on both sides that it is doubtful whether such a course is possible. The first outburst was provoked by Lord Derby. With characteristic gallantry and imprudence he expressed his contempt for the abstract resolutions of the House of Commons, and declared that the House of Lords would throw out the bill which they might pass. Lord Derby, though no longer prime minister, acts as a kind of protector to the Ministry in the upper House. His speech threw the House of Commons into that fury with which they always receive any attack upon their privileges. When Mr. Gladstone denounced the interference, he was received with those vehement bursts of cheers which testify that the House is put on its mettle and means to vindicate its authority. Thus the two Houses of Parliament were set against each other; but Mr. Disraeli achieved the more unpleasant feat of bringing the Queen personally into the quarrel. He went to her Majesty and had an interview, which has been explained so elaborately that nobody knows quite what it meant. The upshot was that he received a kind of indefinite power to dissolve the House of Commons if its action upon the Irish Church renders it necessary. The House thus lives with a vague threat suspended over its head to forbid it going too far. It is left uncertain whether the appeal is to be made, if it is made, to the old constituencies, or whether the new are to be called into action at an earlier period than that already fixed. It is sufficiently annoying that a minister, in a minority of over sixty, should have a whip put into his hands wherewith to scourge the recalcitrant assembly; and still more, that the Queen in empowering him seems to have been led a little beyond those strict limits of neutrality to which our constitutional theories restrain her action. The answer is, that the circumstances are quite unprecedented, owing to the uncertainty about the constituencies, and that the course proposed gives the best chance of getting some business done. It seems, however, that Mr. Disraeli endeavored to shelter himself rather too much under the Queen's authority, and, at any rate, the House of Commons has been furious.

Mr. Disraeli has been cross-examined, denounced, chaffed, and bullied in every way possible. His position reminds me of the Australian savages who show their agility by standing up and allowing themselves to be pelted by several antagonists at once; managing by dexterous shifts to evade the different weapons. Mr. Gladstone has been the foremost and most eager assailant. It is an article in the Liberal faith to swear by Mr. Gladstone, as at least the necessary leader of the party. Yet with all his talent and high character he suffers from the vehemence of his temperament. His warfare is never in play; he is ardent with constant moral indignation against his adversaries; he looks upon it, I should guess, as a burning shame that the Prime Minister of the country should be a shifty adventurer, without political principle; he is always eager to be at him, and by no means stands waiting like Sir R. Strahan and the Earl of Chatham, but hits always as hard and straight as his temper will allow. Of course, this impetuous, restless ardor gives frequent advantages to a cooler antagonist. On the present occasion, however, he is supported with equal eagerness by his party and by many more dexterous colleagues. Mr. Lowe, equally bitter if more cool, puts questions with the skill of a brilliant cross-examining barrister, though he suffers from certain imputations upon his party fidelity of which Mr. Disraeli has more than once taken advantage for a biting retort. Mr. Horsman comes in aid with elaborate quotations from past debates to prove Mr. Disraeli's inconsistency—a line of argument of which we are becoming rather tired. Mr. Bouverie, a well-known Liberal member, is great upon the constitutional argument, and proves that the Queen should be kept so carefully out of harm's way that we should be scarcely conscious of her existence more than of a kind of animated great seal. Mr. Bright comes down at intervals with a piece of vigorous English, like a rhetorical sledge-hammer. To these and many other antagonists Mr. Disraeli has replied single-handed with infinite dexterity. Though disapproving heartily of his principles, I cannot refuse him the admiration due to a consummate gladiator; like Fitz-James, in "The Lady of the Lake," his blade seems at once sword and shield; he defends himself with consummate skill and coolness, and might adopt the words, "'Come one, come all.' I am ready to meet you at all points." Last night, perhaps, he had a little lost his coolness; but the sight of a split amongst his antagonists, quarrelling amongst themselves, was undoubtedly tempting, and the sneers to which he treated them told with some force on their tempers. Meanwhile, his party, conscious of their strength, irritated by the attempts to oppose them to the Queen and the House of Lords, and with little respect for their leader—except as for a man with singular talent—are getting daily more unmanageable. Mr. Gladstone will introduce his bill suspending all creations of new vested interests, and as matters stand at present it is not improbable that a Liberal victory may lead to a dissolution. Mr. Disraeli will go to the country with the cry of "No Popery and no surrender!" and the Liberal party must appeal to certain wider prejudices. It is the fashion among many Liberals here to say that the Church of England will be strengthened by the disestablishment of the Irish Church, because it will relieve it from the imputation of being identified with so anomalous a body. I confess that I do not believe in this theory, and that I agree with the Conservatives in holding that the precedents will have a wider influence. In Wales, for example, the Church of England is almost in as small a minority as in Ireland, though the Welsh are for the most part Protestant Dissenters. In short, I hold that as the agitation spreads, as it may possibly do, the whole question of a state church will come into a more prominent position. This, however, is too wide a question.

The Abyssinia expedition is over, and has resulted in a more conclusive success than we could have hoped. The way in which the difficulties of the country have been surmounted does the highest credit to Sir R. Napier and to the organization of the Indian army. The enemy was, of course, below notice; and the distrust of poor Theodore reminds one too much of the proverbial gentleman who went out fox-hunting with a brigade of artillery. But it is something to find that we have a general and an army who can do the more difficult duty of marching great distances, in spite of great material obstacles, in a thoroughly workmanlike fashion.

Correspondence.

THE TRIBUNE AND IMPEACHMENT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Will you be good enough to inform me in the next number of the Nation in what words used by the Tribune of Monday, May 19, you find even a shadow of justification for the following words, in the Nation of today: "On Monday . . . it (the Tribune) declared impeachment a mistake." I am, etc., C. C.

New York, May 21, 1868.

[We find the required justification in the following, which appeared in the Tribune of Monday, May 18:

"The Republicans who initiated and have sustained this prosecution have relieved themselves from a grave responsibility. For years, Andrew Johnson has been the terror of the Southern loyalists and the chief obstacle to the rapid progress of peaceful and loyal reconstruction. Thousands have impatiently murmured, 'Why is he not impeached and removed?' It was in vain that we urged that this was a big job—that it was likely to fail if attempted; and that such failure would only increase his power for evil. At length he rashly struck the law and the law-makers a blow in the mouth by his second removal of Stanton and appointment of Lorenzo Thomas to fill his place ad interim. It seemed to most of us that this was a challenge that must be accepted, no matter with what result. To vindicate and uphold the law may not always prove practicable; but nothing will excuse a failure to try.

"So we have tried and not succeeded; but the result is quite other than failure. The Republican party stands for ever relieved from all responsibility for Mr. Johnson's future misdeeds. Let him now wrest the command of the army from Gen. Grant—let him wield the military as well as civil power of the Government in the interest of rebellion and aristocracy—let him obstruct to the utmost the return of the Southern States, free and loyal, to the councils of the Republic—the country and the world will hold us wholly blameless."

In other words, impeachment may lead to Mr. Johnson's overturning the Government, in which case, however, the country will have the consolation of knowing that Horace Greeley is not to blame.

"The big job," having been attempted, has failed, as the Tribune feared it would. According to the same authority, this failure has increased Mr. Johnson's "power of evil." Why, then, is the result "quite other than failure?" Because, we are told, if Mr. Johnson should "wrest the command of the army from General Grant, and wield the civil and military power of the Government in the interest of rebellion and aristocracy," and "obstruct to the utmost the return of the Southern States, free and loyal, to the councils of the Republic, the country and the world will hold us [the Republicans] wholly blameless." Impeachment was not, and ought not to have been undertaken, however, as "a good card" for the Republican party, and if its failure has increased Mr. Johnson's powers of mischief, as the Tribune predicted it would, and he is likely to use them, as it suggests that he is, by forcible resistance to Congress and General Grant, the assertion that the result of the late trial is "quite other than failure" was, of course, not expected to impose on all readers.

But all talk of Mr. Johnson's wresting the army from General Grant, or trying to keep any Southern representatives out of any "councils of the Republic," is simply tumid rhetoric. The Tribune might as well say that impeachment is a great success because, if Mr. Johnson should now suddenly bombard Washington, the Republican party will not be responsible for it. If "C. C." were to walk down Broadway some fine morning in chain armor—we ask his pardon for making the supposition even in jest—and his friends were to pronounce it a foolish proceeding, how would it do for him to defend it by saying, "Let the president of the National Academy of Design attack me with a bowie knife in front of the Astor House, and in the presence of several policemen, and then you will see that the wearing of chain armor, uncomfortable and unhealthy though it be, is a perfectly rational and praiseworthy performance." Of course this reply would be taken either as evidence of insanity or as a muddle-headed admission that he had been making a fool of himself and knew it. But insanity is not supposable of a newspaper. Many of the Tribune's performances, this last included, one is forced to explain in a less charitable way. The account it gives of the result of impeachment is, in short, a clumsy admission that it was a grand blunder from first to last, and the admission is made the more repulsive by being as usual carefully wrapped up in some unsavory fustian. Impeachment "quite other than failure," even if it result in enabling or tempting Mr. Johnson to seize on the army and overcome Congress by armed force, provided "the country and the world" hold the Forneys and Logans and Greeleys and Butlers "entirely blameless!" What a compensation this is for the destruction of a free government! "Que mon nom soit flétri, que la France soit libre," said Danton. "Let the government be overturned, provided our graceful skirts be cleared," says the Tribune.—Ed. Nation.]

THE WEST IN THE CONVENTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

The platform which has been adopted by the Republican National Convention, or rather the circumstances under which that platform has been adopted, should, once for all, put a quietus upon the allegation that in the Western States the repudiation doctrines of Mr. B. Butler were exceedingly popular even with the Republicans. It was well known at Chicago that in the Platform Committee the member from Illinois not only denounced Butler's doctrines, as well as Senator Sherman's insidious threats, in the most uncompromising language, but that under his lead the members from Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Wisconsin, Tennessee, West Virginia, and South Carolina united in a solid phalanx in order to carry the most outspoken and unmistakable denunciation of all repudiation schemes whatsoever, while Pennsylvania opposed such plain talk; while New York, with all the New England States, except Rhode Island, were silent; and while Ohio was represented by General Lee, who at the Ohio State Convention had made a wild harangue in favor of the greenback plan. You, sir, have bestowed well-deserved praise upon the Republican platform adopted at Peoria, Illinois. Yet the Western members of the Platform Committee did not consider the Peoria resolutions sufficient. It was the member from Illinois that drew the committee's attention to the dubious meaning of the words "according to the letter and the spirit of the law," since Mr. Butler had made the letter to mean the exact reverse of the spirit. He insisted upon having the wording strengthened by saying, "not merely the letter but the spirit of the law." Again, while the Peoria platform had urged a reduction of the interest whenever it could lawfully be done, the Western members of the national Platform Committee, well remembering what sort of "laws" may be enacted, insisted upon having the term "lawfully" changed into "honestly," which, you will admit, is a considerable improvement. Then, a resolution, stating that the true way to reduce the burden of the debt was in improving the public credit by honesty, economy, and steadiness of the financial system, having been voted down in the sub-committee, a similar one was introduced in the full committee by the member from Rhode Island, was supported by the Western members, and finally adopted. It is believed that as yet no platform of any party in any section of the country has taken such decided ground in regard to the preservation of the public faith, nor has any as completely stopped all loop-holes through which even the "mildest" form of repudiation might creep in, as this Chicago platform, mainly drawn, urged, and passed by the representatives of the westernmost States. That being so, should not the insinuations against the position held by the West on the finance question be dropped out of sight?

LITERARY.

Little, Brown & Co. announce for immediate publication "The Modern Representations of the Life of Jesus; Four Discourses delivered before the Evangelical Union at Hanover, Germany, by Doctor Gerhard Uhlhorn, First Preacher to the Court." The work is translated by the Rev. Charles E. Grinnell.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers have in press "Lord Byron, Judged by the Evidence of His Own Life"—the Countess Guiccioli's long talked-of book.——Messrs. Lee & Shepard will publish Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's account of her recent Cretan voyages; "From the Oak to the Olive" is the title of the book.——Mr. Loring has in press "Medusa, and Other Stories," by Madame Sartoris, whose "Week in a French Country House" has been so deservedly popular.——A book that will be looked for with very great interest in all literary circles is "The Spanish Gypsy," a narrative and dramatic poem, by George Eliot, which will be published immediately in this country by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields. A part of it has already been given to the newspapers, and it promises to be a thoughtful poem of much eloquence.

—Some new English books of interest to the general reader are these: M. Jules Van Praet, a Belgian writer, has published a volume, entitled "Essays on the Political History of the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries," which has been translated into English, the translation being edited by Sir Edmund Head (recently deceased). The translation, which was not by Sir Edmund, is a bad one, and this is particularly unfortunate, for M. Van Praet's style is anything but good, being dull by reason of perpetual repetitions, and without positive felicities of any kind. But the author has great knowledge and considerable philosophic insight, and gives the reader a comprehensive view of the territorial changes brought about in Europe between the time of Charles the Bold and the time of the Peace of Westphalia in 1648. The "Memoir of Baron Bunsen," compiled by his widow, is in two heavy volumes, which relate fully the life of the multifarious scholar, from his days of youthful poverty to his death, after a long life of literary labor and literary and political honor. The Rev. George W. Cox is bringing out in one volume a corrected edition of his "Mythological Tales," of which we have already spoken as it deserves, under the new title of "The Gods and Heroes." Parents and guardians might do much worse than give it to boys fitting for college, and we hope to see it put before the American public in a form cheaper than the English one. Doctor Zeller's "Socrates and the Socratic Schools" is translated by Professor Reichel, who is to translate the learned author's less famous work, "Aristotle and the Elder Peripatetics." "A Glimpse at the Social Condition of the Working Classes during the Early Part of the Present Century" we commend to the notice of collectors of works relating to America. Its English author, a working-man, has a profound contempt for American newspapers, and contrasts the condition of the English laborer with that of his brethren in this country very much to the disadvantage of the latter. A curious book for readers of books that are purely books and nothing else, is R. S. Charnock's "Ludus Patronymicus; or, The Etymology of Curious Surnames." The author, however, had no mind to make a mere literary curiosity and relishing tid-bit. He thought "it might be acceptable for the purpose of enabling those burdened with objectionable names to discover their true orthography." A cheap edition of what is perhaps the best of Goldwin Smith's books, "Irish History and Irish Character," is to be issued for the use of "that class of the public"—some of the papers say with an air of not being in the best of humors—"whose historical reading is very elementary in its nature." To name the new books dealing with the Irish question would be to make a very long list; but Mr. Smith's is one that is very far from possessing only a local and temporary interest. The novels of the last month or two seem to be of no value. Lighter than a novel, and not unamusing, is B. W. L.'s "Corset and Crinoline," an illustrated book, showing many of the female costumes of the times since the so-called Dark Ages.

—Our clerical readers will be interested in hearing of several new works of some importance to them in their studies and labors. We have announced Mr. Grinnell's translation of Doctor Uhlhorn's book of sermons or lectures on the works on the life of Jesus that have formed so large and interesting a part of late religious literature. Emile de Bonnechose is the author of a little work, which may be had of F. W. Christern, "La Crise Actuelle dans l'Eglise Réformée de France à propos de Théodore Parker et de son école." "The Gospel in Leviticus" is a new English book by Dr. J. A. Seiss, which contains twenty-one lectures on the Hebrew ritual, in which the author gives a popular exposition of the typical import and relations of the Levitical ceremonies. High-Church Episcopal clergymen will be glad of a pocket edition in two volumes of Bishop Sherlock's "Practical Christian." Another old English divine, and one of another school, the Rev. John Spencer, reappears in the revival of his "Things Old and New; a Storehouse of Similes"—a book praised by Mr. Spurgeon as containing a vast amount of 'salt." A book praised as orthodox in all its historical views is Mr. Philip Smith's "Ancient History, from the Earliest Period to the Fall of the Western Empire." It will no doubt be republished in this country. "Pax Vobiscum," by Doctor Daniel Fraser, has for its second title "The Bible and the Family," and presents Scripture in its characteristically family aspects. A more important work than most of these is by Dr. Samuel Davidson, the well-known Congregational divine and Biblical critic, who has just published "An Introduction to the Study of the New Testament, Critical, Exegetical, and Theological." It treats of the books of the New Testament in the supposed chronological order, and begins with the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, and closes with the Gospel of John, which Dr. Davidson refers to the year 150 A.D., and to an author unknown. A work of a totally different tone is a German "Popular Dictionary of the Bible," edited by Dr. Schenkel and a corps of free-thinking assistants, among whom are Bruch, Schweizer, Gass, Hitzig, Schwarz, Lepsius, and Reuss. It is, strange to say, the first sceptical Bible dictionary in German, and supplies a want long felt by the Rationalistic school. Dr. Schenkel is the author of another new work published in the interest of the school of which he may be called the present head—the "Life of Schleiermacher." It is spoken of as having been prepared for the purpose of showing Schleiermacher's general antagonism to the orthodoxy of his day. It is a centenary offering to his memory.

—The American reading public begins at last to make the personal acquaintance of M. Sainte-Beuve—"the great master of us all," as the perhaps ablest of "appreciating" English critics calls him. Roberts Brothers have just issued in English a selection from his works, under the title, "Portraits of Celebrated Women." As a sample of work of Sainte-Beuve's, of a sort that would perhaps be more generally interesting than even these fine essays, we copy some remarks of his upon Michelet—a man whom it is almost intolerable to be obliged to like. We must say first that, according to the report of an able letter-writer in Paris, no French critic dares express his opinion of Michelet or Victor Hugo or other distinguished contemporary authors. Renan had to wait till Béranger's death before he could speak frankly his real mind about the poet. Life would be made unendurable to any honest, outspoken French critic of French authors. If nothing worse happened to him, still he might have to suffer what M. Philarète Chasles not very long since suffered. He had the temerity to undertake a work which most French writers of position, no matter how much tempted by foreign editors, prudently decline attempting, and began a series of critical articles for a Russian newspaper. Suits were at once brought by offended parties, and M. Chasles, being heavily fined, speedily desisted from correspondence. It is only in a roundabout way, then, that Sainte-Beuve frees his mind about Michelet, who must have been long a source of acute misery to him. M. Firmin Didot, having written some "Observations on French Orthography," Sainte-Beuve, in criticising it, takes occasion to say: "Émotionner is certainly a horrible word. Will it be said, Do not admit it into the 'Dictionary of the French Academy;' do not give it the freedom of our city; émouvoir suffices? I reply to this: 'No, émouvoir does not suffice, for there are instances where I should use émotionner and where I should require it.' For example, if I would define the manner of a modern historian who by dint of making history dramatic has enervated it; who, in depicting the men of the Revolution, has described them with an impossible minuteness of detail, as Balzac has done for the heroes of his novels; if, in speaking of this historian, I say, In his 'History of the Revolution,' and in the scenes he depicts in it, N—— does not content himself with exciting sentiments of pity or indignation, he shakes the nerves; he is not satisfied to émouvoir; he wishes to émotionner—now, I ask, is not émotionner, in this instance, French, according to the justest meaning of the word? It is true, in introducing it into the dictionary care should be taken to indicate that the word émotionner may not with propriety be applied, except in an unfavorable sense." M. Michelet, we observe, has the satisfaction—not, we suppose, complete in the case of a man like him, but still, doubtless, a satisfaction—of knowing that he has just made a very profitable sale of his copyright in the said "History of France." He gets for a five-years enjoyment of it $34,000 in gold, and in cash.

—Going on with his criticism of M. Firmin Didot's treatise, M. Sainte-Beuve tells us that the Academy is engaged in revising the Dictionary, preparatory to publishing a sixth edition. The discussions upon new words have already commenced. Absolutisme was debated the other evening and admitted. M. Sainte-Beuve prophesies the admission of Radicalisme also when its turn shall come, and says in general that the Academy is in the true path, that of a progressive, enlightened, and sufficiently broad eclecticism. "We do not conceal," he says, "that there has taken place, from a variety of causes, a sort of general intimidation of the human mind on every subject. The reform of orthography itself is included in it, and feels it." In its first century the Academy was bold in making orthographic changes. Compare the third edition (1740) of the Dictionary with the first edition (1694), says Didot, and it will be seen that changes had been made in not less than five thousand words—that is to say, in one-quarter of the whole vocabulary. Thousands of parasitical letters disappeared; it was then that laict became lait; apostre, apôtre; advocat, avocat; bienfaicteur, bienfaiteur, and so on. Then there was timidity for a time; but the eighteenth was an audacious century. Voltaire, Dumarsais, Duclos, and the Abbé Girard pushed reforms which, however, were not wholly accepted by the Academy till the fifth edition of the Dictionary was published. Then Voltaire's rule—that a should be substituted for o in the spelling of all words where already the sound of a had supplanted that of o—was established, though not so firmly but that some writers—Lammenais, Chateaubriand, notably Charles Nodier, who hated Voltaire—supported the old orthography, and spelled connaître and ivraie, for example, connoître and ivroie. It is since 1835 that M. Sainte-Beuve sees, or thinks he sees, indications that a general timidity is creeping over the mind of our age; but he avows his intention to support the cause of reform in the discussions on which the Academy has just entered, and we have seen what his course has been as regards émotionner and absolutisme.

—There has been published a very small new edition of "Tommy Trip's History of Birds and Beasts," a children's book which was written by Oliver Goldsmith, and first published by Thomas Newbery, of St. Paul's Churchyard, some time before 1770. That was the first publication of Goldsmith's little work; but the book took its present form only in 1779, when T. Saint, of Newcastle, republished it, with sixty-two cuts by Thomas Bewick. It is for the sake of these cuts that the book is reissued now in its fifteenth edition. The publisher, Edwin Pearson, "of the Bewick Repository, 64 St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross, W. C., also of 'Bewick Cottage,' Ovingham (Bewick's Resting-place), Northumberland," in a preface, garrulous and personal and of curiously awkward English, tells us how he bought, in 1865–6 the Bewick blocks which he found among Henry G. Bohn's stock of engraved blocks; how he found that he had come into possession of the original blocks of Tommy Trip, which had long lain perdus; how he hunted everywhere for a copy of the book from which to print a new edition; and how at last he found one, which was at once put at his service by its fortunate owner.

In the first part of this book we have an account, very pleasantly fancied, of Tommy Trip and his dog Jouler; and, incorporated in this—as Thackeray's

"Ho, pretty page with the dimpled chin,"

is in his continuation of "Ivanhoe"—or as Lowell's

"Zekle crep' up quite unbeknown" is in the Notices of the Press in the first volume of the "Biglow Papers"—appears a poem which is familiar, in a modified form, to most readers of domestic literature:

I.

"Three children sliding on the ice,
Upon a summer's day;
As it fell out they all fell in,
The rest they ran away.

II.

"Now, had these children been at school,
Or sliding on dry ground,
Ten tho usand pounds to one penny,
They had not all been drown'd.

III.

"You parents who have children dear,
And eke you that have none,
If you would have them safe abroad,
Pray keep them all at home."

The accounts of beasts and birds which follow this preface are striking for the boldness of their statements. We are carried back to the natural history of the Middle Ages by such statements as these: "Its Quills are about two Spans long, and when it is enraged it shoots them at Man or Beast with such Violence, that if they miss their Aim, they will penetrate and stick on the Trunks of Trees;" and, speaking of the Leopard, "He is thought to be produced by the Conjunction of a Panther with a Lioness." These descriptions of animals are interesting in biography and in literature, because the first beginnings of the celebrated "Goldsmith's Natural History."

The Bewick designs are in like manner curious and interesting, as being the first attempts of that great artist in that especial branch of his art which made him famous. They show but little sign of the peculiar and unequalled merit of his later engravings of birds and beasts, and, so far as execution goes, are little more than cuts in the simple and straightforward old manner, as free from modern striving after "effects" and the look of engravings on metal as they are guiltless of the exquisite handling and delicate truthfulness to nature of Thomas Bewick's own best work. They have been, as the publisher says in his preface, terribly abused; pieces have been chipped off, and the surfaces marred; the frontispiece especially has lost a great piece from one side. And they are not clearly and evenly printed—though how far this is done badly on purpose, in imitation of the old editions, we cannot say.

On the whole, the book is rather a curiosity than intrinsically valuable; and although it is well that it has been printed, it is probably well, too, that only 252 copies have been printed.

DYER'S KINGS OF ROME.*

Mr. Thomas Henry Dyer has written a history of the kings of Rome the special and avowed object of which is to refute the positions of Niebuhr and his followers, and prove that Livy's account is, on the whole, authentic and self-consistent. In this work he has shown great zeal, industry, and fairness. The opinions controverted are very fully presented, and, for the most part, in the words of the writers themselves, so that it is their own fault if, in any case, they come off worst in the discussion. This, we are bound to say, they frequently do. It is not hard, in dealing with antagonists of a fanciful or over-sceptical turn of mind, to show, as Mr. Dyer does in many instances, that the current tradition is not only better attested, but intrinsically more probable, than the view substituted. As instances may be mentioned his treatment of the origin of the Tarquins, of the fall of Alba, and of the story of the Horatii and Curiatii, in all of which he has very well shown the groundless nature of some of Schwegler's objections. There is a slashing kind of argumentum ad hominem, too, in which he is not without skill, and which, if not always convincing, is generally telling, and of which the following is a good specimen: "But, says Schwegler in a note, it may be asked whether Servius saw them [the Annales Maximi] with his own eyes. To which we answer, At all events in their public form; while it is certain that Schwegler never saw them, though he pretends to know so much about them" (p. xxi.)

But the real question is not whether on this or that point Dyer or Schwegler is in the right, it is not whether Niebuhr (the great object of Dyer's attacks) was correct in his details, but whether he was right in his method. Nobody pretends to hold with Niebuhr on all points, and those German scholars who have worked most faithfully in his methods have often gone furthest from his results. Mr. Dyer himself, on every page of his work, shows the influence of Niebuhr—his book could not have been written but for the impulse given by that great man to the critical study of the ancient records. For there are but two alternatives. Either we must accept the record without questioning and without sifting, and simply transcribe it into English, as Goldsmith did, or we must apply the critical method to it, weigh authorities, judge of probabilities, and draw inferences. One person will do this more skilfully than another, one will be more bold in his inferences, another will follow the record more closely; but the principle is the same in all, whether in Niebuhr's imagination, Mommsen's philosophical insight, Sir G. C. Lewis's scepticism, or Mr. Dyer's faith in the written word.

For our author is very far from swallowing the old traditions entire, after the manner of the early writers. It is true he places his mark further back than most scholars of the present day, but he has, like all the others, a dividing line, up to which he believes, and beyond which he refuses assent. Sir George Lewis will not go further than the capture of Rome by the Gauls; Mommsen admits names and dates up to the early Republic; Schwegler acknowledges the historical character of all the kings after Numa; Mr. Dyer claims Romulus and Numa as well, but says, "We abandon at once the whole history before the foundation of the city" (p. cxvi.) No reason is given, however, for drawing this arbitrary line, and we do not see why we are not as well entitled to believe that Romulus was a grandson of the Alban king as that Numa was a native of Cures. He admits, indeed (p. 68), that he cannot claim "that before the time of Tullus Hostilius the history rested on anything but tradition," although ten pages before he maintains that the Romans "possessed from the earliest times the art of writing."

Mr. Dyer has, indeed, a reason, and a very sufficient one, for cutting off the authenticity of tradition at the foundation of the city, and that is that he has a pet theory of his own as to its origin, with which the Alban story would be inconsistent. Yes, even Mr. Dyer, after all his indignation at the "reconstructing" systems of the Germans, falls himself a victim to Niebuhr's baneful influence. The temptation is too strong for him—or rather the decree of fate that everybody who touches Roman history shall broach at least one new theory. His is that Rome was, to all intents and purposes, a Grecian colony—a theory which, if it only had enough testimony in its favor, would be very consistent with the fact of an active Greek colonization going on in Italy and Sicily at the time of the alleged founding of the city. Mr. Dyer also rakes up a few words and customs which have a Greek look, as the festival of the equestrian Neptune, the word curio, which he derives from κύριος, the celeres from κέλλω, etc. He even identifies with these celeres the celsi Ramnes of Horace, which he says "commentators have racked their brains to explain"—although there are plenty of instances of celsus with the meaning "haughty." Apparently Mr. Dyer does not mean that Rome was formally a Greek colony, for then it must have had its œcist, its sacred fire from the prytaneum, etc.; but even if it were the mere settlement of a roving Greek adventurer, the Greeks would hardly have lost knowledge of it, and it would seem that we should certainly have some more definite evidence of it than any that Mr. Dyer is able to give. For we can find only one tradition to that effect, quoted by Festus (p. 266), among a multitude of others—all inconsistent with it, and all of equal weight. And no other proof is offered by Mr. Dyer, except the few coincidences in language and customs mentioned above. The volume, to be sure, abounds in expressions like "we shall endeavor to show," and "as we have seen," when this theory is alluded to; and if we trace forward and back these prospective and retrospective indications of a demonstration of it, we find them centring in the bold statement (p. 57), "To this we answer that the real name of Rome's founder was not Romulus, but Romus (Ῥῶμος). He was a Greek, or, at most, the second in descent from a Greek, and is called Romus in most of the Greek traditions." Q. E. D.!

It is hard to say whether our author believes or not that the name of the city was identical with the Greek ῥώμη (strength). He says distinctly that it was derived from the name of its founder, Romus, but at the same time alludes approvingly to the derivation given above, and its identity in meaning with Valentia, the alleged sacred name of the city. He laughs to scorn (p. 60) "Dr. Mommsen's odd derivation from Rama, and this apparently from ramus; since he considers it to mean the wood- or bush-town;" rejects, too (p. 52), any etymological connection between Roma and Ramnes, which latter "is evidently a Greek name, Ῥαμνοῦς." He magnanimously forbears to "claim for these Ramnes an origin from the Attic demus Rhamnus;" "it is enough that their name was evidently Greek, derived from ῥάμνος—a brier." So it seems that brier is a very good meaning for Ramnes, but that bush will not do at all for Roma.

Mr. Dyer frequently criticises the German passion for "reconstructing" history, often very effectively; and we desire to acknowledge very fully the service that he has done, not merely in single points of criticism, but also in calling attention to the unsafeness of this fascinating employment. As far as names and dates are concerned, it matters very little whether those which tradition gives us are the true ones or not. For our part, we have always held that the easiest way to account for the existence of the names, Tullus Hostilius, Ancus Martius, etc., was to suppose the existence of persons who bore the names. But the names are only a skeleton at best, and the real object of our studies in this direction should be the institutions of the times. And here is where it appears to us that Mr. Dyer makes his most fatal mistake in supposing, with Livy and Dionysius, that patriarchal institutions, like those of the earliest Roman state, could be created out of hand by the fiat of the man Romulus. With the à priori habits of thought of ancient writers, nothing is more natural or more common (see the case of Deioces in Herodotus); but when a person at this day looks upon primeval history from this point of view, we cannot argue with him, because we differ upon a fundamental and vital principle of historical criticism. Of course this does not apply to such organized institutions as are attributed to Solon and Servius Tullius. In these we see the hand of the lawgiver. It is in the primitive social structure which tradition ascribes to Theseus and Romulus that the individual lawgiver would be powerless—or if there could have been one, it must have been far back, centuries before 753 B.C.

Of all the German "reconstructors," who have so bad a name, Mommsen is the most obnoxious, because he starts frankly from the assumption that for this early period we have no trustworthy chronology, and devotes his whole energies to reconstructing society and institutions. Perhaps it would surprise many who think of him only as a German idealist, who has gone as far beyond Niebuhr as Niebuhr went beyond his generation, to learn that Mommsen is distinguished above all other scholars in this field by the degree in which he has returned to the traditions of the ancient writers, following their testimony more closely and arriving more frequently at their results than any of his co-workers. All this, however, by preserving a strictly critical spirit, and bringing collateral light to bear upon matters that often the ancients themselves evidently did not understand. "If," he writes in his "Chronologie," "in regard to a calendar by which Varro reckoned all his life long, we are not to accept the deliberate testimony of Censorinus (that is, of Varro himself), and that, too, when he recognizes emphatically the unaccountable nature of the facts, it is folly to desire to investigate antiquity at all." This is the spirit in which Mommsen's later works especially are written; but, he would say, it would equally be folly to accept all the statements of the ancients implicitly, as Mr. Dyer appears to argue. We must distinguish in their testimony between facts and inferences. Whenever a fact is given from their own observation, as in the one cited from Censorinus, it is worthy of all credence; but when it is inference merely, as must often be the case in regard to the early Roman constitution, it is claimed that we moderns can infer more correctly than the ancients by reason of our better processes of investigation. We suppose that even Mr. Dyer would not claim any authority for their guesses at the derivation of words, which are for the most part worthy only of the merest smatterers in etymology; and yet it would be as fair to apply to these as to any other questions his sarcastic words, "Of course nobody would presume to say that an old Roman knew so much about his language and antiquities as a modern German" (p. 69).

Setting aside Mr. Dyer's untenable position, that the institutions of the Romans began with the legislator Romulus in the seventh or, at earliest, the eighth century before Christ, we find much sound reasoning on the later development of those institutions. There is much to be said in favor of his opinion that the clients (and so a portion of the plebs) voted in the curiæ—it is certain that plebeians were members of the curiæ in the Republic, and we have no evidence as to the time of their admission to them except by inference. We think, too, that he is right as against Niebuhr, Schwegler, Becker, and Lange, in denying the identity of the patrum auctoritas with the lex curiata de imperio. On the other hand, we think, with Niebuhr, Schwegler, and Lange, that the most probable origin of the third tribe, the Luceres, is in the conquered Albans. There are many indications that the state was double (Ramnes and Tities) some time before it was triple; and not believing, with Mr. Dyer, that the events narrated for the reign of Romulus are historically attested, we are not troubled by the fact that Livy represents the three tribes as coequal.

As we have said more than once, our chief adverse criticism on the book is the general theory of primeval history upon which it proceeds, which is in direct antagonism to the spirit and the most important results of late investigations. The labors of linguists, archæologists, and philologists have been gradually gaining a knowledge of the process of development in thought and institutions in early times, which is seen to have been incredibly slow, and to abound in parallelisms in different communities. But, according to this, book all this is wrong; all this labor is wasted; institutions are formed mechanically by outside pressure, not organically by inward growth—society is created, not developed.

MAGAZINES FOR JUNE.

Mr. Henry James, Jr., furnishes the good thing of this month's Galaxy in a little story which may be read with the satisfaction which one gets from any carefully finished work, slight work or weightier, of a thoughtful and clever writer. "A Problem," he calls it, and the question proposed for consideration is the not unfamiliar but not easy one, How far do prophecies—prophecies of events in which human beings are actors—tend to fulfil themselves? The mode of presentation adopted is to relate some passages in the life of a young married couple who both have had dealings with fortune-tellers. One prediction partially fails; but it has had the effect of preparing the minds of Emma and David to pay a somewhat unusual attention to such matters and to think there may possibly be some power of prevision in predictors. Then come to light two prophecies of a sort quite capable of fascinating understandings not very solid, and of a sort, too, to breed troubles between man and wife. The case is well managed; but perhaps the picture, suggested rather than fully delineated, of the honeymoon happiness of a commonplace young pair is as skilfully done and as pleasant as anything else in the story. "A Problem" may be spoken of as showing, not so forcibly as some of Mr. James's other stories, but still very well, its author's principal powers as a story-maker, and as showing them disjoined from a certain defect or fault that we, for our part, find in him. His subtlety in the dissection of motive is to be seen in it; and also there is present in its usual proportion his power to set before us, for inspection if not for action, a real person; but there is less of an enveloping atmosphere of what, for want of a more accurate term—in our inability to find a term nearly accurate—we call his voluptuousness. Women we have with us always in his stories; and almost always, we believe, his women appear in their strictly female aspect, in the aspect which they wear to the curious, somewhat puzzled, not very-much-admiring, much-interested young male of the species. It is, of course, easy to see how strong a temptation addresses itself to the artistic side of a story-maker's nature to deal with love and lovers.

The author of "Emily Chester" writes a piece called "My Note-Book," which we hope she has had lying by her for seven or eight years. It affords no proof that she has advanced beyond the stage of development which she had reached when Max was created. What cherub is it, we wonder, who sits up aloft and makes designing young bachelors his care? Of course, it is natural that the enchantress should feel a curiosity as to the feelings of the enchanted, and that she should try to image them to herself as vividly as possible. But to throw her thoughts into the form of a diary which "Dulaney," say, fills up very full in the evenings, and to make his diary a record of what things he did to commend himself to Miss Glenn's favor; what times he knew, and by what sort of glance he knew, that he had succeeded; why it was, as he now sees clearly, that he failed when fail he did; what sentiments of his it was that made her face "light up;" and what opinions of hers made him (and made him bear visible testimony of it) "reverence in her the true woman;" how it was that he acquitted himself when he found her sitting dreamily before the fire in a soft wine-colored silk; what conduct of his procured him an invitation to lunch—to do all this, unless the volunteer autobiographer has extreme artfulness, and has brothers, and has watched them closely at periods when they most shunned observation, is to do nothing at all but depict a highly impossible man, and to run the risk of revealing feminine secrets of great import. "Dulaney," with his diary, we assure Miss Crane, is an impostor, a woman in man's apparel, and a traitress to the diary-keeping sex.

For the rest, the June Galaxy has some verses, not of her best kind, by

Miss Phœbe Cary; Miss Lily Nelson has some pretty lines "To a Caged Canary;" "Apple Blossoms" is verse, by Miss May Mather; and Dr. Parsons writes verses ("To a Lady with a Perfect Ear—of Corn") rather better than their title would lead one to expect—which is saying little enough when such a writer as Dr. Parsons is concerned. In prose we have "Forced Marches," by Mr. De Forest; an article on "Railroad Management," by Mr. Edward Howland; "Jarocho Life," by Captain Mayne Reid; a not very powerful "Galaxy Miscellany" of five articles; "Driftwood," by Philip Quilibet; some very slight criticism of some of the Academy Exhibition pictures, by S. S. Conant; some not quite so slight book notices, by Mr. Grant White; and a separate notice of Mrs. Edwards, by Mr. Eugene Benson. We impeach Mr. Benson of talking sad nonsense where he declares that Mrs. Edwards's books "are rich in an experience full of distinction." As for Mr. Quilibet, by the way, we should hardly have thought ourselves repaid for going through his "Driftwood" this month if we had not lighted on a statement which, if we do not misapprehend it, is to be something of a literary curiosity, and not without value to the future historian. Apparently the writer was sure that before his remarks on "A Nation's Repentance and Faith" should be printed Mr. Wade and his new Secretary of State would be in the places of Mr. Johnson, impeached and certain to be convicted, and Mr. Seward. "The best thing," he says, "the late administration did regarded Fenianism. . . . . We throttled Fenianism at Buffalo, and strangled it in our own hands at the very St. Albans which witnessed the Canadian raid of 1864."

Hours at Home for June is full of sound reading, well adapted to the taste of its subscribers. One of its articles, the opening essay, "On Stockholders," is worth the careful consideration of the very secular no less than the religious reader, and its writer does good service in laying before the public his mass of facts. James Greenwood's paper on "Pawnbrokery in London" needs no further description than is given when its title and the name of the writer are given. Professor A. J. Curtis contributes a more than ordinarily well written paper called "Friedhof, the Court of Peace," which treats with an agreeable freshness the hackneyed subject of graveyards. "A Newly-discovered Hymn of Calvin" is a passable translation, with one bad blunder, of an original hymn which M. Felix Bovet found in an old Genevese prayer-book, together with metrical versions of nine Psalms, Simeon's Song, and the Ten Commandments, and which he conjectured to be the work of the great reformer. The editors of the new Strasburg edition of Calvin's complete works supported M. Bovet's view, and have admitted the twelve pieces (in their original Old-French form) into the sixth volume of their set. The stanzas are destitute of merit as a hymn or as poetry, and have no characteristic marks of their authorship. "A Chat with the Austrian Premier," Baron Beust, is translated from the German. It is brief, and what there is in it is the talk of a diplomatist and of a diplomatist talking to a newspaper editor, yet the baron apparently spoke in honest explanation of his course as prime minister of Saxony, and apparently is confident in the duration of the liberalism which has just secured the Austrian helm of state. We publish elsewhere an article which perhaps contains the best of reasons why Francis Joseph and his Prime Minister should be Liberal.

"Lookout Mountain, and How we Won It," "Among the Andes of Peru and Bolivia," "Shooting Stars, Detonating Meteors, and Aerolites," an instalment of Mrs. Craik's "Woman's Kingdom," a full "Editor's Drawer" of jokes, a more than usually loquacious "Easy Chair," chatting about young Mr. Tyng's troubles, the Dickens dinner, and the American-minister's-clothing question—this is the good and bountiful provision which Harper's for June sets before its half-million or more of readers. It is reading so good and so characteristic that the magazine with its immense circulation is a thing to rejoice over. It may almost be doubted if in virtue of their Monthly and Weekly periodicals, and we do not exclude the pervading Bazar, the Messrs. Harper have not been the most potent of late civilizers of the American people. Their influence must be, humanly speaking, incalculably great, and that it is, on the whole, a good influence, would not be denied even by the defunct Alabama Legislature. Readers of Harper's, if they do not practise deception on the simple-minded comic editor when they write letters to him, always "turn first to the 'Drawer.'" So it is only in the second place that they will this month turn to an account of Allan Pinkerton's discovery and frustration of the Baltimore plot to assassinate Mr. Lincoln. It is an interesting story as told here, seems true and unvarnished, and is so capable of being worked up into an effective book that it will be a wonder if some Loyal League does not have it in paper-covers between now and September, or if Mr. Pinkerton does not fall a prey to Mr. Edmund Kirke or Mr. Abbott. "Woman's Beauty, How to Get and Keep It," has a general effect of dust and bitter ashes, being full of sub-carbonate and carbonate of soda, chlorate of potash, borax, and so on, and the apothecaries of the West, where the water is not good, if we may make bold to say so, and canned food causes the art of the pottinger to flourish, may expect a heavy run on their stores. The author of the "Loot of Lucknow" had better material than he very well knew how to use. "Drawing Bureau Rations" is very good and instructive.

Without doubt it is the same author, Colonel De Forest, who furnishes the one article in Putnam's for June that saves the number from altogether too much dulness. His "Low-down People" is exceedingly readable; we do not know where to direct the reader for anything like so vivid and accurate a description of the refuse of Southern white society. Perhaps the Greenville Bureau Major had no opportunity in the hill country to photograph the very worst specimens of this unfortunate class. The low-down person must have a sandy habitat near a fever-and-ague swamp to be found in the perfection of his almost miraculous worthlessness. A priori he seems an impossibility on this continent; but there he is by the hundred thousand, scattered through almost every slave State—a living proof, by the way, that there were worse conditions for man than that of Southern slavery. Mr. Duyckinck's revival of Dr. John Moore, author of "Zeluco," and father of Sir John, is another essay that we except, dubiously, from the general criticism we have just made. The magazine enters on its second volume with this number. We must not leave it without protesting against the libellous caricaturing of "prominent men" that has been going on in the last two or three numbers. The June Colfax is worse than the May Greeley or the April Beecher.

Lippincott's contains as its most noticeable article a long poem written expressly for the publishers by Mr. Swinburne, who foams at the mouth and flushes with feverous heats only a little this time. "Popular Novels" is grammatically correct criticism on Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, and other novelists; "To Please Aunt Martha" is an agreeable little love story—a first one, we hope; "The Strange Passengers" is by Mrs. Prescott Spofford, who is best when, as here, least pretentious, "weird," and thrilling, and so forth. "American Culture" and "American Forest Trees" no one need read, and the same thing is to be said of "Across the Sierra Nevada," but not so absolutely. A shade better than these are the two articles on "The Home of Robert Burns" and "Major M. M. Noah," each of which gives us either a new story or a new version of an old one, but neither of which rises above the rank of padding. "Dallas Galbraith" goes on and continues to be a tolerably readable story, though perhaps it is dragging a little now.

Robert Buchanan has in the Broadway a somewhat affected piece on "Burns's First Bosom Friend," "Daintie Davie," whose suggestive surname was Sillar, and who merits no excess of affection on the part of the poet's admirers any more than he merited it from the poet. Mr. Buchanan in prose is almost sure to be offensive by his "bumptiousness" and the rolling of his poetic frenzied eye and his various affectations. He and Mr. Swinburne are enough to corrupt all the boys in the neighborhood.

The Catholic World is of average excellence this month. It selects from foreign sources several articles of interest and value. There is one noticeably interesting, translated from "Etudes Religieuses, etc., par des Pères de la Compagnie de Jésus," which gives a new chapter—new to us, at any rate—in the natural history of the spider. "The Flight of Spiders" it is called, and the reverend observer, who writes very pleasantly indeed, tells how he has watched spiders ascending into the air till lost to sight, and how he has been entirely convinced that each year there is a general migration of spiders of certain sorts towards the atmosphere, where they pass the whole warm season, and whence they return only in the winter. The gossamer that used to puzzle our fathers is fully accounted for in the light of these newly-discovered facts—it is the web of these aerial spiders which some higher than ordinary fog has loaded with moisture and brought down to the earth. "John Tauler" is also from the French, and on a good subject, but desperately rhetorical and not instructive. "Sketches from the Life of St. Paula," and "An Italian Girl of Our Day," both from the French, are both for pious readers, and the latter will be much liked by persons who were affected by the religious part of Eugénie de Guérin's diary. It is the beginning of a series of the letters written to her betrothed by a young girl, Rosa Ferrucci, of lovely character and excellent mind, who died while the preparations for her marriage were making. Some of them are charming. "Edmund Campion," a readable account of the politico-religious martyr, opens with a statement to which a correspondent calls our attention, and which to mention is to condemn, as they say. The writer calls Elizabeth "Queen of Great Britain," which is to antedate the Union in a surprising and not allowable manner. "Mexico" is an aimless sort of a review article which contains, however, a literary, or rather bibliographical, remark or two about Humboldt's "Mexico" that it may be well to remember. "Harem Life in Egypt" reviews with amusing respect Miss Emmeline Lott's rather sad performances; "Cowper, Keble, and Wordsworth" is nothing if not, or if it is, critical; "The Early Irish Church" is good reviewing by some one who apparently knows his subject. "The Episcopalian Confessional" is the sensational article of the number—or might be called so if the Catholic World ever descended to the sensational. Its conclusions will be accepted by most people. But the author makes rather a mess of it when he speaks of the Episcopal or Anglo-Catholic clergymen who hear confessions as if they were not penetrated by a sense of their supernatural calling to the work of hearing and absolving, and as if they were not exercising a power which they conceive to have been conferred upon them by the words of ordination. It is saying nothing to a Ritualist—in other words, an Anglican who hears confessions and absolves from sin—to talk to him as if he were a Protestant Episcopalian minister. Much, however, of what the writer in the World says would doubtless be accepted by the persons to whom it is addressed as true and well said. Aubrey de Vere has a sonnet on "Le Récit d'une Sœur."

We have not left ourselves space to speak at any great length of the June Atlantic, which, however, is not a number that demands much notice. Mr. Lowell's "June Idyl" is pretty much all of it. Mr. Eugene Benson talks more restrainedly than is common with him, and so that one can listen to him without more than an occasional shuddering, about Théophile Gautier. "A Literary Artist" is the second title of the essay. One notes the fact and thinks of a number of persons who just now are keeping themselves in a badly inflamed state about the junction of art, or Art, with Morality. To keep Art separate from Immorality is apparently not part of their mission, and really they are less "purely artistic" than most ruling elders, as far—only on the other side—as the ten commandments themselves from un-morality. However, this essay is a good one. Let us suggest to Mr. Benson—it is a small matter of phraseology merely; it is of no great consequence—that "haughty and unique thinkist" would probably have been the late Artemus Ward's way of depicting M. Baudelaire, and that to us, too, it seems better than "haughty and unique thinker." "Thinkist" goes more naturally with the adjectives. "The Discovery of Etherization" is an unhesitating ascription of the invention of the great anæsthetic to Doctor Jackson, and the evidence in his favor is put forth fully.

"The Talmud," by Dr. Stowe, gives some facts in regard to the history of that work, and an intelligible description of it. The writer, in using his various German authorities, has been quite careless, and bad work is made of the spelling of proper names. Meir, for example, is spelled in three ways; it never appears twice alike, and it never appears in its correct form. "Meyer" we have, and "Mair," and "Meier." The German j is also translated into the English j, instead of into y; the sound of sh in Hebrew is rendered by the German sch instead of by the English sh; and there are various similar mistakes, some of which are perhaps due to the printer, but some undoubtedly to the writer. "Vix" is a tribute full of good feeling, and pleasant to read, to a pet horse. "Abyssinia and King Theodore" we found readable; "St. Michael's Night" gives fair promise, or almost gives fair promise; "A Week on Capri," and the "Casa Guidi Windows," both by Mr. Taylor, one in verse, the other in prose, we found dull—indeed, dull to a great degree. "A Castle of Indolence" is good, after its kind; and "The Beauty of Trees" is tolerably good after its kind, and may probably be useful in bringing the Eastern farmer to a better mind than he has had heretofore—

> . . . . "For in the blood
> Of our new-world subduers, lingers yet > Hereditary feud with trees"— as Mr. Lowell says and as everybody sees who sees New England—a land of "side-hills" and "paster land" and nakedness.

If Mr. Lowell's admirers could have poems from him for the asking, a June idyl would probably be the second choice of nearly every one of them; doubtless a new "Biglow Paper" would be what they would wish for most. They have reason to be satisfied with what this Atlantic gives them. The idyl is not full of the rapture of June, as the little lyrical outburst in Sir Launfal is; this is evidently the June of other years; the poet now muses, possessing the month instead of being in a manner possessed by it and meditates and moralizes and indulges a thoughtful fancy. The poem is in a talking blank-verse, so to speak, which fits to admiration the substance of it. Occasionally matter and manner rise a little, or rather become a little more literary, or bookishly poetical, as poets' meditations are apt to become, we suppose. This is seen at the end. As we speak of the end of the poem, we quote a few verses, for the sake chiefly of the happy stroke with which the passage closes; though half the rest seems fine too:

> . . . . . "The sliding Charles,
> Blue towards the west, and bluer and more blue,
> Living and lustrous as a woman's eyes
> Look once and look no more, with southward curve
> Ran crinkling sunniness, like Helen's hair,
> Glimpsed in Elysium, insubstantial gold;
> From blossom-clouded orchards far away
> The bobolink tinkled; the deep meadows flowed
> With multitudinous pulse of light and shade
> Against the bases of the southern hills,
> While here and there a drowsy island rick
> Slept, and its shadow slept; the wooden bridge
> Thundered, and then was silent," etc.

This also ends in a lucky "statement of the thing:"

> "Under this willow often have I stretched,
> Feeling the warm earth like a thing alive,
> And gathering virtue in at every pore,
> Till it possessed me wholly, and thought ceased,
> Or was transfused in something to which thought
> Is coarse and dull of sense. Myself was lost, > Gone from me like an ache, and what remained > Became a part of the universal joy."

But we have no space to go over all the things that give us pleasure in the reading and recollection, nor to find the things that interfered somewhat with our perfect enjoyment of the poem.

Critical and Social Essays.

Reprinted from the Nation.

"Would do credit to some of the best of our own journals and magazines. They are lively without flippancy, quiet and moderate in tone, and deal with some of the peculiarities and absurdities of Yankee taste and habits in the best possible spirit; neither defending them nor speaking of them with unworthy self-abasement, but generally endeavoring to trace them to their origin in the social and economical condition of the people."—Saturday Review (London).

"They are generally sensible, well expressed, and, in short, such articles as may be read with pleasure and a fair amount of solid profit. . . . If they are not polished quite up to the Saturday Review pitch, they are, nevertheless, very good reading of the kind, and much in advance of anything that we have seen in other American papers."—Pall Mall Gazette (London).

"All are entertaining, clever, and well written; and some of them deserve the higher praise of being the condensed statement of vigorous thought upon questions of practical importance. . . . We trust that this is but the first of a series of similar volumes."—North American Review.

"All are good, and several are of quite unique merit."—Atlantic Monthly.

"Of the whole twenty-five, there is, perhaps, none which does not contribute something to the reader's information, give him a new idea, or wake up an old one."—Boston Commonwealth.

"They are thoughtful, carefully written, fine in style, and wholly free from partisan or personal prejudice."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

The Week.

The legislative event of the week has been the passage by the Senate of the bill admitting Arkansas. The House, it is expected, will make no difficulty about concurring in the Senate's amendment, which simply enacts that Arkansas shall not change her present constitution so far as it makes citizens of all colors (except, of course, the Indian not taxed) equal in all respects. In the House, the most important thing of the week has been the introduction of the new Tax bill by Mr. Schenck, who made a solid speech that will be read with interest. There has been, besides, a quantity of miscellaneous work done, some of it of a sort that it would have answered very well to have left undone. Miss Vinnie Ream, on motion of Mr. Bingham, was ordered out of a room in the Capitol which she has been occupying as a studio. Woolley, the contumacious witness, is to be confined in it—that is, it is to be used as a guard-house. On Wednesday week, in the Senate, there was a round of explanations from the senators who have been so much abused. A committee was appointed to examine and report whether attempts were made to intimidate or bribe senators during the impeachment. Mr. Ross made a speech which did him credit, and set an example that a hundred or more of the "eloquent" men in the "Halls of the Republic" might follow with great profit. It reads like the talk of a modest and honest man. Throughout the week the Woolley business has been constantly coming up, Mr. Butler succeeding in having his own way, but sometimes by bare majorities, for the House is evidently very sick of the business into which it let him lead it. On Monday, in the Senate, there was a warm debate on a resolution thanking Mr. Stanton for his services as Secretary of War both during and since the rebellion. Mr. Fessenden made a fine eulogy of Mr. Stanton, whose services to the country and whose character seemed to him to merit the very highest respect. The recent brief but fierce storm through which Mr. Fessenden himself has passed seemed to be in his mind. It certainly was in Mr. Henderson's, who voted against the vote of thanks, as did Mr. Fowler and Mr. Ross. Mr. Trumbull, on the other hand, and Mr. Van Winkle, like Mr. Fessenden, voted for it. So it is said that they, with Mr. Grimes, are going to hold entirely aloof from what is called the Chase movement, while the other three may go over to it. We suppose nobody ever, when at all cool, imagined Mr. Trumbull or Mr. Fessenden or Mr. Grimes out of the party. As to the others, the country knew less about them.

No progress has been made in getting anything out of Woolley. No more is known of what he did with that $20,000 than was known last week. The assumption in which the New York Tribune indulges every day, that it was used in the corruption of senators, is entirely gratuitous. Unhappily there is too much other corruption going on, a share in which Woolley would be afraid to own, to make his silence of any great value as evidence on this point. Miss Vinnie Ream has been turned out of the room in the Capitol basement in which she was moulding a statue of Lincoln, to allow it to be converted into what Democratic members call a "Bastille," but, in plain English, a place of confinement for Woolley. The interruption of Miss Ream's labors we are sorry not to be able to regret. The commission to make a statue of Lincoln ought never to have been given her, and the voting of it in the teeth of the remonstrances of everybody in either House who knew anything about art was simply a triumph of folly and ignorance.

If the majority in the House of Representatives have a real regard for the Republican party, they will take the great Woolley case out of the hands of Mr. Butler. His performances in it are doing serious injury. It will not do to depend too much on General Grant and the platform. They are both strong, but they need to be braced up by general good behavior on the part of other prominent politicians between now and November. In the first place, the general seizure of telegrams was a high-handed measure, seeing that the telegraph is now the means by which a large mass of private and confidential correspondence is carried on; but it is in certain cases a justifiable measure, and we think this Woolley case is one of them. Whenever the House orders such a thing, however, it ought to be very careful to whom it commits the execution of the order. A duty requiring more delicacy and discretion than that of going over them and picking evidence out of them it would be difficult to imagine. To say this is simply to say that it is not to Mr. Butler alone it ought to have been committed, nor even to a committee composed exclusively of persons of one party or of one way of thinking. As we have said before, the task of examining the evidence thus selected, and of deciding what portions of it should be published and what suppressed, ought not to have been left to a one-sided committee, much less, as it has in the main been left in this case, to Mr. Butler only. It gives him, as a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune has pointed out, an opportunity of giving his enemies side stabs, and this is a kind of opportunity which he never misses. He has used it fully and adroitly in this case. We submit whether on the whole the House and the party have not had about enough of Mr. Butler. He certainly has no reason to complain of either. The House has given him an opportunity of displaying all his strong points. Nobody will now deny that he is the smartest, sauciest, most intrepid criminal lawyer that ever rasped a witness or bamboozled a jury. This confession made, what good purpose is served by allowing him to carry on a little game of mystification and vituperation with Mr. Woolley? The business of the House has been greatly interrupted by it, and the House itself has been disgraced by listening to and confirming the smart quibbling by which Mr. Butler defended the exclusion of all anti-impeachers from the committee.

Mr. Schenck, from the Committee of Ways and Means, has made his financial statement to the House apropos of the new Tax bill. His speech had the merit of great clearness, and his views, in so far as he has developed them, are eminently sound and sensible. He acknowledges at last that he and the majority of last Congress were wrong in thinking that a whiskey tax of $2 a gallon could be collected. He confesses it has not been collected, and that under its operation, instead of getting $120,000,000 from whiskey duties, we only got this year $13,000,000. But this is not all. The high tax has spread fraud through every branch of the public service, and created an organized band of plunderers called the "whiskey ring," who for the last two years may almost be said to have governed the country, so far as they chose to govern it. Moreover, the manufacture and consumption of whiskey have been enormously increased by it, and thousands of men previously honest and upright have been seduced by it into perjury and peculation. Mr. Schenck now proposes to reduce the tax to 75 cents, as being the sum which distillers will pay sooner than cheat. If this be the conclusion to which the committee have come after careful investigation we have nothing to say, but Mr. Kelley's proposition to reduce the tax to 50 cents pleases us still better. From 75 cents Mr. Schenck calculates on a revenue of $70,000,000 during the coming year. We should not say one word by way of criticism on Mr. Schenck's conversion to the low rate if it were not that during the past two years he and others persisted in keeping on the $2, in the teeth of the experience of other countries, and of the principles of human nature. Now, there is no excuse, under all the circumstances, for insisting on our making the experiment ourselves, at such enormous cost, when it had been so effectually made for us by others. A more striking example than this of the value of study, observation, and a teachable spirit is not often afforded in politics. We beg to call the attention of the "Thoughtful Teetotaller" to it, as he will see by it that hatred of drunkenness is not all that is needed to qualify a man to legislate against it.

Mr. Schenck also proposes to consolidate and simplify the tobacco duties, to take away from street-car companies the power of exacting the tax on their receipts from their passengers, and to leave everything else where it is. The public income last year was $405,794,459; the expenses $379,178,066. The probable expenses of the coming year will be $352,320,629; the probable receipts, supposing the whiskey tax to reach $70,000,000, will be $406,560,000. Mr. Schenck wisely and nobly says: "There is but one way after all in which the debt of the country can be paid, and that is by working it out. Industry, commerce, the productions of labor and of the soil are eventually to pay the debt."

Other good features of the bill are the bestowal on the Commissioner of the Revenue of absolute control over the employees in the service, making him responsible for their behavior, thus giving the revenue service an accountable head, which it now has not, the President and Secretary of the Treasury being able under the present system to shift from one to the other any blame arising out of the rascalities of their subordinates. We have not seen the Tax bill; but we have no hesitation in saying that if it does not contain a provision protecting the commissioner against the influence of Congressmen, his control over his officers will amount to nothing, owing to the way in which appointments are made in the first instance. Nearly every revenue officer is either an active politician or is the protégé of an active politician. The first thing he will do, therefore, in case the commissioner punishes him, is to go to work to get his superior "decapitated," and in this he will have the active assistance of all the other knaves and their patrons, and they will in the end either drive the commissioner out of office or send him to the lunatic asylum. We appeal to anybody who knows how these things work to say whether this is an unreasonable prediction. We come back, therefore, once more to our old position, and say that, although the concentration of power in the hands of one person is a step in the right direction, he will bear the sword in vain unless the mode of appointment be also changed in the manner advocated by Mr. Jenckes. Public men are twisting and turning a good deal to avoid this, but to this they must come for radical reform, and we warn the public that all changes which do not involve this are delusive.

In his proposed legislation against the foreign brokers who come over here and do business at their rooms in the hotels, thus evading the tax of $22 exacted from the native brokers, Mr. Schenck seems to us to be falling into the error from which he has just been escaping on the whiskey business. He proposes to tax these foreign brokers $5,000, and if they do not pay to send them to the penitentiary. We predict that the result of this will be that the law will never be enforced, but that the fear of it will drive away any decent men there may be amongst these foreign brokers and fill their places with double-refined scoundrels, who will reduce illicit brokerage in hotel bedrooms to an art and sell more goods than ever. If they pay any money at all under the law, it will be to confederates in the revenue service. We draw our inspiration in this matter from the same source from which we obtained our inspiration with regard to the whiskey tax, about which, though we say it, we have prophesied with considerable success.

We have been looking anxiously through the week for a reply from Mr. Collector Smythe, of this port, to the charge made against him by Mr. Thurlow Weed on oath, of having taken into his serious consideration, or, in other words, "consulted" with two persons about the propriety of bribing United States senators sitting as judges in a legal investigation. Failing a satisfactory reply, we are still in hopes of Mr. Smythe's resignation. The Sun thinks we are too sanguine in expecting his resignation, inasmuch as, if he felt rightly about his own position and character, he would have resigned at the time of the "Mrs. Perry" scandal. We excused him for his share in that affair, however, on the ground that he had just taken his first plunge into "politics"—as this disgusting jobbery and intrigue is called—and in conniving at the misappropriation of the public funds simply did what his predecessors had been doing, and what, under the present system, any collector must do to keep his place. But the bribing of senators in an impeachment trial is something entirely novel, and is not, under any existing theory or practice, a legitimate portion of the duties of a United States collector of customs. In "consulting" upon it—if "consult" he did—Mr. Smythe drew from his own private fountain of wickedness, and we therefore again suggest that he either answer Mr. Weed's charge, or pay his neighbors a small tribute of respect by resigning.

The Radical editors of Missouri have just been holding a convention, at which they mutually pledged themselves hereafter to think for themselves on political questions, and not to accept their opinions ready-made from Congressional politicians, or to advocate everything which a small caucus in Washington decides upon as the party policy. A convention of this kind ought to be ludicrous, but it is not. It ought to be as absurd for editors to meet together and interchange vows of independence and honesty as for women to bind themselves in council to be chaste, or for lawyers to make a covenant with each other not to cheat their clients. As matters stand, however, the public reads of a convention of this kind with tears of pious emotion, and the editors have probably gone home, thinking, and thinking rightly, that they have been taking part in a revolution. There are plenty of papers, of course, all over the country whose editors think for themselves naturally, and for their own comfort and credit, as they wash their faces or pay their rent, without registering a vow to do so; but then there is a vast body who receive their opinions by mail, and construct them on a model with Chinese reverence for authority. If this Missouri movement should spread, it will not only raise the profession of journalism in the estimation of mankind, but it will give journalism a claim to the gratitude of mankind such as it has never had. It will help to destroy utterly the old Democracy—a great flock led by two or three shepherds, with party editors barking round the outskirts to keep the sheep together, and to hasten the reign of the new democracy, in which a party is a great collection of intelligent men, bound together by a few leading ideas, differing freely on minor ones, reaching their conclusions by reason and discussion and not by dreams and animal secretions, and aided in the discussion by a press which makes it its business to test both legislators and legislation by principles. In such a party as that, men like Trumbull and Fessenden will not be "read out" by men like Colonel Forney and General John Cochrane.

Our readers may remember that during the interval between the two votes in the impeachment trial, Senator Ross received a telegram informing him that "Kansas had heard the evidence" and demanded conviction. We have ever since been curious to know what kind of tribunal "Kansas" was, where it sat, and how it took evidence, whether orally or by written interrogatory, or by common rumor. Our curiosity has been satisfied by another telegram sent to Mr. Ross in reply to one of his, saying that he would vote according to the dictates of his judgment and in obedience to his oath. This second telegram shows that the court called "Kansas" is composed of "D. R. Anthony and others," and it delivers a calm opinion on Mr. Ross's share in the judgment of the court below in the following chaste and elegant language:

"Hon. E. G. Ross, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

"Your telegram received. Your vote is dictated by Tom Ewing, not by your oath. Your motives are Indian contracts and greenbacks. Kansas repudiates you as she does all perjurers and skunks.

"D. R. ANTHONY AND OTHERS."

Mr. Buchanan is dead, after a long and, on the whole, brilliant career. He may be considered the last of a school of statesmen who have left no successors, and who, for want of a better name, may be called a "sensational" school. Their great aim during the greater portion of their career was to turn the national attention away from slavery by a succession of startling strokes and brilliant effects, sometimes in home and sometimes in foreign politics. Mr. Buchanan was very bold where it would have been well to be cautious and prudent; and in the great crisis of his public life, when courage was the one thing needful, he proved the most timid of men. But of his kind of politician he had in his day few superiors.

The Cable brings the news that Mr. Disraeli has "written a reply to Mr. Gladstone," admitting that further resistance to the Church bill is hopeless, and announcing that he will offer no further opposition to its passage. To what this was "a reply," and why it was written instead of being spoken in the House of Commons, we are unable to say. It is not very important in any case. The bill had been "committed" by a large majority in a full house, and its passage in the Commons, at least, was certain, no matter what Mr. Disraeli's feelings might be. His assent to its passage only makes his retention of office more embarrassing and less defensible. The only excuse he has for staying in is that a dissolution must legally take place in the winter, in order to bring the new Reform bill into operation, and he wants to see what the effect on his fortunes of the new election by the new constituencies will be before he resigns. Nobody else has the least doubt what the effect will be, and people believe that he has none either, so his course simply resolves itself into a vigorous effort to stay nine months longer in office. The Church bill prohibits the filling of any vacancy in any archbishopric or bishopric which may hereafter occur, or any new appointment to any living in the gift of the Crown or of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and directs that when benefices fall vacant, temporary provision simply shall be made for the spiritual wants of the parish. The act continues in force till August, 1869, and is of course simply an essential preliminary to more elaborate legislation for the formal extinction of the Establishment. The Irish bishops have protested in an address to the Queen, the Archbishop of Armagh at their head. He is a Beresford, and it is calculated that his family have, in different generations, drawn nearly $20,000,000 from the Church Establishment. It is not uncharitable to say that the archbishop's objections to the whole movement are natural.

The great event of the week in Paris has been M. Thiers's speech on the treaty of commerce with England. M. Thiers is an intense protectionist, but his advocacy of the cause is marred by total ignorance of, and in fact great contempt for, political economy and political economists. Indeed, he makes a boast of not studying the works of these gentlemen, his dislike of them being due, it is suggested by some of his enemies, to their want of imagination. He assailed the treaty on two grounds—one, on which he was very strong, the assumption of the Emperor to regulate the commercial policy of the country by treaty; and the other, on which he was very weak, the condition of trade and industry, in consequence of the treaty. Here he falls an easy prey to the economists, and he has accordingly been vigorously bombarded by them. M. Benard has launched a pamphlet at him, in which he twits him with a few of his old predictions about wool duties and railroads; but his most formidable antagonist is M. Dupontis, writing in the Journal des Débats. In 1859, he shows, France exported manufactured articles to the value of $280,000,000; in 1867, to the value of $356,000,000. Her total exports to England during the same period had increased from $118,000,000 to $230,000,000 in 1867, and the advance with all other countries is in the same proportion. Her general trade in 1859 amounted to $1,082,000,000; it amounted in 1866 to $1,625,000,000. In fact, there has not been a period of such extraordinary commercial prosperity in the whole of French history. The provisions of the treaty have since 1860 been extended to Belgium, the Zollverein, Italy, Switzerland, Sweden and Norway, Holland, Spain, and Austria. Certain branches of trade—iron-works, for instance—are depressed, but an enormous manufacture of machinery has sprung up in consequence of the admission of cheap iron, enabling the French to compete successfully in foreign markets with the English and Belgians. In other branches of industry, too, there is just at present more or less depression, owing to political uncertainty and the bad harvests of last year. One of M. Thiers's opinions is that there should be corn-laws keeping up the price of grain to a "reasonable price." He alleges that the fluctuations have been much more frequent and violent under the free-trade policy than under the protectionist one.

The point that the Emperor has no right to settle the commercial policy of the country on his own mere motion M. Thiers pressed with great force, informing the ministers that, "august" as the Emperor was, "august" as everybody in the Tuileries must be considered, there was something in France still more "august," and that was the nation, throwing into vigorous prose the idea which Mr. Bright not long ago borrowed, in one of his most powerful and effective perorations, from, he said, an "old Puritan poet," in the lines:

> "There is, on earth, a yet auguster thing, > Veiled though it be, than parliament or king."

M. Thiers maintains that, as the state of things for which England has been striving for one hundred and fifty years is now established on the Continent, in the erection of a great power hostile to France, and of which France is really afraid, the commercial treaty with her might be abrogated without risk. Having got what most she wants, she would not fight.

Austria has at last come to terms with the German Zollverein. There was a commercial treaty between Austria and Prussia from 1849 to 1865, the terms of which were imposed by Austria. In 1865, Prussia having recovered her freedom and become more confident in her strength, refused to renew it, and entered into the Anglo-French treaty with France, and asked Austria to join. Austria refused, and tried to get the South German States to leave the Zollverein and join her in a protectionist league of their own, but they declined. She has accordingly during the last two years been trying a high tariff on her own account, but it has broken down. With cheap goods on every side of them the people would not submit to it, and Baron Beust has given way, and has negotiated a treaty with the Zollverein early in this year, which is now before the Customs Parliament and will doubtless be passed. The treaty lowers the Austrian duties on most articles, in various degrees ranging from sixty to ten per cent.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

THE moderation, foresight, and sound judgment manifested by the Chicago Convention, alike in the selection of candidates and the construction of a platform, have given new justification to the preference which the American people have given for the last forty years to the system of nomination by delegates chosen for the particular purpose, over the former system of nomination by the members of Congress in caucus. It seems strange, on some accounts, that it should be so; yet there can be no doubt that a Republican Congressional caucus would have greatly imperilled, by its rashness, the party victory which the Convention has done much, by its prudence, to secure.

This unexpected moderation, in the very height of a passionate excitement over the failure of impeachment, which might naturally have misled the Convention, has given a warning to the Democratic party which its Eastern managers, at any rate, are disposed to heed. The preference of a majority of the party for Pendleton, and a platform committed half-way to repudiation, and unequivocally against negro suffrage, is beyond doubt; and the personal inclinations of three-fourths of the nominating convention will be in the same direction. But the desire of the delegates for success in the campaign will probably suffice to overcome their attachment to candidates and principles, if they can be convinced that the latter impulse can be gratified only at the expense of the former.

The nomination of Pendleton, upon a platform taken from his speeches, would excite the enthusiasm and zeal of the "Old-line Democrats" to a degree which could not be surpassed by any other scheme, and which might not be attained under any other candidate, except, possibly, Horatio Seymour. The workers of the party would labor in such a cause with all the energy that party pride and personal attachment could inspire, in addition to that which comes from the hope of office, and would be encouraged by the general and unselfish enthusiasm of the mass of the party.

This peculiar and valuable zeal cannot be aroused by any candidate of less pronounced opinions. It cannot be bought or coaxed into existence. The desire of office is a very important motive to the Democratic mind, probably strong enough to outweigh any other single consideration; but it does not make the work of a campaign as easy as it is when all motives are brought into full play. The nomination of General Hancock, and still more that of Chief-Justice Chase, would awake no other enthusiasm among old-fashioned Democrats than such as springs purely from the love of place and power. This is a very serious drawback to the advantages which might be gained by such nominations.

On the other hand, there are strong objections, on grounds of policy, to the nomination of Mr. Pendleton. He is extremely obnoxious to all supporters of the war on the part of the North, and to all men who are honest enough to be squarely opposed to repudiation of the war debt. And he cannot get the vote of any self-respecting colored man, except by force or fraud. The blots upon his record concerning the war and the debt are certain to prevent his carrying any of the New England States, and would make him the weakest candidate that could be named for the Middle States, while his general reputation would deprive him of every electoral vote south of Maryland, except, perhaps, that of Arkansas. With no reasonable hope of carrying Pennsylvania or Ohio, and but very slender chances in New York, he would start in the canvass at a vast disadvantage. Indeed, if we are right in believing that he cannot carry Pennsylvania, his case is hopeless; for, as we shall demonstrate, the vote of that State is indispensable to the election of a Democratic President.

The reconstruction of the insurrectionary States under universal suffrage is now substantially complete. Virginia, Alabama, and Texas are the only States which have not yet adopted new constitutions. Alabama will undoubtedly adopt a constitution upon a new vote being taken. Virginia and Texas seem likely to delay their reorganization until after November. If they do not, it will be because a majority of their voters are Republicans; and in that case we shall have understated the Republican strength.

Assuming that the reconstructed Southern States are to be admitted in time to vote at the Presidential election, we think the electoral vote should be divided as follows, classing as doubtful all States the result in which cannot be foreseen with moral certainty:

REPUBLICAN.		DEMOCRATIC.
Maine,	7	New Jersey,	7
New Hampshire,	5	Delaware,	3
Vermont,	5	Maryland,	7
Massachusetts,	12	Kentucky,	11
Rhode Island,	4
South Carolina,	6
Louisiana,	7
Ohio,	21
Michigan,	8
Wisconsin,	8
Kansas,	3
Minnesota,	4
Iowa,	8
	98		28

PROBABLY REPUBLICAN.		PROBABLY DEMOCRATIC.
Pennsylvania,	26	Connecticut,	6
West Virginia,	5	New York,	33
North Carolina,	9	Georgia,	9
Florida,	3	Arkansas,	5
Alabama,	8	California,	5
Mississippi,	7	Oregon,	3
Tennessee,	10
Indiana,	13
Illinois,	16
Missouri,	11
Nebraska,	3
Nevada,	3
Total,	212	Total,	89

Of the doubtful States, while we expect them to vote as we have indicated, we believe that the votes of a majority will depend greatly upon the course of future events, and especially upon the action of the Democratic Convention next July.

No reasonable politician will dispute with us as to the vote of any State included in our list of certainties, except as to New Hampshire, Ohio, and Wisconsin on one side, and New Jersey on the other. We have put these States in accordance with their last votes; and though we are aware that enthusiastic friends of Mr. Pendleton insist that he can carry Ohio, we do not see the least reason to believe it. The position of the other States referred to scarcely needs any comment. We wish we could see a chance for redeeming New Jersey from its present masters; but the largeness of the Democratic vote last fall leaves no room for hope.

Connecticut having given Governor English 1,750 majority, on the largest vote ever polled, must be conceded as likely to vote the same way in November. There was a larger fraudulent vote cast there in April than can be polled next fall; but after allowing for this, the majority for a Democratic candidate of good antecedents is likely to be over 500. We do not think, however, that Mr. Pendleton, or any one like him, could carry the State at all. Mr. English carried it by the aid of "Conservative Republican" votes; and though Senator Dixon and his friends in office may feel bound to adhere to his new allies under all circumstances, his Republican friends who are not collectors or postmasters will not agree with him.

New York will be hotly contested, both parties being sanguine of success, and both having such chances as may well induce each to make its utmost effort. Besides its thirty-three Presidential electors, the State elects a governor, representatives to Congress, and the lower branch of the Legislature, upon the complexion of which depends the choice of a United States senator. The probabilities are that the Democrats can carry the State for any candidate except Pendleton, and elect their governor, but that the Republicans will carry the Legislature, and therefore the United States senator. The Democratic majorities are furnished principally by the cities of New York and Brooklyn, which last fall gave 74,000 Democratic majority, and will next fall give at least 80,000. The rest of the State gave 27,000 Republican majority last year, but gave 70,000 for Governor Fenton in 1866. Fenianism helped the Republicans in 1866 as it never will again, and there is no ground for expecting that even the excitement of a Presidential campaign will draw out a larger Republican majority in the interior of the State than was polled in 1866. This calculation would leave a Democratic majority in the whole State of about 10,000. But this does not carry the Legislature with it. Enormous majorities concentrated in small districts are not as available for this purpose as small majorities scattered over the whole State. There are several Assembly districts which give the Democratic party from seventy to ninety per cent. of their vote; while the Republican assemblymen rarely obtain sixty per cent. of the vote cast; but they are none the less sure of their election. New York city and Brooklyn elect thirty members of the Assembly, who will probably be all Democrats; but the rural districts elect ninety-eight members, of whom the Republicans seldom fail to have at least seventy—a clear majority of the whole. This is not the result of any unfair apportionment; it is merely the natural consequence of the concentration of the Democratic vote in one corner of the State.

Pennsylvania gave a small Democratic majority last fall; but only on personal grounds, many Republicans preferring the Democratic nominee for judge of the Supreme Court. The State is somewhat doubtful, and will be vigorously fought for; but we cannot see any reason to believe that it can be carried for any candidate yet named among the Democratic party. We feel quite sure that Mr. Pendleton could not get its vote.

West Virginia will become more doubtful as the course of time diminishes the force of her laws excluding rebels from voting. The sons of rebels will vote, and will be apt to vote for the restoration of their fathers to political privileges. But, for this year, the State is likely to remain with the Republican party, unless its zealots succeed in turning out all the friends of the two senators from that State, as they are trying to do.

North Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee cannot fail to vote for Grant unless the Democratic party should adopt a candidate and a platform which would divide the colored voters—an improbable event. If Governor Brownlow should die, and his successor fail to administer the registry laws with Brownlow's stern determination, the vote of Tennessee would become doubtful in any aspect of the canvass.

Georgia has given the Republican governor only 7,600 majority, and the negro vote was divided. The white vote will be larger in the fall, and it seems probable that the State will be carried for any Democratic nominee not personally obnoxious to the colored people.

Arkansas gave no more than between one and two thousand majority for reconstruction, and we think that will be overbalanced at the next election by additional white votes.

Missouri, like West Virginia and Tennessee, owes its Republican majority to disfranchising laws, which become ineffective through mere lapse of time. We think that Grant will carry the State, but it is not absolutely certain.

Indiana is a closely contested State, with a naturally small majority either way. Its population has been largely increased of late by immigration from the South, and for this reason we think it much more doubtful than it has been for some years past. If the Republican nominations were less popular than they are, we should concede the State to the Democrats.

Illinois gave a Republican majority of 56,000 in 1866, and it may therefore seem a needless concession to call it doubtful. But this large majority was partly derived from Fenian aid, and cannot be repeated. Still, we see no reason to believe that the State will fail to give 20,000 to 30,000 majority for Grant.

Nebraska gave only a small Republican majority in 1866, which may have been overcome by the immigration of the last two years, though we think not.

Nevada, California, and Oregon are controlled by similar influences, and California especially is receiving large accessions from the Southern States. We do not think that the Republicans can regain it, and we are not over-confident that they will retain Nevada. But that is a small matter.

We are not yet satisfied that the Democratic Convention can be induced to nominate Mr. Chase; and our calculations are not, therefore, made upon the basis of his nomination. If, by any extraordinary influence, the Convention should be led to accept him, and the party could agree to support him, he might, and probably would, carry several States which otherwise are hardly doubtful.

To elect their candidate the Democrats must carry, in addition to the States which we have mentioned as likely to vote for them, the States of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Indiana, Missouri, Nebraska, and Nevada, with either Illinois or some one of the reconstructed States, besides Georgia and Arkansas. If they carry Illinois, they can spare either Missouri or the three small States. Even with the aid of Pennsylvania their task is a discouraging one; but without that aid it seems to us hopeless. How, under these circumstances, the party can imagine the success of Mr. Pendleton to be possible, is beyond our comprehension, unless they contemplate his installation by force, on the ground that the Southern votes should not be counted. But this is a step for which they are not prepared, and any attempt at which would only result in the destruction of the faction guilty of it.

GENERAL GARFIELD'S SPEECH ON THE CURRENCY.

It must be admitted that the fears which many people entertained after the war was over touching the prominence in our legislative bodies which successful soldiers would probably acquire, have been proved groundless in a very striking way by the facts. It is remarkable but true, and true almost without exception, that the military temper—impetuosity, impatience of discussion or delay, love of arbitrary procedure, contempt for study and experience—has been shown during the last three years by civilians, or by nominal soldiers, who did little or none of soldiers' work, properly so-called. The real soldiers, men who had won distinction in the battle-field and on the march, have, in the great majority of cases where they have been called into political life, shown the possession of the political sense in a very high degree, and have brought to the treatment of political questions not only as much knowledge as the civilians, but a judgment and discretion to which most of the civilians who are most active as legislators can lay no claim.

Of this class of soldiers whose services in the field seem to have prepared rather than spoiled them for political life, General Garfield, of Ohio, is an excellent specimen.

Bred a lawyer, he was, at the time he entered the service, at the head of a college in Ohio, in the district represented for twenty years before by Joshua R. Giddings. At the time of his unsolicited nomination and election—for he was absent in the field—the doubt entered many minds whether he could hold the position in Congress in the place which his predecessor had so worthily filled. But this doubt is set at rest. True upon all the questions of reconstruction and of equal rights, General Garfield has, since his entrance into Congress, recognized the fact that the great question looming up in the future—the rock on which we might yet be stranded—was the great fiscal question, the question of currency and taxation, and to this he has applied himself with indomitable industry. In his speech upon "The Currency," delivered on the 15th May, he has proved his power to become a leader of his constituents upon this matter; and although a majority of them may have been deluded by the arguments of politicians of the Butler stamp, or disheartened and confused by the weakness of their own Senator Sherman (who of all men should have stood firm), yet we doubt not that before the nomination for the autumn campaign they will be glad to continue their good practice of retaining an able and an honest man as their representative, as they did his predecessors, one for sixteen, the other for twenty years.

Although he is without practical experience in financial matters, General Garfield's speech is not the speech of a mere theorist or doctrinaire. He does not attribute all our difficulties to a bad money system, as many of our so-called financiers are apt to do, but he has recognized the need of "patient examination of facts, and careful study of principles which do not always appear on the surface, and which involve the most difficult problems of political economy;" and he exhibits that wisdom so rare among the people of this country, of being willing to "consent to be instructed by the experience of other nations."

We shall give a short sketch of his speech, advising any reader of the Nation to write to him for a full copy. He first proves that our so-called hard times bear no comparison to the difficulties with which other countries which have not been in active war are struggling, but he shows that almost every country in Europe is suffering from a dearth of food and from stagnation of trade to a far greater extent than we are, rightly attributing this state of things to the condition of passive war involved in the maintenance of standing armies of 3,000,000 men at an annual cost of $1,000,000,000. He next proves that our civil war and the return to peace produced an industrial revolution in this country; first, the war gave an undue stimulus to many branches, we may say to most branches, of industry, resulting in an over-investment of capital in many of them, which can only be corrected by our rapid increase of population. He rightly says: "Rising prices increased the profits of business, but this prosperity was caused by the great demand for products, and not by the abundance of paper money. As a means of transacting the vast business of the country, a great volume of currency was indispensable; and its importance cannot well be over-estimated. But let us not be led into the fatal error of supposing that paper money created the business or produced the wealth. As well might it be alleged that our rivers and canals produce the grain which they float to market. Like currency, the channels of commerce stimulate production, but cannot nullify the inexorable law of demand and supply."

We think he alleges too positively that the rise in prices was not in part, at least, the result of the issue of paper money; and he also admits too fully the need of more currency than we had, although he touches upon the fact elsewhere that an excessive issue of currency stimulated exchange and speculation of the gambling kind; hence, when the war ended, and the whole army of men returned to peaceful pursuits, too large a proportion were tempted into trade, and too small a portion returned to the production of commodities, the exchange of which constitutes trade. To this cause, we think, may be attributed the peculiar condition of the past winter; in the cities there has doubtless been more than the usual amount of destitution and want, while in every part of the country there has been a vehement cry for more labor, both male and female, and in almost every branch of occupation pursued in the country districts, whether mechanical or agricultural. To quote the words of another of our successful generals, now settled in the interior of Missouri, "law, physic, and merchandise are full; brains at a discount—muscle wanted."

General Garfield next gives a compact and clear statement of the function of money, ending with these conclusions:

"When the money of the country is gold and silver, it adapts itself to the fluctuations of business without the aid of legislation. If, at any time, we have more than is needed, the surplus flows off to other countries through the channels of international commerce. If less, the deficiency is supplied through the same channels. Thus the monetary equilibrium is maintained.

"Not so, however, with an inconvertible paper currency. Excepting the specie used in the payment of customs and the interest on our public debt, we are cut off from the money currents of the world. Our currency resembles rather the waters of an artificial lake which lie in stagnation or rise to full banks at the caprice of the gate-keeper.

"Gold and silver abhor depreciated paper money, and will not keep company with it. If our currency be more abundant than business demands, not a dollar of it can go abroad; if deficient, not a dollar of gold will come in to supply the lack. There is no legislature on earth wise enough to adjust such a currency to the wants of the country."

We mark the last paragraph in italics, as it presents a truth which many of our legislators fail to perceive.

He next meets the insane or iniquitous proposals for an increase of currency by affirming that "No such change of values [as would be produced by an increase] can occur without cost. Somebody must pay for it. Who pays in this case? We have seen that doubling the currency finally results in reducing the purchasing power of each dollar one-half; hence every man who held a legal-tender note at the time of the increase, and continues to hold it till the full effect of the increase is produced, suffers a loss of fifty per cent. of its value; in other words, he pays a tax to the amount of half of all the currency in his possession. No more unequal or unjust mode of taxation can possibly be devised. Some one may say: 'This depreciation would fall upon capitalists and rich men who are able to bear it.' If this were true it would be no less unjust. But unfortunately the capitalists would suffer less than any other class. The new issue would be paid in the first place in large amounts to the creditors of the Government; it would pass from their hands before the depreciation had taken full effect, and, passing down step by step through the ranks of middlemen, the dead weight would fall at last upon the laboring classes in the increased price of all the necessaries of life. It is well known that, in a general rise of prices, wages are among the last to rise."

This truth has been by no one better stated, and there is ample evidence that the mass of the people are becoming alive to the fact that such is the truth; and hence we find politicians of the Butler stamp attempting to explain away what they have said.

We cannot help regretting that General Garfield should have presented in his speech a specific plan for the resumption of specie payment. It is open to criticism and does not seem to us a good one. We know that he attaches but little importance to it himself, and we regret that attention should by it be diverted from the principles so logically and ably presented in the main body of the speech.

The question of resuming specie payment is one of will. If bank officers and experts in finance do not join heartily in devising the easiest and safest method—and we fear that many of them are passively opposed to any speedy method—we may rest assured that the will of the people will manifest itself and bring about the result at any cost and at any sacrifice of the interest of the banks, or any other special interests which may stand in the way, and with much greater difficulty and disaster than is absolutely necessary in the process.

In fact, we believe with General Garfield that the most difficult point has been passed. Our enormous natural resources are asserting their full power, and, notwithstanding the alleged stagnation and depression of business, the fact that the receipts of our railroads and canals are greater than ever before, although the prices of freight are lower than they have been, proves that the aggregate exchange of commodities is larger, and that production, the true test of prosperity, is increasing at an enormous rate. The vehement demand for labor in almost every department of industry further proves that production and exchange do not, on the whole, fail to pay a profit to the capital which is the fund from which all wages are paid.

JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE.

THE three great questions of the day we hold to be the reform of the civil service, the condition of the judiciary, and the finances. As regards the first, we see good reason for feeling hopeful. The performances of the whiskey ring are doing for it what years of honest agitation could hardly have done; it has enlisted the services of able and energetic men in Congress, and a larger and larger proportion of the public is every day convinced of its importance. Besides, its evils lie on the surface, or, as the French say, "they leap into your eyes." No means have as yet been discovered of disguising or defending them.

The judiciary and the finances, on the other hand, labor under unusual difficulties. The issue of legal-tenders in paper has caused great confusion in the popular mind touching the nature and functions of money, and it is this confusion which those who are now contending for the honorable discharge of all the national obligations find their greatest impediment. Once let the great mass of the people be convinced that the greenback is not money, but a promise to pay money, and that, though it may temporarily and imperfectly serve the purposes of money, it cannot without absurdity be tendered in final discharge of the debts of the issues of it, the repudiation movement will be at an end. That we shall reach this consummation before many months we do not doubt.

As regards the judiciary, however, a number of circumstances, only indirectly affecting it, combine to render reform in it exceedingly and increasingly difficult. Nobody who has observed how much what Carlyle calls the "earth-rind of habit" has to do with maintaining good government, as well as with maintaining abuses, can witness without alarm anything which tends to blur or distort the popular conception of the nature and functions of a court of justice, or of the place filled in society by the judges. There can hardly be a greater misfortune than the occurrence of anything which accustoms people to think of a court as an agent, a servant, a delegate, or, in fact, as anything but pure judgment. Now, various incidents have of late been helping to convert the judges in the popular eye into mere delegates, the instruments not of abstract justice, but of the majority, and not even of the popular will in fair weather, but of the popular will in a storm.

In the first place, the introduction of the plan of electing the judges has been gradually assimilating in the popular eye the functions of courts to those of the legislatures, and has been leading people to consider the judge's decision in all cases in which the party which elected him is interested as much its due as the votes of the men it has sent to the legislature. We could give numberless illustrations of this, if they were needed; nearly everybody is familiar with it. This tendency was stimulated by the conduct of the Supreme Court in the slavery controversy. The popular respect for that court was enormous, and was, it is safe to say, one of the most valuable of the national possessions, when the Court itself destroyed it in a day by presuming too much on it in the Dred Scott decision. Then the expediency of "reorganizing" the court, with the view of making it the minister of the popular will on the question of slavery, began immediately to be discussed and to grow in favor. The complications arising out of the reconstruction problem have increased the suspicion with which it has been regarded, and led to more vehement denunciation of the judges, and more earnest questioning of their right to oppose themselves in their decisions to the prevailing sentiment of the hour, not on slavery only but on any question. The duty of all judges to submit themselves to the voice of the people, and the meanness and dishonesty of all judges who refuse to do so, has been a favorite subject on the stump for the last two years. In fact, fierce denunciations of the court in anticipation of possible decisions on probable cases were a favorite occupation of Mr. Boutwell and other Radical leaders in the early part of last winter.

Most inopportunely at this juncture came the impeachment trial before the Senate. It was undoubtedly the intention of the framers of the Constitution not that the Senate should try impeachments, but that the senators, and no others, should be members of the court for the trial of impeachment. In other words, they did not mean to add to the duties of the Senate; they simply determined the composition of the court, and when a senator took his place in it he ceased to be a senator or delegate or representative, and became simply a judge. His character is fixed still more clearly by the proceeding. The oath administered to him to decide "according to the law and the evidence," the presentation of the charges in formal articles, the hearing of witnesses and counsel, the presence of the Chief-Justice, all proved clearly that the minute a senator takes his place in the "High Court" his connection with his constituents is severed ad hoc. He is then under no responsibility to anybody but God and right reason. Now, this transformation it was hard for the popular mind, especially in a time of great excitement, to follow. It needed, in following it, all the help it could get from the press and from influential politicians. A portion of the press did its duty as well as it could, but it was a kind of duty that it was difficult under the circumstances to do otherwise than timidly. The other portion of it which made itself the instrument of folly and fanaticism was under no restraint whatever, and under the play of its rhetoric the judicial character of the Senate, faint from the beginning, gradually disappeared from the mind of a portion of the Republican party.

That it was a great mistake to impose any such duty as the trial of impeachment cases on the Senate, or, rather, that impeachment should have been made a judicial process at all, or anything more than the removal of the President, as a legislative act, by a two-thirds vote, we think the result of the late trial proves. But this result has been unfortunate in more ways than one. It has not simply proved the unfitness of a legislative body, under such a government as ours, for purely judicial functions; but it has helped to increase the confusion in the popular mind touching the nature of judicial functions. We think under this aspect the late trial has done mischief from the effects of which it will take all that every intelligent writer and talker in the country can do for some time to come to enable the public to recover, for it has strengthened and confirmed the already too prevalent opinion that it is the duty of the judge to carry out the will of "the people" (the majority) in every case about which the people cares anything—or, in other words, in the very cases in which judicial independence is most needed.

We have been induced to come back to this subject by the letter in another column, signed "S.," on the subject of Mr. Wade's vote on the verdict. The casting of that vote, and the small amount of reprehension it has excited, would of themselves furnish all the justification we need for the amount of attention we have bestowed on the nature of the trial. Mr. Wade is not only utterly unconscious himself of the impropriety of his own conduct, but he and his friends evidently think it was something very fine. Now, we can discuss his conduct on the impeachment trial only as the conduct of a judge. No matter what he may say or think, we know he was there as a judge and as nothing else, because we know the oath he took, and we know that, after he had taken that oath, he was no more responsible for what he did in his judicial character to the Republican party or the people of Ohio than to the Austrian Reichsrath. Therefore, when Mr. Johnson was brought before him, and he perceived that the result of a verdict of guilty would be to give him, Benjamin Wade, a free house, $25,000 a year, a place of power and much dignity, a great increase in the number of his friends, and the disposal of forty thousand offices, more or less—in other words, a prize so enormous that there is no man in public life whose head is not completely turned by the smallest prospect of it, his plain duty was to abstain from all share whatever in the proceedings. The rule is clear, and is as old as civilization. It is embedded in the human conscience as well as in the common law. It does not need a direct bribe to disqualify a judge. It only needs interest in the result. Hobbes stated it admirably when he said:

> "And seeing every man is presumed to do all things in order to his own benefit, no man is a fit arbitrator in his own cause, and if he were never so fit. . . . For the same reason no man ought to be received for arbitrator to whom greater profit or honor or pleasure apparently ariseth out of the victory of one party than of the other, for he hath taken, though an unavoidable bribe, yet a bribe, and no man can be obliged to trust him."

Moreover, the Constitution excludes the Vice-President from all participation in the trial of the President on this ground. That the exclusion was not made to cover the President of the Senate in the trial of the Vice-President when acting as President was doubtless due to the feeling that the contingency was too remote to make it worth providing for. But the rule as it stands furnishes an analogy which Mr. Wade and his friends ought not to have disregarded. We must not be told that Mr. Wade is honest, or would not be warped by his interest in the result. He has no right to ask us to trust him. It is only a part of a judge's duty, as we took the liberty of saying when discussing Chief-Justice Chase's position some months ago, to be honest; a more important part still is to inspire the public with confidence in the administration of justice, and this there cannot be if judges decide causes by which they lose or gain, though their virtue be adamantine. Bacon said in his apology, when charged with corruption, that though he might have made suitors pay for just decrees, he never made them pay for unjust ones; but this excuse was worthless, because, as Bentham says, "it was notorious he took money for his decrees, and disputable whether they were just or no, and the Court of Chancery, therefore, wore in the eye of the public the appearance of a great auction-room, in which all the fortunes of the kingdom were selling to the best bidder, for the benefit of the judge." In short, any action on the part of a judge, let his motive be ever so pure, which produces a feeling of insecurity, by shaking the confidence of the community in judicial integrity, produces as bad consequences as action dictated by the most corrupt motives. For this reason the law orders an ordinary judge to leave the bench when a case comes before him in which he has an interest. It does not trust anything to his character; it does not wait to see whether his vote will affect the result or not, or whether he will not vote against his own interest. It says: "No matter what the value of your vote may be, or what your purity may be, come down. You must not give scandal; you must not only be pure, you must be unsuspected. Your duty is not simply to judge righteously, but to magnify the judicial office, to cherish the faith of mankind in the existence of justice. You shall not wait to hear the case; you shall not make any display of your virtue in deciding against yourself. You shall not familiarize the people with the spectacle of a judge deliberately exposed to temptation, or with the idea that a judge may, under any circumstances, court temptation. Come down."

Mr. Wade's casting his vote, therefore, after the result was certain, does not alter his position. It was still a scandal; his conduct in taking part in the trial was still indecent. We make no charge of dishonesty against him. We accuse him of crime only in so far as all great blunders of public functionaries are crimes. And all claim to consideration, on the ground that he was simply indiscreet or overzealous, he has effectually destroyed by his behavior to Messrs. Trumbull, Fessenden, and others since the trial closed—behavior which clearly shows that he is not willing to allow to others the liberty he claims for himself.

We single him out for animadversion, too, for the simple reason that, as we have often said, there is in these days of incessant preaching little use in denouncing any of the great public abuses unless you point your moral with actual cases. To inveigh against corruption and judicial indecency in general terms, carefully avoiding all reference to A.'s corruption or B.'s indecency, is to waste one's words on the desert air. Moreover, we have been amongst the number of those who have, during the last three years, urged incessantly the admission of great bodies of ignorant people to the franchise. Whoever does this, and does not at the same time preach with greater earnestness than ever the supremacy in politics of reason over feeling, the value of judicial independence and of the forms of law, incurs, no matter how small the amount of his influence, a greater responsibility than we are willing to assume.

THE MIND'S THE STANDARD OF THE MAN.

WHOEVER surveys America as it is to be seen in newspapers is aware that we have among us, flourishing in what begins to look like excessive luxuriance, a class of political persons with a decided horror of "mind." Especially they are at bitter enmity with "the so-called judicial mind" and with "the so-called legal mind," both of which they seem to consider forms of head-disease resulting from moral profligacy. "Whenever," says one incisive writer of this school,—"whenever we hear of a man's getting 'a great legal mind' on the brain, we give up all hope of him;" the state of despair into which the writer permits himself to fall being due, we suppose, partly to horror at the wickedness of the man in admiring mind, particularly mind of the legal variety, and partly to grief and anger because his fellow-creature does not cherish the preference he feels for always throwing himself on his instincts; or rather, to speak more exactly, on his eternal instincts. Eternal instincts is the more proper name, we believe. That is, at any rate, what is usually said by the school of which the authority above cited is one. God-given instincts would perhaps be the best term. It would cover not only the kind of instincts designated as eternal, but also those of a fleeting, temporary kind—the corporeal and strictly personal instincts of the individual avoirdupois man. And apparently these latter are held to be very important. For example, take this paragraph by an own brother, in spirit, of the gentleman quoted above. No attention whatever is to be paid to what he says at the commencement; "they seemed odd remarks," says he; but that is merely his way of talking. Evidently in his secret heart he considers them not odd, but thinks there 's a great deal in them. We may as well confess, too, before we quote, that it is our belief that the old Roman of a senator who is made to father the remarks is fabulous, and that they are the writer's own. Old Romans are not so plenty in the Federal District. However, this is what is attributed to one of them:

"They seemed odd remarks that a grand old Roman of a senator made on Saturday evening, when he said: 'Just look at those men who betrayed us to-day; they are not well-made men; there 's something the matter with every one of them. Look at Fessenden; he is half dead with dyspepsia. See Trumbull; he looks as if he were made of parchment. Look at Henderson: he is too long for the blood to circulate in his head and in his feet at the same time; and Van Winkle is so obese the circulation would be as slow in the other direction. Then there 's Fowler and Ross; poor little creatures! Don't they look like just the men to slink away and do a mean thing the very moment you are depending on them to do a right one? There 's not a squarely-built, well-put-together man in the whole lot.'"

"Seven men," the argument seems to be,—"seven men pretending to be politicians, and yet, what with derangement of the circulatory system, and a bad state of the digestive organs, and defective stature, not one full set of instincts in the whole seven of them put together!"

It will help to give a clearer notion of the school if we set beside the previous passage the passage following, as it gives a description of the truly great man, and one may see in it the ideal public man of the men of instinct:

"Have we a great man? If we have, he is not great because he commands the lore of ages, nor great because he competes with the masters of thought, nor great because he is eloquent, nor great from any intellectual power solely. He is great because he is the master of every evil force in his own soul; because he is stronger than envy or jealousy, hatred or malice, revenge or ambition; he is great because he can lift his face to the eternal God and declare, 'I love Truth and Justice, I love Mercy and Purity; these only will I serve.'"

To this definition we might make thousands of objections, but want of space forbids us to dilate upon more than one or two of them. It certainly is a definition which tends strongly to confirm a valuable theory of the late Mrs. Farnham's—namely, that woman is a truly great man far oftener than her male tyrant is. That can be said in its favor. But that alone is not a sufficient justification of it. It may be said, too, that it gives, for the first time, a fair chance at greatness to boys—to all boys over eight years of age who have had the advantage of instruction in schools. Nothing equals The Boy, except the Sixth Ward Man, when it comes to lifting up his face, as in the definition, and asseverating that he loves Truth; that his desire, even his demand, is Justice; that he is fond of Mercy, and that he has not done a thing the whole afternoon but serve them and them only. And the negative qualities also which are set forth in the ideal character he possesses perhaps in the highest degree. The Boy never "competes with the masters of thought;" he does not "command the lore of ages," nor the lore of his own age unless upon well-founded apprehension of personal violence; he is not eloquent, nor a prey to devouring ambition, nor to jealousy, nor malice, nor thirst of fell revenge. But though this is so, though the definition puts true greatness within the boy's reach, that is no more a sufficient justification of it than that it does the same for Mrs. Farnham and woman generally.

The fact is, there is no complete justification for it. It tacitly pours contempt on brains; for that reason it is to be utterly condemned and rejected. The great man may be of as middling stature as he sees fit; there may be not one internal organ of him which is not in a state of the most healthful activity; his skin may be moist as skin can be and of a color the furthest removed from the color of parchment, in every way competent to perform every proper function of a skin; his wind and limb may be sound; his moral character may be better than that of two ordinary men; his obesity may be less than that of all mankind in a lump; but unless he is gifted in some degree with the poor despised reasoning faculty he is not, in our eyes, truly great. Admit him perfectly able to lift his face up every few minutes and swear eternal fealty to Justice and to Purity and to Truth. What editor of all the instinctive school will tell us how he is going to know what Justice is, or what are Truth and Purity? Is there, possibly, some one of the organs in his square-built, well-put-together body which gives him absolute truths by a process of secretion, secerns them from his blood? Which one is it, we wonder, of his nobler entrails that would exude, so to speak, a sound Bankrupt Act, for instance? Has he glands that would give us as good a Bill to Regulate the Civil Service of the United States as that one which Mr. Jenckes has drafted with no other aid than the feeble light of reason, assisted by a dull poring over the records of half-a-dozen countries of Europe?

Or, if he does not secrete political and other truths from his chyle and blood, whence does he derive his claim to his own unhesitating confidence and our profound reverence? Is it that to the great man of the Instinctives there has been vouchsafed direct inspiration? Of course, if a man is in the constant receipt of profuse revelations from heaven there is nothing surprising if he disregards, and if his uninspired followers scorn with a great scorn, the slow plodding men who have to have minds and who endeavor to use them, who can see no better way of handling a weighty matter of government or what not than to get done "lifting up their faces" over against it as soon as may be, and instead to learn what they can about it and kindred things, even at the hazard of their complexions and digestion. There certainly is no good in brains if one is the subject of a constant though anachronistic miracle whereby the place where the brains ought to be, and where they are in the case of uninspired editors and Congressmen, is filled with ideas ready-made, fresh and hot, infallible, on all the most difficult sciences and arts. We who look on and mark the fervent heat and the appearance of infallibility, and the contempt of reasoning, and the scorn of the lore of ages, and the firm refusal to "compete with any of the masters of thought," and the double-leaded invocations of Eternal Justice as distinguished from everyday justice, which can be perceived by mere mind and which has to lean on statute-books—of Eternal Truth as distinguished from truths that have been painfully wrought out by the labors of many generations, and of Eternal Freedom as distinguished from freedom without a capital F—freedom which has been slowly acquired by people who got what schooling they could,—we who mark the peculiar manner of the "Eternal" man and see how he shines more in preaching policies than in debate, who observe his animal fondness for the "previous question," who note his habit of putting his head down, like an excited bull, and eternally going at anything that requires his attention—it is natural that we should take him to be under the influence of his instincts. Especially in the light of the flesh-and-blood passage we have recently read. But perhaps it is inspiration. There is a bare possibility that Colonel Forney has revelations. Mr. Stevens's gold bill may have been inspired into him instead of being due, as some said, with a loud voice, for the space of about three days, to his instinctive good sense. When Mr. Logan made his remarkable assault on the Secretary of the Treasury, and a rational being got up and cast great discredit on him and on his charges, and he declared that "he cared nothing for any committee on earth or in heaven," it looks more as if he were giving play to his instincts; probably heaven had not inspired him; but it is difficult to tell. And it is not possible to be sure whether it was inspiration in General Cochrane, or glands secreting political propositions, that made him announce that he would support the devil if the devil were the regular nominee of the party. There is no saying what may be revealed to a man; you have to take his word for it.

But if the despisers of brain are not inspired, and if their secretory glands are the same as those of other people; if they have no natural or supernatural means of taking immediate cognizance of truths, political or otherwise, then, for anything we can see, they also, like the rest of us, must fall to using their reasoning powers with what ability they may. Once get the most soaring correspondent, or the Grandest public man, or the editor most intolerant of "mind," to admit that probably he is essentially the same in his inside as the grovelling "judicial-minded" man, and then get him to disavow any claim to inspiration, and what is there left to him but to desist from prophesyings and come down, bringing what mind he has with him into the arena where gentlemen are requested not to call names or kick, and where disputes are settled by arguments drawn from reason, supported by a conscience to be sure, but a conscience enlightened by as much knowledge of the subject as a man can get hold of?

That our instinctive school of philosophers will speedily come to this we have little doubt. To see God in history, it is better to survey it by centuries than to look at it week by week—or as often, say, as one gets on his legs to make a speech, or bends over his pen to write "an editorial like a clarion blast." Indeed, to take contemporary events and attempt referring them to their true place in the general scheme of things, and apportion each its true importance in the counsels of Providence, is as sure a way of making blunders as man has ever invented. So it may be that we are egregiously mistaken in believing, as we do, that the band of Instinctives saw its greatest glory a year or so ago and that it began its descent last fall when it flung itself against the Supreme Court—when the Independent was very earnest for a decision based on the letters sent by the people to the judges, and the Tribune demanded that the will of the people should govern the sentence, and both wanted the court swamped by Congressional enactment. For some little time before that period of ruin they had been having everything their own way. In the first year of the war mind had little chance. Even strategy was secreted by prominent men, perfectly sound, here in New York. But after the first "On to Richmond," as the business in hand admitted of no theorizing, we betook ourselves to persons educated for that particular business; in other words, we called in "mind." Everybody remembers how, one by one, the instinctual leaders retired and left the field wholly to the plodders. Then came peace and the beginning of reconstruction, and the men of Eternal Instincts after a severe struggle for the foremost place found themselves in a minority in both Houses of Congress, and that the terms offered the South were not their terms.

"'Unfortunately,' the future student of history will say, unless we are mistaken,—" unfortunately just at this juncture that became manifest which had long been suspected. Instinct was in the White House also. The President rousing the instinctive political faith of the Sons of the Sunny South, the Sons proceeded to the enactment of the most oppressive Black Codes for the government of the Negroes. People who respected their minds saw but one course open to them; it was a choice between submitting themselves to Instinct and Oppression-for-the-Freedmen, or to Instinct and Protection-to-the-Freedmen, and they chose as might have been expected of them. This, however, gave the lead in affairs to the instinctual or revealed-political or—to unite in one name both theories of their nature—the glandular-inspiration portion of the Republican party. Thenceforward things foolish and unnecessary were done so often that the party soon found itself in process of serious diminution. There was one period when the investigations of a prominent leader of the Instinctives—who had not a 'legal mind'—cost the party about two thousand votes per diem. This, however, was at a later period. When the inspired men were at the culmination of their influence in Congress, though perhaps when their hold on the country had become loosened, they attacked and threatened to destroy the Supreme Court, and avowed a determination to carry on government by popular agitation. It was not necessary that a man should have at command much of the lore of ages in order to be able to see in this project nothing less than anarchy. The Men of Instinct made a gallant fight; but from that time forward they sank lower and lower in public credit, and at the time of the Chicago Convention, which nominated President Grant, they were dwindling in numbers, and their power was a thing of the past."

SCANDINAVIAN NEWSPAPERS AND REVIEWS.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago the civilized world took very little interest in the periodical press of the Scandinavian countries, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. No events of great importance interrupted the even tenor of the domestic history of those states. King Bernadotte governed Sweden in a manner highly honorable to his sagacity and liberal tendencies. It was even true, to some extent, what he said to his countryman, the French historian, Jean Jacques Ampère, who paid him a visit at Stockholm, and expressed to him his surprise at the simple and unpretending style in which the royal court lived, and at the extreme mildness with which the king ruled over his people, — "Ah, my friend, you must not forget that in me you see a republican on a royal throne." It is true, the rulers of Denmark were animated by a less liberal spirit, and their rule was, in some respects, oppressive enough. But the Danish people submitted to it, if not cheerfully, at least patiently, and the wrath which the German subjects of the kings of Denmark in the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein entertained against them was not to break out until a later time. In short, entire domestic tranquillity reigned both in Denmark and the Scandinavian peninsula. Equally unimportant was the part which the Scandinavian countries played in the international politics of Europe. Sweden seemed to have abandoned all hopes of recovering Finland, which Alexander of Russia had taken from her in 1808, and the existence of Denmark seemed entirely safe under the jealousy of the Great Powers, which were mutually interested in keeping the Sound, that highly important gate of the Baltic, in the hands of a third-rate power.

Under these circumstances, very little interest was taken abroad in the periodical press of Scandinavia. Few people out of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark were familiar with the languages spoken in those countries. Only the merchants and clerks in the German ports on the Baltic, such as Rostock, Lübeck, Stralsund, Stettin, and Danzig, which had intimate commercial relations with Denmark and Sweden, tried to acquire a smattering of Danish and Swedish sufficient for the requirements of their intercourse with the merchants of Copenhagen, Gothenburg, Calmar, and Stockholm. At that time it was difficult to find a Danish or Swedish newspaper even in such great commercial cities as Hamburg and Lübeck.

The great events of 1848 not only gave a remarkable impetus to the development of the periodical press in Sweden, and, above all, in Denmark, which then for the first time was placed in possession of the constitutional liberties that had been promised to it as far back as 1814, but excited also the liveliest interest of the whole of Europe in the polemics, the leading articles, and the editors of the Swedish, Norwegian, and Danish journals. For the first time in history the politicians of the Old World spoke in terms of great interest of the savage editorials of the Faedrelandet (Fatherland) of Copenhagen, of the semi-official statements of the Berlingske Tidende (Berling's Gazette), of the piquant articles of the Dagbladet (Journal), and of the impassioned leaders of the Stockholm Aftonblad (Evening paper). The revolution of 1848 secured an entirely free constitution to Denmark and it must be said, in justice to that blunt and eccentric king, Frederick VII., that he honestly carried out the provisions and principles of this constitution from the moment when it was granted, in 1848, to the last day of his life, in November, 1863. The events of 1848 exerted a less sensible effect upon the liberties of the Swedes and Norwegians, because, as we said before, they enjoyed by far more freedom since 1814 than their neighbors in Denmark.

In consequence of the important events of the revolutionary year the old papers of Copenhagen, Stockholm, and Christiania gained large numbers of new subscribers; they improved their outward appearance, increased their reading matter, and profited in every way by the chances offered to them at that time to augment their influence and importance. Besides, a great many new papers were started, especially in Copenhagen, by enterprising journalists under the newly-acquired freedom of the press, and favored by the perpetual political excitement prevailing in Copenhagen during the wars between Germany and Denmark, from April, 1848, until January, 1851. In 1814, sixty-seven daily, weekly, and monthly periodicals were issued in Sweden. In 1833 this number had risen to one hundred. Ten years later, in 1843, it amounted to one hundred and twenty. In 1853 the number of periodicals published in the Swedish kingdom was one hundred and thirty-eight, of which twenty-one were published at the capital, Stockholm. Of these hundred and thirty-eight periodicals one hundred and five were political journals; the remaining thirty-three were literary and political reviews. In 1860 the number had been increased only by two journals, and in 1868 by nine more, so that the number of periodicals issued in Sweden at the present time is one hundred and forty-nine. As the kingdom of Sweden has 3,700,000 inhabitants, there is about one journal issued to every 24,800 inhabitants. This proportion is comparatively favorable, for in 1850 Germany had but one journal to every fifty thousand inhabitants. About the same proportion prevailed in France and England, while in Russia there was in 1850 but one journal to every 357,142 inhabitants.

The oldest Swedish paper is the Post och Inrikes Tidningar (Post and State News). It was established in 1645, when it appeared as a small weekly, and contained articles in four languages—Swedish, Latin, French, and German. In 1659 its size was enlarged, and this was done again when Charles XII. ascended the Swedish throne. A great many extras of the paper were issued during the marvellous career of that heroic madman, and since 1719 it was published as a tri-weekly. In 1790 it became a daily paper, and did a flourishing business during the eventful period preceding the French Revolution. The court had always used it as its special organ, and in 1814 it was formally declared the official journal of the Swedish Government. Its political tone is, of course, moderate and conservative, though it never exhibits any of the slavishness which is so often met with in the official journals of France, Germany, and Russia. It is well printed on a large sheet, and has a circulation of between three and four thousand copies.

In 1767 an enterprising printer of Stockholm started a paper in opposition to the official Post och Inrikes Tidningar. He issued his new journal every day, and called it Daglight Allehanda (Daily Miscellany). The Daglight Allehanda was a liberal paper and met with good success. The despotic Wasas repeatedly tried to suppress it, but its proprietors always thwarted the persecutions directed against them, although they were repeatedly compelled to change the name of the paper. They finally chose that of Nye Daglight Allehanda (New Daily Miscellany), which is still in existence, and has a daily circulation of six or seven thousand copies. As of old, it advocates the principles of the liberal party, and is chiefly noted for the great care which is bestowed upon its literary department. Emilia Flygare Carlen, Fredrika Bremer, Maria Sophia Schwarz, and other distinguished Swedish romancists contributed to its columns. The Aftonblad (Evening paper) is the best and most widely-circulated daily paper in Sweden. It was established by Lars Hjerta on the 10th of December, 1830, and has now a circulation of ten thousand copies. Its leading columns contain contributions from the pens of the ablest members of the liberal party throughout the kingdom, and to its extraordinary influence may be attributed in great part the final overthrow of the ancient constitution of Sweden—the representation of the four classes at the Stockholm diet—and the substitution in its stead of a parliament elected by the whole people. Several years ago one of the editors and proprietors of the Aftonblad, Hellgren, was involved in a criminal tragedy in which he played a most unenviable part. This injured the influence of the paper to some extent, but skilful management soon restored its former standing, and it is now, as it was before, the most important and influential journal in the kingdom. Its literary matter is excellent, and it has had the honor of introducing through its columns some of the foremost writers of Sweden to their countrymen and the European public in general. The Swedes do not advertise much, but the advertising receipts of this paper are comparatively large; they amount annually to about forty thousand dollars.

Norway is inhabited by a sparse, poor, but liberty-loving population. It has few considerable towns, and hence the number of its political journals is comparatively small. It is remarkable, though, that of the papers published in Norway not only nine-tenths are organs of the liberal party, but that they are all edited with uncommon ability. Christiania has several dailies, of which only the Morgenblad (Morning paper) has a good circulation, between three and four thousand copies being issued every day. It is not near as large as its contemporaries of Stockholm, but edited with equal ability and with the characteristic spirit with which the Norwegians have always asserted and maintained their liberties. Bergen, Drontheim, and two or three other cities likewise boast daily papers of small size and limited circulation.

The Danes like to call themselves "the French of the North," and their beautiful capital, Copenhagen, "the Paris of the North," and not without reason. No other nation can boast of so many eminent men in science, art, and literature, in proportion to its population, as the Danes. Denmark has at the present time only 1,200,000 inhabitants, and yet it occupies a high place in matters of science, art, and literature. The greatest nations on earth would be proud of such naturalists as Oersted, such novelists as Hans Christian Andersen, such dramatists as Oehlenschläger, such sculptors as Thorwaldsen, such composers as Niels Gade. And it should be borne in mind that Denmark, beside being a small country, is a poor country; that it lacks most of the means by which larger and wealthier European states foster the development of art and literature, and that but few prizes are held out there to eminent savans, littérateurs, and artists. It is, therefore, the more remarkable that Denmark should possess so many. For instance, besides Hans Christian Andersen, whose works have been so extensively read in America, Denmark has at least twenty novelists whose works deserve to be translated. Its political press, too, occupies a position far above that which we should look for in so diminutive and poor a country. Except the United States, no country has more political journals in proportion to its population than Denmark.

Eleven daily papers are issued in Copenhagen. Three are sold at a lower price than is charged for any daily paper in the world. One, the Berlingske Tidende, is a large paper, and sold at a high price. It is believed that it could not live without the financial assistance which some wealthy Danish noblemen render to it. The Faedrelandet and Dagbladet are likewise large papers, and known to be in a very flourishing condition. The Faedrelandet is edited by Mr. Ploug, an able and fearless journalist, who, during the despotism of Christian VIII., got himself frequently into serious difficulties with the Government. Since 1848 his paper has ranked among the foremost journals of Denmark. It is noted for its enterprise in procuring news, and uses the telegraph with greater liberality than almost any other paper in the north. Its daily edition is between six and seven thousand copies. Its formidable rival is the Dagbladet, whose editor-in-chief, Mr. Bille, is one of the leading democratic politicians of his country. The Dagbladet is the sprightliest paper published in Copenhagen, and has obtained the largest circulation. Its ordinary subscription list is between eight and nine thousand copies; but when events of great importance occurred as many as twenty thousand copies were sold in a single day. Both the Faedrelandet and the Dagbladet are incessantly at war with the German journals. They denounce Prussia with great virulence. The German journals do not respond in the same violent tone, but treat their Danish adversaries condescendingly. "Do not get excited, my little Dagbladet; you are too much of a dwarf to annoy us seriously," is the style in which the Berlin and Hamburg papers reply to the fierce attacks of their Copenhagen contemporaries.

A great many monthly magazines and quarterly reviews are published in Sweden and Denmark. Mr. Kramer, a clever journalist of Stockholm, issues a quarterly review in French, devoted to politics and literature, and those who wish to familiarize themselves with the political questions agitating Scandinavia, and with the current literature of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, will find able and succinct reviews of all this in the columns of the Revue Suédoise. The interest which the Scandinavian public takes in this review is not very great. Its subscribers are chiefly Germans and Frenchmen, and the support with which it meets is so limited that it has been repeatedly obliged to suspend publication. The most famous Scandinavian review, and one that is of a very remarkable character, is the Nordisk Universitets Fidskrift (Northern University Review), which was established in 1854 and since then has constantly grown in favor with the educated classes of Denmark and Sweden. Its cover, which is adorned with singular emblems and mottoes, indicates the object which it has in view. On the first page of the cover is to be seen a banner, similar to the one which is generally carried in front of the societies of the Scandinavian students when they visit their fellow-students at the other universities. The last page of the cover is decorated with the Buddstikke (message-staff), that is to say, the famous staff which, in ancient Scandinavia, was sent from village to village to convoke a judicial meeting, or to call upon the people to take up arms, while beacons, lighted here and there upon the summits of the mountains, spread the same summons to the most distant parts of the country. Under the Buddstikke are written the words, "Bud og hilsen," and "Bud och helsning" (message and greeting), the former being Danish,

SPECIAL NOTICE.

HAVING changed their mode of mailing the paper to all except New-York City Subscribers, who will continue to be served by carriers, the Publishers of the Nation wish to call attention to the meaning of the printed labels substituted for the previous written address.

These bear not only the Subscriber's name and post-office address, but the date to which he has paid for his paper; and the change in this date will hereafter be a valid and sufficient receipt for moneys sent in renewal of subscriptions. From them is apparent, at a glance, the precise relation of the Subscriber to the Publishers, and the latter would express the hope that arrears as soon as revealed will be paid up. When the label antedates the current issue of the paper, it may be regarded as a bill.

Any errors which may be observed in the address, and any discrepancies between the account on the label and the last receipt of the Publishers, should be promptly pointed out to them for correction; as well as information given of any undue irregularity in the mailing.

Money should be sent, when possible, by money-order through the post-office.

and the latter Swedish. In effect, every number of this review, of which one number is issued once a year at each of the four Scandinavian universities—Christiania (Norway), Upsala and Lund (Sweden), and Copenhagen (Denmark), is a message and fraternal greeting to the other three. Each number contains a fresh motto, taken either from contemporary poets, or, still oftener, from the Edda or the ancient Skalds, and admonishes the readers that patriotic sentiments ought to unite the Scandinavians now as they united their remote ancestors in times of yore. Here are some of these mottoes: "If you have a friend, in whom you confide, blend your soul with his;" "The more threads of equal strength there are in a string the stronger it is;" "If you have a friend, visit him often, for the road trodden by nobody becomes obstructed by thorns and thistles;" "The pilgrim separating himself from his companions runs great risk of falling into the hands of robbers;" "We speak a single language, and Frigga is our common mother. Norwegians, Swedes, and Danes, let us be brethren!" "The Latin grammar taught us once four regular conjugations: the first, amare, to love; the second, docere, to teach; the third, legere, to read; the fourth, audire, to hear. To love, enlighten, read, and listen to each other would not, even at our age, be so bad a conjugation."

A peculiar feature of the periodical literature of Scandinavia is the great number of reviews, in which all articles are written by the same author. Such magazines and reviews would hardly meet with much favor in other countries, but they flourish in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. Thus, the celebrated Crusenstolpe has issued at Stockholm for twenty-nine years past his Stallringar och Forhallanden (Situation and Circumstances), a monthly magazine, devoted to contemporary politics and history. Mr. Crusenstolpe, a man of extraordinary ability, familiar with all the intricacies of European diplomacy, and possessed of a curious collection of unpublished political letters and documents, knows how to lend a peculiar charm to his essays, and his magazine has obtained a very large circulation. In Norway, Professor P. A. Munch, of the University of Christiania, publishes in a similar way his Norskt Maanedsskrift (Norwegian Monthly), composed exclusively of articles written by himself. Professor Munch is one of the most learned men in Europe. When he visited Rome a few years ago he surprised the learned librarians of the Vatican by explaining to them, in an off-hand way, certain ancient inscriptions which nobody had until then been able to decipher. Great homage was thereupon paid to the Norwegian professor, who spent a long time in the Eternal City, without interrupting the regular publication of his monthly magazine. The world is indebted to Professor Munch for the best history of ancient Norway, and the curious accounts of the Norsemen's voyages to America several hundred years before Columbus discovered the New World were first published in his Norskt Maanedsskrift. Mr. Goldschmidt, a Danish journalist and novelist of great ability, publishes a similar magazine, remarkable for the great variety of subjects which are treated in it.

The best Danish magazine which, like our American periodicals of the same class, has a number of contributors, is the Dansk Maanedsskrift (Danish Monthly), of which Mr. Steenstrup is editor-in-chief. Its circulation, however, never exceeded two thousand copies.

THE TRIBUNE AND "THE MISTAKE."

To the Editor of the Nation:

I cannot say that your reply last week to your correspondent, "C. C.," appeared to my mind properly conclusive, and I may say, too, that I was not much surprised at the asperity and astonishment expressed in his note. What you had previously said of the Tribune's course in regard to the seven senators gave me a great deal of satisfaction. That paper's peremptory demand for a verdict selected by its editors—regardless of the wear and tear of senators' consciences—and its screams of "bribery," "lying," and so forth, when it could not get what perjury it wanted, seemed to me, if anything, more insulting to the rest of the party than to the particular Republican leaders whom it was trying to insult. For my own part I found it best to refrain for some days from reading it. The Washington correspondent alone, by the time he had compared Mr. Grimes, who has just had a stroke of paralysis, to "a sick hedge-hog," was altogether too much for me, so I let my Democratic friends talk, and waited for Mr. Greeley to come back to the office—or his senses; I could not tell which. I was not absolutely sure, then, that you had erred in regard to the Tribune's change of front; but very much surprised I certainly was when I read your statement to that effect. As it looked to me, only a complete change in the editorial corps could make it possible that there should be such an admission as that would have been of folly and recklessness on the part of its conductors. And the paragraphs you quote in your remarks to "C. C." bear out, I think, my view of them. They are not, perhaps, what Mrs. Todger calls "as plain English as the shining sun," but is not this the meaning of them? "By removing Stanton, Johnson gave us a challenge—dared us to impeach. So we impeached, thereby doing our duty, for we relieved ourselves as a party from a grave responsibility." This is what the Tribune said, and how is this an admission that impeachment was a mistake?

Respectfully yours, R. J.

New York, May 30, 1868.

[The case is simply this. The Tribune on Monday, the 18th, announced that it had opposed impeachment on two grounds—one, that it would probably "fail" (i.e., result in acquittal); the other, that if it failed it would increase Mr. Johnson's "powers of mischief;" but that it had afterwards recommended impeachment as an answer to a challenge thrown out by the removal of Stanton. Impeachment proved, however, as the Tribune had predicted, "a failure," in that it resulted in acquittal. The question then was, had the acquittal also increased Mr. Johnson's "powers of mischief," and would he use them? That it had increased his powers of mischief, and that he would use them, the Tribune admitted by suggesting that he would now perhaps "wrest the army from General Grant," and prevent the return of Southern delegates to "the Councils of the Republic" (fustian for "Congress"). In commenting on this performance in our paragraphs of "The Week" we did not profess to quote the Tribune's words. We followed our usual practice of putting on them what we conceived to be a fair and reasonable construction, and asserted that in the passage we quoted last week the Tribune "declared that impeachment was a mistake." To this the Tribune might reply that this is not a legitimate construction, because it never used the word "mistake" and because its words apparently denied that the process was "a failure." We paid no attention to this denial, because the reason on which it was based was ridiculous, so ridiculous as to be, as regarded the public, impudent. That reason was, that no matter what happened, even though Johnson overturned the Government, the Republicans would no longer be responsible for him! If the effect of language could be got rid of in this way it would, of course, make the conviction of impostors and fortune-tellers and confidence men and quacks very difficult. A doctor might cut off a patient's leg to cure a corn, and, while admitting that the patient would probably die of the operation, show that this admission was not a confession of malpractice, inasmuch as the corn would give no more trouble. The course of the Tribune in this matter has been of a piece with its course towards the seven Republican senators. Its flat contradictions during the week ending May 23 of what it said about these gentlemen during the week ending May 15, and which some of the papers have published in parallel columns, and its course at this moment in treating the evidence produced in the Woolley case as conclusive that some of these gentlemen were bribed, furnish painful reading for honest men. They would put the paper beyond the pale of criticism if it were not for the number of its readers. We are in hopes, however, that after reconstruction is settled there will be no "cause" left in behalf of which any considerable portion of the public will consider anything and everything lawful. Its pretence of not knowing who "C. C." was, and its modest suggestion that probably he was some indignant Tribune subscriber, reminds us of the astonishment of the showman when his confederate rises up amongst the audience on the back benches in the guise of an honest countryman, and offers to bet him five dollars that he can do the trick better himself.—Ed. Nation].

MR. WADE'S VOTE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In the last number of the Nation you commented with severity on Senator Wade's vote on the eleventh article of impeachment. Did you not do him injustice?

The Washington correspondents of the press had assumed to say what Mr. Wade would do in case his voice were necessary to convict, and what he would abstain from doing if conviction could be had without his vote; but neither his "friends" nor his enemies had speculated as to his probable course in the contingency which actually occurred. Had his vote been an essential means of his own advancement, or had it, though not necessary, co-operated to that end, there would be some reason for censure.

His honesty is not questioned. Had he honestly voted "not guilty," would that have been "indecent"? But when he did vote, nineteen senators had pronounced those words, and conviction was seen to be impossible. Was it indecent for him to vote according to his conscience and his oath, "well knowing" that it could not profit himself? S.

WESTERN ANTIQUITIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

I write to you from one of the most interesting antiquarian localities in the United States. The American Bottom is a vast alluvial, stretching nearly one hundred miles along the Mississippi, in the State of Illinois, having a mean breadth of seven miles. Standing in groups upon this great plain, and stretching in connected series from bluff to river, are numerous ancient mounds, varying in size from a few feet to nearly one hundred feet, and in form conical, ellipsoidal, and angular. These tumuli belong to that ancient class of earthworks which abound over the Ohio, Mississippi, and subordinate valleys. The question of origin, purpose, and contents is still among the unsolved problems. Who were the mound-builders? Whence came, and whither went, that mysterious people? Were they autochthones? If so, how did they derive their semi-civilization? how lose it?

It is surprising that these extensive and interesting remains should have received so little attention. No examination has been made by men whose opinions are entitled to consideration. Half a century ago Breckinridge, Flint, and perhaps other early writers, roughly described them, and occasionally the Western press, particularly that of St. Louis, gives brief and hurried accounts of them, but no reliable or accurate description has ever been given of these most interesting monumental remains. So little has their character been known or understood, even by those whose studies and pursuits should have led them to the examination, that their entire nature and purpose have been misconceived. The works are so remarkable, some so gigantic, that uninformed visitors have imagined them to be natural. A favorite notion has been that they were fluviatile, while the State geologist of Illinois, in the fulness of his wisdom, has declared them to be loess!

These doubts, scepticisms, and ignorant assumptions have been abundantly dissipated by the researches now in progress. Dr. De Hass, whose general study and thorough investigation of Western antiquities, particularly in the valley of the Ohio, have made him known, is now engaged in a series of explorations in the Mississippi Valley proper, and giving special attention to the mounds and other ancient remains on the American Bottom and in the vicinity of St. Louis. His explanations have thus far been of the most satisfactory character, and the future promises results of great value to science.

The mounds are undoubtedly artificial—the product of man's industry and spirit of combined action.

A populous community occupied, in pre-historic times, this great alluvial and the adjacent bluffs. They were agricultural, for the very implements with which they tilled the soil have been recovered, and are among the most interesting relics of the Stone Age on this continent.

The people who raised these huge tumuli and dwelt around them practised both inhumation and cremation. They buried in the mound, upon the plain, and on the bluff. They used stone-lined cists and cinerary urns.

They were adepts in working stone. Many of the relics discovered display much taste and skill in their fabrication. They are of porphyry, hornblende, serpentine, steatite, etc. The flint implements and weapons are of the finest variety.

The fictile art also flourished among the early occupants of the central Mississippi Valley. Pottery of fine finish and vessels of great size have been discovered. It is a mixture, which has been exposed to the action of fire of clay and broken mussel shell, but, occasionally, I have detached small rhomboidal fragments of white spathic carbonate of lime, used instead of the shell.

It is probable the results of present explorations will determine that different and distinct peoples occupied this valley in pre-historic periods.

BY an oversight we omitted to announce last week a translation of Octave Feuillet's successful and clever novel of "Camors." Feuillet may be said to be already popular in America as a novelist, his "Romance of a Poor Young Man" having made him known favorably. Messrs. Blelock & Co. are publishers of the translated "Camors," which is now ready.—— Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press a number of valuable editions of the Scriptures: (1) Bagster's Comprehensive Bible; with the text of the King James Bible as revised by Doctor Blaney, with that commentator's Various Readings, with Archbishop Usher's Chronology, with Parallel Passages, with Notes (exclusively philological and explanatory, that is to say, unsectarian), with five different indexes, with introductions to each book, with a table of contents historically arranged, and every other feature of a truly comprehensive English Bible. The plates of the work have just been purchased by the Philadelphia firm from Messrs. Bagster & Sons. (2) A new edition, the fourteenth, of "Bloomfield's Greek New Testament." It will be in two volumes. (3) A Bible to be known as "Lippincott's Imperial Pulpit Bible." (4) A new edition of Dr. Hahn's Hebrew Bible, with the editorial work revised by Dr. Isaac Leeser. (5) "The Student's Treasury Bible," a work for the pocket. It will contain references to parallel passages, but these will be not in a column as is usual, but at the end of each verse. The same house announce a paper-covered edition of Swinburne's latest poem, "Siena;" the fifteenth volume, "Ernest Maltravers," of the Globe Edition of Bulwer; "Tricotrice," by "Ouida;" "John Ward's Governess: a Novel;" "Gold Elsie," by E. Marlitt, who has just been making American friends by her "Old Mam'selle's Secret;" a volume of Burns, with a glossary and memoir prepared by Alexander Smith; the second series of Baring-Gould's "Myths of the Middle Ages."

—That part of the literary world which opposes the passage of international copyright laws is morally bound to bestir itself and give an open answer to the pamphlet just published by the International Copyright Association. We recommend a perusal of it to everybody who is interested in the subject. It contains the never yet answered arguments on the question considered as one of morals, and we hope soon to be able to recommend a second pamphlet containing arguments equally conclusive on the question considered from the point of view of good policy—of the lower expediency, too, as well as of the higher expediency which is the close and hardly separable companion of justice. Mr. Palfrey and Mr. W. Gilmore Simms, in letters which form a part of the report before us, mention treatises of theirs which would be useful in the preparation of such a pamphlet, and there is a "publisher's note" which also bears on the question we hope to see treated next. That such a work will have to be done before the House passes Mr. Baldwin's bill, or any bill, no one doubts who knows the House and the Congressional history of the subject. In this pamphlet there are letters from various eminent literary men and argumentative addresses by Mr. Bryant, Doctor Lieber, Doctor Prime, Doctor Schaff, and Doctor Osgood. These are followed by several papers, of which the one most valuable is perhaps the letter from Albert Matthews, Esq., who gives a summary of the famous decision in Millar vs. Taylor, by Lord Mansfield, who then (1769) declared the common law as regards copyright, handling the subject in a way that, as Mr. Matthews says, should make this decision the text of all who discuss the right of authors to the fruits of their labor. Mr. Grant White's recent article in the Broadway is also given, and is very good; it states the case forcibly, and contains a lucid historical account of the great landmark of English legislation on the subject, showing how by the statute of the eighth year of Queen Anne the common law rule which recognized property in copy was overset completely. As we have said, the pamphlet is to be recommended for instruction and reproof; it is to be wished that a copy of it were in every newspaper office in the country, and that the House would spend a Saturday or two in hearing the clerk read it over half a dozen times; any one, able or unable to do thinking by himself, who is equal to coarse print, and will spend twenty minutes on as many pages, may understand the whole matter, and be made to see why the law as it stands is a disgrace to us as moral and intellectual beings—how it makes the United States a robber of foreign writers, a prey to foreign publishers, and a step-mother to her own literary children. As to the two latter points, Doctor Prime declared, and we suppose he knew, that more than fifteen hundred American copyright books had been stolen by British publishers. As to the other, we all partly know how many foreign books we have stolen—since we began setting a general good example to unfortunate nations in Europe. But there is some hope of better things; though we are to wait, we suppose, till the next session and the new President, and meantime to work at indoctrinating the wilder Congressmen.

—The Workshop is a monthly magazine devoted to the reproduction, by wood engraving, of designs and patterns for all kinds of ornamental work. Thus, one of the numbers, after an essay "On Surface Decoration," gives a picture on quite a large scale of a carved stone panel of good French Renaissance work; next an early French classic window-cap from the Louvre; then Fig. 3 is a piece of wall decoration from St. Francis of Assisi, a good and instructive design, but of course not to be adequately rendered by printing and black and white, and not so accurately described as to be of much use—"green leaves," "circle brown with yellow clasps or nails," and the like, not being very instructive to the student of color. Then we have a great piece of carved ornament from the new Paris Opera House, modern work of almost the worst type, all hand work, and no brains nor feeling. Fig. 5 is a bit of flat pattern from a mosque at Cairo; Fig. 6 is a lot of designs of modern conception and of no importance, meant for china painting, but equally appropriate to ladies' embroidery; and Fig. 7 is a carpet. There are thirty-five different pictures, embodying perhaps as many different designs, and besides these, a large folding leaf gives on both sides full-size outlines and details of ornament. An illustrated specimen sheet informs us that "this periodical is the American edition of a German monthly, Die Gewerbehalle, which is published simultaneously in German, French, and English." It is announced by E. Steiger, of 17 North William Street, and the three numbers which we have received announce themselves as Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vol. I.; that is to say, of the American edition, for it seems to be not now first established in Germany.

—A much more important and better work of the same general character is L'Art pour Tous—"Art for All," published in Paris, and supplied here by the publisher's New York representative, D. Charnay. This periodical is not merely a series of fashion plates for workmen to copy from, and so smother all chance of originality and native force—it is indeed open to the objection that it can be used in that way—but it is also for the student of art a valuable collection of examples, serving to illustrate the history of decorative design. In a country like this, without old work anywhere visible, and without museums and public collections, such books are invaluable. The text is in French, English, and German; but the English is of the lamest, and seems to have been constructed by a Parisian possessed of a French-English dictionary, and of but little English more. This periodical has a large folio page, and costs twice as much as The Workshop.

—Dr. Hook, whose "Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury" promises to become a standard (High) Church history, has some remarks, in a note in the first volume of his new series, on the subject of anonymous criticism. He admits that "much may be said in favor of the anonymous in political journalism, but in favor of anonymous criticism scarcely a word can be said. When the question relates to the merits or the demerits of a literary or scientific publication the public ought to be informed whether the critic, who represents the plurality of voices by whom judgment is pronounced, is a man competent to sit in judgment upon the author." This view corresponds exactly with the semi-papistical one which is set forth in the same volume on a theological point. Dr. Hook agrees with Protestants in general in upholding the Bible as the only source and standard of a true religious belief; but he denounces as a fanatical absurdity the common notion of the right of each individual to interpret Scripture for himself. "Though the Bible is the authority, it is an authority only when rightly interpreted." In both cases, therefore, it is assumed that the public is not a competent judge of the questions at issue, the inference being that a decision is to be given by some recognized authority. But how are we to arrive at that unanimity which Dr. Hook, both as an ecclesiastic and as a man of letters, appears to consider so desirable? Catholics believe in an infallible church; Dr. Hook tells us that in England the Roman Catholics are a mere body of sectarians and schismatics. The difficulty would be still greater in the case of literary and scientific questions, for nobody, we suppose, would claim infallibility for an academy, or propose to set a pope over the republic of letters. The truth is that unanimity in matters of faith, of opinion, of taste—in everything, in short, on which the pro and con. cannot be brought to a demonstration—is as undesirable as it is unattainable. It is the unity that underlies diversity, not the unity that crushes diversity, which is the true aim and product of investigation and of culture. A really cultivated mind, instead of desiring to make its own preferences universal, will require only equal candor and sincerity in others, and will rejoice in the variety of channels through which kindred emotions and ideas may be transmitted and imbibed. Criticism is not, as Dr. Hook appears to think, a "representative of the plurality of voices," or a dictum ex cathedrâ, but merely the expression of different and often conflicting views, which, when analyzed and compared, afford a better index to the character of the work and the effect it is capable of producing than any report of an academical committee would be likely to give.

All this, however, proceeds on the presumption that the criticism, whatever its defects, will be honest. Dr. Hook justly considers that much of the contemporary criticism bestowed upon an author is dishonest. The spirit of clique and a thousand petty personal motives are dignified or sheltered by the anonymous "We." But when Dr. Hook points to the example of France, in proof of the advantages to be gained by discarding the anonymous, he is confounding the cause with the effect. Such men as Sainte-Beuve and Taine do not write with impartiality because they have a reputation to sustain, but they owe that reputation to their impartiality, in conjunction with other qualities. We believe that, by the public at any rate, more is lost than gained when the anonymous system is discarded, whether in literary or political journalism. Possibly so far as concerns the writer, the gain may be greater than the loss, but this we doubt. We doubt if the anonymous system ever kept from fame any writer who had earned it and desired it, and that it has kept many writers from dishonesty and from quarrels there is no doubt at all. We had occasion last week to speak of one bad effect the system of signatures has had on French literary criticism—even that of such men as Renan and Sainte-Beuve. But it is of course true in general that criticism stands on a far higher level in France than in England. It has been cultivated by the French as a distinct and independent branch of letters. There are no professional critics in England whose names any one would care to know. The class that confine themselves to this kind of writing are not men of letters, but literary apes. Whatever is really deserving of the name of criticism comes from persons whose regular labors lie in other fields, and whose visits to this are occasional. What they contribute, therefore, is special knowledge or accurate observation; they do not give any such analysis or estimate as the cultivation of criticism as an art might have enabled them to give. We should gain nothing by forcing such men to speak in the first person singular and attach their names to their articles. The Fortnightly Review is trying the experiment, but we doubt its success The April number, for example, contains a review of Pearson's "England during the Early and Middle Ages" over the signature of Edward A. Freeman. Mr. Freeman is a scholar, and he has evinced a minute acquaintance with early English history. In the article in question he shows himself painfully conscious of the fact. He aspires to speak with freedom, yet he evidently fears the imputation of rivalry. He talks of his own studies, and almost gets to the point of discussing his own merits. We remember a former article of his—an anonymous one—in which he recommended to the author under review to drop the use of the "We" and substitute "I." Mr. Freeman "will do well"—to use a phrase of his own—to abandon the "I" and betake himself to the "We."

—Some of our readers have doubtless seen a photograph of Erckmann-Chatrian. They are, therefore, aware that the mental unity which owns this compound name has a corporeal duality. There is not even a band uniting the two breasts in which, nevertheless, all the throbbings and pulsations would appear to be in unison. What is still more remarkable—what, indeed, would seem to give the lie to the whole science of physiognomy—these literary twins, instead of looking like two cherries on one stalk, are as dissimilar in person, feature, and air as it is possible to conceive. One is tall and solidly built, rather bald, with a high brow, a snub nose, and a mien to inspire unbounded confidence on the stock exchange. The other is short and slight, with flowing hair, a sloping forehead, a very long and slender nose, and a poetical—we had almost said a lackadaisical—expression of countenance. This contrast indicates, we suppose, what the two names would also imply—a difference of race. Nor is there any singularity in the fact that the Teutonic Erckmann and the French or Celtic Chatrian are natives of the same region, since this region is one where the two races and the two languages have been intermixed from the earliest historical times. By a misnomer, they were lately spoken of in an article in Lippincott's Magazine under the title of "Two Alsatian Novelists." It would be as correct to speak of "Chevy Chace" as a Scottish ballad, or of Joseph and Xavier de Maistre as Swiss authors. Both Erckmann and Chatrian were born in the Département du Meurthe, which lies wholly within the ancient limits of Lorraine and Bar. Here, or in the adjoining department of the Vosges, also a portion of Lorraine, the scene of most of their stories is laid—commonly, it is true, in the mountain region which forms the boundary between Lorraine and Alsace, and sometimes, as is natural, transferred to the plain on one side or the other. The legends, the traditions, the names they are so fond of commemorating belong not to Alsatian history nor, in a strict sense, to that of Lorraine, but to that of the border-land, where in primitive times the mountain fastnesses were held by clans and chiefs whose allegiance to any sovereign was at the best but nominal. Alsace, it may be added, was at one time included in the Lotharingian monarchy; but the Duchy of Lorraine was always, politically as well as geographically, a territory quite distinct from Alsace.

SAINTE-BEUVE'S PORTRAITS.*

THE essays collected in the volume introduced to American readers by Miss Preston in this very agreeable translation (to which the translator has prefixed a well-written and discriminating preface) belong to the early period of the distinguished writer's career, and may be said, moreover, to treat of persons not especially dear to the American public. And yet on this occasion we have no hesitation in speaking of the book and its author; for M. Sainte-Beuve still lives and writes, and so long as he has not gone to join those illustrious departed spirits to whom in this modern world he has given a voice and a shape, he may be deemed in literature one of the subjects of the day. Miss Preston's translation, we say, is agreeable; but is it always exactly faithful? In the article on Mme. de Sévigné, the author, commenting in a note on a description of his heroine by a contemporary, writes: "Que c'est bien elle!" etc., which Miss Preston renders, "This is worth while." This is the first error on which our eyes fell; we have not pursued the search; perhaps it is the only one.

Of the nine women whose lives are here sketched, three alone are known even by name to American ears—Mesdames de Sévigné, Roland, and De Staël. Who is Mme. de Duras, Mme. de Krüdener, Mme. de Rémusat? Each of these ladies, in the early part of our century, wrote two or three novels which thirty years ago—the date of these articles—were in a fair way to be forgotten in France. M. Sainte-Beuve, in his inimitable manner, said a good word for each; but did he arrest the wave of oblivion? On the contrary, his word was doubtless felt to be the last word, and his heroines received their quietus. It is not as that of a novelist that the mystical Krüdener's ghost of a name appears to us. To read and enjoy his various articles must have seemed to ordinary readers an all-sufficient tribute to these departed women of talent. They read M. Sainte-Beuve's extracts, and this was quite enough. Who nowadays sits down to a perusal of "Edouard" or "Valérié?" M. Sainte-Beuve himself, in the current year, would admit that we can make a better use of our time. There is, to our sensibilities, something sad and spectral in the sight of these poor old French ladies, summoned from their quiet graves, deep in the warm and comfortable soil of oblivion, and clad afresh in the chilly drapery of our American speech. With all deference to the translator's opinion, we cannot help thinking that this was not a book to translate. For our own part, we should have wholly deprecated any translation at all; but if such a work had been determined upon, we should have suggested a selection of articles from the immense repository of the "Causeries du Lundi," where the translator would have found at once greater perfection of manner and heroines more generally interesting. The article on Mme. Roland in the present collection is extremely good, but it is wholly inferior to the admirable paper on the new edition of her memoirs contained in the eighth volume of the "Nouveaux Lundis." And so any one of the essays before us, with the exception of the first, the fourth, and the fifth, might have ceded its place to the sketch in the "Derniers Portraits" of Mme. de Staal-Delaunay, the author of one of the most deeply-interesting volumes of memoirs ever written. To induce an intelligent reader to go through the memoirs of Mme. de Staal-Delaunay would be a better service than to lead him (or her, we may say, as Miss Preston chiefly covets female readers) to rest content with a few extracts from three or four feeble and elegant tales of fifty years ago. Let us add the expression of our regret that the translator has judged best to omit the article on Mme. de Charrière, a lady no better known indeed than her sisters, but far more deserving of our modern attention. This person, a Dutchwoman by birth, and for a long time a resident in Switzerland—it is doubted that she ever visited Paris—was perfect mistress of a delightful French style, in which she composed two excellent novels as well as several inferior ones. From these two works M. Sainte-Beuve gives a number of extracts, all remarkable for strength and truthfulness. Mme. de Charrière looks like the first of the realists. But with the realists, as we have learned, one must proceed cautiously, and it is very possible that with all her merits Mme. de Charrière could not logically hope to figure in these chastened English pages.

"The quiet fairness," says Miss Preston in her preface, "with which M. Sainte-Beuve estimates feminine effort and achievement in letters, as contrasted alike with the indulgent praise and considerate blame which they ordinarily receive, is to a woman, at least, absolutely affecting." This is doubtless perfectly true, and yet after all the author's tone is by no means the pure judicial one. On the title-page of the French edition of the work before us is the following bit of dialogue, by way of an epigraph: "'Have you ever been a woman, sir, that you should pretend in this way to know us?' 'No, madam, I am not Tiresias the soothsayer; I am only a humble mortal who has loved you much.'" He has loved them much—this is the motive and the secret of M. Sainte-Beuve's deep appreciation of the characteristics of women. To our mind it is not his fairness that is affecting, but his devotion; the exquisite humility of his intellect—its servility, one may call it—under the charm of feminine grace and talent. In one sense it is a deeper and more disinterested devotion than that of the great poets and romancers. These writers construct lovely women by the dozen, and lose their hearts to their own creations; but their heroines are emphatically their creatures; they bear the stamp of their own passions and prejudices; they flatter their genius. M. Sainte-Beuve takes women as they come, neither ideally beautiful nor ideally gifted, full of foibles and disenchantments and incompleteness, and places his faculties at their service to act upon society; waits upon them, interprets them, exhibits them, repeats their faint accents in a louder key. It is decidedly as they are—as they have been, even in the past—and not as they may be and as many of them wish to be, that he studies and admires them. The translator, we think, forces a point when she intimates that M. Sainte-Beuve has caught a glimpse of that luminous future which shines from afar in the eyes of the more sober and strenuous of her sex. She even goes so far—horrescimus referentes—as to mention in this connection the word suffrage. This term suggests an order of facts and ideas to which we may be sure that the mind of the illustrious critic is a stranger. We may best express at once the extent and the limitation of his conception of the feminine nature—of das ewige Weibliche—by saying that he deals only with women as established in society, and that he uses the word society in its artificial and modern sense of good company. If we regard this circumstance in connection with the fact indicated in the epigraph—the fact that he maintains an emphatically sentimental relation to the ladies of his choice—we shall see that it is no easy task to enlist him on the side of reform, progress, emancipation, or any tendency foreshadowed in these formidable words. Society, in the sense necessarily attached to the word by M. Sainte-Beuve, does not exist, and is not likely to exist, in this country. To M. Sainte-Beuve it has, as much as anything can have, probably, an absolute sanctity and meaning. In France, from the time of Madame de Sévigné down to the present day, it has gradually assumed form and substance, and has constituted the only possible medium of life and action for superior women. Each of the ladies described in the present volume was a woman of the world—of the nine no less than seven were members of what is called the great world, of the inner circle of society. This inner circle was composed of many elements, among which it would be unfair not to mention literature. But the further one penetrates into it, it seems to us, the more those complex elements tend to reduce themselves to two simple ones—in the first place the salon, and in the second place love, or, as it would be more correct to say, lovers. Miss Preston admits, correctly, that what our author chiefly values in woman is the "capacity for passion." Of course the love indicated in our quotation is not all on one side. M. Sainte-Beuve repays himself for his own effusion of sentiment by detecting and pursuing the emotion in the lives of his heroines. Assuredly, it is not directed towards himself; but this is of small account. Provided it is really the process, the act of love, he is quite content to be but a spectator. The translator has, of necessity, omitted from her volume the last of the original portraits, a sketch of a certain Madame de Pontivy. This lady, who flourished in the first half of the last century, was in no sense of the word a celebrated woman; she was not even a literary woman, and we remain in ignorance of the documents in which her history is revealed. Her sole claim to our interest is her love-story—the fact that for a large number of years, a whole lifetime indeed, in the midst of a faithless and licentious society, she maintained privately, and yet in all its fulness, a passion of the most exquisite quality. There is nothing in the story but that; no wit, nor wisdom, nor action—nothing but happy love, pure and simple. M. Sainte-Beuve relates it with excellent skill, and with the most generous sympathy and unction. But that he should relate such a story in such a manner is conclusive evidence that he is very little of a moralist and, in a really liberal sense of the word, not overmuch of a thinker. We are half sorry that the translator might not have ventured to retain the sketch. To a serious mind it offers perhaps more matter for reflection than any of the other essays.

* "Portraits of Celebrated Women. By C. A. Sainte-Beuve. Translated from the French by H. W. Preston." Boston: Roberts Bros. 1868.

What we ourselves most enjoy in the writings of M. Sainte-Beuve is their numerous literary merits. The literary merit of the present volume so far exceeds its merits in other particulars that it seems futile to look upon it as anything but a contribution to pure literature. A writer and a psychologist—an empiric, if you will, in each case, but a most successful one—these seem to us the terms which best describe M. Sainte-Beuve. We admit that it is dangerous to assume aught of a trenchant tone in speaking of the constitution of his genius. He contains a little of so many things in a degree that sadly puzzles the critic's mind and leads him to forswear the attempt to classify and label him. He is a little of a poet, a little of a moralist, a little of a historian, a little of a philosopher, a little of a romancer. But successively, with patience and care, you detect each of these characters in its littleness—you detect the wonderful man in flagrant default of imagination, of depth, of sagacity, of constructive skill, and you feel that he is reduced to logical proportions. At the same time you feel that there is another element of his mind which looks small from no point of view, but which remains immeasurable, original, and delightful. This is his passion for literature—in which we include both his insatiable curiosity and his eternal gift of expression—his style.

The Old Mam'selle's Secret. After the German by E. Marlitt. By Mrs. A. L. Wister. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—This is a very pleasant book—superior to the average novel by reason of its simplicity and artistic completeness, the purity of its sentiment, and the quality of its thought. Lest, in making the latter statement, we should repel those readers who object to the discussion of problems in novels, we hasten to add that the author's thinking appears in the book as a result, and not as a process. The woman question, and certain aspects of the religious question, have doubtless engaged her attention and, in part, suggested her story; but she understands the novelist's business too well to make studies in public. She plays the part of narrator simply, and reflects and moralizes only by implication.

The story of the book, told briefly, is as follows: Felicitas, the little daughter of a juggler, is adopted and taken home by Herr Hellwig, a benevolent gentleman who is present when her mother is accidentally shot during the performance of some juggling trick. His wife, one of those hard, severe religionists whose piety is impious, and is only saved from being hypocrisy by the fact of its imposing upon themselves, hates the child, as is only natural since she feels assured that as the offspring of "players" its soul must be incapable of salvation! Felicitas is, however, well taught and well treated until the death of her adopted father, which occurs when she is about nine years old. She then learns for the first time to what class her parents belonged, the fate of her mother, and her own preordained eternal misery. She falls, by her protector's will, to the care of his eldest son, whom she sees for the first time at his father's funeral. This young man, who has been brought up in the strictest manner by a severely pious relative of his mother, shares in her aversion to the child—not on personal grounds, but because she comes of a degraded stock. He leaves her to the tender mercies of his mother while he pursues his medical studies "in a distant city"—puts a stop to her education, which had been begun by his father, and orders her to be trained as a servant. Felicitas fortunately makes the acquaintance of the "old Mam'selle," a relative of her adopted father, who lives in a secluded manner in some rooms in a remote part of the house, and is secretly instructed by her at odd hours during the next nine years. She grows up extremely beautiful, with a fine and well-cultivated mind and a noble character. In her eighteenth year her guardian, now become an able and distinguished physician, returns to his mother's house. The usual thing happens. His prejudices have been partially destroyed by his scientific training, and the beauty of Felicitas and the purity and strength of her nature complete the work of their destruction. His pride of birth and social position yield fully to these influences, but are yet more completely humbled by the discovery of the old Mam'selle's secret, which is that the virtue and respectability of his family are built upon a sham, and that their wealth was obtained by a fraud practised by one of his ancestors upon the family from which Felicitas sprang. The secret plays, however, no really important part in the story, the interest of which depends entirely upon the characters of Felicitas and her lover, and the delicacy and purity with which their love story is told. The book is a little too dramatic, and the character painting, though clever, is by no means in the realistic style—was done, rather, on the principle of artistic selection for definite ends. Supposing the chief end in view to have been the production of a readable and entertaining novel, this principle seems to have worked very well; but the book is neither high enough in its idealization nor close enough to nature in its realism to take rank in the highest department of fiction. Still, it is extremely pleasant reading, and much better than most recent novels.

Mrs. Wister seems to us to have done her part of the work remarkably well. There remains in her version none of the hardness and cumbrousness which, in literal translations from the German, is apt to strike the reader unpleasantly.

King Sham, and other Atrocities in Verse; including a Humorous History of the Pike's Peak Excitement. By Lawrence N. Greenleaf. (New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1868.)—Mr. Greenleaf's title-page, with its touch of humorous frankness, seemed to promise something that should be not atrocious, but good, perhaps. The name of the book is, however, to be read as literal description; atrocious it is—altogether a very saddening affair. This is in the author's best manner:

> "See Scituate, that famous town,
> 'Tis situated near the sea:
> Where lived Joe Kerr, of great renown—
> A great jo-ker was he!"

Then a joke of the practical sort is described, and evidently Mr. Kerr, like his biographer, is one of those witty persons who make life in small New England towns more depressing than Providence intended.

History of the Reconstruction Measures of the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Congresses. 1865-68. By Henry Wilson. (Hartford: Hartford Publishing Company. By subscription only. 1868.)—In his "History of the Anti-Slavery Measures of the Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eight Congresses" Senator Wilson had arranged and condensed in the most convenient manner the talk and legislation of the Capitol for the five years 1861-65, the most important in our history. The service was no slight one, as everybody who attempts to consult the record of that period through Mr. Wilson's compendium will gratefully acknowledge. In the present volume, bulkier in appearance but containing considerably less matter for obvious reasons, the Congressional journal is continued to the present year, with the change of topics caused by the President's perfidy in regard to reconstruction. Those measures, however, like the Tenure-of-Office Act, which grew out of the abstract controversy as to the powers of the Executive, and only indirectly concerned the freedmen and the South, are omitted in this résumé, while, for the rest, we shall render all-sufficient praise when we say that, like the previous history, it has been made as the compiler intended, brief and impartial, following the excellent method originally adopted. In the reconstruction enactments Mr. Wilson's own part is perhaps not so signal nor so memorable as in some passed during the war; but besides taking the initiative in measures which were either let drop or were not adopted in the shape in which he proposed them, he carried with his usual tact a bill to disband the rebel militia, another abolishing corporal punishment at the South, a third striking out "white" from the Federal militia laws, and a fourth abolishing peonage in New Mexico—landmarks both in reconstruction South and in the progress of the entire nation. It would be easy to show from quotations that Mr. Wilson has not expressed all the juice from the Congressional debates. The last phrase of Mr. Wade's that struck us was that he was "too old-fashioned" for something, and here on p. 143 he declares himself "a little too old-fashioned to be charged by the executive branch of this Government as a traitor on the floor of Congress, and not resent it." We doubt if Mr. Wade would have relished, in taking the vote on impeachment, the practical adoption, by the President's friends, of his own tactics on the Civil Rights Bill. Senators Wright and Dixon were sick, and the Democrats wished the vote postponed for their recovery. They were told, as many will remember:

"I yield to no importunities of the other side. I feel myself justified in taking every advantage which the Almighty has put into my hands to defend the power and authority of this body, of which I claim to be a part. I will not yield to these appeals of comity on a question like this; but I will tell the President and everybody else that if God Almighty has stricken one member so that he cannot be here to uphold the dictation of a despot, I thank Him for his interposition, and I will take advantage of it if I can."

A Practical Grammar of the Hebrew Language for Schools and Colleges. By B. Felsenthal, Ph.D., Minister of the Zion Congregation, Chicago. (New York: L. H. Frank. 1868.)—The intention of the author in writing this manual was not, as he informs us in his preface, to elaborate a complete system of Hebrew grammar, but to place in the hands of teachers of that language a text-book containing "the main points of grammar, so arranged and illustrated as to meet the wants" chiefly of beginners. "Encumbering details on grammatical niceties are purposely omitted." His principal aim was to satisfy a want seriously felt in Jewish schools, the pupils of which generally begin the study of Hebrew before the knowledge of Latin makes it possible for them to use systematic manuals elaborated on the principles adopted for the use of the classical tongues. Plainness and easy gradation were, therefore, the chief requirements. We believe the author, whose name does not for the first time appear among the cultivators of Hebrew science in this country, has well executed his task. Excellent for the instruction of Jewish beginners of a tender age, his book will be appreciated as a very satisfactory guide also by teachers in higher institutions of learning. The rules are clearly and plainly presented according to the inductive method. The orthoepic part and the verbal paradigms are especially full. The illustrations are well chosen. Translating exercises are attached. What is wanting can easily be added by teachers who are to a degree masters of their subject. The print is fine, distinct—excepting, perhaps, the h and 'h, which resemble each other too much—and very correct. Bayith h(a)ggadol, on page 48, contains the only misprint we have discovered, besides being a grammatically unexplained example. The author's Latin equivalents for the Hebrew letters and vowels are very good. The capitalization, however, in the use of grammatical terms appears to us arbitrary and inconsistent. We should also prefer k'thibh (or K'thibh) to Kh'thibh. We wish the learned author the success which his useful publication merits, and such as would encourage others to follow in his path. We have specially in mind Dr. Deutsch, of Baltimore, whose full and scholarly Hebrew grammar, long completed, has already too long remained in manuscript, for want of a publisher, to the detriment of American learning.

Recent Republications.—At the time we announced the American edition of Darwin's latest work* it was going through the press, and it now appears in very handsome shape from the office of the Agriculturist. The author contributes a short preface, offering a respectful greeting to his American readers, and explaining his reason for descending, in the first volume, into such minute details concerning the differences of domestic breeds of animals. He also calls attention to his theory of Pangenesis, which, as Prof. Gray points out in a succeeding preface, has nothing to do with the theory for which Mr. Darwin is famous. Prof. Gray also recommends this book to practical agriculturists and breeders; and it is not difficult to believe that they will be intensely interested in it, and perhaps led to proffer the author some of their own experience, as many have done and are thanked for in the introduction. Indeed, one can hardly over-estimate the value to the popular mind, for habits of observation and reflection, of the widespread circulation of such scientific and yet thoroughly intelligible works as this and Mr. Marsh's "Man and Nature;" and we are led to regret anew the want in this country of the Continental mode of publishing cheaply even the most enduring monuments of the human intellect.

We must not omit to add that the present edition contains the corrections and changes which were made in the second English edition, with some which have since been sent over in manuscript by the author, and have not before been printed.

A continuing place in our literature is secured for "Vathek"* by Lord Byron's praises, by the fact that the manner of its composition was a remarkable literary feat, and more legitimately and surely by the really impressive vision with which it closes. The Hall of Eblis is a powerful conception. Unborrowed—if we except the somewhat Miltonized Satan or Eblis—from any of the famous poetic conceptions of the abode of the damned, it is yet a conception not wholly unworthy of a place among the most terrific of them. But it is true that this scene gives to the tale an ending grander by far than properly belongs to it. Certainly there are several passages in the story not destitute of power, but there is almost none not very seriously injured by something quite trivial—some farcical circumstance, some feeble satire, something modern, and modern French very likely, in the sentiments. It is safe, we suspect, to say that the once lauded Orientalism of "Vathek" is essentially "Brummagem." The tale might, however, permissibly be out of keeping with itself, and very permissibly it might be out of keeping with the supposed place and time, if it had in it much thought, but at best we get only the thoughts of a boy of twenty, who, with an inadequacy to be expected, sets before us, in the adventures of Mussulmans about as real as the philosophic Chinese of the encyclopædists, the proposition that there can be an inordinate desire for knowledge, and that he who seeks "forbidden science" falls into the clutches of the fiend.

Still, "Vathek" ought to have, and will have, readers. For one thing, it is worth while to look at it and see in the Sultan—when the author does not make him inconsistently ludicrous—the germ of the grand, gloomy, and peculiar Corsairs and Manfreds of a later and greater than Beckford, and in the Vizier the germ of Moore's Fadladeen. And though the personages are ill-depicted, and little more than names or sketches of impossible people, still the imagination of the reader is excited by them and their surroundings something as it is by the "Arabian Nights." The East of fable, if not the real East, is at least suggested, and the amiable Princess Scheherezade, with her enchanted armies, allies herself to the new magician, and helps him to subjugate us. And then at the end is the awful abode of the pre-Adamite sultans; we see King Solomon waiting and watching till the cataract shall cease to flow and the day of his forgiveness shall come, and we see walking up and down with hands pressed on their breasts, while their hearts burn underneath, the innumerable multitude who have sinned by excess of ambition and pride.

The edition before us is well printed, though not without some errors, from an English edition of the translation which the author approved. An edition with a better prefatory memoir, with certain passages omitted, as better suited to the grosser taste of Beckford's day than to the decency of our own, and, finally, with illustrations by some one of our artists who joins to a certain degree of poetic power some measure of Doré's gift of uniting the cynically humorous with the horrid, would make a book fit for readers of every age and every degree of culture, a book for the holidays, and all the days, of many years; and we hope to see some of our publishers and artists attempt it soon.

The Week.

WORK has gone on in Congress during the week with considerable rapidity, the heat, the coming campaign, and the exciting session making everybody desirous of coming further North. On Wednesday week Mr. Sumner brought forward half a dozen resolutions to this effect: first, the people have a right to make censorious remarks in regard to senators sitting as judges; second, the Senate trying impeachments is not a true court at all, and the senators' taking an oath to decide according to the law and the evidence does not make it so. On the same day there was debate in the Senate over the name for the new Territory. Territories often keep their names when they become States, so we may be glad that "Cheyenne," to be pronounced "Shy-en," was not adopted. "Lincoln" was rejected for an obvious and, no doubt, sound reason. Apparently, nobody had a better name to offer, though there must be plenty of Indian words that could properly be used, and, for the present, the insignificant "Wyoming" is retained. In the House, on the same day, there was a dispute about the wording of resolutions in reference to Mr. Buchanan's death. Mr. Morgan, of Ohio, was ousted, and his seat given to Mr. Delano. On Thursday the House asked for a committee of conference on the Arkansas bill, and discussed at great length the new Tax bill. The Senate elected Mr. Gorham, of California, successor to Mr. Forney, its former secretary—a choice which may probably have some effect on the Presidential election in California.

On Friday the Senate passed a bill authorizing contracts which specify that payments shall be made in gold. There was a long debate on the Omnibus Reconstruction bill, the point in dispute being the amendment that Alabama should be admitted at the same time with the Carolinas, Florida, Georgia, and Mississippi. This Mr. Wilson urged, but the objection seemed strong in the minds of senators that it would be a plain violation of the faith of Congress to admit Alabama without a new election. For the rest, the point of difference between Senate and House as regards these bills—that for the admission of Arkansas and the Omnibus bill—relates to the question whether the "fundamental condition" clause shall merely state the proposition that civil and political inequality on account of color is wrong and forbidden, or shall ordain that "the promises of the present Constitution" shall never hereafter be altered. The term "brutum fulmen," applied by Mr. Trumbull to one of these propositions, applies equally to the other, and it is not easy to see why there should be two words about the matter, except, of course, that in one case rather more manifestly than in the other Congress puts itself in the position of apparently threatening to do what it will not do and probably knows it cannot do. In the House, the Tax bill was amended by striking out the section which creates a new department, puts at the head of it the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and gives to him absolute power to dismiss his subordinates and appoint new ones. Commissioner Rollins, tired of responsibility without power, felt obliged, as soon as its defeat was known, to resign the office he has filled so well. The House on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday was occupied with the Tax bill, "the contumacious Wooley," and the Arkansas bill, which on Monday last went to the President.

Wooley has at last surrendered. He says the mysterious telegrams which passed between him and his "client" in New York had reference to some "lawful" influence which he was endeavoring to exert on the Tax bill, and particularly on that portion of it relating to the whiskey. He has also explained what has become of that mysterious $20,000, or $17,000, or $15,000 after which Mr. Butler has been keeping up such a keen pursuit. It appears that he and Sheridan Shook, being drunk and in bed at their room in Willard's, he (Wooley), in the presence of Mr. Van Valkenberg and others, offered to bet Shook $20,000 on the Presidential election, and threw down a roll of bills on the table, Sheridan Shook being entirely unable to comprehend the transaction or take cognizance of the money. Van Valkenberg, fearing it would be lost, took it up, counted it, and found the sum to be $17,000, and determined to take care of it for Wooley. He accordingly deposited it in the office safe of the Metropolitan Hotel, where it has lain ever since. The evidence adduced in support of this story is that of Van Valkenberg; of Robert Strong, who was present with him at the drunken scene; of Cornelius Wendell, who went with him to the hotel office, saw the money counted and deposited in the safe; of G. H. Shelly, one of the proprietors of the Metropolitan Hotel, who, though he had no recollection of the making of the deposit, on being spoken to about it in New York, a few days later, telegraphed to his partner, Mr. Potts, to put the parcel in the inner safe for greater security, which he did. There it was found in due course and restored to Wooley. A plainer story is not often told in a court of justice, and there is no flaw that we can see in the evidence. Wooley's ignorance, and Shook's, too, of what came of the money, can be readily understood, and also the unwillingness of the former, if he had learnt what had become of it, to tell the story. We beg to remind our readers, that during the last fortnight charges of corruption have been incessantly made against Republican senators, based simply upon the presumption that Wooley's refusal to tell what he had done with this money was proof that he had used it to influence the impeachment trial.

We shall repeat once more, apropos of the Butler investigation, as it affects the characters of several prominent men, that, to make evidence worthy either of confidence or respect, it must be taken either by an unbiassed, impartial, and trained examiner publicly; or it must be taken by examination and cross-examination, the result of the cross-examination being produced along with the result of the direct examination, and the examiner and cross-examiner must represent different parties or different interests. Mr. Butler supplies none of these guarantees. The committee which the House has charged with the investigation are exactly in the position of the counsel who have lost a case, and who are trying to show that the jury who gave a verdict against them must have been bribed by the opposite party. They are, therefore, not impartial examiners; they are actuated by strong personal interest; and they not only propound questions as counsel, but exercise the functions of a judge by deciding on the propriety or admissibility of the questions; and the result of their interrogatories is not tested or modified by cross-examination. The condition of Mr. Butler's mind was well illustrated by his calling in the House on Monday the witness who is under examination before him "a perjured, defaulting, contemptuous, and contemptible witness." It is a gentleman who talks in this way who is now conducting a secret enquiry, and who has it in his power to spread rumors at any time, or get rumors spread by his admirers in the press, that he has "damning proofs" of the guilt of anybody in the community he pleases to fix upon. We do not recollect a case in recent times in which the moral as well as the technical requirements of judicial investigation have been so completely disregarded.

The week has afforded one good instance of the way in which the Democratic leaders in the House cover themselves and their party with credit whenever they attempt action. Mr. Buchanan having died, Mr. Woodward proceeded to utilize the dead man. He would show the Republicans up as tramplers on graves. To this end he prepared resolutions in which Mr. Buchanan was declared a patriot sage, and a committee was called for to attend his body to its last resting-place. Everybody is a sage, of course, and the House would have been perfectly willing to say so. And, in a sense, Mr. Buchanan was no doubt patriotic, though his moral and mental helplessness prevented the late Confederacy from giving him very high honor, and made the North talk of hanging him. Mr. Woodward's resolutions were, of course, as he had foreseen and wished, rejected. Some honest and sufficient resolutions having been offered, were passed. The affair would hardly be worth mentioning, if it were not that it fairly shows the height to which Democratic statesmanship in the House usually rises. There never was a time, we suppose, in the Congressional history of the country when the opposition in the House was so feeble and incompetent to any tolerably good work.

The talk of Chief-Justice Chase's acceptance of the Democratic nomination on a platform specially prepared for him still continues to grow. Of the moral character of the arrangement we have spoken elsewhere. Mr. Adams is the last person named for the Vice-Presidency. But it does not seem within the bounds of possibility that the party can make any arrangements which would bring either of these gentlemen within its fold without a sacrifice of character which they are not capable of making. Whatever the party managers may be willing to agree to now, the Convention will scarcely be persuaded to fling away everything on which the rank and file place any value. Chief-Justice Chase has written a letter to a "personal friend" which appears in the New York Herald, in which, after replying to the attacks on him touching his share in the impeachment trial, and disclaiming all political ambition, he expresses a gentle hope that "the Democratic party may take ground which would assure the party against all attempts to subvert the principle of universal suffrage in eight and to be established in all of the Southern States." Should he see this, he intimates that he "would not regret his absence from political labors." We venture to say that a very large proportion of the public would not regret his absence from them even now, before that great consummation has been reached. His "labors" are an affliction to all thinking men.

The Australians seem to have been driven crazy by the attempt on Prince Alfred's life. The President of the Upper House in New South Wales, an old and prominent advocate of the abolition of capital punishment, has expressed in his place in the legislature a desire to have O'Farrell "hanged fifty cubits high;" and, more than this, desires to have "the gallows stand till the last Fenian is exterminated!" The Bishop of Sydney (Protestant) also made the startling announcement, at a meeting of the clergy, "that there were many fathers in the community, since this dreadful crime had been committed, who did not dare to look their own offspring in the face, for very shame that their children should have been born in a country the shores of which have been stained with the blood of the Queen's son." When one remembers that this ineffable nonsense was uttered by a prominent teacher of religion to an assembly of his brethren, one gets a shocking idea of the condition of the colonial mind. As long as the eye of God Almighty has to look down upon the various crimes of every degree which are committed night and day in her Majesty's Australasian colonies, we think the clergy may fairly encourage the Australian fathers to meet the eye of their children unabashed, even when the assassination of a prince by a weak-minded adventurer is spoken of. The utterance of such teachings by such men on the subject of moral responsibility at an exciting crisis, is a disgrace to the Church. When the public in any country is carried, by exciting events, into forming exaggerated or distorted estimates of the nature and guilt of crimes, it is the duty of the clergy, more than of men of any other class or calling, to keep their vision clear, and to hold the balance calmly. If they cannot do this, half their value in a civilized community is destroyed. The ladies have joined the clergy in swelling the tide of folly. Two thousand women held an indignation meeting in the Exhibition building in Sydney, to "denounce" O'Farrell and congratulate the Prince. The resolutions were moved and seconded and the speeches made by clergymen, other "males" being sparingly admitted by ticket, and only allowed standing-room on the outskirts. A Jewish rabbi, at the close, communicated the views of his co-religionists on O'Farrell's crime.

The Colonial Legislature also passed a ridiculous treason felony bill in one day, making it punishable with imprisonment and hard labor for life, or not less than seven years, to "propose a peaceful and friendly separation of the Colonies from England;" or with imprisonment with or without hard labor for three years or less "to speak disrespectfully of the Queen," or to refuse "factiously" to join in a loyal toast "in honor of her Majesty." The London Spectator, commenting on this legislation, sensibly suggests that the best way to cure the delirium which is at the bottom of it, would be to send out a few princes from England, so as to familiarize the colonists with them. In England, their presence is found to have a calming rather than exciting influence on loyalty.

The protectionist cause in France has met with a much more powerful champion than M. Thiers, in the person of M. Pouyer-Quertier, a Rouen manufacturer. In addition to M. Thiers's avowed ignorance of political economy, both in theory and practice, his steady support of various antiquated ideas—such as that the weakness and degradation of her neighbors are necessary to the greatness of France, that the Papacy is a valuable institution and ought to be supported by French bayonets, that Italy should be again broken up—weakens the force of all he says on behalf of any old doctrine whatever. He is, in short, a statesman of the Guizot school, without Guizot's deep religious feeling, and the world has travelled a good way since that school exercised any real influence on the affairs of men.

M. Pouyer-Quertier made a powerful speech, although not a practised orator, and, being very popular and a princely entertainer, he made a good deal of impression. He did not take up, as M. Thiers did, a position of downright hostility to free trade at all times and under all circumstances, but maintained that the Emperor was, in the first place, wrong in forcing it on the country of his own mere motion, and, secondly, that he did not reach it in the right way. He charged him with having violated the promises he made in his letter of 1860, written after the conclusion of the commercial treaty with England—declaring that before concluding any fresh treaties France should improve her own agriculture and means of transport—the rivers and canals being enabled to compete with the railroads—diminish taxation, and do away with prohibitions. M. Pouyer-Quertier then asserted that the navigation of the rivers had not been improved, that the canals had not been improved, and that taxation, so far from being diminished, had in eight years increased from $360,000,000 to $460,000,000. The army, too, he said, weighed terribly on French industry, and operated to prevent France competing fairly with England. Finally, he attacked the accuracy of the customs returns, and he and M. Jules Brame, a brother member, circulated, the day after his speech a written undertaking, signed by them both, offering to pay $20,000 to the Empress for distribution in charity, if it should appear, after an examination of these returns by four sworn accountants, chosen half by protectionists and half by free-traders, that a majority of the articles which were valued in making up the amount of the "general trade" of the year had not been counted twice, thus nearly doubling the apparent amount.

To this M. Rouher replied, that the Emperor had promised in 1860 to spend $65,000,000 on public works; that he had actually spent $80,000,000 in the eight years referred to; that the traffic rates on canals had been lowered 70 per cent. in the same period; that although the English budget is lighter than the French one in appearance, this proves nothing as to the comparative taxation, because the French budget contains the departmental and communal taxes, which the English one does not, and that, as a matter of fact, while taxation only amounts to 39 francs a head in France, it amounts to 60 francs in England for the year 1869. In answer to M. Thiers's attacks on the lowering of the differential duty in favor of French shipping, M. Rouher showed that of 307,837 tons of direct imports, 273,100 came in French bottoms; that there are from 200 to 400 French vessels which, caring nothing for the protection afforded them in their own ports, are exclusively engaged in the carrying trade between foreign ports; that France has now 55 per cent. of the navigation in the Mediterranean; and that, under the reduction of the coal duty from 3 francs 20 centimes to 1 franc, the production in the French mines has increased in seven years 65 per cent., while the importation has only increased 42 per cent. The debate has been on the whole highly interesting, but was not protracted to the extent desired by the protectionists, many of whom were cut off from speaking by the pressure of the ministers for a division as soon as M. Rouher had concluded. The extreme Liberals took the free-trade side, M. Emile Ollivier speaking in its favor. The only hard blows struck by the protectionists were, as we have said, those of M. Pouyer-Quertier. The treaty M. Rouher announces will stand, the Government being more convinced than ever of its advantages to France.

A report was spread some weeks ago that an attempt had been made by the Archbishop of Algeria to repeat on some of the young Arabs the experiment which the Pope found so successful in the case of the young Jew, Mortara—that is, to seize them and bring them up in the Catholic faith in defiance of their parents—and Marshal McMahon, the general in command, was said to have interfered on behalf of religious and parental rights, and had been compelled to quarrel with the archbishop in order to protect them. There has been a serious difference between the two functionaries, and the archbishop has come to France to appeal to the Emperor, and the latter, it is said, sides with the marshal; but the archbishop's course turns out not to be so reprehensible, from a moral point of view, after all. He has not employed, or sought to employ, any constraint whatever, and has not interfered, or attempted to interfere, with parental rights; but he has sought to proselytize through teaching, preaching, and charitable aid offered directly to the Mussulman population. To this Marshal McMahon objects, on the ground that if many conversions are made, though in never so legitimate a way, it will rouse the suspicions and fanaticism of the whole Arab population, and perhaps lead to a bloody rising, or make it impossible to preserve order without the employment of an immense force. There is much to be said on both sides. It is hard to see how the archbishop, with his views of the probable future of the Arabs, can desist; and hard to see how the marshal, with his experience of Arab powers of mischief, can give way. But it is right to add that similar fears to the marshal's long prevailed amongst English functionaries in Hindostan, and were found to be not only groundless but really injurious to English interests. There is, however, always something in the teachings of the Catholic Church, when it has the civil authorities or military force at its back, which makes the blood of the infidels, heretics, pagans, and Jews boil a little, although there are no more patient and devoted missionaries than the Catholic missionaries when the heathen have the arm of flesh on their side. The marshal's opinion is all the more deserving of respect from the fact that he is an old personal friend of the archbishop, and was mainly instrumental in having him transferred to Algeria from the Bishopric of Nancy.

There is still talk of war between France and Russia, but the period of its outbreak has been judiciously postponed till the autumn, a season in which no power engages in hostilities in northern climates, except under pressure of absolute necessity. Every reason—except the want of a proper armament and a sufficiently large force—which existed a year ago for believing France unwilling to fight, exists still. The condition of the finances and of industry is a fresh guarantee for peace at present. This is what is rendering the Emperor's position insecure, and war could not mend it. Prussia, too, is struggling with financial difficulties. She used, before the late war, invariably to have a surplus of revenue; this year she has a small deficit; and the fiscal systems of all the states which have been brought into the Confederation have undergone more or less derangement, owing to the increase in their military and other burdens.

The story of the Briggs colliery, in Yorkshire, England, of which most persons who are interested in Co-operation have heard, has just been published in the Sixth Report of the Trades Union Commission. Briggs & Co. were the proprietors of large coal mines. They found their business in 1865, after ten years of difficulties, on the verge of ruin through strikes, quarrels, and "play days." They were at the mercy of their men, who, Mr. Briggs says, "seemed utterly reckless as to what loss they inflicted on their employers and fellow-workmen." In that year, therefore, almost in despair, the firm was dissolved and a joint-stock company substituted. The old partners reserved 6,000 out of 9,000 shares, of $50 each, the rest being offered to the workmen or any one who chose to buy. Then it was arranged that capital should have, first, ten per cent. of the profits; the remainder to be divided into two equal parts—one-half to go to capital, in further remuneration; the remainder to be divided amongst the employees of all kinds as a bonus proportioned to earnings. The experiment has been a complete success. Before the change the firm rarely made five per cent. on their capital; they now realize 10 per cent. always and a surplus, divided as we have described. The shares are at twenty-five per cent. premium. Strikes have ceased. Mr. Briggs has very much more control over the men than he ever had, in fact, and says he "is infinitely more proprietor than before." Moreover, the Trades Union organization has been driven out of the district; and, more wonderful than all, the employers have to interfere to prevent the laborers working each other too hard. What if the proprietors of the great collieries here, in such abodes of bliss as Mauch Chunk, were to try this experiment?

A French economist of distinction, M. Louis Reybaud, writing in the Revue des Deux Mondes of April 15, makes, in discussing the state of political economy in the United States, some rather amusing comments on the dispute which long raged between H. C. Carey and Ricardo on the nature and origin of rent. Ricardo maintained that rent represented the difference between the best and worst land in cultivation, and as to the origin of it, he said when "first settlers" came into a country they naturally chose the richest land, river bottoms and so forth; and rent did not begin till, all the best land having been occupied, soil of inferior quality had to be brought into cultivation. Here Mr. Carey presented himself and made what we believe he considers one of his greatest discoveries. He denied that rent originated in the way described by Ricardo, and showed that, on the contrary, feeble man, instead of first cultivating the rich alluvial soils, first settled on the poor uplands, and only comes down to contend with the river bottoms when population has become dense and labor more abundant. M. Reybaud points out with French neatness that this celebrated discussion has not a particle of foundation either in tradition or observed facts, and that one theory is, therefore, just as good as another. Neither Mr. Ricardo nor Mr. Carey has ever seen or read of or heard of any country being settled in the manner he describes, so that his origin of rent is constructed out of his imagination. In fact, the controversy bears a strong resemblance to that which occupied philosophers in the last century about the origin of society. The "Social Contract" of Rousseau had just the same kind of basis as Messrs. Ricardo's and Carey's theory of the origin of rent, and the "natural rights" theory of some of our own politicians is no better off.

CHIEF-JUSTICE CHASE AND THE DEMOCRATS.

WILDLY improbable as it seemed two or three months ago, the nomination of Chief-Justice Chase by the Democrats is beginning to be set down by very shrewd observers amongst things certain. At all events, all the usual influences are at work to bring it about. Negotiations are pending; the Chief-Justice has stated his terms; the Democratic managers are trying to find out whether they can safely accept them, and it begins to seem to many people not only a feasible but rational thing that they should do so. Pendleton is said to be the choice of the West; but then he is weak on the subject of the public credit, and still weaker on the subject of the war. In other words, he is the representative of those portions of the Democratic creed which have during the last seven years placed the party in a hopeless minority. To give it a chance of recovering its lost position, it must give up the very things in the defence of which Pendleton has won all the distinction on which his claims to the Presidency are based.

Supposing the war heresy, however, and the greenback heresy to be discarded, the Democracy has still the "white man's government" theory to stand upon. On this point, however, Pendleton has no special value. He has not done anything very remarkable in defence of this doctrine, and then the doctrine itself has very little practical value. It had some value in 1865; but instead of urging it at that time on the attention of the Southern States, persuading them to come into the Union on the fourteenth constitutional amendment, under which the maintenance of a white man's government would have been possible, the Democratic party stood up so stoutly for the "dignity" of the white man that his chance of retaining the control of the government was allowed to slip by. Government for all colors is now established at the South. Whether it is the best kind of government is not now a practical question. It is the actual and only possible government. The vast body of the Northern people would now, we are sure, sooner leave the political relations of the two races at the South to be decided by their relative mental and moral capacity and power of multiplication than attempt a new resort to restrictive or partial legislation.

Supposing the Democracy, however, to give up its secession doctrine, its greenback doctrine, and its white man's government doctrine, and to prepare a platform accepting negro suffrage, sustaining the payment of the national bonds in gold, and guaranteeing the existence of the national banks, could Chief-Justice Chase honorably take his stand upon it? He is apparently of opinion, if his sentiments are truly reported by his friends, that he could. These, he says, are his "principles." His party he may change, but his "principles" never. If the Democratic party adopt his principles, there is no reason why he should not cast in his lot with them, particularly as he has ceased to sympathize with the Republican party on some important points in its policy, such as the military government at the South and its treatment of the Supreme Court. Our views about the propriety of his becoming a candidate at all, no matter of what party, are well known to our readers. We urged them early last winter, when many Radicals were lauding him to the skies as their ideal standard-bearer, and talking darkly and mournfully about Grant; we said that it was a scandal for a Chief-Justice to carry his political ambition up to the bench with him, and use his position to help him in urging his "claims." We felt satisfied that Mr. Chase's willingness to do this was of itself either proof of his unfitness for the Presidency, or a good reason why every Republican who valued judicial purity and independence should refuse to vote for him.

But granting, for the sake of argument, that there is nothing improper in making the Supreme Court a step to the Presidency, we hold that the acceptance by Mr. Chase of a nomination from the Democratic party, on a platform which has been prepared simply for his reception, and from which, for the purpose of securing him, the principles and traditions of the party have been carefully excluded, would be a shameless juggle, in which we cannot yet believe he will participate. A party is only respectable and only useful in so far as it is held together by faith in certain ideas, and attachment to a certain policy embodying these ideas. Without this bond it is simply a faction, and the strife of politics becomes simply an ignoble and repulsive gambling for offices. A party which repudiates the ideas that have created and preserved it, and furnished it with the reason and justification of its existence, and which formally makes a profession of adopting others against which it has always fought, for the avowed purpose of securing a valuable candidate, and through the use of his name securing office, is not a party at whose head a respectable politician can put himself. If Chief-Justice Chase does it, he will have done much not only to destroy what remains of popular confidence in the Supreme Court, but to carry politics a step lower down in immorality than they have yet gone. Whether the people of any party would permit such an abuse of political organization, we still doubt.

Moreover, the excuse which Mr. Chase would probably put forward, that his acceptance of a Democratic nomination on a platform containing his principles would, if he were elected, help his principles, is too flimsy to afford him much cover. A "platform" has not the slightest value, except as an expression of the opinions and feelings by which the great body of the party adopting it are animated, and as an indication of the policy they are likely to pursue in legislation. A platform is not in itself legislation; it is not a formal compact or pledge to which the party can be held. It has no legal and not much moral force, as far as the mere form of words is concerned. It is apt to be forgotten, and is often, in part at least, repudiated soon after the election is over. Why we all look for it with eagerness is, that party usage and sound morality make it in the main the formal enunciation of the principles on which the party is based, and for which it has been fighting and means to fight. To talk of a platform, therefore, in which a party repudiates every principle for which it has fought, and adopts others which up to that moment it has denounced as wicked and impolitic, as something valuable or important—something on which the country can rely, or on which an honest statesman can take his stand—is really to be guilty of an attempt at imposture on a great scale. We do not like to use the word, and we only use it because we still have hopes that the plan which elicits it will not be carried out.

Such a platform as Mr. Chase would stand on could not possibly serve the Democrats as a basis of legislation, even though they elected him on it, without a total change in human nature. To cast in his lot with the Democrats on condition of their formally adopting his "principles" is really to commit his "principles" to the guardianship of their enemies. Nobody believes—Mr. Chase, surely, cannot believe—that if he were put in the White House by Democratic votes, and the public offices were filled with Democratic politicians, and Democrats had a majority in Congress and the State legislatures, any ideas in the service of which he has won much distinction would be faithfully carried out—that the principle of equality would be respected, the public credit be maintained, by the very men whose political career, during the last ten years, has consisted of a bitter and passionate struggle against both one and the other. The very notion of such a thing is preposterous. Democrats may adopt what platform they please, the radical differences between the two great parties would still exist. Their spirit and aims would still be different. Their views of the object and nature of the Government would be different. The Democrats would still retain that hostility to reform of all kinds which has made them so worthless as an opposition, and which has rendered their resistance even to Republican excesses so futile, and Chief-Justice Chase would find himself, after four years' leadership of them, as friendless a politician as Andrew Johnson, and even more detested. He would end his days amongst the fallen angels of American politics, and would have nothing to console him, except the reflection that his descent had begun at a higher point and ended at a lower one than that of any of his companions in misfortune.

ONE REASON WHY RAILROADS ARE BADLY MANAGED.

IN a recent article we pointed out how some of the evils complained of in the present system of railroad management arise from the faulty financial basis upon which many of our principal companies have rested from their very inception. If we had not observed, from the discussions going on in private and in public, that the subject is attracting unusual attention, we should still be satisfied, from the various communications received in reply to our comments, that the public mind is gradually awakening to the importance of this whole question of railroad management, and that the time is slowly approaching when some attempt at a practical settlement will undoubtedly be ventured upon. Unfortunately, the knowledge necessary to discuss this question intelligently is confined to a comparatively small number of men whose interests rather lead them to keep that knowledge to themselves; and hence the present discussion wears the aspect of a somewhat confused wrangle, without, so far, giving any promise of practical result. It seems to us that the chief cause of this want of system in the discussion of so extremely important a problem lies in the fact that all writers on the subject fail to make the necessary distinction between the different parties to the quarrel, or rather between the different quarrels that are being carried on simultaneously between different parties in relation to the same interest.

There are, as we have already stated, three principal parties in interest: first, the railroad fraternity, interested in maintaining untrammelled their present extremely profitable control over the roads; next, the actual stockholders in any given road who desire to see their property made very valuable and very productive, without any labor or care or responsibility of their own, and with the least possible cost to themselves; and lastly, the great body of travellers and freight-senders, who are, nolentes volentes, compelled to trust their property and their lives to the hands of men they mistrust, and on terms in whose adjustment they have had no voice. It is between these three great classes that there is now preparing throughout the civilized globe a civil conflict of larger proportions than any the world has witnessed since the abolition of feudalism. The object of this conflict is none other than to restore the freedom of locomotion. Disguise it as we may, this and none other is the unrecognized, unacknowledged, but yet undoubtable motive power of the present agitation. It is solely in order to maintain untrammelled the monopoly of locomotion that the railroad men have done those things which have got them into trouble with their stockholders. It is because the stockholders are at war with the railroad men, the recognized opponents or all, that the people look to relief from a change which shall restore the control of the roads to the shareholders. It is a popular error which will soon be discovered. But until thoroughly understood, this erroneous idea will be the guiding one throughout the conflict. Hence, for the moment, all questions are lost sight of save the one of how to restore the control of the roads to the stockholders. We repeat, the people are dissatisfied with the management of the railroads, the imperfect accommodation, the insufficient number of trains, the high and arbitrary rates of fare and freight, the difficulty of obtaining redress for wrongs, and, above all, the constant and frightful risk to life and property; the stockholders are dissatisfied because their property is wasted and rendered unproductive, and because they themselves are held in part responsible by the public for all the shortcomings of the railroads; the railroad men—and our strictures must not be understood to imply that there are not among them men as pure as they are skilled, as honest and disinterested as they are far-sighted and never-tiring—the railroad men throw the blame upon the system, the incessant and urgent demands of the people for more roads, and the indifference and want of co-operation on the part of the stockholders. The stockholders in turn throw the blame upon the railroad men; and, as the errors of the managers are much more easily understood than the errors of the stockholders, the public readily accepts the views of the latter, and stands prepared to give them all the aid and sympathy that they can ask for with any plausible show of justice. It is worth while enquiring how the stockholders have lost that control over their property which they are now so anxious to regain. This loss of control is attributable to several causes, the first and most important of which is the system of mortgage indebtedness.

Nothing appears at first sight more reasonable than that an individual or a corporation should have the right to pledge his or its property as security for a loan of money, especially when that money is applied to improve the property itself. Indeed, as a question of right, it is utterly beyond the pale of discussion. But as a question of wisdom or policy it is, as applied to railroads, not only open to doubt, but, in our opinion, deserving of the most emphatic condemnation. According to law the ownership, the responsibility, the control of a corporation vests in the holders of stock, who alone have the right to vote, to elect officers, to regulate its policy, and to dispose of its property. According to common sense the ownership and control of a corporation ought to vest in those who have the largest interest at stake. This common-sense view is practically ignored, indeed totally reversed, in the case of railroad and other corporations whose property is encumbered by mortgage. It is scarcely too much to say that, leaving out of view half-a-dozen or ten exceptional lines, the railroads of the United States are, on an average, mortgaged for an amount fully equal to the market value, even at present inflation prices, of the whole of their stock, while many are mortgaged for more than even the nominal value of their stock, some for more than all the road is worth, and others never had any real stock capital at all, but were built exclusively with the money raised by the sale of the bonds for which the road is pledged. The effect of this is seen at a glance. Not only have the holders of mortgage bonds no vote in the management of the property, in which they frequently own the largest interest, but the management falls into the hands of those who have the least interest at stake, and sometimes actually into the hands of men who really did not fairly invest a single dollar in it. It is only necessary to state the case to show the wrong of it. But the worst does not even appear in this simple statement.

A road that is doing a prosperous business and is well and economically managed, earns enough in ordinary times to pay, say, seven per cent. interest on its mortgage bonds and seven per cent. interest on its capital stock. These are the net earnings of the road, after deducting all its expenses. To make net earnings sufficient to pay this interest and dividend, the gross earnings, that is, the receipts of the road, must be very much larger. In earning one hundred dollars a railroad will incur say seventy dollars of expenses, and will thus have thirty dollars left, fifteen for interest and fifteen for dividends. But it will require almost the same expenditure to earn only eighty-five dollars. If, through dull times, bad management, or competition, the earnings of a road decline from one hundred to eighty-five dollars, and its expenses continue at the rate of seventy dollars, it will then have only fifteen dollars of net earnings to pay its interest and dividends. The interest on its mortgage bonds must be paid, the whole fifteen dollars of net earnings go to the bondholders, and not a cent is left for dividends to the stockholders. It is thus seen that, when a road is to any extent encumbered by mortgage, a comparatively slight decline in its earnings is sufficient to entirely destroy its power to pay dividends; the stock of a road in whose dividends comparatively slight influences can produce such a radical change will be of very uncertain and fluctuating value, and will be far better suited to the purposes of stock-gamblers in Wall Street than to the wants of a capitalist or others seeking investment. It must now be easy to understand how a mortgage debt introduces into railroad investments an element of excessive fluctuation and uncertainty, and how it becomes the source of other evils which we now proceed to explain.

If a railroad or other company repeatedly fails to pay its dividends, or pays irregular and uncertain dividends, the market value of its stock fluctuates largely, investment holders sell out one after another in disgust, and the stock becomes the foot-ball of speculators, whose sole object and aim is to make it fluctuate still more widely, in order to make still larger profits on the changes in its price. Speculators never own railroad stocks in the ordinary sense of the word. They buy them to-day and sell them to-morrow. Sometimes they sell them first and buy them afterwards. They care nothing about the property represented by the stock, nothing about the management, neither how it is managed nor by whom, frequently do not know where the property is situated, sometimes doubt whether there is any such property in existence—and these are the men whose votes control the management of a railroad upon which thousands of men, women, and children daily risk their lives and sometimes lose them. Is it necessary to show in detail how the management of such roads falls into the hands of reckless, corrupt, dishonest men, who make the name of "railroad" a synonym with all that is repulsive and offensive to honest people? Of course, the temporary holders of such stocks have no objection to give their proxy, their power to vote at an approaching election, whether the vote will be cast for an honest management or for a dishonest one. Sometimes the proxy to vote is given away, sometimes sold for money or other valuable consideration, such as early information likely to affect the value of the stock. Or, instead of merely buying the proxy, the stock itself is bought in order to secure the necessary number of votes for any plan or policy; and thus, previous to an important election such will be the competition among rival factions for the possession of the stock that the price will be advanced five or ten per cent. in a few days, only to fall back again immediately after the election, thus introducing a fresh element of fluctuation and uncertainty, and involving the buyer in a loss which, if his "ticket" at the election is successful, he will somehow or other manage to repay to himself, directly or indirectly, out of the company's property. In this way armies of drummers are employed previous to an election canvassing, begging, bribing, and buying proxies, until at the election itself proxies of half the stock of a company are in one or two hands, and until a stockholders' meeting of a company representing ten millions of capital, owned by five hundred individuals, frequently consists of half-a-dozen smiling knaves and a doorkeeper. The directors elected at such a meeting have full control over all the property of the road for one year, with no earthly power to call them to account save the next yearly meeting of stockholders similar to the one just described. This evil is more directly due to the existence of a heavy mortgage encumbrance than to any ten other causes combined.

Of course, so long as the property continues to be fully worth the amount of the mortgage or a little more, the bondholder cares little or nothing what becomes of the road. The interest on his bond is sure to be paid as long as there are means to raise a dollar, for a failure to pay the interest would lead to an almost immediate foreclosure and sheriff's sale, which is equivalent to a total sequestration of the stock capital and an almost equally total loss of occupation by the managers connected with the road at the time of its occurrence. In this way the bondholders, the men who really have the largest moneyed interest in the whole enterprise, not only have no vote in the management, but even, being amply secured, are practically indifferent whether the management is good or bad. Nay, worse; for if the management be bad, while the property is intrinsically good, there is even a slight temptation to a not over-scrupulous first mortgage bondholder to give the preference to the worse management. For if, in consequence of bad management, default is made upon the interest, the first-mortgage holders can foreclose and frequently acquire a desirable property at much less than its value. Or even when a foreclosure does not take place, some sort of reorganization is sure to result, with plenty of opportunities for profit; and there are not wanting instances in the history of Wall Street of combinations between corrupt managers and corrupt bondholders to ruin a road, prevent it from paying interest, and then allow the mortgagees to foreclose and get a property for the amount of the mortgage which was in truth worth double the amount.

It must be evident that if a road is not encumbered with mortgage it will be less liable to great changes in the rate of its annual dividends, less liable to violent fluctuations in the market price of its shares, and that consequently a larger portion of its shares will be held for permanent investment by persons who will give some little attention once a year to the management of the company's affairs, and not sell their proxies for a dollar or two a share to some stockjobbing railroad magnate, whose prime object in seeking an election may be to ruin the road for the benefit of some competing line.

For all these reasons we urge, as the very first step towards railroad reform, the abolition of the entire system of mortgage indebtedness. It is not easy to say precisely how this is to be accomplished, even if the people can be convinced that its accomplishment is desirable. But much will be gained if railroads could, either by State or Federal legislation, be prohibited from placing any new mortgage upon their property, or issuing any preferred stock or shares, or in any way allowing any interest in their property to be represented by or to consist of any security whatsoever, save only simple common stock. It might even be desirable to prohibit the renewal of any expiring mortgage, and compel all companies to devote a certain proportion of their net earnings annually to the redemption and cancellation of all now outstanding mortgage bonds, authorizing an issue of a corresponding amount of common stock to replace the bonds so redeemed.

Of course we are fully prepared for the many objections to our suggestion. It will be long before its force will be acknowledged, but that some such action will ultimately be taken we entertain no doubt. The gravest objection that can be made to it is, that without mortgage bonds, with simple shares, railroad companies would not be able to raise the necessary funds, as the majority of investors do not think shares safe enough, but prefer, and indeed insist, upon having bonds. In answer to this objection, we remark that there are railroad companies in the United States who have raised their capital exclusively upon shares, and who have issued no mortgage bonds at all, or only for nominal amounts and exceptional purposes. It is true the instances are rare, but their existence proves that it is not impossible. It will, of course, be difficult also to convince holders of mortgage bonds that common stock would be a better security; but it is susceptible of almost mathematical demonstration that the depreciated value of the shares is mainly due to the recklessness and mismanagement which the mortgage system has engendered, and that without the first introduction of this system the shares would to-day in many of the roads be better than the bonds. The recent example of England, where millions of debentures or bonds have been swept out of existence, warns us of what may possibly be in store for us. It is notorious that many of the recent issues of mortgage bonds are secured by the mortgage of roads as yet unbuilt, while others are secured by the mortgage of roads worth one-half or two-thirds of the mortgage. While many excellently managed roads have large mortgage debts, the bonds of which form unquestionably one of the most desirable investment securities obtainable anywhere, there are also, unfortunately, many overgrown concerns, with high-sounding names, that cannot stand two successive bad seasons without bringing the mortgage question to a test that may result very unfavorably. But the probability that some mortgage bonds may prove valueless is not likely to induce the holder of undoubtedly good bonds to exchange them for doubtful shares, and if the object of the proposed legislation were merely to influence investments, the legislation itself would be an unwarrantable interference with individual rights. The change is not intended to influence investments at all, nor to restrict private rights. It may do so incidentally, but its object is solely and exclusively to protect the public against the evils of railroad companies without responsible owners. This is one of the very difficulties to which we referred in speaking of the conflict between the different interests. In relation to any ordinary property, it would be absurd to attempt to restrict the right of mortgage. But railroad property is not ordinary property. Railroad property consists of a monopoly of the right of locomotion between given points, and the people, who alone can grant that monopoly, must and will have the right to restrict and fence it in with just such safeguards as they may think best. If it can be proved that the mortgage system is eminently productive of bad and dangerous management, the mortgage system will have to give way without regard to any advantages that may have been derived from it. That it is and must be productive of just these evils, we think cannot well be doubted by any one who will give the matter calm and dispassionate consideration.

CRITICISM OF SENATORS.

We have always held that criticism was at worst a harmless occupation, that it might be made a useful and dignified occupation, and that, whether well done or ill done, it was the principal business of a journalist, in so far as he made comments of his own on public affairs. But we have always understood that a great many of our Radical brethren did not like it when directed against prominent men in "their own party." They said there was no time for it; that it was not kind to the persons criticised; that their past services ought to protect them from it, and many other things of the same sort. And yet we have never ascribed difference of opinion to personal rascality; we have never followed an opponent into his dining-room, in order to turn against him his conversation with his guests; we have never examined his bank account, in order to insinuate that he made base uses of his money; we have never drawn inferences from his personal appearance, or his birth, or parentage, or education, unfavorable to his moral condition. We have confined ourselves rigidly to the discussion of the public acts of public men. We have known them only through their bills, speeches, and resolutions, administrative acts and professional career. We have, it is true, on more than one occasion spoken disrespectfully of the early training of some distinguished citizens, but only when they had put forward this early training—nay, its very defects—as furnishing a claim to political honors. We have, too, carefully admitted personal character to weigh in expressing an opinion on men's title to the confidence of the public. More than this, we have labored in season and out of season for the exaltation of character as a political force. And yet many good souls have been tried by our course. They could not bear to have the discretion of Sumner, the wisdom of Stevens, the moderation of Wade, or the knowledge of Banks even doubted. They have thought that if we wanted to criticise we ought to expend our energies on Seymour and Pendleton and Vallandigham and the other men of "the concern over the way," they being an insignificant minority who were exercising little more influence on the great political crisis through which the country was passing than the Indians not taxed.

Our pleasure and surprise may therefore be guessed when we lately saw so many of the leading Radical journals rushing into "criticism" of Republican senators, and even of the Chief-Justice. When we saw what criticism it was, too, we began to feel astonished, in fact ashamed, of our own past moderation. Our own opinions on questions of law and politics may not be very valuable, but then they are as carefully formed, and are as dear and trustworthy to us, as those of any journal are to it. We have, therefore, frequently felt indignant with Thaddeus Stevens, and Benjamin Wade, and Charles Sumner when they were not of our way of thinking, and have frequently scolded at them—nay, we have ridiculed them occasionally, being of the opinion of Tertullian, that "there are many things which ought to be mocked at and made fun of, in order not to give them weight by combating them seriously." We never dreamed that it was open to us, when these gentlemen differed from us on a point of law or of policy, to insinuate that they were corrupt fellows in the pay of expectant office-seekers, or that their villanous expression of face indicated the loathsomeness of their moral nature; or that they had committed deliberate perjury; or that they had voted in a particular way on an important occasion in order to help sporting relatives of theirs to win their bets; or that honest men were defiled by sitting near them in Congress, and so on. Yet we find now that we might have said all this, and more than all this, and it would have been all legitimate "criticism;" for large numbers of our Radical brethren have been saying it during the last few weeks of members of the Republican party as old, as honored, as useful, and as trusted as any we have named, and, having said it, they now defend it with unblushing front.

The St. Louis Democrat, which, so far as we know, has not gone as far as this, has recently read us a long lecture for "maintaining that it was a disgrace for American journalists to censure the seven senators for the discharge of their sworn duty as jurors," and alleges "that it is about time to bring this cant face to face with a little common sense." It goes on to say:

"Every other public servant, in the discharge of every other public duty, is justly subjected to public criticism for his conduct. We claim to be a free people, and do not know that Mr. Fessenden, Mr. Trumbull, or the Nation itself has any right, as ruler by right divine, to expect to be free from criticism. We say nothing for the moment of alleged unworthy motives. If there were not a shadow of reason for suspecting the integrity of any of these men, the press, the party, and the people would still have an absolute right to form an opinion as to the correctness or justice of their action, to judge whether it was calculated to benefit or injure the country, or to aid or to betray the great cause to which these senators had pledged fidelity, and, having formed that opinion, to express it in such terms as the honest judgments of their acts require. Nay, more; it is not only the right, but it is the duty of the press to form and to express an opinion, and if Senator Fessenden was under obligation to vote as his conscience dictated, so every honest and patriotic man in the land is also under obligation to approve or disapprove as his conscience may dictate. But Mr. Fessenden was 'a juror.' Well, what of it? Is an oath to try a case more sacred than an oath to perform all the duties of senator? The sanctity of the oath under which Mr. Wade and Mr. Sumner act does not preclude the Nation from savagely berating them whenever, in its judgment, they do not faithfully or wisely perform their sworn duty. If a man may err in the one case, he may also err in the other—oath or no oath. If the one may properly be censured by the Nation for his error, the other may, with equal propriety, be censured by nine-tenths of the Republican papers in the country for failing to discharge his sworn duty with fidelity or sound judgment. More shallow nonsense was never hatched in any human brain than this notion that a senator's vote may be criticised in one case but must not in the other, because he happens to take one oath instead of another."

We greatly enjoy seeing "cant face to face with common sense." We never knowingly lose an opportunity of bringing the parties together, and purpose to help the St. Louis Democrat to do it on this occasion. We are delighted to see that journal such a friend of "criticism." We hope its love of it may spread, take root, and be perpetual. But then we must call the Democrat's attention to the fact that we have not opposed, do not now, and never shall, oppose criticism of the vote of the seven senators in the impeachment case. We are in favor of having every Radical editor in the country, who thinks it worth while, devote two articles a day to the discussion of the reasons given by these gentlemen for their vote. Of course we shall reserve our right to form our own conclusions as to which is entitled to more respect, the opinion of Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Fessenden on the evidence and the law, or the opinions of the editors. At present we admit fully that we have a good deal of respect for what Messrs. Trumbull and Fessenden say about a case which they have heard as judges, and that we have uncommonly little for that of excited persons at a distance who did not hear the case at all.

What we have objected to and denounced strongly is the attempt which has been made by a great many Radical newspapers and politicians not to criticise the vote of the senators, but to force them by threats and intimidation beforehand to vote in a particular way. We may criticise the verdict of jurors as much as we please after it is rendered; we may say it is against the evidence, or that the jurors were corrupted, or swayed by passion or prejudice. But we may not force ourselves into communication with the jurors during the hearing of the case, or into the jury-room while they are deliberating on their verdict, or threaten them with a good drubbing, or with being sent to Coventry, or driven out of the town, if they do not find for the plaintiff. And yet this is what was done during the late trial. Lawyers of forty years' standing and of stainless reputation were duly informed by that renowned jurist, Horace Greeley, and his youthful disciples, that if they did not follow his instructions in deciding the case they would be held for ever infamous and perjured. Moreover, whether you may decently accuse jurors of corruption or perjury after verdict rendered depends largely on their character and standing. Character tells, or ought to tell, on such an occasion, if it is ever to tell on any occasion. You are not at liberty to impugn the personal integrity of a man of unblemished character, simply because he differs with you on a point of law or on the force of evidence, unless you have strong proof at your back. If Bishop Potter and Dr. Adams and Jonathan Sturgis were on a jury in a criminal trial, it would be iniquitous to go and threaten them with persecution in case they did not find a particular verdict; and after they had found one in opposition to popular clamor and the opinions of their intimate friends, it would be silly as well as iniquitous to accuse them of corruption unless you had positive proof. The man who did it would be universally considered a malignant blockhead. And yet it would be very proper to criticise their verdict, to point out facts they had overlooked, considerations they had not duly weighed, and points of law they had misinterpreted. Of course, "an oath to try a case is not more sacred" than "an oath to perform all the duties of a senator." Who ever said that it was? An oath is an oath. The sanction of all judicial oaths is the same, but the oaths differ in their object. That it should be necessary to point out this distinction in the present case is both singular and humiliating. We have never accused Mr. Wade or Mr. Sumner of breaking their "oath to perform all the duties of a senator." We have accused Mr. Sumner on several occasions of not reasoning soundly about his duties as a senator. We shall do so again in all probability, but we shall nevertheless retain the very highest respect for Mr. Sumner's personal character. We have accused Mr. Wade not only of not reasoning well, but of being headstrong, passionate, a poor political economist, and too slenderly educated for the proper discharge of many of his duties. We could not surrender this opinion though we were ridden on a rail by "D. T. Anthony and others;" but we have never said that Mr. Wade was bribed by the "Whiskey Ring," or that he wore the appearance of a perjured scoundrel. Moreover, the "duties of a senator" is a very vague term. It gives room for the widest diversity of opinion on the greatest variety of questions. A man may be held to discharge these duties properly who votes as he thinks well himself or who votes as his constituents instruct him. A senator is a representative sitting in a legislative body.

But when a man takes his seat in a judicial tribunal, and takes an oath "to do impartial justice according to the law and the evidence," he swears that he will be guided in forming his decision by the testimony adduced before him, and by the legal arguments presented to him by counsel, or by those which his own learning and experience may supply. He swears, in other words, that his decision shall be the product of his own reason, and not the product of Horace Greeley's reason, or of that of any other editor or distant patriot, and that it shall not be supplied to him by Bishop Janes, or General Schenck, or "Kansas," or Charles S. Spencer, or General Logan.

When one is stating propositions of this kind, one can hardly help feeling that he is breathing a mediæval atmosphere. He feels transported back to the dawn of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, when the great principles on which our criminal codes and our mode of trial are based were slowly struggling into shape and recognition, when law was still two-thirds barbarian usage and one-third monkish theology, when men got at the truth of a controversy either by getting twelve men to swear to the same opinion on one side without a hearing, or by setting the plaintiff and defendant to cut each other's throats in a ring. One fancies one sees Horace Greeley go by in the guise of a barefooted friar, Benjamin Wade in that of "an abbot on an ambling pad," and Benjamin F. Butler assumes a strange resemblance to Duns Scotus, and the "burning editorials" of distant Radical periodicals sound in one's dreaming ear like the wild music of the troubadour's guitar. But we must not give way to these enervating visions. The great body of the people live in the broad daylight of the nineteenth century. The experience of five hundred years, and the labors of twenty generations of statesmen, jurists, and philosophers, have not lost their value in the popular eye, and are deeply embedded in the popular common sense, so that, though there were twice as many persons given over to the delusions of which we believe the St. Louis Democrat—and we say this with all possible respect for its honesty and ability—to be the victim, we should still feel no doubt whatever of the continued supremacy as well as of the soundness of the great legal ideas on which our freedom is based, and without which it would not exist for a year.

READINGS IN THE RUSSIAN ARCHIVES.

ONE day in Moscow the writer was in the Tchertkof Library, an excellent collection of about 15,000 volumes, relating solely to Russia, though in all languages, the property of Mr. Tchertkof, but open to the public, when the librarian, Mr. Barténef, showed him a little biography he had written of Count Morkóf, and said: "Count Morkóf was ambassador at the Hague and at Paris, and says in his despatches some interesting things about the Americans. If you will go to the archives you may find something of importance." I learned from him then that all the despatches and papers of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs down to the end of the eighteenth century are kept at Moscow, and as what he said had made me a little curious, I determined to do some reading in the archives. The next day I called on Prince Obolensky, who has charge of the archives, and obtained full permission to see everything and copy what I chose. They are kept in a dilapidated-looking stuccoed building with iron shutters, formerly the mansion of some noble. The only entrance is through a large garden. After going up the staircase and through the ante-rooms, you come to four moderate-sized rooms, hung with portraits of the czars and emperors, and the chancellors and vice-chancellors of the empire, with bookcases about the walls. These are the rooms of the officers. In one of them are four small tables, which are quite enough for the limited number of readers.

I took my seat, and soon had before me the despatches from the Hague for the year 1782, in four neat pasteboard boxes. These despatches were written in various ways. Those to the court either in Russian or in cipher, those to the vice-chancellor usually in French. Then there was often enclosed some document, pamphlet, or newspaper in Dutch.

At this time Catherine II. was empress. Count Osterman was vice-chancellor, and Prince Demitri Galitzin was the ambassador at the Hague, to whom in the spring Mr. Arkadi Morkóf was sent as adjunct, with special instructions to mediate between England and the Netherlands, and endeavor to bring about a peace.

The first notice of American affairs which is of any account is in a despatch of Morkóf to Osterman, dated 25th February (8th March), in which he mentions Mr. Adams's arrival.

Two weeks after, Prince Galitzin says that the States General have begun to talk in earnest about recognizing Mr. Adams as ambassador. This, however, is only to hear what he has to say, for the writer is sure that their High Mightinesses will not be brought so easily or so soon to recognize the independence of America. A few days later Morkóf says that Mr. Wentworth, before leaving, made him ample confidences, "but never touched upon the Americans, except to say that England was not without friends among them, nor upon Mr. Adams personally, except to complain of his proceedings and show inquietude about their result. I can now use the orders your excellency has given me, by regulating my conduct toward Mr. Adams so as to facilitate my relations with him, if new orders from your excellency or some request from England authorize me."

On the 9th (20th) April he writes that, the consent of the Province of Guelders having arrived the day before, the States General immediately recognized Mr. Adams as Minister of the Thirteen United States of America. Social troubles were the consequence of this recognition, and though Mr. Adams wore a court dress, his position was no pleasanter than that of his grandson lately. On the 13th (24th) April Morkóf writes: "Yesterday the French ambassador gave a grand dinner (dîné) to all the diplomatic corps, to which Mr. Adams was also invited, and he presented him to us as a new member of our body. To-day he came himself to our doors and left his cards, to notify us of his recognition. We have, notwithstanding, agreed among ourselves not to return this visit, at least till we receive express orders from our respective courts."

To this letter Osterman replies on the 6th May: "Now that their High Mightinesses have proceeded to the formal recognition of Mr. Adams as Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, I must instruct you that her Imperial Majesty does not wish any demonstration on your part that can lead to the presumption that she approves of this step. You must then abstain from receiving or paying visits either to Mr. Adams or to any other person accredited from the colonies which are separating (qui se font détachées) from Great Britain."

It would, of course, have been very improper for the Empress Catherine to recognize the United States so long as she held the position of a mediator, and the independence of America was one point in the quarrel. But there was apparently no desire on her part ever to do this. She had a wholesome horror of rebels of every kind, for she had just succeeded with great difficulty in putting down the rebellion of Pugatchef, which had threatened to tear away some of the best provinces of the empire. It was about this time that Radistchef printed surreptitiously in his own house his "Journey from St. Petersburg to Moscow," which exceedingly displeased the Empress. She did worse than confiscate it; she wrote a very severe and very witty review of it, which she published herself. But in conversation she said, "Radistchef—he is worse than Pugatchef: he praises Franklin." This shows her feeling toward the Americans at the Hague. Not long after this a portrait of Washington was sent in the Russian despatch-bag to Mr. Francis Dana, the unrecognized American agent at St. Petersburg. Count Osterman returned it to Prince Galitzin, with a sharp letter, in which he says:

"With your despatches came a portrait of Washington, to be delivered to one Dina [sic], an American gentleman [nobleman in the Russian] here. But as this man is not known to her Imperial Majesty or her ministry, you are commanded by her Majesty to return it to the source from which it reached the courier, together with documents accompanying it. Her Majesty wishes your excellency, as well as Mr. Morkóf, in future not to receive from or for Americans any letter or anything else to be despatched by the courier; for besides the reason given in my letter of the 10th May, it is not pleasant to deliver them to people with regard to whom her Majesty's ministry does not know where they are nor why they are here."

By the 2d of May Mr. Adams had made himself very popular in Holland. Galitzin says: "Mr. Adams really turns people's heads." Morkóf writes:

"Far from growing calm, people are getting bitterer every day. A scene that recently took place at Nimeguen during the session of the States is a new proof of this sad truth. A Mr. Syngledon (or Singendonk), a relative of the Register Fogre and a member of the state of Guelders, being at a dinner that one of his fellow-members had given, was invited to drink to the health of Mr. Adams. He had the imprudence to refuse, which so provoked the guests that they almost threw him out of the window, and he regarded it as a piece of good luck to escape with blows only, and to take refuge at the Hague. He was pursued there by anonymous letters, addressed to the Prince of Orange, the Grand Pensionary, and other persons of the government, in which they threatened with a similar and even worse treatment all those who did not adhere to the principles adopted for the recognition of America and the war against England. There is a general inundation of libels, each more violent than the other, in which the chief attacks are directed against the Stadtholder and the Duke Louis. The Grand Pensionary, notwithstanding the servile complaisance with which he lends himself to the views of the dominant faction, is not even spared. He is the butt of sarcasms and ridicule bestowed upon him without measure."

Mr. Adams apparently endeavored to make a good use of his popularity, for Galitzin writes on the 7th May:

"Mr. Adams has opened a loan of five million florins at 5 per cent. for the Americans at Amsterdam. Your excellency can easily imagine that notwithstanding the enthusiasm here for the Congress, the purses will hardly be untied for him till one can see great sureties for payment. He has then asked their High Mightinesses for a guaranty; and I am assured that he threatens not to conclude the commercial treaty with the republic if this guaranty is refused."

The Dutch expected great things from this commercial treaty, so that this threat was not without significance. According to Morkóf, it was pushed hastily through all the provincial diets, for fear lest, if it was not finished in time, there might be put in the treaty of recognition by England some exclusive advantage for the commerce of England, to the detriment of that of the republic. Everybody was then expecting the close of the war. Mr. Adams went to Paris in October, 1782, and there are no other notices of importance on American affairs in the Russian despatches, except the conclusion of the various treaties. Copies of these are sent, but there are no special remarks on them. In April, 1783, Morkóf also went to Paris, being at the same time created a count for his services. Here he renewed his relations with Adams, and seems to have been on intimate terms with him as well as with Jay. The latter endeavored to begin negotiations for a commercial treaty with Russia, but the Empress was still unwilling to recognize the Americans.

The regular Russian ambassador at Paris during all the period of the Revolution was Prince Ivan Bariátinsky, the grandfather of the present field-marshal and conqueror of the Caucasus. His despatches are very copious, and are nearly always in Russian or cipher. They are full of interesting matter of all descriptions. On European intrigues of course there is a great mass. In one despatch is a description of the first representation of Voltaire's "Irene," and in another is a long—as yet unpublished—account of the death and funeral of Voltaire, by one of his intimate friends.

I have had time as yet only to examine a part of the papers for the year 1778, and so far have found nothing particularly amusing or piquant on America. American affairs, however, receive their full share of attention, and every battle is described, and usually a plan of the battle is enclosed. This is a proof of the interest which was taken in Europe in the struggle in America.

Bariátinsky gives the following account of what seems Dr. Franklin's first reception by the king, but he makes no mention of the appearance which Franklin presented. It is dated March 11 (22), 1778:

"Most Illustrious Sovereign, Empress, and Autocrat of all the Russias:

"Most gracious Madame: Day before yesterday Dr. Franklin, Dean and Lee, with the other Americans here, had the honor of being presented to his Most Christian Majesty by the Minister of State, Count Vergennes, in the quality of deputies from the United States of North America. His Most Christian Majesty assured them of his favor, and that the treaty which had been concluded would be inviolably preserved. To this his Majesty was pleased to add that he thinks that the treaty will be advantageous and profitable to both nations. The king was pleased to say to Dr. Franklin that he justified his reputation, and that his Majesty was pleased with his conduct during his whole residence here." . . . .

About this time Mr. Adams arrived in France to replace Dean, and there came also various reports that the French treaty had been repudiated by the Congress. Dean and Gerard, the head clerk of the French Foreign Department, left together, and their destination was a great theme for conjecture. Most people supposed that they were going to Spain to secure the recognition of the United States by that country. It was not until the arrival of the account of Gerard's reception at Philadelphia (this is sent in full to the Empress) that even Bariátinsky knew certainly where he had gone.

The direct relations of Russia with America, as contained in the archives, comprise only five or six documents.

Francis Dana was the American agent at St. Petersburg from August, 1781, to September, 1783, but appears never to have been officially recognized by the Russian Government. There is first a letter of Dana to Osterman, dated February 24, 1783, informing him that he has been named minister and asking for an audience to deliver his letter of credit. On the 10th of April Dana writes again, saying that he had received a verbal reply from Count Osterman that, as it was the first week in Lent, he had not had time to lay the matter before the Empress. A conference then ensued on the 12th of April, at which Osterman stated that her Majesty, having been invited by the courts of Versailles, London, and Madrid to mediate in conjunction with the Emperor of Germany, cannot consistently receive a minister from America without the consent of those Powers; that the present treaty between England and America is provisional only; that Dana's credentials are dated previous to this provisional treaty and recognition; and that her Majesty ought to wait until an American minister has been received at London. On the 27th of April Dana sends a memorial in reply to this answer of Osterman, stating arguments against such objections. On the 3d of June there was another verbal conference. Count Osterman states that her Majesty is greatly pleased with the special compliment of an envoy sent expressly to her, and will recognize him with pleasure as soon as the definite treaties of peace are concluded. "Notwithstanding, her Majesty intends that you shall enjoy not only for your own person, but also for all of your countrymen who come to Russia for commerce or otherwise, the most favorable reception and the protection of the law of nations."

On the 5th of June Dana writes to express his thanks, and to say that he will wait until the definitive treaty of peace is concluded before making any further proposition. On August 3 he states that, in accordance with his own request, on account of bad health and of his affairs at home, Congress has granted him permission to return to America; that he has now a good opportunity to do so; that though it would greatly flatter his vanity to be received as minister, yet as he should be obliged immediately to depart, he will not ask to be recognized, but will go at once. After this there are no documents of any kind down to 1800. As the first treaty with Russia was concluded in 1824, it becomes an interesting question whether the date usually given of September, 1783, for the recognition of the United States by Russia, is correct, and how that recognition was accomplished.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, May 22, 1868.

THE political struggle still continues; the ministry, though at times in an almost intolerable position, seems, on the whole, rather to gain strength than otherwise. There have been already several so-called crises, produced by adverse votes on different subjects; but Mr. Disraeli, after taking time to consider, has hitherto decided to struggle on without either dissolving or resigning. The position is, of course, altogether anomalous, and under any other circumstances must have led long ago to one of those alternatives. The general desire to avoid a dissolution, and also to avoid the waste of time and the delay in business which would result from a change of ministry, will probably, as it now seems, lead to a continuance of the position until the essential business of the session has been done, and Mr. Disraeli can appeal to the new constituencies. The battle is indeed so even, and the chances vary so rapidly, that it would be rash to make any confident prophecy. Loud as is the clamor from the Liberal side against the baseness of a ministry which consents to hold office whilst in a minority, I suspect that there are many Liberals—and those very sound ones—who in their hearts would be sorry to force a dissolution. Besides the general inconvenience and expense, they feel that they can extort more from a Conservative ministry in a minority than they could get from their own leaders when clogged by official responsibilities. Moreover, they are not confident as to the result of an immediate appeal to the country. The attack, indeed, upon Mr. Disraeli has been vehement enough, but it has come principally from those who would gain office if he were turned out. The Independent Liberals have been less eager than the recognized leaders of the opposition. The fighting amongst the chief combatants has been keen enough, in all conscience. The Times has thought fit to warn the House of Commons that they are losing the dignified freedom from personality and disorderly abuse of which they were wont to boast. Mr. Bright has called Mr. Disraeli "pompous and servile" (as I think I mentioned in my last); and Mr. Disraeli has retorted that Mr. Bright was not a gentleman. A member last night said that the state of the House was drawing down upon it the contempt of every thinking man in the country. Another added that the worst he could wish for his enemy would be that he should sit on the Treasury bench as a minister under Mr. Disraeli. A third retorted by comparing the first speaker to the cur in Sir Roger de Coverley's pack: "If an old hound opened but once he was immediately followed by the whole cry, while a raw dog might have yelped his heart out without being taken notice of." Many other little amenities passed, justifying the remark of Mr. Bernal Osborne that the House was giving way rather too much to its fondness for "baiting a minister." And, indeed, the best description of the last few weeks' debates is that they have been a succession of minister-baits. Now, most modern spectators would sympathize rather with the bull or bear than with the dogs; and I think that Mr. Disraeli is gradually profiting to some extent by the sympathy which naturally follows a man who, rightly or wrongly, is able to pose himself as a martyr, especially when it is possible to accuse his assailants of being actuated chiefly by a desire for office. I entirely disapprove, for my part, of Mr. Disraeli's policy; but I doubt whether much good will come of the eager attempt to kick him out of office at once and at all hazards, which looks like persecution, and which also is obviously not free from all suspicion of interested motives. In short, I would hope that he may be allowed to transact such business as remains and then dissolve with all practicable speed.

It is a difficult question what will be the consequences of an appeal to the country. If the present constituencies are consulted, it is far from improbable that Government may gain strength. The charge of factiousness will do something against the opposition, and it is not impossible that some effect may be produced by the "No Popery" cry. Hitherto there has been singularly little response to the appeal made to the bigotry of the Protestant party; but there is a considerable reserve fund, as it were, of prejudice to draw upon; and a desertion of only a moderate fraction of the Protestant Dissenters, who are generally the mainstay of the Liberal party in towns, might make a great difference. They hate a state church, but many of them hate any semblance of a concession to Popery still more. It is not yet safe to say that Mr. Disraeli's appeal has been entirely thrown away.

Other business, of course, has to wait. The Government have abandoned their education bill amidst general indifference. Another bill, which has a strong interest for Liberals, was talked to death the other night. The English universities have for some time been thrown open to Dissenters, in the sense that Dissenters may, and frequently do, become students. But no one may enjoy a share of the endowments who does not declare himself to be a member of the Church of England; and as the endowments are really the mainspring of the whole machinery, the leave to share in everything else is felt to be little better than a mockery. The House of Commons would have passed the measure, as they have previously done, by a large majority, although the House of Lords might have rejected it for the time. However, Mr. Beresford Hope, who is an accepted representative of the High Church party in the House of Commons, and privileged to the use of something like buffoonery, managed to get rid of the bill on a side-wind. A bill for allowing metres to be used instead of yards happened to have precedence of the university tests bill, and Mr. Hope talked about metres and yards and the radius of the earth and the decimal system till there was no time left to consider the university question. Consequently we shall for another year suffer our universities to remain in the hands of a privileged sect. In spite of all the archbishops and bishops in the kingdom, no one fancies that they can long be preserved; but Mr. Beresford Hope's eloquence about the metrical system has gained another breathing-space for an ancient abuse. Another abuse excited a little splutter of talk, only to be once more put aside, which must some day or other revive. Mr. Trevelyan, a young member of much promise, and supposed to have inherited a share of the talents of his uncle, Lord Macaulay, brought forward the consideration of the purchase system in the army. No one, we would have thought, could defend the system seriously on any ground except the difficulty of changing it. However, the question is still in that early stage in which the Conservatives can take a bold line of defence. The Times and Sir John Pakington prove that there cannot possibly be any better way of promoting officers than to let them buy their places. Nothing is so encouraging to merit or so conducive to the efficiency of the army. By our system, says Mr. Trevelyan, we get the dregs of society for our rank and file, and the froth for our officers. Well, says The Times, and what better can we do with the froth and the dregs? Do we not make from them that incomparable army which won at Waterloo and killed King Theodore, and excites the enthusiasm of every true Briton? In short, the present argument still is that our system is the best conceivable. In a session or two more the argument will be that, though obviously bad in theory, it cannot be abandoned in practice. Then we shall declare that to abolish purchase is to introduce the thin end of the wedge, and soon after that we shall be wondering how we could ever have been so foolish as to tolerate the system at all. Such, at least, is the course through which all political argument seems to pass as regularly as a caterpillar goes through its proper transformations. But under present circumstances there is the shorter argument that Parliament has not time to do anything except bait the ministers.

Governor Eyre has at last been committed for trial, the Jamaica Committee having prosecuted him for a misdemeanor instead of bringing the graver charge of murder. Had this course been adopted when the matter was fresh, I think that Mr. Eyre might not improbably have been convicted. As it is, he is profiting in the same way as Mr. Disraeli. His antagonists, however good may be their case, have the air of persecuting, and, moreover, of persecuting a man for an error of judgment under very critical circumstances. For every one remembers that the negroes tried to get up an insurrection, but no one can be expected to remember two years and more after the event that a few hundred of them were shot, flogged, or hung without sufficient cause. "Surely a murdered nigger may rest quiet in his grave after a year or so; one feels less for a hundred niggers than for a living Eyre." This, at least, appears to be the general view of the case, and I suspect that the grand jury will throw out the bill accordingly.*

The lawsuit between Home and the Spiritualists and Mrs. Lyons has just ended in Home being compelled to return the £60,000. Meanwhile a smart controversy has been raging between Home and Professor Tyndall. The professor asserted that Home had been afraid to meet Faraday with a view to a scientific examination of the spirits. Home replied that Faraday had imposed unfair conditions; and on Faraday's letter being produced it certainly did appear that he had asked some preliminary questions which had an insulting tone. For example, he enquired whether Home would be glad to see the fallacious nature of his performances exposed. On this ground, then, Home had a fair opportunity of evading the proposed test, and, to be fair, I must confess that he wrote plausibly, and certainly came out of the controversy with considerable success. He informed Professor Tyndall, in answer to his challenge of a further trial, that he would give him a chance of witnessing the phenomena whenever he should be in a humbler frame of mind. Since then others, including Mr. G. H. Lewes, have joined in the controversy, and the result is that a challenge, to which Mr. Home can hardly object, has been held out to meet him for a fair experiment. He has not yet answered, but it would certainly be pleasant to have the spirits and the philosophers brought for once face to face.

* It has thrown it out.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. LEYPOLDT & HOLT announce the following works: "Reminiscences of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy," by Elise Polko, translated from the German by Lady Wallace; "Select Works of S. Schwartz," from the Swedish—"The Man of Birth and the Woman of the People," "Two Family Mothers," "William Stjernkrouna," "The Children of Labor," and others; "Taine's Ideal in Art," from the French by John Durand; "Taine's English Literature," "Taine's Italy" (Florence and Venice); "Taine's Philosophy of Italian Art," "Taine's Ideal in Art," "Taine's Philosophy of Art," a new edition; "Manual of Mythology," by the Rev. G. W. Cox, M.A.; "Tables from Ancient Greece," by the Rev. G. W. Cox, M.A.——D. Appleton & Co. have announced a republication of "Faraday as a Discoverer," a memoir, by John Tyndall, LL.D., F.R.S., author of "Heat, a Mode of Motion," with two portraits.——Virtue & Yorston have in press "A Treatise on Colors," by Professor Ernest Brucke, of Vienna; edited by Robert Mallet, A.M., F.R.S., etc.; "The Holy Land, Past and Present: Sketches of Travel in Palestine," by the Rev. Henry S. Osborn, M.A., new edition, with fifty-eight illustrations on steel and wood.——J. B. Lippincott & Co. will republish the "Memoirs of Baron Bunsen," by his widow; "Half-Hours with the Telescope," by R. A. Proctor; and "St. Francis of Sales," by Lady Herbert.

—The American Naturalist for June contains several excellent papers of a kind that are intelligible and valuable to others besides men of science. That on "The Warblers" appears to be the fullest catalogue ever made of those songsters. "The Goldsmith Beetle" and "The Parasites of the Honey-bee" concern country people very nearly, and should be extensively read. Mr. W. J. Brigham begins a promising description of numerous tropical fruits which, we doubt not, are destined to effect great changes in the world's diet, if aerial transportation shall ever be realized. The department called "Natural History Miscellany" has a great variety of interesting communications, and the "Entomological Calendar" keeps pace with the insect pests. We regret that a publication so useful and so well-conducted—so creditable to the country in every way—should not be supported liberally, as appears to be the case. The editors represent their expenses to be in excess of their revenue, and the success of their enterprise to depend on the immediate exertions of its friends. We are glad to repeat that the Naturalist deserves long life and the amplest development, and we especially regard it as of service to the young for inducing habits of careful and precise observation in fields too generally neglected in our primary education. It is published at the Peabody Academy of Science, Salem, Mass.

—The Northern Monthly having been merged in Putnam's Magazine, its place is taken and more than filled by two new magazines. One is announced by Messrs. P. S. Wynkoop & Son (late Wynkoop & Sherwood), and is to be "a scholarly Christian monthly of 64 pages." It will be the fourth periodical of that general character. Messrs. Pott & Amery sell the People's Magazine, which is in its way really excellent, and will, we doubt not, when "pushed" as magazines have to be, become widely popular, especially among the Church of England people. Messrs. George Routledge & Sons are publishing agents of Good Words, also a very good magazine for the family circle and with much good writing and valuable reading in it every month. Then we have Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co.'s Hours at Home, which is known to most of our readers as occupying a middle place between Harper's on the one side and the religious weekly papers on the other, and as containing much profitable Sunday reading. What Messrs. P. S. Wynkoop & Son will make of their Good News we do not venture to predict. The Cornhill Monthly and Literary Recorder is to be published in Boston, and is to be, so far as we can judge from the prospectus, a combination on a small scale of the Publishers' Circular and something more literary. It is to be issued monthly, is to have thirty-two pages, of which sixteen are to be filled with advertisements; five will be devoted to announcements of new books, issued and in press, with brief editorial notices; five will be filled with items of literary intelligence; and six will be given up to "communications and general intelligence." "All publications sent to the editor will have a full, impartial, and discriminating notice." Further, it is said that, "as a purely literary journal, it is intended that the Cornhill Monthly shall equal any work of a secular character ever offered to the reading public," "some of the best talent of the land" having been engaged.

—The Boston Transcript frankly and fairly retracts the charge of "ignorance" it made against the Nation last week with reference to our remarks on Professor Stowe's article on the Talmud in the last Atlantic Monthly. We cannot help saying one word, however, of protest against the manner in which the charge was made, which was exceedingly improper. If the Nation were to criticise an article on any such subject as the Talmud without knowing well what it was talking about, it would be guilty of gross imposture, to use no stronger term. We may add that we have satisfied Professor Stowe privately that we were not only correct in the small criticism we made on his article, but that we might have pointed out more errors of the same sort had we thought it worth while. We did not think it worth while because these errors, though they deserved in the interest of accurate scholarship to be mentioned, did not detract in any material degree from the merit of his paper, which was, in all its statements of fact, both trustworthy and instructive.

—New English books of interest to readers of various sorts, and most of them of interest to the general reader, are these: Mr. Furnivall and Mr. Hales having brought to completion their edition of the folio manuscripts on which Bishop Percy founded his "Reliques," it is proposed to sell a certain number of copies to persons other than members of the Early English Text Society. The price put on such copies will be a little more than the price paid by subscribers, which was excessively low—one guinea for four large octavo volumes containing so rich a treasure of English ballad literature, and edited, as our readers have been informed, in the best manner. A work not very dissimilar to this in kind—still more like the recently published curious collection of "Slave Songs" of our Southern negroes—is a translation, by the Rev. Canon Calloway, of the "Nursery Tales, Traditions, and Histories of the Zulus," an intelligent, spirited South African race. As the solidest of three new works on art we mention first Professor Lubke's two-volume "History of Art," translated by F. E. Bunnett. It is illustrated by more than four hundred engravings. That pleasant writer, intelligible to the lay world, for which also art exists, as well as to the art-workmen, Mr. Philip G. Hamerton, has written a work entitled "Etching and Etchers: a Treatise Critical and Practical," which is adorned with original plates by Rembrandt, Paul Potter, Dujardin, Collot, and other masters. The Clarendon Press Series is to contain a work, by the Rev. R. St. John Tyrrwhitt, entitled "Handbook of Pictorial Art; with Numerous Illustrations, and Practical Advice." This is, we believe, the first work devoted to art which has made its appearance in this excellent and truly catholic series of educational works. Two other publications, belonging to the same set of works, which we see advertised with Mr. Tyrrwhitt's "Handbook," are Mr. Freeman's "History of the Norman Conquest" (Vol. II.) and Spenser's "Faery Queen" (Book II.), edited by the Rev. Mr. G. W. Kitchin. We see it stated that the continuation of Mr. Kinglake's "Crimean War" has been delayed by reason of the care requisite in preparing the numerous maps and military plans by which it is to be illustrated, but that the work may be expected immediately. We may mention here, although it is old, another historical work, of which two new editions are just appearing, and as to which there is a sharp quarrel going on between two publishers. The copyright in the first edition of Hallam's "Middle Ages" has just expired, whereupon Messrs. Alexander Murray & Co., "violating the courtesy of the trade," begin issuing in parts a cheap edition. Mr. John Murray, however, has advertised the purchasing world that the new reprint is a reprint of the first edition, full of errors, afterward corrected by the author, and destitute of the volume of notes and dissertations which Mr. Hallam appended to the original work in 1848, thirty years after it was first published. Mr. Folkestone Williams's "Lives of the English Cardinals" is nearly ready. It may well enough be a history of the Roman Church in England from the days of the Conqueror to the days of the Reformation. Whether it will be, we do not know. We, in our own day, have seen the Roman Church in England recovered from the blow of the Reformation and again making English cardinals. Closely allied to history would be a good life of Lord Brougham. A work entitled "Life and Career of Lord Brougham, with Extracts from his Speeches and Notices of Contemporaries," is announced as the first volume of a series of "Representative Biographies," which will be for sale in this country by Messrs. Walter Low & Son. A better biography—if it is not a blunder to regard an autobiography as a biography—is Count Maffei's translation, with notes and an introduction, of Azeglio's "Recollections"—a charming book; pronounced far better than the author's excellent novels. Mr. Cyrus Redding, whom Maginn was so far from being delighted with, has put together three volumes (very heavy) of "Personal Reminiscences of Eminent Men." Still, there are several new things in it; there almost never was a book of this kind not worth turning over. Oftener, perhaps, than any others, such books justify a remark of Swift's—we forget where he got it—that one often reads with some pleasure a book which inspires one with contempt for the writer. "A Life of Sir John Richardson," in one volume octavo, is the well-told story of an interesting career; the book is full enough of adventure to be a Christmas story for boys, and yet does such justice to the scientific aspect of Sir John's life as to be interesting to the savans. In poetry we have the fourth volume of the new six-volume edition of Browning. Why, we do not know, but the poet is nowadays publishing things of his which he was before displeased or rather unwilling to see in the hands of readers. "Pauline," in the first of these new volumes, is a specimen of the class of poems we refer to—a poem long out of print, and known only to the poet's more enthusiastic students and admirers, and the publication of which has caused a vast deterioration in the value of several poetical scrap-books. William Blake's recent revival by certain art-critics and by Mr. Gilchrist in his memoir, and by Mr. Basil Pickering's publication of the "Songs of Innocence and Experience"—poems which only need to be known to be admired—a revival not stopped, and possibly even aided, by Mr. Swinburne's performance, has made the mystical poet and painter somewhat popular. Mr. Pickering now announces an edition of Blake's "Poetical Sketches," poems first published in 1783, and never republished in complete form. "The Spanish Gypsy," by Mrs. Lewes, we already have on this side of the water, with the imprint of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields. A good novel is not to be forgotten. "The New Landlord" is a translation of a Hungarian story by Maurice Jokai. It depicts the strifes, humorous and otherwise, between an honorable, gay-hearted old Austrian, a retired officer, who has for tenant a haughty, but patient, fine-tempered old Magyar chief. But in the house of Ankerschmidt there is a little maid, and in the house of Granvölgyi there is a youth, and the old Imperialist and the old Magyar finally unite in blessing the union of Aladar and Elise. The pictures of Hungarian life, the critics say, are set in scenery agreeable by its novelty, and the story altogether is fresh and pleasant.

—We take pleasure in commending to the notice of our clerical readers especially—and to them especially only because they are to so great an extent Bible-readers to many besides themselves—a new version of the Psalms which will be liked by all who like poetry, and by all who, whether they like poetry or not, like the Psalms, and would be glad to understand them. The title of the book reads as follows: "The Psalms Chronologically Arranged: An Amended Version, with Historical Introduction and Explanatory Notes. By Four Friends." This is hardly the place for criticism, but we can describe the book easily by asking the reader who remembers the 121st Psalm ("I will lift up mine eyes to the hills, from whence cometh my help") to consider how much more force and beauty he perceives in it when he learns that it was probably composed by a Hebrew going into exile, who, passionately longing for his home, turns his eyes to the hills he is leaving for ever behind him: and then, seeking comfort somewhere, appeals to his heart to know where it is to be found, and finds it not in the hills, as our version seems to say, but in his God. With unforced and small yet important changes the beautiful lyric begins thus:

"I will lift mine eyes unto the hills.
Oh! whence cometh my help?
My help cometh from Jehovah,
Who hath made heaven and earth.
Will He suffer thy foot to be moved?" etc.

Other new religious publications are these: The vast mass of divinity that St. Thomas Aquinas put into his "Summa," which will never again be studied as a whole, except by here and there some one enthusiast, is being broken up into parts for the convenience of our modern theologians. "A Digest of the Doctrine of Saint Thomas on the Incarnation" has been made by the same compiler who had previously made digests of other parts of St. Thomas's doctrine—Mr. Humphry, formerly one of the cleverest of the Puseyites, now recently become a Romanist. The Rev. Orby Shipley has prepared the Third Series of "Tracts for the Day." It contains essays on education for girls, "The Divorce Courts," "The Natal Scandal," "Prayers for the Dead," and similar topics, and will give a more or less pleasing and refreshing change of reading to persons who have had the civil aspect of marriage, and Mrs. Dall's theory of female education, and the Broad Church view of Bishop Colenso for a long time forced on their attention. Professor Russell Martineau's new edition of "The History of Israel," by the great Ewald, first of Hebrew scholars, will comprise two volumes, and will continue the history to the time of the death of Samuel.

—We on this side of the water never fell into the extreme admiration and reverence for Lord Macaulay which the English, even the Conservatives after some feeble resistance, felt for him. Poe, to be sure, in one of those newspaper criticisms, acute and too sharp, in which he imitated Hazlitt's hastier works with much success, was almost a little enthusiastic about the great reviewer's rhetoric and style—which was much for Poe, who seldom became warm except when it was a question of exalting some good or bad obscure poet over poets, good or bad, whom he detested. We had an extremely brilliant "Boston Macaulay" in spite of Rufus Choate's declaring the style of the English one very tiresome and otherwise disagreeable. Even to this day there are young Americans who imitate him; one of the May magazines had an amusing specimen of such writing. So it was not with any horror that we saw Matthew Arnold's severity and disdain when "the chief of the Philistines" was mentioned; or the very lukewarm liking for him entertained by M. Taine, who assured the surprised English years ago that he found in Lord Macaulay nothing "like the best French manner." In England this tone of speaking about him, we are told, is still offensive to vastly more people than are pleased by it. It is not so long since Alison, the Tory historian, avowed his attempt to copy the Hastings trial passage in the Whig historian's essay; Sir James Stephen painfully put his feet into Macaulay's footsteps; and these are two of a countless host whom one may track through all English periodical literature. Mr. Hepworth Dixon's attack on him counted for little; perhaps hurt Mr. Dixon more than Macaulay—though there is no doubt that the latter was all wrong on the matter in dispute—and is probably at the bottom of much of the acerbity with which Mr. Dixon is spoken of by many of the critics. The other attacks made on Macaulay for the inaccuracies of his history had little effect at the moment. But the foundations of his reputation are now getting a very thorough overhauling. We recommend our readers to look over an excellent article in the last London Quarterly. It is said to be by Mr. Hayward, the translator of "Faust." It may be said to give in profusion well-proved specific instances of the "Philistinism" which Matthew Arnold made the ground of his contempt. There is almost no one who will not get new light on Francis's claim to the authorship of "Junius" from reading the testimony adduced by Mr. Hayward; and Macaulay's pictures of Marlborough, of William III., of the Scotch Highlanders, are also shown to be anything but photographic. As to the Junius matter, we think the essay contains something that is new; as to the rest of it, what has before been said is at any rate put forcibly. For several reasons its study is to be recommended to young men who are in their "Warren Hastings" and "Milton" and "Boswell's Life of Johnson." As to Mr. Hayward's having written the article, the notes on the margin seem at first inconsistent with such a supposition; but, on a little consideration, are seen to be not necessarily so.

—Among late French works interesting to the American public we find these: Welter's "History of Coffee," which we have already noticed at some length as an agreeable essay on the berry for the sake of which the Frenchman unwisely forsakes and despises tea. M. F. F. Steenacker has done some whitewashing for the benefit of Agnes Sorel, the mistress of Charles VII., and almost equally famous contemporary of the Maid of Orleans. It is a book of amusement merely. The Abbé Maistre's "Witnesses of Christ" may be called valuable as a reference book for clergymen. It contains biographical memoirs of each of the seventy-two disciples of Christ, the first witnesses of his miracles, the first pastors of the first churches, and so forth, and is in one octavo volume. And clergymen will be pleased to read M. Emile Caro's "Materialism and Science."

—G. S., the correspondent of the Publishers' Circular, who seems always to have good information as to what goes on in the publishing circles of Paris, gives in a recent letter some statistics which show the relative popularity of authors in France: "Let me make a note of the success of some works; their fate is curious. M. Guizot's 'History of Civilization in France' has reached a 10th edition; his 'History of Civilization in Europe' a 9th edition; his 'Essays on the History of France' a 12th edition; Mme. Craven's 'A Sister's Story' a 15th edition [soon to be set before Catholics in this country also]; Mme. de la Rochejaquelin's 'Memoirs' an 11th edition; Pinnock's edition of Goldsmith's abridgment of the 'History of Rome' a 21st edition; Gustave Droz's 'M. et Mme. et Bébé' a 24th edition, and his 'Entre Nous' a 12th edition; Victor Cousin's 'Mme. de Hautefort' a 3d edition; Count J. de Maistre's 'The Pope' a 21st edition; Auguste Nicolas's 'Philosophical Studies of Christianity' a 19th edition; a translation of Miss Strickland's 'Alda' a 5th edition; Ch. Tondeur's 'Stenography' a 28th edition; Defaucopret's translation of Scott's novels a 21st edition; and Gustave Droz's 'Cahier Bleu de Mlle. Cibot' a 10th edition." As in England and in this country, so in France too; among the books that sell best are sure to be several adapted to the needs of the religious world. We dare say statistics from publishers of devotional books would make this still more plain than it is made by the figures we have given above.

—The Bishop of Orleans in his last pamphlet gives a lively picture of the bête noire which terrifies him whenever he tries to approach as near as he gladly would to popular education. It must be confessed that he has some excuse for his horror and trepidation; for our friends the French Liberals are not, all of them, the most judicious of creatures. There are reckless Freemasons, it appears, who have made a league for educational purposes, and who are strong both in Belgium and France. The covenanters consider religion as anything but a sound basis for morality; they specify the works of Madame Sand, Jean Jacques' "Emile," and M. Victor Hugo's "Notre Dame" as far preferable to the Bible for making the child a healthy moralist. M. Duruy, the bishop says, has authorized an educational course favored by the league. And there is another plot against religion to which the Minister of Public Instruction lends himself. The newly established public lecturers on scientific subjects, especially on medicine, are avowed materialists. What did one thesis writer do only the other day? He declared that he recognized but one master, Auguste Comte, but one doctrine, Positivism; he thought, he said, that Fetichism would be rather less favorable to the formation of brain diseases than the ordinary faiths held by European people; belief in a God and a soul always seemed to him, he said, very decided indications of predisposition to insanity, and so forth. Then there is the lady who translated Darwin into French, and who loves the law of Lycurgus—"Let the father without delay destroy the malformed infant;" she hates the way in which man wars against the law of selection, and out of foolish charity preserves alive the physically and morally incurable of his race; "it is all the work of old Bibles, of old women, and of those beasts of books called moral which soften the brain." We can hardly believe the bishop when he says, by implication, that persons of the power of brain above indicated are so common in France that they need be fought against very hard.

BROWNE'S SKETCH OF THE OFFICIAL LIFE OF JOHN A. ANDREW.*

Those who had occasion to visit Governor Andrew in his room in the State House will all remember the large, square table, heaped with papers and letters, at which he worked. Directly opposite, they will remember, sat his military secretary, Colonel Browne, the author of this interesting volume. They will remember the watchful interest with which this young man, without neglecting his own business, observed the movements of his chief—always prompt to aid and serve him, though usually very quietly and silently. No man had a better opportunity of witnessing the various activity in the official life of this great worker, and he has used his opportunity well. He is one of a family to various members of which Governor Andrew was warmly attached, whose sympathies and interests were always in those ideas and objects dear to his heart. In fact, it may as well be said at once that, though John A. Andrew was a wide liker, and one of the most genial of men, no one had stronger friendships for individuals or more loved certain intimate relations where he felt himself more at ease. He had his favorite retreats in certain households, where he made himself one of the family. Arriving once at one of these homes, we remember finding the family in one room, and Governor Andrew asleep on a sofa in another. He had escaped from his work into his friend's house, to take an hour's rest.

The volume before us, being devoted to the five years in which the great war-governor did his official work, can, of course, say little of the period in which his power was being trained and developed. Like Oliver Cromwell and some other distinguished practical men (Mohammed among the number), he was more than forty years old before he became conspicuous in public affairs. His friends knew his sagacity, intrepidity, and perfect loyalty to truth and duty, but not even his best friends knew the greatness of his force. His qualities were not dazzling; and so it was not seen that in him were combined all the faculties necessary for a chief. For, in fact, there seemed nothing he was not capable of directing. He had in his brain the happiest combination of all the executive requisites. There was the faculty for details which noticed and remembered everything with unfailing accuracy, the judgment which could seize at once the essential question and keep to it, the power of immediate prompt decision, and behind all the determination, reinforced by conscience and hardened into habit, which kept him steady to his work till it was wholly done. His mind was both discriminating and comprehensive. He saw both sides of every question, yet kept to the immediate practical issue. Then, too, there was no prejudice to blind, no vanity to mislead, no private aims to be gratified, no passions to weaken and betray.

It will be easily seen that a man might possess all this power and yet not find occasion to display it outside of the regular routine of duty. It must be confessed that it is not the great men who are most talked about, but the men who have the love of praise joined with brilliant talents. Great men are content to wait, before they do a great thing, until a great thing comes to be done. So that, very possibly, if it had not been for the civil war, the exceptional combination of power in Governor Andrew had never been known.

Impatient of pedantry, disliking all formalism, an intense realist, his thoroughly practical mind always kept in view the object. The majority seem almost immediately to forget what they are working for. His eye never let go the object to be attained, while examining all the means by which to attain it. The famous case of the "overcoats" illustrates this. Projecting his judgment forward, he saw that when the war broke out it would be sudden, that men would be wanted immediately, that it might be cold weather, that their health and consequent efficiency would depend on their being warmly clothed, that the overcoats would be the garment they would not be likely to have, and which would keep them warm. So he ordered the two thousand overcoats, amid the derision of that class of people who laugh at the propositions of the man who sees further than themselves, and then, when his foresight is justified, forget immediately that they ever laughed at all.

Colonel Browne says: "There was a furious snow-storm on January 5 1861, the day of his inauguration. Without waiting for it to abate, his first official act, immediately after the inaugural ceremonies, was to despatch a confidential messenger to the governors of New Hampshire and Maine, to acquaint them with his determination to prepare the active militia of Massachusetts for instant service, and to invite their co-operation. Then followed, week by week, in the face of ridicule from many sources and bitter opposition from many more, that series of military orders and those purchases of war material to which the whole country now looks back as evidences of unequalled foresight.* . . . Nothing disturbed his steady purpose. The people to-day know how the troops were warned for duty by general orders issued in January, but they do not yet know the extent of his efforts —how he urged that our militia should be summoned to garrison Washington at the time of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, in February; how a confidential understanding was established between him and General Scott, which served, perhaps, more than anything else to inspire the veteran commander with confidence that the country's cause was not hopeless; how, in consultation with General Scott, written memoranda for the direction of our troops on the march to Washington were drawn up, by which it was provided, in anticipation of obstruction of their route overland, that they should proceed by sea, and be disembarked, either under cover of the guns of Fort McHenry at Baltimore, or else at Annapolis; and how steamers were kept for weeks in readiness at his bidding to transport them to the Chesapeake" (pp. 28–30).

Here was a man who had all his life been engaged in civil pursuits, who was thought to be not only unmilitary, but opposed to military preparations; a friend of peace, and active member of a peace society; who yet was so wise, and so little governed by personal prejudice or whim, as to see that if you fought at all, it was best to fight in the most thorough manner. His whole mind, heart, and hand were on the side of philanthropy and humanity. But he escaped the shallowness of merely sentimental philanthropists by the absence of conceit and self-opinion, and by his making philanthropy something to be done, not something to be talked about. And so, let it be added, he was truly consistent all through. Long before there was any expectation of war in this country, we heard him make an address, by request, before a peace society in Boston. Declaring himself strongly and entirely convinced that war-making ought to come to an end, and would do so, he nevertheless added: "But, gentlemen, I ought to say that I am no non resistant. I never believed in that nonsense. There are times when it is more Christian to fight, even to the death, than not to fight. A noble peace, founded on a Christian basis, ought to be the object of every good man's aim. But, meantime, a war for freedom, justice, and human rights may often be a great deal better than a peace based merely on selfish mercantile calculations of profit and loss."

Colonel Browne's book is throughout full of facts and remarks which help us to form a good view of the remarkable man whom he describes. It is an invaluable contribution to the biography of Governor Andrew. Perhaps no other man was so near him continually during the war. But Governor Andrew was so full, rich, complex a character, that it will take a great many such delineations from different points of view to show us the entire man. His friendships were so wide and his sympathies so various that no single pen can properly describe him. He was intimate with men of the most opposite opinions, tastes, and habits. He once told us that there was hardly one prominent man in Massachusetts with whom he was not personally acquainted. His intimate friendships were with persons so various as Father Taylor, the Methodist; Father Finotti, the Roman Catholic; Dr. S. G. Howe, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mr. Frank Bird, Mr. Theophilus Chandler, Mrs. Rachel Howland, the Quaker preacher, and Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Blair, of Washington. He almost always went out to Silver Spring to see the Blairs when he was in Washington, and had a very high opinion of their sagacity. We heard him once say that "when old Mr. and Mrs. Blair sat quietly down on the opposite sides of their parlor fire at Silver Spring, and talked over any difficult public question, if they could not see into it, it was no use for any one else to try."

One example occurs to us of the power which Governor Andrew possessed of throwing his mind into any subject, and of thinking it through. In the midst of the war, being at church one Sunday morning, after the service we asked him a question which led him to speak of Harvard University. In answering the question, he went on to consider the whole subject of university education, and as we walked he developed a complete theory of the ends to be kept in view and the methods to be adopted by the college government. "If I were appointed president of the college," said he, "this is what I would do"—and then, for nearly an hour, as we walked round Boston Common, he explained his system and the way in which he would try to carry it out. Those who met us and saw his earnestness of manner no doubt thought that he was explaining some important matter connected with the war. This power of concentrating his mind upon any theme and holding himself to it constituted no small part of his force, and made him capable of filling almost any position with success.

As governor of Massachusetts it was his duty to look after those who may be regarded as the wards of the State—the children in the public schools, the paupers, the prisoners, the deaf and dumb, the insane, the blind. No governor before ever gave such attention to these in times of peace as Governor Andrew did in the midst of the awful war. Once, when he was visiting the reform school for boys at Westboro', having spent the morning in examining classes, dinner-hour came, and the company of visitors moved toward the dining-room. Governor Andrew was following, when he heard some shrill little voice calling his name. He looked around and saw no one; but still the little voice piped out "Governor Andrew! Governor Andrew!" At last it was found to come from a room high up above the hall, in which a little boy was confined for some offence. He had the boy brought down, heard his appeal and his petition to be allowed to join his companions, called back the officers, enquired into the case, requested the authorities to forgive the child and remit the rest of the sentence, and then, calling together again the rest of the boys, told the story of their companion to them, showing them how they might help such a boy to do right or make him go wrong. The governor lost his dinner; but that evening, as he related the story in full, it was easy to see that his generous heart had entered fully into the case of this poor lad and made it his own.

* One of the principal arguments used against him in the campaign preceding his first election was that he was unmilitary, opposed to war, and hostile to the militia!

One more reminiscence, and we must stop. Toward the close of his term there was a great outcry made against him because he refused to sign the warrant to execute Green, the Malden murderer. The crime was a brutal one, and the community cried for the man's blood. The governor would neither sign the warrant nor publish his reasons for not doing so. A storm of reproach and complaint arose; but nothing shook his solid mind. One day, at this time, walking in the country, we were overtaken by the governor in his carriage, who stopped and took us in. Being alone with him, we took the opportunity to ask his reasons for this course. "Well," said he, "people say I do not hang him because I am opposed to capital punishments. But since I have been governor I have signed two death-warrants, so that I need not sign another in order to show that I can hang a man." He then proceeded to explain, at length, that Green had not been tried, but had pleaded guilty, and had been sentenced on that plea; but that by the law of Massachusetts there were two degrees of murder, the first of which was punished by death, and the second by imprisonment for life. Now, in pleading guilty to murder, Green had not (in the opinion of the governor) been properly made to understand the difference between these two, and the governor did not believe that he meant to plead guilty to murder in the first degree. That question, he thought, ought to be tried, especially as, by the concurrent testimony of those who had known Green from childhood, the ministers of the town, the mayor, and the detective who had worked the case, he was a person of very imperfect intellect. Explaining all this at great length, and with all the reasons and facts fully given, the statement was so impressive that we said: "Governor, if this were published it would produce an entire change of opinion through the State in twenty-four hours in regard to your course." He answered: "Very likely. But I shall make no such statement. I could not do it without seeming to blame the courts, and I do not think it right to set the executive and judicial departments of the government even at apparent variance now. No; my back is broad enough to bear all the reproach, and I would rather have it fall on me than on the judges." His course on this occasion and in regard to the liquor law were the two bravest acts of his life, for on these occasions he alienated his own party and his friends. But he never seemed to mind it. He was no more afraid of his friends than of his enemies—the rarest courage in a public man.

It really seems, in considering his course, as if Wordsworth must have had a prophetic vision of John Albion Andrew when he wrote his poem of "The Happy Warrior." The whole of it is very applicable to him—perhaps most of all these lines, which, though they have been already so applied, may well be quoted again here:

> "Who, if he rise to station of command,
> Rises by open means; and there will stand
> On honorable terms, or else retire,
> And in himself possess his own desire.
> Whose powers shed round him in the common strife,
> Or mild concerns of ordinary life,
> A constant influence, a peculiar grace;
> But who, if he be called upon to face
> Some awful moment, to which Heaven has joined > Great issues, good or bad for human kind,
> Is happy as a lover; and attired
> With sudden brightness, like a man inspired;
> And through the heat of conflict keeps the law,
> In calmness made, and sees what he foresaw. . . .
> Whom neither shape of danger can dismay
> Nor thought of tender happiness betray,
> Who, not content that former worth stand fast,
> Looks forward, persevering to the last,
> From good to better, daily self-surpast."

FREDRIKA BREMER'S LIFE.

A BIOGRAPHY of Miss Bremer, written by her only surviving sister, an autobiography which covers but a few pages and extends only to her thirtieth year, when she had as yet hardly more than begun her literary work, a number of letters, most of which were addressed to the sister who publishes them, and some slight sketches in prose and verse, comprise the contents of this volume. Miss Bremer revealed herself so fully in her own writings that those who are familiar with them, as most novel-readers are, will probably find in this story of her life little that is absolutely new. Readers who may chance to hold the theory that the successful novelist, or, to make the statement a little wider, the successful artist in any department of art, relies more upon the facts of his observation and experience than upon his imagination—than upon his creative power engaged in performing the feat known as evolving from the consciousness—may find in it a plausible argument in favor of their views. There is hardly a detail of this unhappy childhood and wearisome youth which will not be familiar, and in a form which really differs but little from that in which it is here given, to people who remember "The Home," "The Neighbors," "The H—— Family," etc. The history of the real Fredrika seems a sort of plagiarism from Fredrika's novels. Her overgrown and much-experimented-with nose, and her childish verses, are hardly so much her own as they are Petrea's. Miss Hallevi Hansgrebel told, in "The Neighbors," the story of these benumbing evening conversations, from which all topics beyond those furnished by the occurrences of the day were rigidly excluded, better than it is told here. The book forms a sort of key to the novels. For the rest, it affords some quite pleasant reading—the biographical portion of it especially. Miss Bremer died in December, 1865, at the age of sixty-four years. Her sister Charlotte was, perhaps, a year or two her senior, and, until she undertook this work, had probably never written anything more ambitious than a friendly letter. The desire to be full and truthful in her account and the life-long habit of constraint are curiously at war in her writing. She is a bit of a critic, too, and feels the necessity of explaining and apologizing—and doing it, moreover, in a sort of covert way, that the reader may not be too certain that an apology is needed—for what she evidently considers some rather innovating vagaries of her sister's. It appears to her that Fredrika speculated too boldly on the woman question, especially after her return from America. Our own agitators in that direction would generally consider her quite too timid; but that she should have advocated giving to girls the same educational advantages as to boys, and leaving all employments, offices, and honors open to them on the same terms, strikes her sister with a wholesome suspicion. She has herself some faint doubts as to whether strict justice is always accorded to her sex, and probably shared in a measure in Fredrika's disapprobation of the Annunciation Day sermon from which she quotes; in which Bishop Wallin explained to his hearers that "what especially belonged to woman's mission was, that she ought humbly to step back when sudden angry passions vent themselves upon her; that there is no circumstance in life where a contrary conduct could be excused; that, in order to triumph, she ought carefully to watch her own temper and submit unconstrainedly to that of others; have respect for the opinions of others without any prepossession in favor of her own; and that even where her own opinion should in reality be the right one, she ought patiently to wait her time to make it valid."

Griselda's self might be excused for writhing a little under this too clerical admonition, especially as it proceeded to lay such unimportant faults as men occasionally commit to the account of their irreligious mothers and wives; but Fredrika's biographer hastens to clear her own skirts from any imputation of sharing further in her sister's views. "As a wife, a mother, an instructress—only there I saw woman in the place which God had assigned her," she says, and then she narrates how she endeavored to impress upon Fredrika's mind "the beautiful lines of Pope, which we learned by heart when we were children:

> "'Woman is born to dignify retreat,
> In shade to flourish, and unseen be great;
> Fearful of fame, unwilling to be known,
> Should seek but Heaven's applauses and her own.'"

Fredrika was incorrigible, however, and evidently remains in her sister's mind as an exception to general rules, who must be tolerated, and for love's sake excused, but not altogether approved.

This vein of sisterly criticism, which runs through the entire biography, never obtrusive, and in no way interfering with a hearty pride in and affection for the subject of it, and yet, it seems to us, always very clearly apparent, is not a little amusing. To us Fredrika Bremer has always appeared quite the model "true woman" in literature. As her novels recur to memory, we find them entirely free from moral blemishes, and innocent of any sentiments which could tend in the remotest manner to the subversion of social order. She did not, it is true, belong to that too-complaisant order of feminine writers, now somewhat less prevalent than formerly, and making their appearance most often in the religious magazines and journals, who hasten to concede even more than is demanded of them; who are ready to prove that it is basely unwomanly to desire much pay for much work, and in other gracefully submissive ways show their thorough appreciation of their natural inferiority to the male of their species; but she was, we fancy, at even a greater remove from those singularly constituted creatures who furnish the hopelessly unreadable and ejaculatory articles on woman's work and kindred topics of which Putnam's tells its subscribers it has already enough on hand to fill several numbers of the magazine. In her own province, which was the delineation of social and family life, she observed closely and artistically, and described with much humor and picturesque force. She was a clear though thoroughly feminine thinker, with exceeding purity and kindliness of heart, and a sort of innocent, gushing sentimentality which perhaps belonged to her as much in virtue of her Scandinavian birth as of her personality. It must have been with something of a pang that the hospitable New Yorkers and Bostonians who received her on her visit to this country found themselves embalmed in her "Homes of the New World," albeit the thing was done with the sweetest of spices and the finest of Swedish linen, although she found Lowell a "perfect Apollo," and Emerson the "only Alp" among the Transcendentalists, of the rest of whom, by the way, she said a very good thing—they seemed to her to spread themselves out and powder themselves to give the impression of snow on their summits, but failed to chill her with their coldness or awe her with their height.

This volume we praise as being agreeable reading, though we are bound to say that we think it does Miss Bremer but scanty and inadequate justice. Those who have read her own works and gained from them the impression of goodness and thorough womanliness which they can hardly fail to convey, may gain a certain satisfaction from it; but those who see her here for the first time see her at great disadvantage. Her letters are not at all remarkable; the prose sketches, some of which are here first printed, and others reprinted from obscure Swedish annuals, are not in her best vein, and the poems have no further claim to that title than the fact of having been written in verse. However, there are probably few readers who will take up the book except those who do so with a wish to renew an old and pleasant acquaintance with the subject of it.

PROBABLE SETTLEMENT OF THE DEAF-MUTE CONTROVERSY.*

THE most important meeting of instructors of the deaf and dumb ever occurring in this country has recently been held in the city of Washington, where seventeen principals, ex-principals, and vice-principals, representing fourteen of our twenty-three institutions, met and had a five days' conference. In these fourteen establishments are two thousand children and youth, or more than four-fifths of the entire number taught in all the United States schools for the deaf and dumb. Many subjects were ably discussed, but the topic in which the general public will take the greatest interest is that of articulation, or the teaching of mutes to speak with their mouths and to apprehend the meaning of oral utterance in others by watching the motions of the lips.

The old-time controversy of Heinicke and de l'Epée has, within a few years, been renewed in New England, one side contending that the system introduced into the country in 1817 by Dr. Gallaudet, founded on the sign methods of de l'Epée, was not calculated to produce the most beneficial results, and the other maintaining the contrary of this proposition. The opponents of the system of Dr. Gallaudet held at one stage of the controversy that all deaf-mutes, except those mentally incapable of being educated, could be taught successfully to articulate and read from the lips, and that the language of signs might be dispensed with. After much effort they succeeded in securing the incorporation of a school at Northampton, Mass., and the patronage of the Legislature of the State in behalf of it.

It is distinctly stated in the first report of the Clarke Institution that the school was established particularly for children "who lost their hearing at three years of age and upwards, after they had acquired some language which they retain," and for those who are "semi-deaf and can distinguish articulate sounds, but not readily enough to attend the common schools with profit;" and the report closes by saying: "Articulation is used as the means of instruction because we believe it the best method for our pupils. The institution is not, however, pledged to any unchangeable system, but only to that, whatever it may be, which experience shall prove to give the best results."

When this new school, which thus in its first report announces the broad and liberal principles just cited, was going into operation, the youngest son of Dr. Gallaudet, who has followed his father's profession, was in Europe making extended and critical examinations into the systems made use of in that quarter of the globe. The results of his investigations have since been given to the public, and exhibit in certain particulars a remarkable coincidence with the views of Mr. Hubbard, the president of the Clarke Institution. President Gallaudet maintains very decidedly that to the mass of deaf-mutes articulation is not attainable, and sustains the judgment of his father in making the system of de l'Epée the basis of all efforts to teach deaf-mutes. He, however, frankly admits that the class proposed to be taught at the Northampton school may succeed in articulation, but prefers to add instruction in this branch as a feature in the general system rather than to accept it as the basis of effort in separate schools. He closes his report by recommending "that instruction in artificial speech and lip-reading be entered upon at as early a day as possible; that all pupils be afforded opportunities of engaging in this until it plainly appears that success is unlikely to crown their efforts; that with those who evince facility in oral exercises, instruction shall be continued during their entire residence in the institution." The general adoption by our schools of this recommendation would secure to the deaf and dumb throughout the country all the advantages sought to be conferred by the founders of the Northampton school, and so settle at once a controversy which has divided the schools of Europe for a hundred years.

That the "National Conference of Principals of Institutions for the Deaf and Dumb" has undertaken to remove all just cause of complaint on the part of those who demand articulation for deaf-mutes will appear from the following resolutions, wherein due respect is paid to the history of the work of Dr. Gallaudet and his successors, while at the same time a frank, full, and ready recognition is accorded to the modified claims of the Massachusetts reformers, as put forth in paragraphs which we shall by-and-by quote from Mr. Hubbard's report. The principals say:

"Resolved, That the American system of deaf-mute education, as practised and developed in the institutions of this country for the last fifty years, commends itself by the best of all tests—that of prolonged, careful, and successful experiment—as in a pre-eminent degree adapted to relieve the peculiar misfortune of deaf-mutes, as a class, and restore them to the blessings of society."

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this conference, it is the duty of all institutions for the education of the deaf and dumb to provide adequate means for imparting instruction in articulation and lip-reading to such of their pupils as may be able to engage with profit in the exercises of this nature."

"Resolved, That while in our judgment it is desirable to give semi-mutes and semi-deaf children every facility for retaining and improving any power of articulate speech they may possess, it is not profitable except in promising cases discovered after fair experiment to carry congenital mutes through a course of instruction in articulation."

"Resolved, That to attain success in this department of instruction an added force of instructors will be necessary, and this conference hereby recommends to boards of directors of institutions for the deaf and dumb that speedy measures be taken to provide the funds needed for the prosecution of this work."

The first and third of these resolutions were offered by the Rev. Collins Stone, the principal of the American Asylum at Hartford, well understood to be the most conservative man in the conference, while the second and fourth were moved by President Edward M. Gallaudet, of the National Deaf-mute College at Washington, who bears the reputation of being one of the most progressive members of the profession.

That the resolutions, all but unanimously accepted, recommend the adoption of all that is offered deaf-mutes by the managers of the institution at Northampton, gives evidence of a pervading spirit of progress that cannot be too warmly commended; and how entirely the third resolution accords with the proposed work of the Northampton instructors will appear from the following passage in President Hubbard's report:

"There are various classes of deaf-mutes who can be taught articulation These are—

"'A. Those who lost their hearing at three years of age and upwards after they had acquired some language which they retain.

"'B. Those congenitally deaf, who have good mental ability, and a capacity for learning to speak.

"'C. Those who are semi-deaf and can distinguish articulate sounds, but not readily enough to attend the common schools with profit.'"

And how fully the limitations of the resolution are sustained by the advocates of articulation is seen in the following quotation from the same document:

"There are various classes of deaf-mutes who cannot be taught articulation, These are—

"'1. Those whose mental powers are feeble by nature or disease, and who are idiots rather than mutes.

"'2. Those whose organs of speech are imperfect, some of whom are not deaf,

* "Report of President Gallaudet, of the Columbia Institution, on European Systems of Deaf-mute Instruction. Washington, D. C. 1868."
"Annual Report of the Clarke Institution for Deaf-mutes at Northampton, Mass., Boston. 1868."
"Report of the Joint Special Committee of the Legislature of Massachusetts on the Education of Deaf-mutes. May, 1867." Boston.
"On the Desirability of National Education for the Deaf and Dumb Poor. By James Hawkins, of the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb. Old Kent Road, London." London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1866.

"'3. Those who have sufficient ability, but who can be no more taught articulation than many hearing persons can be taught singing. In the first and third classes the organs of speech are perfect, but the pupils do not possess the power or ability to use them correctly. How large a proportion of deaf-mutes in our country belong to these classes is not known.'"

And here it must be noted that the great mass of teachers of deaf-mutes on both sides of the Atlantic, and of all shades of opinion, are agreed that a large proportion of the deaf and dumb cannot be taught articulation with success. The terms, therefore, of the first resolution of the conference, that for "deaf-mutes, as a class, the American system, as developed during the past fifty years, is in a pre-eminent degree adapted to restore them to the blessings of society," would seem to be warranted by the facts in the case. As Mr. Hubbard, in effect, says, the articulation method must be limited to the few, and its introduction into the American system will result not in supplanting but in supplementing other methods, by the addition of an accomplishment of great value in those cases where it can be successfully acquired.

It is worth while, in conclusion, to say a word of a brief pamphlet by Mr. James Hawkins. The writer, an Englishman, who is known as the author of a work on "The Physical, Moral, and Intellectual Constitution of the Deaf and Dumb," desires to press on the attention of the reformers who are urging the claims to education of the English generally, the peculiar claims of a class peculiarly in need of instruction. No educational scheme, he maintains, deserves the name of national, or the name of Christian, unless it makes provision for the twenty-two thousand deaf and dumb persons now within the limits of the United Kingdom. At present the machinery for educating such persons is very limited and very inadequate. It rests on precarious foundations; the benevolence of private individuals is its chief support, and it is capable of benefiting but one-fourteenth of the aggregate number of men, women, and children who need it. Our own country, Mr. Hawkins says, France, Austria, Russia, Prussia, and Belgium, are all in advance of England as regards legislation on this matter. It is to be sincerely hoped that his appeal will do something to prevent his clients from being forgotten in the approaching reorganization of English schools.

The Voyage Alone in the Yawl "Rob Roy." From London to Paris, and back by Havre, the Isle of Wight, South Coast, etc. By John Macgregor, M.A. Second edition. (London: Sampson Low, Son & Marston. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1868.)—The third volume of what bids fair to be the Rob Roy library, should the author's days be prolonged, as we hope they may be. The nautical incidents of the voyage are not so numerous as those of either canoe voyage that preceded it, so that there is occasion for more than the usual amount of moralizing to eke out the chapters. However, the statistics which accompany it, and relate to the English reform schoolships, are valuable, and are brought together here for the first time. When Mr. Macgregor comes again to America he will be interested to visit the Massachusetts school-ship in Boston harbor, and compare our imitation with the example of the mother country. A good deal of information not often met with is contained in the description of the passage of the Seine; while so much of the Exposition as was aquatic—including, of course, the international regattas—is represented in greater or less detail. At Dover the author met for the first time one of the lady members of the canoe club, paddling her own craft in sea water. The boys who get hold of this book will do well if, along with the spirit of adventure, they acquire also some of the ingenuity which the forethought and experience of our navigator turned not only to his own advantage, but, it would seem, to that of all seafarers, and permanently.

The Merchants' and Bankers' Almanac for 1868. (New York.)—The lists of banks and bankers which make up so large a part of this annual are of value chiefly to business men. Other statistics to be found in it have a less exclusive interest for them, and will afford whoever consults them a good deal of light on the progress of the country. Such are the tabular returns of our aggregate grain crops in 1863–66, and the same in detail for 1866; the statement of the public debt of each county in New York; the progress of railroads in each and all of the United States, 1835–1864; the monthly prices of various metals and of anthracite coal for the forty years, 1825–64; of coffee, pork, corn, cotton, wool, rye, oats, etc., etc. (eleven staples in all), for 1825–67. These and similar tables are of recognized importance in studying the history of the period which they cover, and if not properly literature in themselves, may become the foundation of one of the highest branches of literature.

Recent Republications.—Sir Samuel Baker's eminently readable account of his adventures in the Soudan* is republished by Messrs. Case & Co., of Hartford, in a style comparing very favorably with the English edition in all except the engravings and the sensational changes in the title-page. We believe that this firm commonly sells through agents, and we can but congratulate them on having chosen, in this instance, a work which, unlike the costly rubbish that usually disfigures the farmer's shelves, will be both an ornament and a source of pure instruction and amusement; in other words, a piece of first-class literature in its way. The more widely this is sold the better.

This volume† contains not only all of Mr. Saxe's old poems, but some thirty, we do not know which ones, that are new. It is hardly necessary to say much of Mr. Saxe's work. He is funny, and other people beside young men in college appreciate his fun, for some of his volumes have gone through thirty-odd editions; he is good-natured always; he is never guilty of impurity; he is sometimes witty; it is not very often that he attempts sentiment. It is not a thing to be regretted on moral, nor indeed on intellectual, grounds that he has been, and is, a favorite American author.

Messrs. Appleton continue their Globe Edition of standard authors, begun by Cary's "Dante," with Scott's poems,‡ apparently printed from less-used plates than was that work; at all events, perfectly clear in the text, and showing marks of wear only in the engravings, which of course does not matter. It is, as we have said, a very handy edition, and sufficiently well bound for most libraries. The same house are grouping the heretofore separate stories of their cheap "Plum-pudding edition" of Dickens in stout volumes whose rather elegant cloth binding sadly disappoints the expectation with which one opens to the typography.

CARMINA COLLEGENSIA.

A Complete Collection of the Songs of the American Colleges, with Piano-forte Accompaniments; to which is added a Compendium of College History, collected and edited by H. R. Waite.

This is the most extensive collection of Student Songs presented to the public. Every college in the United States having been solicited to contribute to its pages, nearly a thousand songs were received, from which great care was taken to select those most valuable in reference to quality, permanency, and general interest; only such being used as possessed intrinsic merit, or cast light upon some peculiar college custom.

The Week.

CONGRESS has admitted the Carolinas, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Louisiana, and the bill awaits the President's signature. On the day of final debate in the Senate, Mr. Edmunds and Mr. Trumbull actively opposed the inclusion of Alabama; but on the final vote the presence of its name among the others was not held to be a reason, as it well might have been, for a Republican's refusing to vote in the affirmative. The House passed the bill without much discussion, except Florida's case—Mr. Farnsworth believing the constitution of that State unrepublican, because it vests the appointment of many officials in the governor instead of in the people at large. No changes of great importance were made in any of the constitutions; Georgia, however, was prevented from dealing out one measure to debtors of loyal creditors, and another to debtors who had got money from creditors who have been disloyal. The other of the two chief events of the Congressional week was the action taken by the House on the new Tax Bill. The Committee of Ways and Means was ordered to take it back and report special bills in relation to the tax on whiskey and tobacco. The debate was very warm. It was led by Mr. Butler on the part of the opposition to the committee. Between the public services of Mr. Schenck, the chairman of the committee, and those of Mr. Butler, a comparison not very pleasing to the latter has recently been making the rounds of the press. The Opposition declared that the Republican party must do something decisive about whiskey frauds or it would be beaten in the fall elections; that, in order to do something, the main bill must be dropped and special bills brought forward. The committee, on the other hand, urged that it would take no longer to pass the bill than to prepare the new ones desired. It would, however, take longer, we suppose. The time which ought to have been given to the work that Mr. Schenck has been laboring at for some months is now past crying for; it was occupied by a variety of business of vastly less consequence. We confess we should have had a little more patience if it had not been Mr. Butler, to whose exertions we owe so great a part of the loss, who came forward to insist on the folly of delay. The committee was defeated by a majority of eleven.

Mr. Schenck's Tax Bill has been defeated and recommitted in spite of all his efforts and that of the best portion of the Republican members. The vote of last week, on Mr. Butler's first attempt to shelve it, seemed to assure its passage, but since then the War-Horse element in the House seems to have been strongly reinforced, and, snuffing the battle afar off, refuses to be kept any longer in Washington. Accordingly, Mr. Shanks, of Indiana, moved on Monday the substitution of two short bills dealing simply with tobacco and distilled spirits, and carried his motion by 74 to 63. Mr. Schenck made, though he had some difficulty in getting a hearing, an able and earnest protest, showing that the House had already got through the heaviest portion of the work—that the provisions of the bill still remaining to be discussed were comparatively unimportant—and that any short bills dealing specially with whiskey and tobacco would not contain the administrative changes made in the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means—a bill which is the result of five months' labor—and would, therefore, be inoperative or make confusion worse confounded; but it was all in vain. Mr. Butler assailed him with jokes and buncombe, and, with the assistance of the Democrats, vanquished him. "We are here," said Mr. Butler, "when we ought to be in the midst of a campaign in order to save this country to the men who have fought for it for the last eight years. And yet we are kept here doing what? We are kept here modifying taxes." The question naturally suggests itself to the reader, What will Mr. Butler and his friends do when they get away from there? what will the country gain by releasing them from the ignoble duty of "modifying taxes?" Simply an extra supply of Mr. Butler's oratory through the valleys and over the plains of the North on the subject of General Grant's merits as a candidate, and the sanctity of the public debt. Mr. Butler's objection that the House ought not to be expected to pass in seven days a bill which the Committee of Ways and Means has spent five months in preparing, and the custom which makes it necessary for the Finance Committee of the Senate to discuss the bill just as elaborately as the Committee of the House, we have considered elsewhere. We shall never have a decent system of taxation as long as every member of both Houses feels himself responsible for it and will take nothing on trust. One might almost as well try to acquire a good education by going to the original sources of knowledge on all subjects.

The Senate performed a most graceful act, and one which does much to clear away the smoke of the recent conflict, in unanimously, and without the usual reference to a committee, confirming Mr. Reverdy Johnson's appointment as Minister to England. There is no man in the country better fitted, both as regards character, intellect, and acquirements, and social standing, to discharge the duties of the post. There are but few men as well fitted to deal with the questions still in dispute between the two governments. Neither the national reputation nor the national interests will suffer in his hands. Moreover, we are very glad that the Republican majority has seized this opportunity of showing that it can appreciate the virtues of an honorable antagonist, and that its bitterness, if it feels any bitterness, is roused by factiousness and not by fair and manly opposition. If the Democratic party had had the good luck to be represented by many men in either House or Senate who understood the duties of constitutional opposition as Mr. Reverdy Johnson understands them, and had performed them as he has performed them, it would not be to-day in its present low condition. He has always stopped short at the line where party becomes faction; and if the cranky, croaking orators who serve the Democrats in both Houses by their essays on negro physiology, and their buncombe jokes and caricatures, had only copied him—of comprehending him we are sure they are not capable—they would not only have hastened the close of the present crisis, but have confounded, instead of rejoicing, the enemies of human nature.

The Civil Service Bill, of course, goes over till next session. We had little hope, however, of anything being done at it this summer. Mr. Butler has played his cards too well for the House to have much time for any useful legislation. What gives a touch of the comic to the otherwise serious situation in which we find ourselves, is that the Tax Bill and Civil Service Bill are thrown aside in order to enable some scores of gentlemen to disperse themselves over the land to pour public abuse on Andrew Johnson for the corruption and frauds in the collection of the revenue. The Civil Service Bill, however, makes way in public estimation. The prominent party journals begin to see the absurdity of roaring about corruption as long as a bill of this kind lies unpassed, and are beginning to urge it faintly on Congress. A quarter of the space and enthusiasm that were spent in denouncing the seven senators and hunting Wooley down, would certainly pass it, and we are still in hopes that the sense of humor of which the party organs are not wholly devoid, will at least drive them into advocating it vigorously. Any further bare denunciation of corruption we advise them to withhold till after the Democratic Convention. If we are not greatly mistaken, there will be a plank in the Democratic platform on that subject which will make the hair of all defaulters, embezzlers, and other cheats and swindlers in the public service stand on end, and will furnish a model and a text to writers of editorials for the next three months.

Apparently the "Chase movement" has received its quietus, and the Chief-Justice will prove to be not very strong in the Fourth of July Convention. Whether it is that the tone of his "letter to a personal friend" did not quite please the Democratic leaders, we do not hear it said. Not impossibly that is so; the real leaders of the Democracy have never been pleased with candidates who were not biddable, well-trained, and did not appear undesirous of followers. The doctrine laid down in the letter may have offended them; it certainly was not theirs. But we doubt the adequacy of these causes. In a bargain so corrupt as the bargain proposed would have been, we are not forced to believe that either of the contracting parties would have stood long on words. One was to have the Presidency; the other was by help of his candidature to float the Democratic nominees for Congress into the House in force sufficient to control appropriations. It is of little importance what is said in "letters to personal friends," and in platforms, when the thing to be done is plainly understood and willingly assented to. The real reason for the apparent coolness of the Democracy—and it may be only apparent, and there is time for it to change into warmth again—we take to be this, that the Peace men of the Democracy, who have always hated the class of politicians to which Mr. Chase has belonged, have been encouraged into asserting their will by the recent Republican defeat in Oregon. Whatever the cause may be, the World, which has been the strongest supporter Mr. Chase has had—for it expresses the opinions of leaders here in New York who have no great love for Democrats of the Vallandigham and La Crosse stripe—has now given him up, seriously as we suppose, and not for strategic purposes. Mr. Chase's loss is of course not Hancock's gain. Doubtless it is to some extent a gain for Pendleton, who represents the opposing influences. But at last Johnson appears as a possible candidate for the nomination. It is said that General J. B. Steedman has brought up a delegation from Louisiana which intends to cast its vote for Mr. Johnson, and that other Southern delegations will do likewise. For him, however, we suppose there is no chance, though we doubt if he would be appreciably easier to beat than Pendleton.

Mr. Rollins, in resigning his office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, said that he did so because "the revenue laws, even in the most important localities, are badly administered by officers either dishonest or incompetent, appointed without my approval, and whose removal I see no hope of securing." Further, he says that many of the disgraceful officials were put into the places of good men whom Mr. Johnson turned out immediately after the famous Philadelphia Convention. So he charges the President with the responsibility of keeping bad men in office, to the great injury of the country. It is not necessary that we should say anything to our readers in regard to Mr. Rollins's character for veracity. Mr. McCulloch seems to impugn it, in the endorsement on Mr. Rollins's letter; but the issue between them is not a direct one. Mr. Rollins would no doubt agree with Mr. McCulloch that the "antagonism between the executive and legislature" had something to do with disordering the revenue service, as every other branch of the public service. And he has already stated his belief that the high tax on whiskey is another cause of the disorder. However, the Secretary declines to receive and put on file the letter of his late subordinate, who in turn insists that he shall, or disprove specifically what is said in it. This Mr. McCulloch will not be able to do, and it is just as well that grumbling Republicans should remember this when making up Mr. Johnson's account with Congress.

The Chicago Tribune thinks it cowardly in a portion of the Radical press to follow up Mr. Ross with charges against his character after they have ceased casting aspersions on Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Fessenden, and insinuates that as the proof against Mr. Ross is not one whit stronger than the proof against the others, the reason why he is thus distinguished is that he is younger and less known than the others, and may therefore be attacked with greater safety. The Tribune might have put forward its hypothesis with even greater confidence. Trumbull and Fessenden are undoubtedly large and dangerous game, and the party bravoes have in the highest degree that base love of torturing the weak and helpless which amongst animals is, strange to say, only found in cats and men. They delight in an antagonist who cannot defend himself, and enjoy nothing so highly as in picking out any tender spots he may have in his conformation, and sticking their quills into them. But they avoid meeting their match with truly Indian astuteness. We notice that some of the tribe are quite shocked because some Massachusetts Republicans propose to give Mr. Fessenden a dinner on his return from Washington, in order to show him, we presume, that his assailants do not represent the American people, and that there are plenty of good men and true to whom the right of private judgment is still sacred, and in whose eyes the character of public men is still a valuable public possession. But the critics "hope the thing will go no further," on the ground that impeachment ought to be "buried out of sight." The attacks on the seven senators are, however, something apart from impeachment. They raise a question which the verdict does not settle, and which will never be settled as long as there are political parties who keep moral bullies in their pay, and there are honored names for these bullies to besmirch, and honorable and useful careers for them to break up.

We are sorry to find that the unfavorable opinion we have long entertained of the qualifications of the Honorable Richard Busteed for the office of Federal judge at the South, or, in fact, in any portion of the country, seems to be confirmed by events. A petition is now before Congress from Henry C. Semple, accusing him of "ignorance" of law and "arbitrary and tyrannical conduct," of "corruption," and of soliciting suitors to bring their causes before him and conferring with them and their counsel as to the disposition to be made of the causes. Mr. Semple's specifications would be painful reading if we were not all getting hardened to this sort of thing. He calls General Swayne, Governor Smith, and thirty other prominent citizens of all parties in Alabama as witnesses to the truth of his allegations.

The report of the Commissioners appointed in England in consequence of the disputes arising out of the conduct of the British Government and the decisions of the British courts, during the late war, to examine and suggest amendments to the neutrality laws, has been published. The recommendations of the Commission are plainly suggested throughout by American demands in the cases of the Alabama and Alexandra. They propose to make "fitting out, arming, despatching, or causing to be despatched, with intent or knowledge," etc., a misdemeanor, which would have covered the Alexandra case; and to empower the Secretary of State or governor of a colony to seize any ship which he has "probable and reasonable cause for believing," etc., which would have covered the Alexandra, Alabama, and the Laird ironclads; and to make any prize captured by a belligerent cruiser, fitted out in England in violation of the law, liable to be seized and restored to the owner, if brought into a British port, and to exclude all such cruisers themselves from all British ports during the continuance of hostilities. These changes in the law were all urged on the attention of the English Government during the war, but they were treated as preposterous by Lord Palmerston.

The exact nature of the quarrel between the Archbishop of Algiers and Marshal MacMahon, of which we spoke last week, seems to be involved in some mystery. If the statement which each of the disputants makes of his own position be true, there is undoubtedly a difference between them, but not one that would seem to call for an appeal to the Emperor. The marshal writes to the papers to deny that he ever threatened to close the orphan asylums for Arab children founded by the archbishop; that what he said was that if the "families" of such children came forward to claim them they would have to be surrendered to them; and that if there was any dispute about the matter, the law courts, and not he, must decide it. The archbishop, on the other hand, reiterates his assertion that he asks for nothing but that liberty of evangelization which the Church has claimed in all ages, and which she has always enjoyed. Whatever be the nature of the trouble, however, the archbishop goes back to his diocese, and will probably take some extra pains not to excite the apprehensions of the military authorities in making converts. The Emperor, it is said, stands by the marshal. The Minister of War has formally approved of his course.

The movement of the French bishops against "materialistic" teaching in the Paris colleges has come to a disastrous conclusion in the Senate. They addressed a petition to that body, the cardinals strongly supporting it, in which they made sweeping charges of atheism against divers professors, and asked for the right of clerical interference with the higher education under the name of "free superior instruction." The movement was no doubt stimulated by the favor which the extreme clerical party meets with at court of late, a favor so strong as to lead many people to fear that the Emperor is going to treat the world to as edifying a spectacle of devotion in old age as Louis XIV. in the days of Madame de Maintenon; but they appear to have been a little too confident. They have a majority of the Senate on their side, but the orders from the ministry were positive, so the demand for "free superior instruction" was rejected by 84 to 31, and the allegations of the petition pronounced untrue in fact by 80 to 31.

The attempt has had for the clerical party the unfortunate effect of drawing out from the students a fresh display of the deep-seated hostility of the educated youth of France to the party and its pretensions. This is perhaps putting the matter too mildly, for we fear we ought to say their deep-seated hostility to religion in all forms. The students went in large bodies to the Luxembourg, in which the Senate sits, and rent the air during the debates with the shouts of "Down with the clericals!" hissing the cardinals as they entered the building. The police intervened; there was a riot, some of the students being badly wounded. Two days after, when one of the professors assailed by the petition appeared in his lecture-room, he was met with a burst of applause, which continued so long that he had to make a strong appeal to the class for silence and attention before he could begin his lecture. Another species of demonstration to which the young men are resorting is calling on M. Sainte-Beuve, who has been in the Senate the energetic champion of freedom of thought. On one day he made as many of the students as could find entrance to his rooms a short speech, exhorting them to industry and perseverance and good order. It seems as if, however, the clergy paid very little attention to the signs of the times, for the Archbishop of Paris has ordered the priests of his diocese not to give certificates of confession to young girls who attend the "professional schools" for women founded by the late Madame Lemonnier, an excellent woman who did wonders for the cause of female education. The Avenir National suggests significantly that this is simply placing before young women and their parents the alternative of staying away from confession or giving up a good education, and that a great many families may be led to decide in favor of the schools.

The Italian ministry have achieved a great triumph, and, as far as we can judge, have saved Italian credit, in the passage of three bills, one for a stamp duty, one for a tax on government concessions, and the multure tax (on all corn ground at the mill), of which we have spoken before, being the most important of all. Count Cambray-Digny has, after weeks of great anxiety and prolonged debates, carried them all three by large majorities. The result is an extraordinary rise in the Italian funds, both at Florence and on the Paris Bourse. The excitement at Florence during the last day of the debates was so intense that conflicting rumors as to the probable result sent the Five per cents up and down 7 per cent. Thes securities, when Cambray-Digny took office, were selling at 32; they now stand at 57; a result of which he may well be proud. It is said that the best friends of Italy have not been so hopeful since Cavour's death as they are at this moment.

From England there is little new beyond the decision of Mr. Disraeli as a last resource to dissolve Parliament. The election, it is supposed, will take place in October. Ex-Governor Eyre, emboldened by his last success in the courts, and no doubt instigated by the class of "friends" who gave him the banquet at Southampton, proposes, it is said, to contest Westminster with Mr. John Stuart Mill. A grosser offence against decency it would be difficult for a man in his position to commit; but it is a capital illustration of the cool impudence of the aristocratic temperament when thoroughly roused. We have little doubt the working-men who elected Mr. Mill will give Mr. Eyre a lesson in the proprieties which will prevent his committing any similar offence. There is something almost confusing in the talk one reads in the Tory papers of the "cruelty" of the Jamaica Committee in "persecuting" Mr. Eyre by dragging him before the law courts, considering what happened to Gordon, and considering what was the nature of the transactions for which it is sought to bring the ex-governor to trial. Are moral distinctions altogether arbitrary? one cannot help asking when one hears Mr. Eyre spoken of as a martyr, and his excesses as "errors of judgment."

The German Customs Parliament has closed its session, and the members, before leaving for their homes, were feasted most sumptuously by the King and by the commercial men of Berlin. The proceedings at the banquet given by the latter, Bismark being present, were very enthusiastic, and the speeches and applause both showed that the Parliament has really done much, and will do more, to draw North and South Germany together. Bismark was received with tumultuous enthusiasm as "the man for Germany," and when the cigars and coffee came he mingled in amiable converse with many of the fiercest of his old democratic foes. The entertainment was very costly, and one most remarkable feature about it was that of the 145 hosts who gave it 90 were Jews—a striking illustration of the rapidity with which men of this persuasion are winning the foremost places in nearly all the great capitals of the world.

THE FINANCIAL MUDDLE.

The resignation of Mr. Rollins, a faithful and valuable officer, to whom we owe it that the revenue service has not been worse—which, to anybody who knows anything of the facts, will seem to be, what we intend it to be, very high praise—puts the anomalous condition of the financial department of the Government before us in a very strong light. The two departments which have the largest burden of responsibility resting upon them are the State Department and the Treasury. Now, well-established and reasonable usage has made the Secretary of State a real minister of foreign affairs, to whom the country looks for the proper transaction of them and on whose head falls the blame in case of miscarriage. He is, of course, somewhat dependent on the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs, both as regards the selection of diplomatic agents and the negotiation of treaties; but we doubt very much whether a similar officer in any other state enjoys practically as much independence. The President—this is certainly true of the three last Presidents—knows little and cares less about our relations with other countries, except when some question likely to affect elections, such as an "outrage" or "dungeon" trouble, comes up. The opening and conduct of negotiations and of diplomatic correspondence is generally left to the Secretary, and he discharges the duty with little help or hindrance, and when it is done submits it to the public for its verdict. The House rarely troubles itself about foreign affairs except for purposes of buncombe, and the senators are generally men of too much judgment and self-restraint to meddle except in case of real necessity. The consequence is, that the State Department is perhaps the most tempting post in the Government to a man of ambition and ability, who seeks a world-wide reputation or desires to appear in a field in which the politicians and jurists of all civilized countries will pass judgment on his labors.

But in the position in which the country is now placed, and is likely to remain, the finances are really a far more important matter than everything else put together. There is nothing but depends on the management of them, not less the prosperity than the fair fame of the country—if indeed anything can be called prosperity from which fair fame is absent. As Burke says of it: "The revenue of the state is the state. In effect, all depends on it, whether for support or reformation. As all the great qualities of the mind which operate in public, and are not merely suffering and passive, require force for their display—I had almost said for their unequivocal existence—the revenue, which is the spring of all power, becomes in its administration the sphere of every active virtue." If, in fact, there is any department in the Government which more than another should be made tempting to the very best men, and to which the very best men should be assigned, and in which responsibility should be concentrated in one person, so that public criticism may tell upon him, and so that the people may know to whom to look when their substance is wasted or their credit tarnished by bad management, it is the Treasury Department. Yet there is not one in which the Secretary counts for less. In fact, we have one of the largest debts and largest revenues in the world, and we may be said to have no Minister of Finance. Our Treasury Department is very much in the condition in which the military affairs of the French Republic were when, at the outbreak of the Revolutionary war, every general in the field had two or three civil commissioners by his side to superintend his operations and keep him in mind of his responsibility to the people.

Mr. McCulloch may have a well-digested policy, and may lay it before the country in his report. The Special Commissioner of Revenue may reach most important conclusions on questions of taxation, as the result of an elaborate investigation, and may submit them in like manner to the popular judgment. But their opinions cannot be embodied in legislation until they have undergone the scrutiny of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House. The chairman of this committee, who is, of course, the most influential member of it, and often is the only one who really works at the subject, is often selected by the Speaker with little reference to his financial experience or ability. The Speaker himself is not apt to be a man who is interested in such questions. Amongst the qualities which procure him his election to the chair an enthusiasm on the subject of taxation is rarely found, and in appointing the committees he is guided largely by considerations of party or locality. So that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who is really the nearest approach to a responsible finance minister we have, sometimes finds himself put into his place without having ever troubled his head about taxation in his life. He consequently may, and often does, not go to work as an expert, or as the representative of certain financial ideas, of a certain financial policy. He may carry the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury or of the Special Commissioner of Revenue with him into the committee-room, or he may not. He may be on the worst possible terms with both of them, and think he knows more than either of them, and consequently may make a point of paying no attention to their recommendations. Or supposing him to be all he ought to be, supposing him to have the requisite union of theory with practical experience—which, as he is not connected with the actual administration of the government, he is not likely to have—there may be nobody else on the committee competent to enter into his ideas, or nobody whose head is not filled with fallacies, and he may, after working ever so hard, be obliged to carry into the House a measure which is only one-tenth part his own.

The House on its side is naturally, though perhaps unconsciously, affected by its knowledge of the chairman's position. It does not regard the tax bill as his, or treat it with the respect due to the carefully considered and matured scheme, complete in all its parts, of a man who is really familiar with his subject, whose voice ought to be listened to as the voice of authority, and whose recommendations are not to be lightly disregarded. A large number of members act under a secret feeling that they could draw as good a bill themselves if they got a chance, and accordingly have no scruple whatever in moving its indefinite postponement—as Mr. Butler did in the case of Mr. Schenck's bill during the past week—or blazing away at any item of it which conflicts with some private prejudice of their own, or has a look of hostility to some little local interest of their constituents. There is a case within our knowledge in which an important appropriation bill was, during the war, withdrawn when nearly passed, on the urgent solicitation of a gentleman high in office, its failure proving the cause of enormous expense to the Government afterwards, and he confessed that his sole objection to it was that it would have legislated out of a small office a young man "in whom he was much interested." Accordingly, a tax bill rarely passes in anything even nearly resembling the state in which it left the committee-room; still more rarely is it based on the recommendations made by the Treasury Department. Sometimes the chairman of the committee is not on good terms with the Secretary, or looks on him as a public enemy whom it is a high moral duty to abase and bring to naught. The consequence is that, when the tax bill is passed—or when it is not passed, or passed in shreds—and Congress adjourns leaving the Treasury plunged in difficulties and the country struggling with the burden of uncured abuses, and the public and the press begin to ask who is to blame, it is found to be just as difficult to fix upon the real offender as to fix upon the exact thimble which covers the pea.

The state of affairs at this moment is a good illustration of the truth of what we have been saying. Mr. McCulloch is nominally minister of finance, but he is in the worst possible odor with the majority of the House, some of whom consider him a genuine son of Belial. What his relations are with Mr. Schenck, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, we cannot say; but, be they good or bad, Mr. Schenck has views of his own which are not Mr. McCulloch's. Now, Mr. Schenck was put in the chairmanship of the committee not because of his financial knowledge or experience, but because it was felt to be "due," in a party sense, to the Western inflationists or anti-contractionists. We mention this not for the purpose of finding fault with Mr. Schenck or casting any slur upon him. On the contrary, we desire to bear our testimony to the zeal and ability and good sense he has shown and is showing, in the production of the tax bill and its carriage through the House. But his bill, be it good or bad, is not Mr.

McCulloch's bill, and for aught we can tell it is not what Mr. Schenck himself would have liked it to be. Before it was debated at all, Mr. McCulloch could have repudiated all responsibility for it. Mr. Schenck might have said, too, that it was simply the best bill he could get the committee to agree to; and by the time it has got through the House and Senate, and been amended and reamended, the committee will doubtless be able to say, and say truly, that it is not their work either. Suppose it is found by this time next year to work very badly—to be, in fact, a piece of patchwork full of oversights and omissions—the only remedy the public will have will be to throw the blame on the House. This might be effective if there were more fixity about the composition of the House. But by following up the principle of "rotation in office," that is, of throwing members overboard as soon as they have learnt their work, constituencies deprive themselves of all check on their representatives. The worst they can do is not to renominate a member; but when he knows they will not renominate him in any case, his strongest motive to diligence, thoughtfulness, and study is gone. Mr. Garfield, for instance, who is a most valuable member of the House, for financial reasons, finds his seat in peril at this moment; the same thing is said of Mr. Schenck, who would also be a very great loss. "Rotation in office" is, in fact, a most ingenious scheme for keeping down the average capacity of the legislature to the lowest point possible in the existing state of the national civilization. So that it may truly be said that for the amount and distribution of the taxes there is nobody responsible but the party at large; but the responsibility of a whole party for the details of a financial policy is, of course, a mere name.

But the collection of the taxes is even more important than the voting of them, and here the responsibility is also divided. For the character of the persons employed in the revenue service the President is a little responsible, the Secretary is a little responsible, and the Senate is a little responsible. The result is that the taxes are, according to Mr. Wells, only half collected. Who is to blame? Nobody. Some of the great thieves are undoubtedly Johnson men; but others are Wade men and Grant men. It is positively asserted that, although the Tenure-of-Office Act was passed in order to give the Senate more immediate control of the civil service, and though the civil service is in the lowest condition of demoralization, no officer has been removed under it. Mr. Johnson has never removed a Democrat, and the Senate has never concurred in the removal of a Republican. In the meantime the unhappy taxpayer bleeds at every pore. Mr. Schenck, when he proposed to fill up the gap made by the abolition of taxes last year by increasing the returns from the tax on whiskey, and, in order to make sure, proposed to make some one person responsible for the conduct of the officials in the revenue service, and that person the officer at the head of the department, seized the key of the position. His case was plain as the shining sun: without concentrated responsibility in the head, no efficiency in the subordinates; without efficiency in subordinates, no $70,000,000 from whiskey duty. But the House was shocked, saw all sorts of objections, drove Mr. Schenck from his position, and, while showing every willingness to let him put what tax on whiskey he pleased, left him to collect the tax as best he could; that is, left the country still at the mercy of the "whiskey ring."

Finding this, Mr. Rollins resigns and throws the blame of the abominations of his department on the President, and Mr. McCulloch returns him his letter, and retorts that the President is not to blame at all; that the demoralization in the revenue service is due in part to the "want of harmony between the President and Congress," but mainly to the high duties on distilled spirits, tobacco, etc. This diffuses the responsibility over some hundreds of men and over a whole series of events. In fact, Mr. McCulloch might as well say at once that the revenue frauds are due to "the force of circumstances."

The moral of all this is, we repeat once more, that the system must be reformed. If Mr. Jenckes's bill were enacted, a quarrel between Congress and the President would not, as it has done, on Mr. McCulloch's theory, turn the public service into a den of thieves; the badness of the President and his desire to secure political support for a policy of his own would not, as Mr. Rollins maintains they have, make it impossible for an upright officer to remain at the head of an important bureauwithout doing violence to his own self-respect and seeming to connive at abuses. For the defects of the House in dealing with the tax bills, we do not see any remedy but the education of the constituencies into a belief that political economy and taxation form a science; that the man who has studied them is entitled to speak about them with authority, and ought to be kept in Congress, if he is willing to go, as long as he can be got to stay; and that members who have not studied them ought, if possible, to preserve a judicious silence about them.

THE CHURCH MILITANT.

A TELEGRAM from Italy brings a report which, though it may turn out unfounded, is worth attention, that the Pope has sent or is sending an agent to this country to recruit for the singular legion which now constitutes his arm of flesh. This body numbers 4,593 men, and is composed, according to the latest accounts, as follows:

"1,910 Dutch, 1,301 French, 686 Belgians, 157 Romans and other Pontifical subjects, 135 Canadians, 101 Irish, 87 Prussians, 50 English, 32 Spaniards, 22 Germans, 19 Swiss, 14 Americans, 14 Neapolitans, 12 Modenese, 12 Poles, 10 Scotch, 6 Tuscans, 6 Portuguese, 3 Maltese, 2 Russians, and a South Sea Islander, an Indian, an African, a Peruvian, a Mexican, and a Circassian."

The Canadians are a contribution sent out a few months ago, passing through this city on their way, and the success of that experiment in the New Dominion has not improbably emboldened the Papal authorities into trying it here. That this summer would be as favorable a season for trying it as is ever likely to occur there can be no question. We are just entering on a Presidential campaign which will in all probability be very exciting and may be closely contested, and in which the Irish and German Catholic vote will count for much. The Papal "War Department" may, of course, reckon confidently on the hearty approval of the Irish for any attempt to raise troops in this country, and may count with equal confidence on drawing nine-tenths of the recruits from the Irish population. There is, of course, therefore, some reason to hope, judging from what occurred during the Fenian operations against Canada, that an influential portion of the Republican press, moved by party considerations, would either keep silent about illegal enlistments if carried on for the Pope, or would throw cold water on the efforts of the Government to put a stop to them, supposing Mr. Johnson to be as honest and determined on this matter as he was with regard to the Fenian invasion of Canada.

What will facilitate the breach of the law will be the comparative smallness of the number of men required. It is not likely over 1,000 will be called for, and it ought not, with so many sympathizers at all the seaports, and with not over-zealous officials, and a press very willing to be silent—for however little the Republican press may do by way of exposure, the Democratic press is certain to do nothing—to be very difficult to get this number safely shipped.

That the Catholic clergy will oppose the movement is not to be expected. They encouraged it in Canada and in Ireland, and in every other country from which the Pope has drawn soldiers, though such enlistments are illegal in all or nearly all of them. Illegality does not with these gentlemen count for much in cases in which the law conflicts with the interests of the Church, or even raises what the Jesuits called a "probable opinion" that they conflict with the interests of the Church, for absolute certainty is not necessary. That kind of worship of law as something in itself sacred, for which the Anglo-Saxon race has made itself famous, does not as a matter of fact exist in any country or amongst any people in which Catholicism has powerfully influenced either politics or morals. The Canadian clergy started the Canadian company with as many benisons and as much éclat as they could bestow on it, and the Canadian authorities winked at the performance with that cynical contempt for decency and consistency for which, during the last seven years, they have made themselves famous. We doubt if the judicial records of any constitutional country can supply evidence of a more disgraceful state of official morals than that revealed in the proceedings in the St. Albans and Lamirande cases; and if anything could lead the respectable portion of the community to laugh at the calamity of the Canadians now when the Fenian hordes are hanging on their border, it would be the remembrance of the manner in which, when international obligations are in question, they execute their own laws. That, after what had happened, the Pope should step in and profit by their shame, was the most natural thing in the world.

Whether he will fare equally well here remains to be seen. To that sober portion of the Republican party who do not expect the advent of the millennium as the consequence of any particular political change, and who believe with us that the work of political and moral reform is and must be slow, and will have to be protracted through ages—because the evil with which it contends is, after all, not simply this or that bad law or bad custom, but the defects of human nature itself, the ignorance, the folly, and the blindness of men—an attempt of the Pope to recruit here, with the connivance and approval of the Catholic clergy, would be important, after all, rather for what it indicated or foreshadowed than what it is.

Nothing can be more respectable than the reluctance of a large portion of the press, and of a large number of public men, to raise questions which seem likely to make religious differences the basis of political differences, and thus transfer to this country the horrid strife by which for four hundred years some of the fairest portions of Europe have been desolated. But then we must take care that this delicacy is not carried too far. The relations of the state to the various religious sects are well settled in the minds of all, or nearly all, native Americans; but we are receiving from Europe every year half a million of people or thereabouts, and we have here already three or four millions more, in whose minds they are not well settled; in whose eyes the position of the Catholic Church in America is not what she is entitled to, but what the numerical weakness of her followers imposes upon her, and is therefore, they hope and believe, only temporary. She has never yet accepted a position of equality with other sects, except as a matter of necessity. It has been imposed upon her, of course, in Protestant countries, but never in Catholic ones, except by the alienation of the body of the people or of the governing classes. In no country in which the government is in the hands of sincere and fervent Catholics does the Church admit that other sects should be tolerated or admitted to an equality with her, or do the clergy refrain from seizing on every species of power which the state is willing to place within their reach. The Austrian Concordat of 1855 handed over to the bishops complete jurisdiction over the schools and over marriage, by an arrangement between a despotic monarch and the Pope, in defiance of the feelings and traditions of the people, and its abrogation within the last few weeks has been accomplished in the teeth of the threats and denunciations of the clergy. In France, Belgium, and Italy they have been ousted forcibly, owing to the long association of the Church with various forms of political tyranny, but largely owing to the growth of scepticism and materialism or other forms of heresy amongst the intelligent classes. In Spain, where the great body of the people remain attached to the Church, the pretensions of the clergy and their treatment of Protestants and other dissenters have undergone little or no change since the sixteenth century. They do not burn or torture heretics, it is true, but this is because manners have been softened by the advance of civilization, not because they no longer believe that purely carnal treatment is unsuited to spiritual disease.

We confess we know of no reason for expecting that in this country either they will ever be content with anything less in the way of privilege or immunity than what they can secure by working on the hopes or fears of the members of the Church. A striking illustration of what we may expect on this point has been afforded by the repeated attempts —one of which was partially defeated a month ago—to extract money from the State treasury for the support of the Catholic churches and schools. They defend this by saying that Catholics are taxed for the support of schools of which they do not approve and which they cannot use, or, in other words, that they must counteract one wrong by another. But this argument will cover every attempt either to escape from the jurisdiction of the State government or obtain the control of State machinery; for the Catholic Church, even when placed in a position of perfect equality, is, as we have said, held to be deprived of her just rights. Every school, no matter who pays for it or attends it, which might be directed and supervised by a priest, and is not, is in Catholic eyes a standing offence against religion and virtue.

We feel satisfied, therefore, that a firm, temperate, and persistent opposition to all pretensions on the part of the Church or its members to exemption from any laws or regulations to which other portions of the community are subject cannot be begun a minute too soon, because the sooner it is begun—the earlier the Catholic population are familiarized with the idea that religious equality is the law of the country, which cannot be evaded—the less trouble will there be hereafter. The evil which threatens us is one of those which gains prodigiously every year, which, if not met in its small beginnings, may produce a convulsion. We are not in a position here, and we hope never shall be, to seize a contumacious archbishop in the night, as the late King of Prussia did, and send him out of the country; and we have not that control over the clergy, and we hope never shall have, which the French Government secures by the Napoleonic Concordat. Whatever we do to keep them in bounds must be done by the pressure of public opinion and the rigid enforcement of equal laws.

An attempt to enlist troops here for the Pope would be not simply a gross violation of the law, but a gross insult. The Pope's army is one of those things which the best Catholic theologians of the best ages of the Church would have witnessed with sickness of heart. It is hard to say whether it is more contemptible, too, from a military or from an ecclesiastical point of view. It is unable to defend the Papal dominions against the Italian troops, as was shown by the affair of Castel Fidardo; though of course no trial of strength was needed to prove the idea that it was able, to be preposterous. It is unable to defend them from Garibaldi's bands, as was shown by the affair of Monte Rotondo; and it is unable to keep order in them, as is shown by the continued occupation of the French. It is composed of adventurers from all parts of the world, and is marked by the absence from it of all but a handful of Italians. There are only 157 Romans in it out of the 4,593 who compose it, and one-fourth of the whole number is made up of French soldiers whose service in it is allowed to count as service in their own army, and who find the life in it easier and their privileges somewhat greater than those of the force to which they properly belong. It was conceived and started by a mixture of mediæval enthusiasts and nineteenth-century charlatans and adventurers, practising on the fears and sentimentality of the old and not very strong-minded man who fills the Papal chair, and whose private virtues have unfortunately served to cover up his deficiency of political sense. His reign has nearly reached the extreme limit of the longest Pontifical recorded term—beyond which, according to the Roman superstition, no Pope can last—and his health is failing. On his death the present monstrous mixture of things sacred and profane which he has been keeping up at Rome will doubtless come to an end. In the meantime it will be the duty of the Government here to see that laws which are intended to prevent the United States being made a recruiting ground, even for the benefit of the best and holiest of causes, are not evaded for the benefit of a force which is of no use in war, and which in peace does not even serve as a police, and the very existence of which is, perhaps, one of the greatest scandals which has ever been brought upon the Christian faith.

THE ORGANIZATION OF CULTURE.

A MOVEMENT has been begun in this city, and, as well as we can judge, with every prospect of success, for the formation of an "Institute," like the French one as far as framework is concerned, with academics under it all over the country—any thirty persons who choose to organize one in any city being entitled to do so. The primary object of the undertaking, as set forth both in the preliminary circular and in the speeches made at a meeting held last Thursday, is the supply of better means of intercommunication than they have hitherto enjoyed to those interested in or engaged in the cultivation of science, arts, or literature; or, to put the idea into language more nearly technical, the "organization" of the chaotic mass of persons scattered from Maine to California to whom mental culture is one of the great objects of this mortal life. There is probably—indeed, we may say certainly—no country in the world in which the number of these persons is so large as in this; and there is no body of persons in this country, possessing so many tastes and interests and aims in common, who possess so few means of interchanging thought or of testing their progress by the use of a common standard. The professions and trades are all organized almost to perfection. The politicians have so thoroughly fused themselves into a homogeneous mass that a whole political party now gets its thinking done by contract, and has it served out to it in rations every morning, each man receiving the same weight and measure, and being forced to live in a kind of intellectual barracks, from which "absence without leave" is punished with terrible severity. There is hardly a branch of manufacture that does not "meet in convention." Even editors, who every day communicate their "views" in print on all possible subjects to their brethren and to mankind, find organizations, in which the same "views" may be occasionally exchanged orally face to face, profitable for doctrine, for reproof, and for instruction. Those who are bound together by the noblest of all ties, a common interest in science or literature or art, and who desire the means of testing their own proficiency, clearing up their own doubts, or the mere pleasure of expressing intellectual and moral sympathy, which nearly every professional man secures in the ordinary course of his professional pursuits, find themselves almost completely isolated. Their nearest approach to intercourse is the reading of the same periodicals; but the reading of periodicals is, after all, a very dense medium, if for no other reason, for the very good one that a periodical, in order to live, has to be conducted on commercial principles.

We feel satisfied, however, that the promoters of this new enterprise do not overestimate the results they are likely to achieve, and we trust the public will not do so. Calling the new organization an "institute," and surrounding it with affiliated "academies," cannot, of course, give it the weight or influence or value of its French prototype, or make it anything but a faint and imperfect copy of it. The French Institute rests on a basis of time, of tradition, of culture, and is fenced about by a spirit of criticism and a standard of excellence unknown here, and which this country will be very lucky if it possesses a century hence. As there are no delusions on this point amongst the founders of the new Institute, we trust there will be no sneering about it on the part of those who think the intellectual work of the United States will be best done as the Western wilderness is settled, by scattered volunteers, each going his own way and carrying his tools and stores in the recesses of his moral consciousness. If we thought the organization was being set on foot as an end, or as a sign of victory, or even as an infallible tribunal to decide for us what to admire and what to dislike, or even to exercise that "academic influence" on literature which Matthew Arnold longs for, we should neither believe in its success nor desire it.

It is intended to be, and we believe it will be if it succeeds, a means of infusing something like discipline and order into the most undisciplined and disorderly host in the world—the thoughtful classes of the United States. It may, too, if well managed, furnish what these classes sorely need, a "place forte" on which they can rely for shelter and rallying-ground when oppressed in the open field by the weight of mere numbers or deafened by the horrid noise of the gongs of passion and ignorance. Numbers in politics must always and should always be a strong argument, nay, may sometimes take the place of right reason, because they supply the means of making things practicable, or, in other words, meet the greatest difficulty of government. The reason on which the rule that "the majority shall govern" rests has, as Barbeyrac, the French translator of Puffendorf, remarks, this solid foundation—"that there is no other means of bringing affairs to a conclusion." That force in a state, whatever it be, which, and which only, can execute the laws, ought to be, and must be, allowed to make them, and the happiness of the community is best subserved by its doing so. But as the world comes more and more under the dominion of numbers in matters political, the tendency to extend their jurisdiction over matters intellectual and æsthetic naturally grows stronger, until the wisdom or taste of a man comes to be measured not so much by the quality of his thought as by the number of persons of any kind or condition he can get to agree with him or to listen to him. We see this tendency in every civilized country in the present day, and it is strong in any given country in proportion to the strength of democracy; and against this tendency democracy needs to be on its guard, for it is a tendency pretty sure to prove in the long run fatal to excellence and to originality. It is stemmed in France and in Germany, and in a minor degree in England, by a love of distinction, in the best sense of the word, and a spirit of criticism and of individuality and a breadth of culture which have been transmitted from ages in which scholars were content to live laborious lives merely to gain the ear of a few dozen contemporaries and to look to remote posterity for applause.

In our day and generation, the spectacle of the enormous force wielded by numbers in the work of government, and the daily demonstrations which we witness of the power of numbers in taking things out of the region of the ideal, clothing them with form and substance, and transmuting society through their agency, has begotten a strange kind of superstition as to its value in determining questions purely intellectual. The coolest and most reflective of us all, if we saw one hundred fools collected together, could hardly rid ourselves of the belief that, if they should agree on a proposition in law or philosophy, it would in some mysterious manner be pervaded by a wisdom which no single fool could possibly have infused into it. The same fallacy furnishes the basis of the reputation enjoyed by a great many popular poets, lecturers, and editors. "See," we say, "how many people that man gets to listen to him and agree with him; what a wise man he must be." What we ought to say is: "See what a power that man wields for good or evil; may God clear his brains, make him use his power with knowledge and discretion, and give him grace to enable him to leave off talking when he ceases to have anything to say."

Now, we cannot help thinking that the proposed organization will do much to check this tendency here, by supporting and stimulating a large body of persons in all parts of the country in the use of intellectual tests and standards, and giving them courage and mutual confidence to enable them to stand fast by the results of their own mental processes, even when they find themselves in a minority. We have not by any means the formation of an intellectual aristocracy or of an order of illuminati in our minds, or of the creation of a body of any kind separated from or opposed to the masses in interest or feeling. We are contemplating simply the creation of a league, which any person properly qualified may join, for the extinction of the mob spirit by which the regions of thought and literature are still, in spite of our common schools and our newspapers—nay, in consequence of our common schools and newspapers—so greatly desolated; a body which, when Reason is dragged into the streets with a rope round her neck, as she so often is in times of popular excitement, shall come to her rescue, release and re-enthrone her, and proclaim the glories and beneficence of her rule, and the respectability of all honest worship of her, no matter how unpleasant for the moment the consequences may appear. To this reverence for her there is no reason why the whole community should not eventually be won over. If we rightly understand the great end and aim of modern civilization, and especially of the American share in the work of civilization, it is the spread of this reverence through all classes and conditions—the communication to the hod-carrier not, indeed, of the scholar's or philosopher's knowledge, for this will always be impossible, but of the scholar's and philosopher's spirit; not the extinction of the passions, but their conversion into the obedient and energetic ministers of a purified and enlightened will.

The Institute proposes, as a means of stimulating and rewarding intellectual exertion, to do what has never been attempted in this country before, and that is to bestow a certain conventional distinction in the shape of "fellowships" on persons nominated by the academies, and voted for by the Council after they have displayed their powers in the maintenance of a thesis. This will undoubtedly be the most difficult portion of the work, and that on the success of which we pronounce with least confidence. The French Academy is enabled to do this successfully, through the greatness of its prestige, and the familiarity of the French public with the bestowal of marks of distinction as the reward of achievements in various fields, and the powerful influence exercised in France by pure criticism in all departments of human culture. We are ready enough to worship poets, orators, and scientific men, but we are very jealous of any attempt to take the selection of the successful candidates for honors out of the hands of the people. There is and will be for some time to come very great jealousy of any test of merit except "circulation," "sales," and "size" of audiences. We do not say that the existence of these difficulties is a reason for not making the attempt; on the contrary, we hold it to be a reason for making it. But this condition of popular feeling will make the work one of great delicacy, and ought to lead the organizers to make the tribunal of last resort one of undeniable lustre and strength from the very outset. Its authority ought to be unquestionable, or it will certainly be questioned, and questioned with so much fierceness that we shall see appeals taken from its decisions "to the people," and disappointed candidates for honors, armed with their publishers' accounts showing the enormous circulation of their poems, histories, and biographies, setting up a rival institute of their own on the grand "American plan" of dividing all honors amongst all persons equally. The academies, too, will suffer from the great curse of the age—the great enemy to excellence in literature and reform in politics—"good nature." As long as finding fault with anybody, denying anybody's claims to anything but money, or in any way giving anybody pain who is not a political opponent, is looked upon as the evidence of a bad heart, of a debased aristocratic disposition, and one of the worst offences an ordinarily respectable man can commit against society, the difficulties in the way of making an academy of letters anything better than a place in which rhetoricians can spout and charlatans secure notoriety will be immense. We do not say this, however, by way of discouragement, for we believe it is a difficulty which honesty and pluck can overcome; but it needs to be said by way of warning.

THE REFORM MOVEMENT AMONG THE JEWS.

JUDAISM, which, in spite of its original separatism, could not withstand the influence of Chaldean civilization during the Babylonish captivity, and of Hellenic philosophy in the times of the Ptolemies; which, having developed its austere talmudical shape simultaneously with the growth of Christianity, again assumed milder and more philosophical forms when the Caliphs from burners of libraries became collectors of literary treasures; which, following this new course, kept pace with Arabic culture from the Tigris to the Guadalquivir; which flourished in Provence and in the land of Dante when the vernacular Romanic tongues commenced blossoming in new literatures—Judaism had no revival in the times of the Renaissance and the Reformation. Those times, the centuries that preceded them, and the centuries that followed, belong in many respects to the darkest in the history of the Jews. Their bloody persecution during the Crusades and in the time of the black plague, their banishment from England and France in the reigns of Edward I. and Charles VI., their still more barbarous expulsion from Spain and Sicily in the year of the discovery of America, and from Portugal a few years later, were not only destructive to their prosperity, but also to their culture, which then, in Western Europe, was approaching a regenerating crisis; while their numbers were continually increasing in the more hospitable and tolerant, but still less civilized, Polish and Turkish provinces. Their condition grew still worse when both Poland and Turkey commenced decaying, and Germany became the bloody theatre of desolating wars between Catholicism and Protestantism. The Christian sects seemed to vie with each other in oppressing them. And the complicated system of petty tyranny—of extortion, exclusion, and humiliation—under which the Jews now groaned for centuries was more destructive to their intellectual development than had been their more sanguinary, but less constant and systematic, persecutions in the Middle Ages.

Even about the middle of the last century the Jews lived as strangers, and were treated as enemies, in almost all the European countries the air of which they were allowed to breathe. The land of their birth was to them a land of captivity or exile (galuth), as Babylonia had been in ancient times. Its language was to them the language of unholy oppressors, unworthy to be used as a medium for sacred rites and literature. The vernacular which they used in profane things or in translating Hebrew texts was a jargon, mostly German, mixed up with Semitic and other foreign words and forms. Spurned and hooted at for their wretchedness, and slandered as enemies of Christ and his followers, they, in their turn, despised the Christians as cruel and profligate idol-worshippers, and withdrew from their communion as contaminating. Modern literature was approached by them only with fear and suspicion. The sciences, which, with the exception of medicine, offered no reward, neither distinction nor position, to their Jewish votaries, were regarded as humble ancillæ of the holy science of the law (torah). The latter study, in all its scriptural, talmudical, and rabbinical vastness, was cultivated, with unparalleled zeal and perseverance, as the only source of true mental culture, spiritual felicity, and worldly honors. The study of the law and the observance of its numberless rites and obligations consumed a considerable portion of every educated or half-educated Jew's life. The wretchedness and bitterness of that life were borne with resignation as well-deserved chastisements for sins and transgressions, and softened by the recollections of a marvellous national past and the expectation of a Messianic future. There were exceptions of every kind, but they were rare.

Those exceptions, however, became more and more numerous with the general progress of enlightenment and of the spirit of toleration in the age of Voltaire and Rousseau, Hume and Gibbon, Frederic the Great and Joseph II., Lessing and Mendelssohn. But it is the latter period of the last-named philosopher's life with which the modern era in the intellectual and religious history of the Jews begins. What Luther was to Christian Germany and Europe in the sixteenth century, Mendelssohn became to his co-religionists in the eighteenth. What Luther's translation of the Bible worked among Christians, Mendelssohn's German Pentateuch, in Hebrew letters, with commentaries and an introduction, achieved among the Jews. Not that the Jewish philosopher advocated or intended a reform of the synagogue. Both his modesty and his principles opposed such an enterprise. The immense influence he exercised upon his people was due to his eminence as a writer and thinker, which attracted the admiration of all and the emulation of many; to the Socratic charms of his conversation, which made his circle in Berlin a focus of enlightenment; to his liberal views on church and state and on freedom of thought, as enunciated in his "Jerusalem;" to his theory, expounded in the same work and so welcome in an age of rationalism, that Judaism, which was a national religion, inculcated only practices leading to ideas, but promulgated no dogmas; to the revival among his co-religionists, through his Hebrew writings and German translations, of the taste for Biblical criticism, for exact and pure diction, for the beautiful and æsthetic in connection with the sacred, which had adorned the golden age of their forefathers in Spain and Provence; to the powerful co-operation, in this literary revival, of his Jewish friends or disciples, the great Hebraists Wessely, Euchel, and others, in whom the kindled imagination of the younger Hebrew students saw new Hallevis and Kimhis side by side with a new Maimonides; to the no less powerful co-operation of his numerous Christian co-laborers on the field of German literature, and especially of Lessing, in dispelling anti-Jewish prejudices, and thus making it possible to the Jews to issue from their isolation and occupy a place among the enlightened of other nations; and, finally, to the Jewish and moral purity of his life, which taught the Jews that, even after Spinoza, Judaism and philosophy were not irreconcilable, and the Christians, that a faithful disciple of the rabbis could serve as a model for a "Nathan the Wise." It is true bigotry and prejudice on both sides but slowly yielded the ground; some rabbis fulminated against him whom others revered as the third Moses—the lawgiver being the first, and Maimonides the second—and even the Voltairean Frederic crossed out his name on a list of proposed members of the Berlin Academy; but when that monarch and his Schutzjude died—both in 1786—freedom of thought and free thought had made immense strides. The "inalienable rights of man" had been proclaimed in the New World; they were going to be promulgated, in a more terrific revelation, to the Old.

The Abbé Grégoire carried the equality of the Jews in the French Constituent Assembly. The armies of France carried it into the Austrian Netherlands, into Holland—long a refuge to persecuted Jews—and across the Rhine and the Alps. Even where equality was not granted, the condition of the Jews was gradually ameliorated. They ceased to be considered as strangers, and, what was more important, they gradually ceased to consider themselves as such. A desire for political and social disenthralment added fuel to the already kindled desire for mental self-regeneration. This double movement among the Jews, which from the fatherland of Mendelssohn radiated into the adjoining countries, was not only effective in ripening a vast number of individual talents and capacities, soon to be distinguished in various fields of literature, science, and art, but also productive of public reforms in congregational life, schools, and synagogues. Wessely and his friends, the learned and brilliant writers of the Measseph ("Gatherer"), gave a powerful impulse to educational reform, and met with the hearty co-operation of Friedländer, Herz, and Jacobson, Jews distinguished by wealth, refinement, and social position, who carried the agitation also into other fields.

The question of religious reform was the highest, the gravest, and the hardest of solution. The want of it began to be seriously felt, but on what principle, in what spirit, and how far it was to be carried, were questions in answering which opinions differed widely. The bulk of the Jews at that time—as is still now the case in Poland—consisted of strict believers, to whom the least and last rabbinical injunction was equally divine with the Decalogue, and whose faith in a future Messianic restoration was no less firm than their belief in monotheism; others were more or less strict conformists from habit, from love for the more essential parts of Judaism, or from repugnance to the trinitarian and similar dogmas of Christianity; still others, whose number was daily increasing, were only nominal Jews, having given up all religious practice from conviction, indifferentism, or light-mindedness; and finally, not a few, yielding to outer pressure, and despairing of the future of their people, were daily abandoning the faith of Israel to seek repose or emoluments in the shade of the cross. Mendelssohn seemed to have expected a remedy for this condition of affairs only from the influence of enlightenment upon the individual Jews, each of whom was to save, first, his freedom of thought, and then his conscience as well as he could. Wessely, an enlightened but zealous rabbinist, demanded the purification of Judaism on the strictest orthodox principles, chiefly by means of education. Others, like Jacobson, a man of the younger generation and of the world, agitated for a thorough-going reform of the ritual. The Kantian philosopher, Bendavid, proposed the total abandonment of all ceremonial parts of Judaism, which, under entirely altered circumstances, he argued, had lost their efficiency for good, and were only a dead weight on pure Mosaic monotheism. And, driven on by a still more violent current of rationalistic opinion, Friedländer even went so far as to ask in an "Epistle" to a distinguished Christian theologian, Teller, for reasonable terms under which conscientious liberal Jews could join the Church. Most of these early attempts, however, meeting with no encouragement on the part of the Jewish people as well as of the governments, hardly led to any immediate result. The time, too—that of the Napoleonic wars—was decidedly adverse to movements of this kind, though by its crushing power it worked wonders in transforming the formerly so-despised Jews of Central Europe into active, energetic, and often leading members of modern society. When peace returned, and literature and science, art and commerce, revived, single Jews soon became conspicuous everywhere, some, it is true, only Jews by name, like the composers, Moscheles, Meyerbeer, and Halévy, and others even nominal Christians, like Heine, Börne, and Gans. Jewish congregational life, too, assumed a new aspect. Sermons in pure living idioms, vocal music of a modern style, and here and there an organ, were heard in the synagogues; catechisms and other manuals elaborated on modern principles were introduced in the schools. A kind of general reform had taken place in France, consisting mainly of a declaration of radical Jewish principles by a so-called French Sanhedrim, in accordance with the wishes of Napoleon, but also involving a systematic congregational organization with a leading central consistory for the whole of France.

Jewish literature, in the stricter sense of the term, now took a fresh start. Of the vast number of writers, chiefly in German and Hebrew, who flourished during the first two decades after the Napoleonic era, we can mention here only a few of the most conspicuous: Jost, the author of various comprehensive histories of the Jews and of Judaism; the Galician, Rapoport, whose biographico-critical masterpieces, contributed to the Bikkurey Haittim ("First-Fruits of the Times"), may be said to have created a new literature; Zunz, who in his "Gottesdienstliche Vorträge der Juden" showed himself a worthy disciple, if not a rival, of Rapoport; Reggio, the author of "Hattorah veha-Philosophia" ("The Law and Philosophy"), and of some more valuable minor works; and S. D. Luzzatto, of the Padua Rabbinical College, chiefly renowned as Biblical critic and Aramaic scholar. These were closely followed by a new generation of literati, to the most eminent of whom belong Geiger, Sachs, Frankel, Philippson, Fürst, Munk, Franck, and Grätz, all Germans by birth. Independent criticism searched and ransacked every corner and remnant of the Jewish past. Numerous important periodicals were started. The Kerem Hemed ("Lovely Vineyard") took the place of the Bikkurey Haittim, to be succeeded in its turn by the more radical Halutz ("Vanguard"), published chiefly by Galician writers, and by the Carmel, an organ of the Russian Jews; Riesser published his Jude; Geiger, his Zeitschrift für jüdische Theologie, and similar periodicals; Philippson, his Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums; Fürst, his Orient; Cahen, the Archives israélites de France; Frankel, his Monatschrift—not to mention a multitude of other, mostly short-lived, journals in Hebrew and various living tongues.

While this progress in literature was going on, partly promoting and partly following the progress of Jewish political emancipation, the cause of religious reform, too, was advanced, first feebly, but afterwards more powerfully by Geiger, who in 1835 took the lead in a movement for the regeneration of rabbinical Judaism through a rational and liberal development of its own spirit. In this he was aided by Philippson, by powerful synagogue orators like Salomon and Mannheimer, and by numerous rabbis, of whom Holdheim soon outstripped his master. This movement culminated in the three rabbinical synods of Braunschweig, Frankfort, and Breslau in 1844, 1845, and 1846, which adopted, among others, resolutions confirming those of the Napoleonic Sanhedrim, and advocating considerable changes in the liturgy, in sacramental and marriage rites, and in the observance of the holidays, all tending to harmonize the religious life of the Jew with his civil life and with the ideas of the age. This agitation met with a storm of opposition from various quarters. Some assailed it as heretical, and in spirit or tendency subversive of all Judaism; others, as a slow, timid, and double-faced movement, which, while pretending to be both rabbinical and rational, was neither the one nor the other. Hirsch and other orthodox scholars attacked it with the weapons both of erudition and sarcasm, while reform associations in Frankfort, Berlin, and elsewhere just as loudly declared their disapproval on opposite grounds, and, under the lead of men like Creizenach, Holdheim, Bernstein, and Stern, openly renounced all allegiance to the Talmud, repudiated all hope of Jewish national restoration, rejected almost all the ceremonies as dead, and generally made the Sunday, instead of the Saturday, their day of worship. Revelation, if not ignored as purely dogmatical, was by most reformers accepted only in a rationalistic sense. Behind Geiger and his associates, though still inclined towards reform, remained Frankel, while other enlightened theologians, like Rapoport, seemed still to occupy the standpoint of Mendelssohn, and cautiously avoided the arena. Generally, however, the discussions were animated and often violent, leading to dissensions and splits in the congregations, and not rarely, also, to interference by the government. The great political events of 1848–1850 for a time quieted the animosities and considerably diminished the interest in these struggles, but they have since been resumed, though with abated vigor. The questions, the tendencies, the differences of opinion are still the same; a harmonious solution is still far remote.

Germany has remained to this day the central theatre of the movement, which is felt, with more or less force, from Odessa to San Francisco, and from Stockholm to Algiers. In France discussions on reform, representing all shades of opinion, have been participated in, among others, by Terquem, Cahen, Cerfbeer, Crémieux, Munk, Franck, and Rodrigues, but with little effect, owing to the religious indifference or ignorance of the mass of French Jews. In all other countries, England and the United States not excepted, the religious as well as literary movements of the Jews are but reflections of those going on in Germany.

AN ENTERTAINING MISCELLANY.

As we grow older we no doubt grow better-natured. Or, rather, we grow more good-natured. The youth sets out on the voyage of life with a demand for perfection; but then, as the cynic says, he lives; and, as all of us would have known without the cynic's help, to live is to learn one's self; so the youth ends the voyage of life by accepting in lieu of perfection mankind as it is. From a complete acquiescence in man there is always, however, this refuge, or, if one likes to say so, there is always possible thus much of revenge for our enforced acquiescences: we can despise preceding generations. If, in view of the ideal man, our contemporaries are not so very admirable, we can at least see that they have their ancestors at an advantage.

To people who feel weak and unable to believe this we can recommend something that will probably do them good; it is a slight and simple thing, but we have found it useful in our own case. Circumstances over which we had no control having compelled us to a wide acquaintance with the magazine writing of the present day, and our complaint having been rather aggravated than relieved, we were induced to try a volume or two of the date of 1791 or thereabouts. We at once began to feel returning strength, as the certificates say, and had made but a brief contemplation of our ancestors as producers and consumers of periodical literature when we were completely restored to civility to the writers of our own generation and to a sound and bracing contempt for their literary foregoers. We have since extended this course, and always with the same result. Of course judgment must be exercised. One does not set the Northern Monthly of to-day against the Gentleman's Magazine of a hundred years ago, but with the Evening Mail of the period. Comparing like with like, our good with their good, our bad with their bad, not making cross-comparisons and not comparing all our things in a lump with the peculiar glories of their time, they, we think, our ancestors, will be found many degrees worse than we are and we admirable enough. However, one goes botanizing for health's sake and finds that in his culling of simples he has gathered a nosegay. We intend here not to argue with the pessimists nor to encourage the uncynical, but merely to exhibit for a moment or two some little things that amused us in turning over the New York Magazine and Literary Repository for a part of the year 1791.

It seems, we notice in the first place, that to "write a letter to the editor" is not a new crime. It must have its roots, one would say, in the primal depravity of the universal heart of man. Here it is flourishing as rankly in "R." of July, 1791, as in the breast of the youngest subscriber of the current month. The publishers, it appears, had printed an article professing to be extracts from a certain sermon. "R."—"Rambler" was perhaps what he meant by the initial—admonishes them for misdoing:

"GENTLEMEN: In your magazine of the last month is inserted a sermon," etc., etc.

"This production is profane and wicked, without the least alloy of wit or humor, and can serve no other purpose than to countenance the vicious and harden the profligate," etc., etc., etc.

"The indulgence you have shown it illy comports with the professions which ushered in your Literary Repository," etc., etc., etc.

"After these remarks, which unfortunately to be just must be severe, I, in justice to you, declare that the subject of them is the first essay I have seen in your magazine from which religion or virtue ought to turn away; and that it requires no very great exertion or charity to believe that the hurry of publication betrayed you to be the editors of a blasphemous narrative that ought long since to have mouldered in oblivion."

The editors, it is sad to say, were far from taking so decided a course with Mister "R." as would be taken with him if he were to revisit the world of to-day and write his impudent letters. On the contrary, they weakly submitted, and probably they had enough of him before they were done. See them in their abasement:

"They admit, with the writer of the remarks, that an unfavorable construction may be drawn from the sermon; though they are convinced that the friend who sent it for insertion considered it a piece of ingenuity, in which light alone the editors themselves viewed it, and which will, no doubt, be accepted as an apology for its having been admitted."

The "Woman Question," which is so prominent a feature in the magazine writing of our day, appears, but appears only once, in its present aspect in the Literary Repository. The editors had been struck by Mary Wolstonecraft's forcible "Vindication of the Rights of Woman," and copied some pages of the introduction without, so far as we can discern, calling down on themselves the rebukes of any friends of morality. Generally, however, woman appears as a thing of verse, in her familiar character of "Melissa" and "Calista" and "Eliza, or Amiable Sorrow," and "Miss E—— W——"—singing:

> "Charm on, soft Eliza, in song ever charm,
> Still ravish our ears and our bosoms disarm,
> Till Truth, Fame, and Love in thy numbers have sung
> How Celestial thy mind is, and resistless thy tongue."

"The American Muse" occupies her appropriate place in the magazine, and may be observed practising some of her now customary activities. There is, of course, something in the way of odes written for the celebration of the Fourth of July at Alexandria, Virginia, and other towns, and something in praise of Washington, and various references to American rivers and plains, and to the aboriginal inhabitants of the country; but there is less of this than one would have supposed. The cast-off gowns of the Muse of Albion were still the favorite wear of her transatlantic sister, and even in the "Songs of the Frontier" there is a strong savor of "the town" of Gay and Goldsmith. This, now, for a "Frontier Song" is not very full of the wilderness; we do not easily think of it as chanted by the stalwart pioneer:

> "Let statesmen tread their giddy round,
> Undoing and undone,
> I hug my cot, where still is found
> My wife, my dog, and gun.
>
> "Let the gay beau and tinselled belle
> In Pleasure's circle run;
> My happiness their joys excel,
> My wife, my dog, and gun.
>
> "Where forests nod and lakes expand,
> And foaming cat'racts stun,
> I've fixed my home, on either hand,
> My wife, my dog, and gun.
>
> "Ambition's path, the miser's road,
> The legal maze I shun,
> But cling to my beloved abode,
> My wife, my dog, and gun."

It might perhaps have been expected that the frontiersman of the day would have been highly Europeanized in poetry, but in the case of the Red Man one would have thought that the true American doctrine—"no good Indians but dead ones"—would have prevailed. The "cot" of the pioneer in West Virginia and on the Ohio border was often enough, in those days, on fire, and his wife and dog and gun, in the neighborhood of Pittsburgh, not at all unfrequently confiscated. But we find "W. D." dressing the heathen scalper in the full nobility of the noble savage. The editor having said in his "Notes to Correspondents" that he will "be happy to be able frequently to adorn the pages of this work with performances from the pen" which wrote the "Triumphs of Logan," we turned to that ode and discovered the dusky child of literature as follows:

> "Wild rang the shrieks thro' air,
> Fast flew the night away;
> The chiefs in arms appear,
> And thus salute the day.
>
> "Aged Logan led the fight,
> Logan's fame is ever new.
> Logan seized a treach'rous white—
> His murdered children rushed to view.
>
> "Curses blast thee, pale-fac'd savage, > Ruin seize thy ruthless kind!"
> Etc., etc., etc.

We do not know whether the editor would have been so happy to be able to adorn his pages with W. D.'s odes if he had been so well acquainted with his Gray as he should have been. Probably he would, though; although on occasion he can rebuke plagiarism, as when he says to "A Subscriber": "The song sent by 'A Subscriber' is, excepting the chorus, a mere copy of the song 'Rule Britannia,' substituting the word 'America' for 'Britannia.' . . . As this song seems to have been sent by some well-meaning patriot, it is somewhat surprising that he should reduce our continent to an island —'Blest isle, with beauty, matchless beauty, crowned.'"

They were not very particular in those days, though there were some things that were rather too much. On the whole, the reader of the Repository understands how Dr. Griswold acquired his facility for admiration, and how our early writers of verses got fame as poets, and also how the later way of talking about them and their works should shock and perplex and enrage them. They were better a good deal than the people they displaced—so much better that it is not astonishing they should fall into bewilderment when told they are not good.

IMPEACHMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Now that Mr. Johnson has been acquitted, we may probably take for granted that there will never be another President impeached in this country. If a man of his temperament and in his situation has succeeded in keeping himself within the bounds of the law, or at least in securing himself against legal proof of his offences, we may safely assume that none of his successors will be less fortunate. We can hardly have a President less discreet than he, or with a larger adverse majority in the Senate; and the conjunction of these two circumstances under another administration would be remarkable indeed.

Impeachment may therefore be pronounced, as Macaulay held it to be, an obsolete institution, borrowed from an age which had different ideas and different political practices from ours. It certainly seems absurd, in the nature of things, to constitute a set of politicians into a court for the trial of a political offender; and the outcry that has been raised against the seven delinquents whose votes decided the matter against their own party shows that the public appreciate the absurdity, however much injustice is done to the considerations which decided these seven votes. It could not be otherwise. Granted that impeachment is a purely judicial process, still enough judges will find it impossible to forget their political ties to divest the trial of much of the dignity and solemnity which it should possess. Grant that it is a merely political process, there still will be enough senators who cannot forget their oaths and their legal training to frustrate the best plans of their party. Even Lord Strafford could not be convicted by an impeachment; but a bill of attainder must accomplish what a trial at law failed to effect. And of the trial of Warren Hastings, Macaulay says that "the result ceased to be a matter of doubt from the time when the Lords resolved that they would be guided by the rules of evidence which are received in the inferior courts of the realm." In the case of Mr. Johnson, the people do earnestly desire to see him removed from the Presidency, and perhaps none desire this more earnestly than Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Fessenden, only that they are not willing to see a judicial process perverted to a purely political end. The fact is, there ought to be some legitimate way of accomplishing this removal; that there is not, is one of the greatest defects of our form of government, and perhaps its most undemocratic feature.

The experience of our Government appears to show that the framers of the Constitution made two fundamental mistakes as to the executive department. In copying from the English constitution, they took the office of the king for model instead of that of prime minister; and further, they wholly underestimated the power and violence of political parties, and the degree in which the President would come to identify himself with them. Their idea was of an exalted personage raised above parties, with no "policy" of his own, but satisfied to carry out the will of the legislature, changing his ministers from time to time, as the king did, in compliance with this will. In consistency with this idea they gave him a fixed term of office, not foreseeing that during this brief term a change of opinions might lead to a direct antagonism between executive and legislative. They provided, further, that the principal candidate in opposition to the President should be associated with him as Vice-President, and should succeed in case of his death or removal—a wholly preposterous plan, except upon the notion that party ties made no difference with this officer, and that his functions were to be purely executive. Mr. Hamilton, indeed, went so far as to propose a President for life or good behavior—of course with the same idea, that this President would change his administration with changes in parties, just as the King of England did.

But it is absurd to suppose that able statesmen such as we need for Presidents—and once had—should be satisfied with this kind of position. A king may well be satisfied with it by reason of the dignity and permanence of his office; but no Adams or Jefferson will consent to be the mere instrument of Congress. It cannot be but that a President of any mark will have, or will desire to have, a policy of his own; and when this policy is opposed to that of Congress few men will have the sagacity and moderation to recognize that the right as well as the power is after all with the legislature and not with the executive. And indeed they are half right. The President ought to be, as is the English prime minister, the leader of the party in power for the time being—none the less a President of the nation, but with all political branches of government ready to co-operate in a harmonious administration of affairs.

This brings us to the English system, which is of precisely this nature. The English have, to be sure, a very illogical and expensive method of accomplishing it; but they do accomplish it, nevertheless, and the result is a far more efficient and, in this respect, more democratic administration than ours. They have two executives: a nominal one, the king, who stands, in fact, above all parties, unchanged in political changes, with the sole function of being the source of executive action and the representative of the national will—and a real one, the prime minister, an active member of his party, nay, its leader, changed with every decided change in popular sentiment, and thus at once the active executive head of the government and the acknowledged leader of Parliament for the time being. In this way the wheels of government run smooth through all changes of party; for it is the jarring and irregularity of action that lead to mischief, rather than the open and honest conflicts of opinion.

The second mistake which the framers of the Constitution made was in not appreciating the power of party spirit and the strength of party ties. It would be interesting to enquire how it comes that party organizations are so much more potent under our form of government than any other, but this is not the place for this enquiry. The fact is undisputed; elsewhere parties exist—they have existed in all free states—but nowhere else do they form a state within a state, nowhere else are they so elaborately constituted, and of such independent, almost corporate action; nowhere else do they claim allegiance as a right; nowhere else would they dare to claim the fealty of the chief magistrate as superior to his duty to his country. From this enormous power of party it results that not only the President will not be the mere agent, nor even will content himself with a policy of his own, but he is expected to act as the agent of his party.

From lack of comprehending these two points, the framers of the Constitution failed to organize the executive department in such a manner as to meet the wants of the nation, in this generation at least. Perhaps we shall never again have a bitter hostility between President and Congress as at present; but we have several times had an approach to it, and it may be questioned whether it does not put a strain upon the system too severe for it—whether this is not partly the cause of the indifference to constitutional obligations that has grown up of late. It is seen that the restraints of the Constitution are unreasonable—that they force us to put up with an inefficient or mischievous administration, and may at some time imperil the country itself. This feeling is at the bottom of the present disposition to scout at all judicial considerations in the trial of impeachment. There ought to be some way, in these cases of dead-lock, of appealing to the country, and taking a fresh start. Either the President ought to be allowed to dissolve Congress, or, what is better, Congress should be allowed to call for a new election of President.

It may be objected that this would destroy the balance of the departments. We think not, so far at least as the balance is of any value in our day. This doctrine of the independence of the departments is an outgrowth of the time and institutions in which the monarch was the sovereign, and the popular rights had to be struggled for and protected by special guaranties. When the people and the king were antagonistic powers, each must be jealously guarded against the encroachments of the other. But in our democratic government this is not the case. The judicial department, indeed, for reasons which need not be given here, is in as great danger as ever, and requires as thorough security as under a monarchy. But the President and Congress are equally agents of the same sovereign people; and the only possible benefit we can derive from the independence of these departments is that thereby the popular will is rendered less intense and concentrated, that—like the division of the legislature into two chambers—it serves, as Mr. Mill says, to "break the headlong impulses of popular opinion by delay, rigor of forms, and adverse discussions." But it would not be necessary to destroy this independence, or to render either branch of government dependent on the other. Each would still rest immediately upon the popular will; only that one would obtain the right of appealing to this will in case of a conflict of powers.

It may be objected, more plausibly, that any such plan would only intensify the already overweening power of party, by removing a principal obstacle to its success. But it may well be doubted whether the virulence of party spirit is not more enhanced by these violent conflicts than it would be by the undivided possession of power. It seems probable that if one party at a time possessed full, instead of divided, power, its sense of responsibility would be increased, and we should see moderation in place of much of the present intolerance and violence. The Athenians were wont to allay the intemperance of party spirit in times of great excitement by banishing temporarily the one of two rivals whom they could best spare; the plan proposed would accomplish the same end by deciding which of the two rivals should have the sole management and responsibility of public affairs for a season.

MARCEL.

THE CIVIL SERVICE DISGRACE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

What with the bill of Mr. Jenckes, and the urgencies of yourself and other depositaries of the national wisdom and authority, we have hoped that Congress would have done something ere this to retrieve the utterly disgraceful condition of our consular un-system. If there were a single M. C who had ever been imbecile or poor enough to serve a term of years as U. S. consul anywhere in the bounds of civilization proper, I should anticipate a ventilation of the state of things obtaining, from the culpable neglect of our law-makers, in this department of the national representation.

As the consular service (?) now stands, the nation must be content to be represented before the commercial and popular intelligences of the world by men from one of three classes—viz., invalids whose health demands foreign air and who are glad to eke out their incomes by the pittance of a consular salary; incapables who have never been able to make a living by any occupation and are content to live in a garret and go through the official routine, subsisting on a minimum of nutriment and self-respect, or else making out their incomes by swindling all the innocents who are confiding enough in the prestige of the United States to believe that one of its officials must be a man of honor; and, lastly, those who, having a sufficient income go abroad to enjoy themselves officially and ride the spread eagle before the admiring eyes of the ignorant Europeans. I belong to the first class with perhaps an admixture of the second, and therefore have the good luck not to participate in the third, though, thanks to confiding friends at home, I have not yet been obliged to swindle the people to whom I represent the greatest of republics and the most free and enlightened of nations to keep from starvation.

I am forty years of age, read and write three languages, have served the United States seven years in two consulates. In the first, one which demanded a good deal of labor and constant office attention, I sunk $3,000 (gold) in four years, part of which I had and the rest of which I owe (I lived au cinquième and kept one servant, never went into society and gave no parties). I may mention that, on my arrival, I had occasion to order a cheap suit of clothes, and that the tailor, who had had dealings with my predecessor, refused to send them to my house without having the money paid before they left the shop. I found that being U. S. Consul did not increase my credit.

Having no "influence," I suppose it was owing to my fidelity in small matters that I was promoted to my second consulate, which had been vacant for several years, and of which the salary is $1,000. I have been here three years, and have only increased my debts about $500; but if (which in our service one must always count on) I am dismissed to-morrow, I must run in debt about $600 (gold) to get home with my family. I have been obliged to learn another language, making the fourth, to incur the expenses of settling in a new country, to study up a new set of political and commercial relations, and while here have seen two of the most profitable consulates in my vicinity filled by men who had not the claim (speaking the language of common sense) that I had to them. I live in a house which is in no respect equal to a good log-cabin. I am obliged to refuse all social invitations more serious than to tea, because I cannot return them. I am obliged, more or less, to hold my own with my colleagues, the poorest paid of whom of my grade receives 12,000 francs (the highest receiving 32,500), and so far I have kept my credit intact.

My nearest neighbor (U. S. consul) has just absconded, after a course of life which will leave his successor some work to retrieve the consular dignity, leaving 10,000 to 12,000 francs of debts, and a reputation for drunkenness and licentiousness which one good and creditable consul will not cause to be forgotten.

A predecessor of my proximus on the other side made a fortune by selling his agencies, passports, protections, etc., etc., a thing which is not difficult in some sections of the world. I have myself been offered £200 each for two agencies in my appointment, with numerous overtures as to passports and protections. It is safe to say that I might have doubled my income by illegal practices, against which our system gives no assurance beyond discharging a detected offender, and against the temptations to which, when a consul finds himself running behind his expenses, it offers little support. Of the not strictly felonious but forbidden practices of working for certain merchants for a consideration, from which many of our consuls have received large profit, I say nothing, though I know that but for them few of our European consulates would be retained long, for the simple reason that not one of them enables a man by his legal receipts to pay his expenses.

On the whole, our system is so unequivocally disgraceful and fraudulent that I am astonished that any honest man, capable intellectually and physically of following any regular occupation, should, save as a temporary change, accept a consular appointment; and the probability of such an one devoting himself, as with other countries, to the service with the intention to study the interests and develop the resources of our commerce, to fit himself really to be of the greatest possible use to the country, and looking forward to the service as a profession, is inappreciably small. He is sure of being ill paid for the time being; he is pretty sure that the most exemplary conduct will not ensure promotion or increase of salary; equally so that his best performance of his duty will bring him no honor or higher consideration at home; and may count with tolerable certitude on being dismissed the moment his post is worth seeking for by any one who has more influence, though he has never served a day in the service.

Our system, therefore, will bring us men who want to go abroad a short time on public expense, who are willing to spend their money in official soirées and make a sensation in a pocket court as the Hon. Adam Parvenu, U. S. Consul, etc., etc., leaving all the official duties to some knavish native who finds his account therein, or who count on making the place pay so well by irregular practices that in the term for which they hope to hold it they can make it pay all expenses, and net something for retirement.

For myself, unable to endure the American winter, I had looked forward to a possible permanency in the consular service, and being really able to be of use to my country; but I have come to the conclusion that I had better run the risks of consumption at home than starvation in the U. S. consular service, and shall avail myself of the first opening which permits my returning home, assured that my generation will have passed away before our legislators will be sufficiently educated to the sense of national respectability to be able to organize a consular service which will be worth an honest man's while to enter it.

ULYSSES EBORACUS, A.M., U. S. Consul, Buncomberg.

U. S. CONSULATE, BUNCOMBERG, May 10, 1868.

[Mr. Eboracus, we may mention, for the information of those who may be astonished by the singularity of his name, is a real consul at a real post.—ED. NATION.]

"RED TAPE" WHICH IS NOT "BRITISH."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

On the 28th of May a letter, very carefully addressed to me, with the number of my box, was deposited in one of the lamp post boxes up-town. The postage was prepaid; but, as subsequently appeared, owing to its defective adhesive properties, the stamp worked off. The letter was not delivered in due course, and not until the 1st of June did I learn that it had been mailed. Upon applying to the postmaster's secretary in search of it, I was informed that it had been "held for postage," and been sent to the dead-letter office at Washington on the 29th of May. I was therefore advised to write to the "Third Assistant Postmaster-General" for it, enclosing a postage stamp. This I did at once. On the 4th day of June I received a reply, in the shape of a printed circular, stating that "the letter to which you refer cannot be found," and also that in the case of a letter, sent to the dead-letter office, containing money or "property value," an effort would be made to return it to the writer or to the person addressed. All other letters are destroyed. A series of printed enquiries accompanied the circular, to which I made answer, and as my letter did contain what I presumed would be regarded as "property value," I added a request for the best endeavors of the department toward its recovery, as the postage really had been prepaid. On the 6th of June I received another printed circular from the department, making no reference to any previous communications, stating that a letter addressed to me, but held for postage, would be forwarded upon receipt of a postage stamp. I immediately returned this circular, as requested, with another stamp enclosed, and on the 10th of June I received my letter, with the seal broken.

SUMMARY.

Two letters to the Post-office Department.
Two stamps do. do.
Two circulars from the do.
Distance from point of departure to destination, three miles.
Time, thirteen days.

Now, Mr. Editor, I presume my experience is that of very many others, and the question arises, What ought we to do? Should we suffer in silence? I understand the fault to be with the law, not with the Department. Perhaps you will tell me to write to "my member of Congress;" yet I would infinitely prefer to appeal to every member of Congress if you can grant me the requisite space. Presuming upon your acquiescence, therefore, let me beg them to remedy this evil of which my facts are an abundant illustration. Make it the rule, gentlemen, that all our letters ought to be prepaid. If we forget or fail, charge us twice or thrice the usual postage for them, or more, if need be. But cut the present "red tape" in some way, at all events. Give us our letters, give us them promptly and regularly, and give us postage stamps that will "stick."

I am, etc.,

A VALUABLE LIBRARY TO BE SOLD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Several days ago I received a letter from a Jewish scholar in Amsterdam, Holland, from Mr. M. Roest, who is favorably known throughout the learned world as an eminent Hebraist and as one of the foremost Hebrew bibliographers of our time, which letter, amongst many other topics, expresses an idea on a certain subject which I deem it my duty not to withhold from the American public. Perhaps some reader might be induced thereby to an action that would be highly praiseworthy.

There is at present in Amsterdam a Jewish library for sale, the like of which is not in all America. The bookseller, Frederik Muller (Heerengracht, K. K. 130, Amsterdam), in whose charge the collection is, intends to sell the same by auction in the first week of November next. A catalogue of the books is now being printed. "It would indeed be a pity"—so Mr. Roest writes to me, and I translate from his letter—"if this grand collection should be torn asunder. America ought to acquire it. Some public library, some institution of learning, some Jewish congregation, ought to buy it en bloc. America would then come into possession of a collection of Hebraica and Judaica which, if properly fostered and judiciously augmented, soon might be favorably compared with the great Hebrew libraries in the Bodleian in Oxford and in the British Museum in London. The collection spoken of contains more than 3,000 printed Hebraica, more than 2,000 Judaica, about 100 manuscripts in Hebrew, Spanish, and Hollandish, and beside these many engravings, portraits, etc. Amongst the books are a great number of incunabula, of books printed in the sixteenth century, books printed on parchment, even some unica."

Is there not a library in the land for which this literary treasure could be bought? Is there no rich Jewish congregation in New York willing to invest some thousands of dollars? Indeed, I should be happy if I could think I had drawn the attention of able and willing persons to the matter in such a manner as to secure the collection for America.

I am, dear sir, yours, etc.,
B. FELSENTHAL.

Notes.

LITERARY.

In connection with Messrs. Rivington & Co., of London, Messrs. Scribner, Welford & Co. will publish immediately Doctor Newman's "Parochial and Plain Sermons." Their author has hitherto been unwilling to republish this work, which he prepared before he became a Roman Catholic, and for a long time it has been next to impossible to procure a copy. In its new form it will consist of eight octavo volumes, which will contain all the well-known sermons—the "Parochial," written, preached, and published between 1825 and 1843, the "Plain," contributed to the series of "Tracts for the Times." No change whatever will be made in the text. What has made Doctor Newman give his long withheld consent to the republication of these sermons, we are not told. He would decline, of course, to stand by all that he said when he wrote them, but probably thinks his error was rather in saying too little than in saying anything wrong, and believes that, so far as they go, the sermons will do only good. It will be nearly a year before all the eight volumes are out.—George Routledge & Sons will issue a shilling edition of "The Charles Knight Shakespeare." It will be in one volume of 730 pages. It will, we suppose, be sold in this country by Messrs. Routledge & Sons for fifty cents. The paper and printing of the specimen pages which we have seen are surprisingly good.

—The prizes offered by the Philadelphia Union League for the four best "essays on the legal organization of the people to select candidates for office" have just been awarded. The committee has been almost excessively considerate of the feelings of the competitors in the manner of making known its decision. Only the successful candidates have been notified of the result, and the names of these have not been publicly announced. The unsuccessful men are to understand from their not receiving notifications that their essays failed, and whether they have failed or not will not be discovered till the fortunate writers proceed to the dignity of print, as they all probably will.

—At Hong Kong the 2,151 American and European souls have boldly begun the publication of a weekly magazine with photographic illustrations. For some little time, we believe, our fellow-citizens in Aliaska have been publishing a newspaper half in Russian and half in English. These are two of the latest born of such periodicals. It is a pity that they all, wherever they are published—India, Africa, Aliaska, or where not—are too apt to be exclusively collections of home news for the exiles. It is natural. But they might without too much difficulty, one would think, do much good in being permanent, stationary travellers, as it were, in foreign realms and lands remote—travellers willing as able to tell tales to us home-keeping folk. Once in a while an Indian paper does so; gives us new, valuable, and interesting information of the people among whom, though not for whom, it is published; but generally the wandering newspaper of the wandering Anglo-Saxon is severely for the wanderer alone, and a cheap way of subscribing for them for us who live in civilization is to buy files of our own old journals, especially such as have long market reviews and much shipping intelligence.

—It was long ago said in praise of Wisdom and to encourage her followers, that "she filleth all their house with things desirable." If we may understand by the Wisdom of the Apocryphal writings the power that presides over a certain portion of our religious press, the text is just now getting a striking commentary. A paper to which, out of politeness, we decline "to give the benefit of our circulation" is printing each week a long list of the desirable things which its lovers may secure for their houses and persons by bringing it new subscribers. A sewing-machine is one of them; another is a piano; another is a "Webster's" or "Worcester's Unabridged;" a cyclopædia is another. Other lots are thus described:

"Five quart bottles of Woodworth's French Violet Ink (see advertisement) for five names and $12 50. Ten bottles for ten names and $25. This superior ink is used throughout our entire establishment.

"A Derrick & Felgemaker Portable Pipe Organ for Church, for two hundred names and $500, worth $450. Larger Organ in same proportion.

"An Oroide Gold Watch, Swiss manufacture, for twelve names and $30."

Watches, in fact, would appear to have very great fascinating power over the ordinary subscriber; no less than six or eight kinds are specified by the publishers, who, furthermore, seem to be rather easy in their dealings:

"A Gold Watch, Waltham, American, worth $100, every one can have for eighty-five names and the full subscription money, $2 50, for each.

"Or, a Silver American Waltham Watch, worth $30, for twenty names and $50; or, one worth $25, for fifteen names and $37 50. Every man or woman should remember this. Send in all the names you get, and the balance as soon as you can get them."

It is, we suppose, proper to stimulate agents to great activity and zeal by holding out to them such prizes. But we confess that about the "Oroide Gold Watch" we have serious doubts. There is a look about you of encouraging humbug when you tempt a man to shine in "Oroide Gold;" and to abstain from even the appearance of evil is a saying we all ought to bear in mind—particularly if we are a religious paper, whose general tone is apt to be as influential as its words can be.

—Probably the very latest of epithalamia written in the English tongue is one now before us, recently received from England. It is beautifully printed, impressive as regards margins, and in its appearance worthy of being offered and dedicated, "by august and gracious permission of his Majesty Victor Emanuel II.," to Prince Umberto and the Princess Margherita. "The Benison" is the title of it. Its author announces himself as a master of arts of Oxford and of Cambridge also. But we do not know that we advise people to get it and read it. By reason of increasing age, we suppose, and infirmities that grow upon us, and a gradual sealing of the fresh young fountains, we, for our own part, take a small and steadily diminishing delight in lays of troth-plight,

"Where rapturous chorus fans the flame of song."

Though, for that matter, a man might be fond of nuptial songs and not like this one:

"The Day shone bright,
Lay vanquish'd Night—
Blind Darkness went,
For ever spent—
Came Life, came Breath,
Defying Death—
Came Freedom, free, Came Victory!" . . .

We do not find that any part of the ode is really better than this. It is a good illustrative example of the truth, often exemplified, that a man and master of arts, capable of being in prose a respectable member of society (vide preface to "The Benison"), may in verse make himself really ridiculous, and never in the least suspect it. The book, with its large, handsome pages, is an excellent one for "mounting," and we commend it to the attention of persons who have portraits of Humbert, his wife, Victor Emanuel, any of his predecessors, Cupid, the Genius of Italy or Italia, Freedom, and so forth, and pictures of wreaths of maidens dancing, of Blooming Summers scattering flowers, and similar figures.

—Speaking of mounted books, we are reminded of one recently imported by Messrs. Scribner, Welford & Co., which possesses rather more interest than most books of the kind. It is "The Father's Revenge: a Tragedy, with other Poems"—all of them being the offspring of the muse of that Earl of Carlisle whose name is of frequent recurrence in Byron's earlier performances. A fine inserted portrait of the noble author gives him a face of the order of vacuous Scotch faces—one which justifies Oblivion for having made a prey of his tragical and other poems, and which seems also to account for some of his ward's trying observations. Besides this there are many other inserted plates, after designs which probably the author of "The Father's Revenge" caused to be made for the illustration of that work. The dons and donnas of the tragedy of the period are seen to swoon and draw swords, and menace and dissolve in grief in a pleasing manner, and the eye aids the mind to understand how great a deliverance was wrought by Lord Carlisle's ward and Sir Walter. Illustrated works of more value than this, and which also form a part of the importation newly added to Messrs. Scribner & Welford's stock, are an atlas folio containing six hundred of Gilray's caricatures, accompanied by an octavo volume of descriptive notices of the men and things satirized by the artist; some twenty-two volumes, several of them very scarce, of the works of Gilray's great successor, George Cruikshank; one fine and one splendid edition of Grammont; and, finally, an old folio, two volumes in one, of Bible prints, by Romaine de Hooghe, with descriptive text in Dutch. We must refer our readers to a late catalogue for the names of several hundreds of other imported books, to read whose names even is a sort of pleasure to the book-buyer. But we may mention here a complete set of the well-known Retrospective Review, which many college libraries want, and ought not to want unless they are far richer than most of the college libraries of our new country in "Curious, Useful, and Valuable Old Authors," and rejoice in a population of readers more learned and critical than most undergraduates were formerly.

—Many good judges have held the opinion that sound literature prepared not with exclusive reference to the tastes of boys is the best

"Boy Literature." This, at any rate, can be said in favor of their view, that the man or woman writing for men and women has a valuable safeguard against his work's being vitiated by the curse of ungenuineness—humbug is often the proper word—in that he has in his knowledge of himself a guiding standard as to what he shall say and how he shall say it. He is, so to speak, writing to himself. It is a rare genius who has the sympathetic imagination so developed that when he sets about writing for children he is not writing at a conjectural understanding and supposed tastes—drawing his bow at a venture. So we have few enough classics in the child's library, and of the few that we have not all, perhaps not the most, were originally intended for children. For our own part, we should call most books for children "unhealthy" on this account; very unhealthy they might be called if the child's digestive powers were not generally so strong. The ability to skip, so necessary to all readers, is fortunately great in children. But below the indirectly injurious books for boys, as to which the boys must take their chance, is the mass of directly poisonous literature that boys eagerly devour when it is put before them, and which their elders are bound to prevent their seeing. Attention has just been called to this matter by the robberies, followed by a remarkably brutal attempt at murder, recently committed by two little English boys, the younger of whom was hardly eleven years old. We have had the same thing here; the known instances are numerous in which similar crimes were directly consequent on the reading of "yellow-covered literature." Once in a while the newspapers print accounts of boys banded together as housebreakers, or occupants of some disgraceful youthful club-room. Probably most of our readers can recall two or three such cases as within their own knowledge. It is well when the infected children make known their disease so soon; the unpublished ruin arising from this cause is immense and harder to deal with. But in spite of a recent act of the Legislature we have flourishing openly among us a literature that plainly is making murderers, as any one may see who walks up and down Broadway. One passes a policeman on his post, and next, within ten steps perhaps, two or three boys staring at a newspaper-stand adorned with a picture where a man breaks in somebody's head with an iron bar, or "a jealous woman knifes her rival," or "a negro is skinned alive and then burnt." Beyond a doubt some of the young spectators will pay for their studies by being hanged by-and-by. There is nothing, we suppose, to prevent Superintendent Kennedy's putting a stop to the public exhibition of certain brutifying newspapers any morning that he chooses. Meantime Mr. Bergh might, without straining his conscience or misspending his society's funds, try how much virtue there is in the present act against their existence. The connection is close enough between such pictures and cruelty to any animal that is in the power of the men who delight in them.

—Dr. Tobler, of Switzerland, the well-known writer of monographs on Palestine, and one of the most learned travellers who has ever explored the Holy Land, has published a "Bibliographia Geographica Palestinæ." It comes down to the close of 1864, and embraces not only all works relating to his subject, but views and maps as well. It is indispensable to the close student of Biblical antiquities, for Tobler's erudition in this department is even beyond that of Ritter and Robinson, and his judgments are generally fair. At any rate, they are always severe enough; there is no over-leniency in the man, and he takes a peculiar pleasure in launching hard adjectives at worthless books. He is a physician in extensive practice at Horn, near Lake Constance; as a man he is gruff, harsh, and opinionated; but his life-long devotion to the study of Palestine and all that pertains to it makes him a peculiarly competent judge of its literature.

LINDA TRESSEL.*

AMONG the new books of the present moment there are many more noteworthy than the little story whose name we transcribe; but we have read "Linda Tressel" because it is by the author of "Nina Balatka," and because it is as clear as noonday to our penetrating intellect that the author of "Nina Balatka" is but another title of the author of "Barchester Towers" and "The Small House at Allington." Mr. Trollope's style is as little to be mistaken as it is to be imitated, and we find it in this anonymous tale in all its purity—with its flatness and simpleness, its half-quaint ponderosity and verbosity, and all its roundabout graces. Mr. Trollope has, of course, his own reasons for suppressing his name, reasons which we have no desire to investigate; but if perchance his motive had been partially to refute the charge that he has exhausted his vein and that his later novels owe their popularity only to the species of halo irradiated by his signature, he may assure himself that he has been amply successful. The author of these two little German tales must, in fact, by this time have become proof against all doubt of his being a born story-teller. These short novels are rich with their own intrinsic merits, and looking at them candidly, taking the good with the bad and comparing them with the multitudinous host of kindred works, we find ourselves ready to say that they contain more of the real substance of common life and more natural energy of conception than any of the clever novels now begotten on our much-tried English speech.

"Nina Balatka," our readers will probably remember, was a young bourgeoise of Prague, who, being minded to take a husband, was determined to take a lover at the same time, and had the bad taste to prefer a Jew. Persecuted and reviled by her family, and finally alienated from her lover and reduced to the extremity of suffering, she is ultimately redeemed from her sorrows by the gentleman himself and locked fast within the gates of matrimony. The story was told in so simple and uninspired a fashion as to be absolutely dull, and yet if you could bring yourself to have patience with its dulness—which was certainly a great deal to ask—it seemed full of truthfulness and pathos. In "Linda Tressel" you have to make the same concession to the author; but here the reward is even richer. Toward the close, without in the least departing from its dulness, without raising its key or smuggling in any leavening substance from abroad, or calling upon the averted muse, but by simply keeping its sturdy shoulders to the wheel, the story forces its way up into truly tragic interest and dignity. We doubt that Mr. Trollope has ever written anything more touching and forcible—more replete with that abject human quality in which he is master—than the pages from the passage in which Linda is described as receiving her lover at the door of her room to the end of the book. And it is really a matter of which he may be proud that he should have written these pages in the way we have attempted to indicate. They have not a whit more purely literary merit than will decently clothe the narrative. They are neither seasoned with wit nor sweetened with poetry. As far as the narrator is concerned, he brings nothing to his task but common sense and common sensibility. The whole force of the story lies just where, after all, it should—in the story, in its movement, its action, and the fidelity with which it reflects the little patch of human life which the author unrolls, heaven-wise, above it. When you can add nothing to a story in the telling, you must rest your claim to your reader's gratitude on your taking away as little as possible. This, it seems to us, is the ground for Mr. Trollope's claim, and standing on this ground he stands with his head above his competitors. More clearly and honestly than they, with less of false delineation and false coloring, he repeats in literature the image projected by life upon his moral consciousness. The lines are somewhat blurred in being thus reproduced, and the colors somewhat deadened; they have nothing of ideal perfection or radiance; but they are true; human nature recognizes herself.

Linda Tressel is an orphan, with a small property, living in Nuremberg under the care of her aunt, Madame Stanbach, a woman of rigid virtue and exemplary piety. In the same house lives an elderly man, a town-clerk, Peter Steinmarc by name, as lodger of the two ladies. It occurs to Madame Stanbach that it would be a good thing that her niece, excellent girl, should marry this old Steinmarc—this rusty coeval of Linda's father, with his big shoes adapted to his protuberant corns, his scanty hair, his greasy hat, and his vulgar probity. We mention these little traits as the chief items in the description given by Mr. Trollope. The reader will see that they do not penetrate very far into the realms of psychology and cannot exactly be said to embody the essence of the man. And yet for the author they form an all-sufficient starting-point. With a hundred touches like these Peter Steinmarc is placed before us quite vividly enough to make us feel in our own hearts all of poor Linda's antipathy, and yet at the same time all of her suitor's own half-conscientious obstinacy and self-contentment. The idea of such a match is, of course, revolting to Linda; she refuses, resists, and rebels. Her aunt and her aunt's protégé persist and press upon her with a pitilessness which, through various tribulations, finally brings her to the grave. The story is little more than this: A simple, lovely, lonely girl, struggling to the death, without help, or with such help as only aggravated her case, with two hard, vulgar persecutors. The peculiar merit of the story—in fact, its beauty, we may say—lies in the perfect moderation with which it is told. It is not the moderation of a Goethe, let us say; of one who stands on a great intellectual height, far above the heady fumes of our simmering human prejudices; it is something more agreeable than this—a moderation born of humble good sense and sympathetic discretion. The pathos of Linda Tressel's fate is deepened by the perfect mediocrity of her persecutors—to say nothing of her own. The author has made his heroine neither a whit more interesting, nor her enemies a whit more cruel, than the story strictly requires, them to be. This universal mediocrity gives the work a depressing and melancholy character which we may be certain that the author is very far from suspecting; inasmuch as if he had duly measured it, he would be, instead of one of the smallest, one of the greatest of artists. Linda Tressel, with all the dignity of her trials, is an essentially common girl, chiefly, we imagine, because the author is a man of a common intellect, and not because he had nicely calculated the dramatic effect of making her common—of making her, in the depths of her sorrow, talk in the most natural and unilluminated and harrowing commonplaces. And so with Madame Stanbach and Steinmarc. The former is an extremely good woman—a narrow woman, to begin with, and contracted and desiccated by religious bigotry, but utterly incapable of deliberate unkindness, and for ever invoking the approval of her conscience and her God—such as they are. She is cruel and fatal from simple dulness and flatness and impenetrability—from the noxious promptings of an unventilated mind. Peter Steinmarc plays his dingy part in obedience to petty covetousness, and petty vanity, and obstinacy and resentment. It is all the sublime of prose. But better than anything in the story, we think—and here it is quite impossible not to accuse the author of having builded better than he knew—is the nature of Ludovic Valcarm's influence and action. He is the author of that assistance which we spoke of as having been so detrimental to Linda's cause. A disavowed nephew of Steinmarc and a clandestine lover of the young girl, he himself crowns her cup with bitterness. In fact, we are told very little about him; we are obliged to put up with a few bare hints. But the vulgarity of character which we suspect under the warmth and audacity of his conduct, at the same time that we deeply appreciate the effect of such warmth upon the poor girl's starveling fancy, serves to round off and complete the tragic homeliness and prosiness of the tale. We remember few touches more painful than the passage in which, when she is making her escape to Augsburg with her lover, and she sits in the darkness in the railway carriage, racked with anguish and half-frozen, she discovers the man for whom she has abandoned everything to be grossly and stupidly asleep. This whole episode, indeed, is admirably related, without the slightest discordance of color as we have said, in all its length of abject soberness and dinginess, as well as the subsequent scenes describing Linda's return and final betrothal to Steinmarc. The atmosphere of the tale here becomes positively heavy with despair and madness and coming death, and it is not too much to say that it recalls forcibly that brooding thunderous stillness which (having read it a long time since) our imagination associates with the last pages of "The Bride of Lammermoor" as a prelude to the catastrophe. There are a great many different ways by which an effect may be reached. Scott travelled through romantic gorges and enchanted forests, and scaled the summits of mountains crowned with feudal towers. Mr. Trollope trudges through crowded city streets and dusty highways and level garden paths. But the two roads converge and meet at the spot where a sweet young girl lies dying of a broken heart. It matters little whether she be called Lucy Ashton or Linda Tressel.

The Artist's Dream. By Ellerton Vincent. (New York: G. W. Carleton & Co. 1868.)—The author of this book evidently got his idea of the plot from Pinnock's Catechism, and his title would have been less misleading had it read thus: "The Artist's Dream; or, History made Easy." The facile conundrum forms in it the model of discourse, and the characters are animated by so irrepressible a zeal for imparting useful information that they form a series of peripatetic school-books, carefully adapted to very mean capacities. Their conversation slides, by easy transitions, from Frederick the Great to Washington and Julius Cæsar—from Mary Stuart to Paradise and the Protestant Reformation. Thus, for instance, do two females of tender age while away the hours of friendly intercourse—the stream of discourse having meandered from a lace collar to the Queen of Scots:

"Mary's health became seriously impaired and her beautiful hair prematurely grey.

"'Did she die in prison?'

"'No; Elizabeth signed a warrant for her execution, an act which will be a lasting disgrace to the memory of the maiden queen.'

"'When did it happen?'

"'In 1587, more than two hundred years ago.'

"'Oh! what a long time,' said Marion. 'When as many years roll by, where shall we be?'

"It was a solemn question; and the heart of the young teacher echoed, Where? She replied that she trusted they would be found among the redeemed.

"'Do people go immediately to heaven when they die?'

"'It is the general belief that, when the soul is departed from the body, it goes to an intermediate state called Paradise, and remains there until the judgment. The good then enjoy eternal rest in heaven, and the wicked are sent to a place of punishment.'

"'And that is called hell!' said Marion. . . . 'How came we by the prayer 'Our Father who art in Heaven'?

"'King Alfred translated the Holy Gospels into the Saxon tongue; and hence we derive the simple and beautiful prayer given us by our Saviour.'

"'He must have been a good man.'

"'Yes, he was very pious, and one of the greatest monarchs that ever swayed the sceptre of England. He was sent to Rome to receive his education. There he drank deeply of the fountain for which he had so long thirsted. The regular militia was established by him, and he greatly encouraged literature.'"

One naturally takes it for granted that in a novel there must be a hero and a heroine, not to say a love story—but in this case any traces of them which may exist are so overlaid with lore that we have been unable to find them. In looking over the pages one frequently finds in juxtaposition two persons of opposite sexes either engaged in fishing, or ensconced behind the usual drawing-room curtains, or playing backgammon together—but they never seem to be the same pair twice, and their thoughts are always rolling on subjects far too awful to admit the idea of love-making. Here are a couple, supposed to be "angling":

"'Have you always resided in the country?' she asked.

"'Yes; with the exception of four years that I was in college. I sometimes wish that I could travel and see something of city life, but perhaps I would be less happy than I am now. Did you ever consider how many of the greatest men, both in ancient and modern times, found their chief enjoyment in rural life? Homer, Hesiod, Seneca, Varro, and Horace. Cicero, in particular, seems to have delighted in agricultural pursuits. The emperors and dictators of Rome were ever ready to retire from the honors of state to their peaceful villas; and even employed couriers to run between the capital and their rural residences. We all know how welcome the retirement of Mount Vernon was to Washington. What exquisite glimpses of rural life have been given us by Wordsworth, Spencer, and a host of other bards."

On another occasion, when an old lady, who is, on the whole, rather less erudite than any one else in the book, interrupts what she supposes to be a lovers' conversation with the question, "What interesting topic were you discussing?" she learns with ill-concealed disappointment that they "were speaking of the instinct of the brute creation, compared with the reason of human beings"—from which topic the talk naturally enough flows to Julius Cæsar, who "expressed in public his disbelief in the immortality of the soul. He belonged to the Epicurean school, you know, and denied all divine mediation in human affairs."

"'And yet, with all his atheism,' replied Augusta, 'it was not without hesitation that he crossed the Rubicon.'

"'Man is a queer compound,' said the captain. 'He is an anomaly, an incongruity.'"

Count out the old lady above-mentioned, and there is no one of the characters who occupies any proud pre-eminence over any other as to the number of facts he has in possession or as to a keen perception of possible chances for ventilating them. People meet with the ostensible purpose of going to the Mammoth Cave, or having a masquerade ball, or visiting studios, or going to Paris in company—but really for the sake of being encyclopædic and mutually instructive. In the Kentucky Cave the author artfully allows the oil in the lamps to burn out in order to leave his dramatis personæ under the necessity of "playing" that they are "in Dante's Inferno, under the special guidance of Virgil." And when they "stopped in front of a rock forty feet in length, which all instantly remarked must be the Giant's Coffin, 'Who knows but what Titus [sic] rests beneath this stone?' remarked Captain Ryland.

"'That is not possible,' replied Arthur, 'for mythology tells us that his body covers nine acres of ground. It would be a fit receptacle for Polhemus [sic], or one of the Cyclops.'"

In the following fine passage the author forsakes the routine of the more ordinary class-books, except the geographies, and soars to the level of Boyd's Rhetoric. Ellerton is describing a young man who possibly is the hero that we missed finding:

"'Ellersley Cavendish is again in his native land, after an absence of five years. What advantages he has thrown away! He travelled for some time in Great Britain, France, and Germany. He crossed the mighty Alps. He stood beneath the great dome of St. Peter's, and listened to the far-famed Miserere. He gazed at the wonderful pyramids of Egypt, tarried a while in the Holy City, and knelt devoutly on Mount Olivet. Yet he has returned home to study medicine with his father.'"

The Special Operations of War; Comprising the Forcing and Defence of Defiles, the Forcing and Defence of Rivers, and the Passage of Rivers in Retreat; the Attack and Defence of Open Towns and Villages; the Conduct of Detachments for Special Purposes, and Notes on Tactical Operations in Sieges. By Francis J. Lippitt, late Colonel Second California Infantry; Brevet Brigadier-General U. S. Volunteers, author of "Tactical Use of the Three Arms," and a "Treatise on Entrenchments." (Providence: Sidney S. Rider & Brother. 1868.)—We are very glad to see a third volume added to General Lippitt's series of excellent little books. They are well and handsomely printed, and, without being too large for the pocket, they contain a great deal of well-selected and well-arranged information on the subject of which they treat. The present volume is even an improvement on the last, the "Treatise on Entrenchments." That, of necessity, was, to a considerable extent, a dictionary of technical terms, but the subject of this hardly requires a single definition, and the special operations of war are, to all but highly educated and scientific officers, more interesting studies than the preparation, attack, and defence of entrenchments, with their precise and comparatively inflexible rules.

In a former number of the Nation we bore our testimony to the excellence of the "Treatise on Entrenchments." What we said of that book might be repeated of this, but with additions, viz., that the subjects discussed are judiciously chosen, and that the discussion of each is well considered, well reasoned, and well put. There is not a word too much, and, we are inclined to think, not a word too little. Most of us hope that there will not be another war in America during the present century at least, but there may be, and it is a wise maxim to prepare for war in time of peace. Our country now numbers many men in civil life to whom the art of war has become an interesting study, and our regular army, though not large, has a cadre large enough to include many officers who must desire to learn what they do not know, or to refresh their recollection of what they have learned and forgotten. To all such we cordially commend the book. They will find it thoroughly business-like. It is all to the point; and yet the illustrations are so well chosen, and so generally taken either from our recent war or from Napoleon's campaigns, that it is as far as possible from being dull. The general reader, with a taste for military subjects, will find it agreeable reading, and will be probably much interested to find how simple is the explanation of many of the successes and disasters of our war, and how directly traceable they were to the observance or violation of some well-settled military principle. The author is eminently successful in perceiving the principles involved in actual operations, and he points the moral to be drawn from such of them as he refers to in a way that readily fixes it in the memory.

General Lippitt generally writes so well that he can afford to take a bit of censure upon a matter of mere style, so we remark that the language of the following sentence is not justified by the usage of any good writer, military or other: "In the siege of a fortress of masonry, the besieging army has but to . . . and the time of the place is considered up." It is fair to add, however, that such faults are not only not common, but that this is a solitary instance.

Elements of Agriculture. By Geo. E. Waring, Jr. (New York: Tribune Association.)—Mr. Waring's book was first published as a text-book for schools, and was excellent for that purpose. Like all manuals which only design to introduce a young student to a new subject, most of the facts and theories were briefly stated, and much left either to inference or to the elaboration of teachers. It was easy, therefore, to content one's self with its general dryness and encyclopædic character; but in its present form—revised, enlarged, and offered to us as a general treatise—it has lost its value as a text-book, without a corresponding gain in interest. In a simple and prepossessing way the author tells us that the subject of agriculture is too large and varied to be treated in a small compass, and that accordingly he has been compelled to make general statements—some almost inaccurate, and many very unscientific—in order to save time and space; but hopes that the reader will excuse the want of finish and possible confusion. He has concentrated a great deal of useful information and some good advice in a small compass, and his book will be of service to many amateurs and some practical men, if it does not, by giving just a little too much condensed statement, discourage study on the part of the reader.

Recent Republications.—There are very different opinions in the matter of teaching mankind by the aid of romance, and possibly the border-land is not well defined. What may be written in a novel or story for fact, for the sake of the possible, and yet be fiction, seems to be an open question. But surely it is straining a cord to its utmost tension when a writer pretends to give you his personal experience in a practical matter—buys his land, of just so many acres, for a specific sum; adds a precise money value in improvements, plants a definite area with crops at a fixed cost; cultivates, gathers, and sells those crops for a profit or a loss—and gets the whole tissue of his theories and facts out of the depths of his consciousness, as the German did his camel. "Ten Acres Enough" is given as a personal experience, and has led hundreds of poor but enthusiastic people to try experiments which have involved many in ruin and sorrow, and yet is fiction throughout. That it seems true is its worst feature, because it deals with the actual facts of life in a way calculated to lead men to spend their time and money in speculations which are quite likely to prove disastrous. It is very pleasant reading, as is "Farming for Boys"*—a reprint from Our Young Folks—which, being understood to be a romance, would be a good book for general circulation, containing many valuable hints, and likely to help and teach country boys and girls—if they ever see it—that their lives need not be all drudgery. On the whole, however, it must have an enervating influence, for although all the things described might happen, if all the conditions were right, no allowance is made for the contingent difficulties and obstacles which are almost sure to block the progress of theoretical agricultural enterprise, and fill their projectors with bitter mortification. Boys and girls, of course, must be entertained, and they like stories, and like to dream of making money and doing all sorts of hard work if they are to grow suddenly rich by it; and as a stimulus to their imagination this kind of agricultural pap may be nourishing and excusable. Certainly it would be more manly to confess the fiction at the outset, and get a hearing and belief by the reasonableness of the story.

Against Mrs. Conant's "Butterfly Hunters,"† also a reprint from Our Young Folks, the objection that it is fiction will not lie. Her aim being to interest the young in a rather tempting natural pursuit, she is at liberty to stimulate curiosity by the use of almost any supposable incidents and adventures. Upon the art thus displayed by the author depends her success; and judged by that, in the present instance, we cannot think her wholly successful. There are some glimpses of boy nature and boy language in the story, but as a whole it is clearly not real. The difficulty, however, of uniting science with sport is great enough to make failure pardonable; and we have no hesitation in choosing between Mrs. Conant and Mayne Reid, who writes for the same juvenile magazine. The butterfly illustrations are quite as good as need be, though far removed from the extraordinary excellence of Mr. Marsh's engravings in Harris's well-known work.

The very ingenious one-syllable Crusoe‡ has been issued from an American press in a style if anything superior to the English edition. We could not name at this moment a book better deserving to be given to young readers, or to be used in primary schools either as a text-book or as a prize for excellence. It is remarkable for avoiding the great stumbling-block of most writers for children—not polysyllabic words as such, but words too big for the age addressed, which are apt to be at once long, and derived from classical rather than from Saxon roots.

The Week.

CONGRESS has been waiting till the tax on whiskey and tobacco is finally arranged, and, meantime, has been getting through with a good deal of work, of a kind not specially interesting to the general public. On Wednesday week the bill in relation to the national currency passed the Senate, and now goes to the House, where it is likely to pass without much discussion or delay. It is the bill in which Mr. Sherman endeavored to expand the currency, on the plea of establishing national banks in the Territories and the South. He was unable to effect this, however, and the parts of the country unsupplied with banks are to be supplied by a diminution in the currency of those States now oversupplied. The House, on the same day, laid on the table the bill to reduce the burdens on American commerce by allowing a drawback of the duties on certain materials used in ship-building. The agricultural and mining interests opposed and defeated the bill. On Thursday there was debate in the Senate on a topic that has once before been pretty fully discussed. The Golden Fleece is an American vessel which sailed under the British flag during the rebellion, for the reason that her owners did not want to lose her, and our Government seemed quite unable to do its duty by its citizens in protecting their ships from Confederate cruisers. Her owners now want an American register for her, but the Senate refuses, and virtually declares that it was the owners' duty to stop business, or to carry it on at imminent risk of losing their property, or under the disadvantage of paying war-risks that would soon have driven them from the sea. There can be little doubt that it is time for Congress to relax the stringency of its patriotic rule on this subject. In the House, on the same day, a stop was put to a gigantic fraud on the Osage Indians and the American people, by which 8,000,000 acres of Indian land were sold at a ridiculously low rate to a railroad company. "A commission of thieves" Mr. Julian called the men who negotiated the transfer. In the House, on Friday, a bill framed by Mr. O'Neill, of Philadelphia, which may be called a bill for the protection of immigrants during the coming campaign, was passed. It regulates the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels, and is a humane measure which may possibly be enforced. The House, on Saturday, made short work of the President's message in regard to the Arkansas bill, passing that measure over the veto in a very few minutes by 111 years to 31 nays. On Monday the Senate passed the bill over the veto by 30 yeas to 7 nays, and on Tuesday administered the oath to the new senators. On Monday Mr. Schenck brought in his bill to tax whiskey and tobacco, and that will be the subject of discussion, probably, for some days.

Mr. Schenck, from the Committee of Ways and Means, has brought in the new Tax bill, as instructed by the House, and we trust every body who is interested in the success of the Republican party and the safety of the public credit will read the speech he made on Monday in doing so. It must be remembered that this new bill has been forced on the committee, which is, therefore, not responsible for it. The tactics by which the regular Tax bill was defeated were, as Mr. Schenck pointed out, unprecedented in Congressional annals. Never before, we believe, has a Committee of Ways and Means been denied a hearing in defence of a financial measure of the highest importance and the result of five months' hard, honest labor, and it was only accorded in this case after a good deal of filibustering. Mr. Schenck's opinion is that, in point of time, nothing is gained by the new bill; that had the House stuck to its work at the old bill through the past week it would have got through the whiskey and tobacco sections by Monday last; and that in throwing aside provisions made by the first bill for additions to the revenue, such as the additions made to the tax on banks and the doubling of the tax on the sales of wholesale dealers, the revenue will fall short of the wants of the country. The new bill proposes to fix the whiskey tax at 60 cents instead of 70, as in the last; but the House has fixed it at 50, in spite of what appeared to be a plan organized between the whiskey ring and the enemies of Grant to defeat any attempt to change the whiskey tax at all, by repeated motions to keep it at $1, or lower to twenty-five cents, and thus keep up during the campaigns the scandal caused by the present frauds and abuses. An excellent occasion offers for people who are fond of writing letters to members of Congress to indulge their propensity. Any Republican member who now takes part in any factious opposition to the Tax bill, either by dilatory motions or otherwise, ought to be "criticised," abused, and privately dealt with, and held up to odium to any extent that may be necessary to subdue and reform him.

The House Committee, to whom was referred the question whether or not Congress has power to regulate and control railroads, have reported that, in their opinion, Congress has no such power except in the case of railroads which "form parts of continuous lines extending from one State to another." In other words, they apply to railroads the constitutional doctrine which asserts the right of Congress to control a navigable stream which is a means of commerce between two or more States, and denies the right of Congressional interference with the navigation of a stream wholly within the limits of one State and unconnected with the waters of other States. The committee were instructed, if they found that Congress had the desired power, to report a bill providing for, first, the safety of passengers; second, uniform and equitable rates of fare; third, uniform and equitable charges for freight; and, finally, proper connections of railroad with railroad. This they ask to be excused from doing; the bill should be prepared, they say, after full and careful examination of experts. We hope the question will not be allowed to drop into forgetfulness. The railroad corporations are already of immense power. They own New Jersey, for example, and, any day they like, a railroad president or two can reduce Washington to the telegraph for communication with New York. The Postmaster has to make what terms he can, not what terms the law commands, in getting the New Jersey railroads to carry the mails. We cannot tell till next October whether Mr. Drew and Mr. Vanderbilt have not now entered into an alliance which puts for many important purposes the whole State of New York into their hands. It is plain that we need a different order of things from what we had when the Constitution was adopted, when railroads were unthought of, and when the whole inter-State commerce amounted in value to what the Erie Railway does in a day or a day and a half.

It now seems as if we should never know what Judge Field, of the Supreme Court, said at Mr. Jeremiah Black's dinner party. The committee of the House appointed some months ago to enquire into the matter has asked to be discharged from the further consideration of it, without making any report. We do not like to cast any imputation on anybody, but we cannot help saying that this lame and impotent conclusion has a most suspicious look. We shall ask one or two plain questions about it; if, to use the language of another great exposer of abuses, any friend of ours thinks we shall damage ourselves by them, "we advise him to get out of the way." Has, or has not, Judge Field been seen conversing, in low tones, with any member of the committee, in any lobby or lobbies of the Capitol, during the last three months? What has he done with his last quarter's salary, and with his last California dividends? Are they lying in his bank? If not, what has become of them? We hardly venture to hope that he will answer these questions. Men that have been at so many dinner parties as he are apt to be hardened; but we may safely leave it to a betrayed public to put a proper construction on his silence.

To make Senator Sherman's bill for keeping the currency equally diffused really effective, it is not enough to make a fresh distribution of currency among the several States; a supplemental bill should be passed, forbidding the accumulation, under any circumstances, of more than a certain amount of currency in any one State. This will be the way to get the better of the greedy Wall Street men. We all know, too, the great inconvenience which is occasioned, both in domestic life and in agriculture, by the unwillingness of water to run up-hill. Why not let us have a short bill, before Congress adjourns, depriving water of this disagreeable quality, and making it squirt and flow in all directions with equal facility? The saving of labor this would cause would be enormous.

We spoke some months ago of the attempt which was being made by the Californian Legislature to break through the conditions attached to the grant, made by the General Government to the State, of the Yo-Semite Valley. The condition was that that magnificent scene should be reserved for ever as a park or pleasure-ground for all comers. The Californian Legislature, however, "moved thereto," no doubt, as the old indictments say, "by the instigation of the devil," whom the spectacle of human enjoyment of so much beauty and sublimity would, doubtless put fairly beside himself, have been conveying large tracts of the valley to two squatters, whose cuttings and diggings and taverns and liquors would utterly deface it, and convert it into a repulsive resort of tipplers and trotters. The bill has been vetoed by the governor and passed over his head, and now only waits the confirmation of Congress to take effect; but this, we trust, it will never receive. There ought to be enough men of taste and sensibility in both Houses to block the scheme effectually. The Valley is, at present, in the hands of a commission, composed of competent persons, charged with the duty of laying it out for public use. A petition against any concessions to the Californian vandals is in circulation, and ought to be numerously signed.

Mr. Johnson has sent in another veto—this time to the Arkansas bill. It was the general expectation that, sobered by events, he was going to let this opportunity escape him; but this, it seems, was based on a miscount of the time he had allowed to run by. He repeats his old argument against the right of Congress to impose any terms on any of the States, as a condition of readmission to the Union, being apparently still of opinion that this is one of the things which the President only can lawfully do. Commenting on the oath which binds the Arkansas elector not to attempt to create political discriminations between persons, on account of race or color, he asks, with much solemnity, "What will happen in case the people of Arkansas should see fit, hereafter, in defiance of this oath, to alter their constitution, and create such discriminations?" He, however, does not answer his question himself, and he can hardly expect any one else to do so.

The air is thick with rumors of a reconciliation between Butler and Grant, Mr. George Wilkes being the mediator. The correspondent of the Boston Advertiser tells the story of the negotiations in a letter to that paper, but we hope the recital will be put into a more permanent form. Butler's griefs are three: 1. That Grant removed him from the command of the Army of the James. 2. That Grant spoke unfairly of him in his report. 3. That Grant invited him to an evening party in Washington after the war. To which Grant replies: 1. That when he invited Butler to his evening party he really desired Butler's presence at that entertainment, and did not mean to insult him, as Butler cruelly and falsely imagined. 2. That when he used the phrase "bottled up," he used it in a technical military sense. The basis of reconciliation is: 1. That Grant's card of invitation be taken as a bonâ-fide invitation, intended to bring Butler to the feast. 2. That Butler's unkind return of that card be considered, as diplomatists say, non avenu. 3. That if Butler retains unpleasant recollections of his operations on the James River he may demand a court of enquiry. The latest news is of Sunday night, and at that date "Butler's friends" were understood to be satisfied.

Senator Fowler, in a speech in Tennessee, has been making some unpleasant remarks about the conduct of Messrs. Wade and Sumner in the impeachment matter, and has alleged that "the whole House of Representatives is under the lead of those good old Democrats, B. F. Butler and John A. Logan." We are very sorry that Senator Fowler can find no better occupation for his vacation than making attacks of this kind on his colleagues and on the House of Representatives, and thought this particular one both weak and foolish. But all animadversion on him is rendered unnecessary by the remark of the New York Tribune, that his attack on the House is "in wretched taste." Condemnation from the Tribune, on this point, is like a gentle tap on the scalp from a steam-hammer—nothing more is needed. A man might be a very good fellow, and be disapproved of by Chesterfield; but when the Tribune says his language is in "wretched taste," women and children, and even decent men, ought to avoid his society. Mr. Butler has retorted by showing that Senator Fowler, in 1866, travelled 500 miles to see him at his home in Lowell, "to urge him vehemently not to cease his efforts till Andrew Johnson was impeached."

It looks as if the financial question in France must shortly come to a crisis. A new loan has been announced for $88,000,000. The present Emperor found the public debt about $1,000,000,000; after the addition to it of this last loan, it will reach $2,775,000,000, and the interest on this will be equal in amount to that paid by Great Britain on a debt of $4,000,000,000, owing to the bad terms on which the Imperial loans have been negotiated. It is true that neither the debt nor the interest will then be any greater than that of the United States, but they will bear on a population which hardly increases, and which supports 500,000 men in the flower of their age in complete idleness. The financial condition of the city of Paris is, owing to Baron Haussmann's improvements, even worse than that of the State, as he bids fair to "improve" the inhabitants out of house and home. He has made three distinct sets of improvements. The first cost $52,000,000, and has been paid for; the second he was authorized to make by law, and it was to cost $30,000,000, but it turns out that it will cost $82,000,000; the third one he is now at work upon, without any authorization whatever, and it is to cost $60,000,000. Moreover, he borrowed $75,000,000 for these purposes from the Crédit Foncier, on his own motion, without any legal warrant, and had it charged to the city; and, what is more extraordinary, the Crédit Foncier lent it without asking for his authority, showing that the "legal mind" is rare enough in France to satisfy any Son of Thunder in this country who wants to have the government carried on by "popular instinct" and public speaking, without the aid of rules or forms. The "Cours des Comptes," which has in a loose way the supervision of the municipal accounts, has now brought the Baron to book, and compelled him to acknowledge a deficit. The burden disclosed is so enormous that it looks as if either a portion of it would have to be thrown on the already overtasked general treasury, or the city would have to be laid under taxes that will diminish population and drive away strangers, to whom it owes so much of its prosperity.

The last telegraphic news foreshadows the defeat of the Irish Church bill in the House of Lords; but as a dissolution of Parliament seems certain, this will not affect its ultimate fate. Mr. Disraeli, after trying to raise the "No Popery" cry with indifferent success, has taken to calling the disestablishment scheme an attempt at "revolution," and declares that the people must be consulted before anything so dreadful is accomplished. The New York World, in a long and elaborate article on this subject the other day, brought the coronation oath, binding the Queen to "maintain and preserve inviolably the settlement of the Church, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof as by law established," etc., as a reason for believing that she would be forced to veto it. We have always supposed that the question of the force of the coronation oath, as regards legislation, was settled finally in the minds of all reasonable men by the discussion created by George the Third's scruples on the Catholic question. It is certainly the general understanding of English lawyers that the oath only binds the sovereign in his executive capacity; that in his capacity as a branch of the legislature, one of the enacting powers, he is under the same restrictions and no others as the House of Commons, and is bound, in vetoing and assenting to bills, to govern himself by the same considerations. It will certainly not be asserted in terms, that it was in the power of Elizabeth's Parliament to do anything which the present Parliament is not competent to undo, which is, however, what is really asserted by implication when it is said that Parliament has no power to disestablish the Irish Church. As regards the sacredness of Church property, whatever part this idea may have played in the Middle Ages, it has now no place in the jurisprudence of any civilized country. All modern governments deal with it on the same principles as other endowments.

The Municipal Council of Florence (Italy), which seems to have the control of the schools of the city, has been discussing the question by which every Catholic country, and every country in which Catholics are to be found in large numbers, is likely to be torn during the next fifty years—for we feel sure that, whatever laws may be passed, that period, at least, will have elapsed before the priests give up the struggle—viz.: Who shall control the schools—the state or the clergy? The point raised in Florence is whether the priests shall teach religion in the common schools or not, Tuscany being still exempt from the general school law of the rest of the kingdom. It is feared that if the common schools are taken completely out of the hands of the clergy, they will use their influence to keep the children away from them. On the other hand, the firmest opponents of clerical influence and firmest defenders of educational freedom are the members of what may almost be called a new sect, the "Liberi Pensatori," or Free Thinkers, who are the enemies of all religious teaching, and, in fact, of all religious feeling. This party, the equivalent of the French Encyclopædists and English "Secularists," which is swelling its ranks every day amongst the town populations, and which refuses to concern itself with a future state at all, seems to be, in our day, the usual product of revolt against Catholicism. Protestantism, in the ordinary sense of the term, no longer gains what Catholicism loses. The chief opponent of priestly teaching at Florence, however, is a statistician, Signor Maestri, the Minister of Commerce and Agriculture, who takes the ground that no system of popular education can ever be established in Italy, or, if established, can be made effective, if the clergy are allowed to have anything to do with it, and that, as they must be fought, they may as well be fought first as last.

The Cretan trouble has entered upon a new and singular phase. The fighting has, as yet, decided nothing, inasmuch as the Cretans hold one portion of the island and the Turks another, and when we hear of peace, it means simply a temporary cessation of hostilities; but not even a truce. The Cretans have, however, been unable to make any impression on the Great Powers, and are apparently as far off from recognized annexation to Greece as ever. But they have determined to cut the knot themselves, and, accordingly, have sent deputies to Athens to represent them in the Greek Parliament. Amongst the number is M. Flourens, a French Philhellene, who has been fighting on the side of the insurgents ever since the insurrection broke out, and has actually proved enthusiastic enough to have himself "naturalized" by the Provisional Government. The sacrifice is not, however, so great as it seems, as we presume he does not lose his French citizenship by accepting that of a state of which the French Foreign Office knows nothing. The police in the Piræus attempted to prevent the delegates landing; but they have made their way to Athens, where the question of admitting them to seats has been creating a good deal of excitement. The Turkish Minister has protested in a note, in which it is said the representatives of the other Great Powers have joined. He announces that if they are received, he will demand his passports; and it is hard to see how Turkey could avoid treating it as a casus belli. The advantage to the Cretans of pressing the matter is, however, plain enough. It would be hard for them to hit on a form of demonstration more likely to impress the European imagination.

The Sultan's "Grand Council," which is to transform Turkey into a constitutional government, is getting slowly to work, and the chiefs of the rayah races, that is, the Patriarchs and Grand Rabbi, have paid him a visit in state, to thank him for his concessions. There is no good reason for supposing, however, that the scheme will work any better than other Turkish reforms. The disease of which the empire is perishing is, like all serious national diseases, moral rather than political. The fundamental reason why Turkey does not flourish is not because the laws are not good, but because Turks are Turks, and Bulgarians Bulgarians, and Greeks Greeks. There may be something behind this to account for the phenomenon of Turkish decrepitude, but if there is, it has not yet been found out. The Sultan is simply going through the hallucination by which nearly all reformers in Christian countries were possessed at the end of the last century, that all that was needed to make a nation free and happy was a well-drawn constitution. He will wake out of it, as they have done, if he lives long enough. What the combination of influences is which enables a people to live under laws of its own making no mortal can tell, though we can with tolerable certainty point out single circumstances which do not affect the case. The Hungarians are of the same race as the Turks, and yet they have shown more political capacity of a certain kind—and that a very high kind—than the Germans, who are of the same race as the English and Americans. The Irish are of the same race as the French, and yet stand lower in organizing power, while the French stand higher than any other European people. So that we may say with safety that it is not race simply which makes the spectacle of Turks sitting in parliament a comical and absurd spectacle; but what it is, who can tell? Any real solution of the difficulty would go far to account for the whole difference between Oriental and European civilization.

THE FINANCIAL PROSPECT.

It is by no means as unreasonable or unsuitable as many people think, that the national fiscal year should close with the close of June. There is, on the contrary, much wisdom in it, and it is a pity that we should not be able to take the national census also at this precise time, as it would result in a far more accurate statement of our national wealth than when taken at any other season. What a nation most needs to know in this respect is the amount of its production, the amount of its consumption, and the balance between the two, the year's surplus, the savings of the nation, the addition to the total national wealth, so as to ascertain whether the whole people as a body are making every year that addition to their substance which is one of the absolute conditions of national welfare. The summer is the time to ascertain this. In early summer, before the new crops come in to confuse the account, we can best ascertain how much we have saved out of last year's crops, how much we have failed to consume of the products of last year's labor, how much we have added to the national wealth.

For these reasons the time seems to us peculiarly appropriate for studying the condition of our national household. The data to guide us are unfortunately very imperfect, but such as they are they will enable us to arrive at many conclusions of interest and importance.

The one great feature of our national housekeeping which obtrudes itself on our attention first, last, and at all times, our national debt, must here likewise claim attention first. We find on examination that from Sept. 1, 1865, when the debt first became fairly settled and its highest point was reached, up to June 1, 1866, a period of nine months, the total amount of the debt was reduced by nearly ninety millions. In the twelvemonth from June 1, 1866, to June 1, 1867, the total amount was reduced by the very large sum of over one hundred and fifty millions. In other words, the taxes levied upon the people's property and income sufficed to pay the regular expenses of the nation and the interest on the debt, and left a surplus in nineteen months of nearly two hundred and fifty millions, or of over thirteen millions a month, to be applied to the reduction of the debt. For the twelvemonth expiring June 1, 1868, the total reduction of the debt amounts to less than six millions of dollars, or about one-fortieth of the reduction of the previous year. As there has been no important change in the rates of taxation sufficient to affect materially the result for the past year, we must infer that the amount taxed, the property and income of the people, has been less, or else that the expenses of the nation have been greater. The very imperfect information vouchsafed to the people on this subject by their servants at Washington does not enable us to judge accurately to what extent the expenses have been greater than last year. The interest on the public debt has probably not been greater; the amount of debt on which interest was paid was less than last year, and the conversion of the debt from currency interest-bearing to coin interest-bearing securities has rather diminished than increased the rate of interest; for although, when calculated in currency, the coin interest makes a larger sum, yet this should not adversely change the figures in the Treasury accounts, since the interest is collected in coin from the customs duties, and in the departmental accounts coin and greenbacks are counted equal. The other ordinary expenses of the government cannot or should not have been much greater than last year; but a large portion of the year's income has been paid out as an extraordinary expense for bounties, estimated at about sixty millions. Even this large sum, of which only a small portion has really gone to benefit the troops, to whom it was pretended to be appropriated as a national gift or reward, cannot account for the striking deficiency. Indeed, it is confidently asserted that the payments on account of bounties have been purposely retarded and evaded as long as possible, in order not to alarm the people by too unfavorable exhibits of the Treasury's condition; and at the same time journals known as warm supporters of the financial department of the administration tell us that the last month's statement would have shown a much larger increase in the debt if the War Department requisitions had not been kept back for the same reason. It is, therefore, not unfair to surmise that but for these various devices the debt, instead of nominally decreasing during the year, would have shown a real increase of considerable magnitude. How far the surmise is correct we shall probably not learn positively until the middle of August, unless the totally inexcusable and suspicious practice of entirely withholding the June debt statement should this year be abandoned. But leaving all surmise aside, the fact remains that the reduction of the debt has fallen one hundred and fifty millions below that of last year, without important reductions in the rate of taxation, and without extraordinary expenditures sufficient to account for more than a small portion of the difference.

The inference is inevitable. The taxes have not been collected, or else the taxable property and income have diminished. That the former is the case to a very large extent everybody is well aware. The open, undisguised frauds in the collection of the whiskey and tobacco taxes are a disgrace to the nation, and are exerting a most poisonous influence upon public and private morals. The income from the whiskey tax, which should produce two hundred millions, will, it is said, fall below twenty millions, the difference of one hundred and eighty millions being divided between dishonest distillers and corrupt tax collectors. But the whiskey tax was not much better collected last year than it has been this, and the falling off in our surplus, as compared with last year, cannot, therefore, be due to the whiskey ring. There is in fact only one way to account for the falling off of our national income, and that is, startling as the statement may appear, our steadily increasing poverty. The people of the United States are, and have been for several years past, steadily decreasing in wealth. It is to this cause and to no other that we must attribute the falling off in our surplus revenue during the last year.

We do not propose to answer all the objections to our assertion, especially not those based upon "our vast mineral resources, the wealth of our merchant princes, our miles of marble palaces, and our leagues of costly equipages, etc." We do not intend to enquire what the total property of the nation is estimated at in greenback dollars and cents. If a man owns one cow, she can produce but one calf and a given amount of milk per annum, whether her market price be one hundred dollars or fifty, whether the calf sell for ten dollars or twenty, and the milk for five cents a gallon or for ten. Whatever the price may be in greenbacks or gold, there will be but one cow, one calf, and just one cow's daily milk. And when the calf is killed, it will furnish just one meal to fifty or a hundred people, no matter what the meat sells at per pound. The question of wealth for a nation is not how many dollars will their milch cows sell for, but how many milch cows are there to produce calves and milk to feed a hungry people. Now, a comparison of the census of 1860 with recent reports of the Agricultural Bureau at Washington shows that, whereas the people of the United States have largely increased in numbers, the milch cows have decreased to the extent of fully five per cent.; that, where before the war enough calves were every year allowed to grow up to furnish an addition to the existing number of milch cows, during the war and since not enough have been allowed to grow up even to replace the number of cows annually dying, much less to keep up the increase required by the growing wants of a growing population. Is it to be wondered that milk and butter and meat are high? Is it necessary to attribute to paper money some miraculous influence in raising prices, when we see that in this instance, at least, the rise in prices is due to a very different cause? Is the nation poorer or not in the matter of milch cows? The farmer who values his cow at one hundred dollars may think himself richer than when his cow was worth fifty dollars only, but the nation that has four hundred thousand less milch cows to feed four millions more people can scarcely be thought to have increased its wealth.

In our climate and with our habits milk and all its products are an absolute necessity. Hence, whatever else may be recklessly consumed, wasted, or destroyed, milch cows will be carefully preserved and every effort made to keep up their number. Thus the decrease in the number of milch cows, though sufficiently startling, is in reality comparatively light. The decrease in the number of milch cows is estimated at five per cent. for the seven years; the decrease in the number of oxen and working cattle during the same time is six times as great, or over thirty per cent.; the decrease in asses and mules is twenty-eight per cent., in horses seventeen per cent., in swine nearly twenty-five per cent. Truly, most startling figures. Of all domestic animals the only one that has increased in numbers is the sheep, and here the increase is large, nearly seventy per cent. The cutting off of our cotton supply during the war, with the necessity of substituting wool wherever practicable, and the enormous demand for woollen clothing and blankets for the army, made it seem extremely profitable to raise sheep; few were killed for meat, and they increased rapidly, until we have more than the country needs or can use. In a dollars-and-cents estimate of our wealth, this increase in the number of sheep may partially offset the decrease in the number of other cattle, but it cannot in any real estimate of our wealth. The value of sheep is based almost exclusively on their wool, and we are producing more wool than we fairly know what to do with; we cannot produce it cheaply enough to export it; it is selling to-day at less in greenbacks than before the war in gold; and the whole Northwest is clamorous for higher duties on the few fine imported wools, as though that would suddenly increase the demand for our home product. (This is another illustration of the way in which prices rise and fall without the slightest reference to an inflated currency). We cannot, except under direct compulsion, as during the war, substitute wool for cotton or linen; we cannot, except to a very moderate extent, eat mutton, even were it ever so cheap, which it is not; nor do sheep yield us milk, butter, cheese, nor have we found means to make them labor for us. It appears, therefore, that the apparent increase of our wealth through the increased number of sheep will only very slightly offset the actual and positive decrease of our wealth through the decrease in the number of horses, mules, cows, and oxen. The fact remains, that we are as a people very much poorer in domestic animals than we were a few years ago.

The figures in regard to domestic animals are so striking and their importance is so readily understood, that we have given them fuller consideration. But we might go through one-half the principal objects comprising our national wealth with the same result. With the exception of corn, our supply of almost every article of farinaceous food is less to-day than it has been for years at this season. Our stock of cotton is less than one-half of what it was this time last year, and shrewd dealers fear that we, the United States of America, may again have to import cotton from Europe this summer, as our supply will not suffice to keep our mills going until the new crop comes in. Surely we are not rich in cotton. Six or seven steamships cross the Atlantic Ocean weekly from and to our shores; not one of them is ours. We are not rich in steamships, save in the costly and unwieldy monsters rusting away our wealth under the name of vessels of war out of commission or laid up in ordinary. The foreign steamers ploughing the Atlantic bring us weekly their costly loads of foreign merchandise; but even of these we have no accumulated stocks to represent our wealth. Even in foreign merchandise we are poorer than usual. Whatever arrives is rapidly consumed, and we look around in vain in all our markets to find the wherewithal to pay for them. We are exporting next to nothing; we have next to nothing to export, to pay our debts with, save—promises to pay our debts at some future time, that is to say, our bonds, five-twenties, and ten-forties. But even these are not taken abroad in sufficient numbers or with sufficient rapidity to pay for all we owe, and hence we are obliged to send gold; send it in larger quantities than we have ever sent it before—over forty-six millions of dollars since the first of January; send it, too, at a time when all Europe is at peace, and the banks of England and France and all the principal Continental cities are glutted with the accumulation of idle coin; send it until our stock even of gold has fallen off nearly twelve per cent. from what it was this time last year; send it, it seems likely, until some day we shall suddenly awake to find ourselves ten years further off from specie payments than we now seem to be.

The coming fall is going to be our season of trial. From what we have said, it must be evident that the Secretary of the Treasury has, with the utmost good management, been barely able during the last twelvemonth to keep his head above water, and that it is doubtful now whether the year about to close will not have to close on a financial deficiency, an actual increase over last year in the amount of the total debt. The prospect for the more distant future is gloomier still. In face of the fact that the present income of the Government is barely sufficient for meeting its expenditures, Congress has reduced that income one-fourth, by remitting the manufacturing taxes to the extent of about eighty millions without making the slightest provision for an increase of revenue from any other source. It proposes, it is true, to reduce the tax on whiskey, which is in itself a measure of unquestionable wisdom. But the whole administration of the revenue is so lax and irregular that honest men are compelled to protest against well-established taxes because their neighbors and competitors are not called upon to pay them; and the head of the revenue department is so much occuped with a quarrel with his official superior that he keeps the most important questions "under advisement," and both the people and the officials are beginning to believe that there is no head to the department at all. The Secretary himself is the object of violent attacks, coupled with repeated rumors of his intended resignation and of the appointment of his successor, all evidently intended to force him to resign.

It is impossible to disguise the fact that our position is a very serious one, but the whole country seems infatuated with the contrary belief, or, at least, is sunk in total apathy or wrapt in ignorant selfishness. Can it be that sensible men are indifferent to the fact that Congress is about to adjourn with an all but undoubted revenue deficit of many millions staring us in the face? Is it of little or no consequence that the two most important financial officials of the country are openly at war at the very time when our whole financial system requires the most skilful handling to prevent the most awkward complications? Who can doubt that an outbreak this summer or fall of the oft-threatened war in Europe would affect us tenfold more injuriously than it did two years ago? May be, much of the indifference is due to the vague hope that good luck will carry us through this winter without disaster, and to the unquestioning faith in the honesty, purity, and ability of the administration which General Grant is to give to the nation after March next. May he prove worthy of so much trust!

WHAT THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY WANTS.

Are there any good reasons why the Democratic party should now receive the approval of the people of the United States, and why the management of public affairs should now be committed to its charge? In answer to this question we state two propositions, which we think can be clearly established by a reference to the political history of the country.

All of the principles and measures which the Democratic party held and maintained during its period of growth, strength, and activity have either been abandoned by it, or have been finally and for ever rejected by the people; secondly, all of the principles and measures which it now holds and advocates are either in direct antagonism to those which it formerly maintained, or are in equally direct antagonism to the will of the people most solemnly expressed by a life-and-death struggle for national existence.

During the period prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, two ideas were contending for the mastery—national power and local liberty. The Articles of Confederation represented the latter idea, the Constitution the former. Still, the Constitution was so much a work of compromise that it endeavored to strike the golden mean between two equally impracticable extremes, by giving absolute supremacy to the General Government in those matters which are peculiarly national, and by leaving the States with the control of those matters which are local and private. But the balance was very nicely adjusted, and the old struggle has been continued, and perhaps will be continued indefinitely.

Those who originally opposed the Constitution naturally became grouped into a party which upheld the local supremacy of the States. To these were added some men, like Madison, who had taken a very active part in forming the organized law. This party represented and upheld the idea of personal, local political liberty. We cannot doubt that the Federalists were as patriotic, as honorable, and as devoted as their opponents; but they rather wished to govern for the people than by the people. It is a mistake to suppose that slavery entered very largely into the contest which preceded the adoption of the Constitution. The opposition to that instrument was most powerful in Massachusetts, and only failed of success in New York, notwithstanding the labors of Hamilton and Jay, by a distinct understanding that a number of amendments protecting individual and political liberty should be immediately adopted; while in South Carolina the proposed scheme of government was accepted by an overwhelming majority. To this idea of local and personal liberty was soon added that of the extension of political rights, and particularly the right of suffrage. The party which maintained these principles was sure of success, and success soon followed. Everywhere aggressive, everywhere proclaiming the rights of man, and sympathizing with the peoples of Europe who were struggling with old dynasties, this party won an easy victory, and long held the results of its triumph.

But from the very beginning of the present government many leaders of this party had not only insisted with emphasis upon the rights reserved to the States by the terms of the Constitution, but had maintained that the States not only originally were, but still continue to be, sovereign; not only originally were, but still continue to be, the parties to a voluntary compact—a compact binding upon them only during the continuance of their tacit consent. This doctrine, simply because it was more logical than any other which desired the supremacy of the nation, and because it could not be successfully answered in any other way than by maintaining the absolute sovereignty of the one people of the United States, rapidly gained ground. Jefferson was its first prominent apostle: Calhoun wrought it out with irresistible logical deductions from his premises, and linked it with the cause of slavery. This theory produced one necessary effect, that of denying to the General Government the authority to decide upon its own powers. It is true that this denial was by many limited to the Supreme Court. Jefferson, the champion of absolute State sovereignty, and Jackson, the champion of a modified State sovereignty, were ready enough to uphold the power of the President while they held that high office; but they denied, with equal alacrity and emphasis, the capacity of the Supreme Court to settle any questions of constitutional construction, and to pronounce upon the powers of co-ordinate departments of the Government. It was Jackson who made the brutal remark upon C. J. Marshall's righteous decision in the Cherokee case, which the Tribune is so fond of quoting. We think there was a general consistency in these doctrines and principles. Between the absolute State sovereignty of Jefferson and Calhoun, and the modified State sovereignty of Madison and Jackson, the line of separation was shadowy and indistinct, and was fast disappearing. It did finally disappear within our own immediate times, and the Democratic party has become united upon the theory of Calhoun.

Compare this retrospect with the present position of political affairs. If there is one question which the people of the United States have finally settled, it is the absolute nationality and oneness of themselves, separate and distinct from any State boundaries and State organizations. If there is one claim which they have denied and for ever rejected, it is that of any independent State sovereignty. Millions of dollars, burdens voluntarily assumed for generations, thousands of lives willingly given up, attest this fact. We fought for our nationality, not for an assemblage of sovereign States. What does the Democratic party offer us as the result of the war and of the victory? It proposes the doctrine of absolute State sovereignty in its most offensive form. It asserts the complete right of the insurgent States to resume their former position with no loss of political power or capacity; it requires no conditions from the rebellious commonwealth; it denies the authority of the Congress to legislate upon the subject. Disguise it as we may, cover it up with an assumed love for the Union, this is the assertion of absolute State sovereignty, and a virtual abdication of national authority. It offers a premium to organized rebellion. Should these views be adopted, we believe that it would have been better had the Southern States succeeded in their war upon the nation. For the precedent thus established would virtually say to every State: "There is no risk in rebellion; resist at your pleasure; if you succeed, you will have obtained the object of your desires; if you fail, you will have lost no political attribute; therefore, rebel, and rebel as occasion shall permit." This is what the Democratic party now virtually says: the Western Democrats are not more reticent in the expression of their opinion than those of South Carolina or of Mississippi. Can the people of the United States adopt these views? We believe that the Republican party, as represented by its legislators, has done many unwise, and some invalid acts; but we more firmly believe that if the positions of the Democratic party be adopted, the war for nationality will have been turned into a farce.

The other principle which the Democratic party now maintains, is, that this is a "white man's government," and therefore that the electoral franchise should under no circumstances be given to the negro. We would not mistake the position. If we could see any signs of a desire to establish a qualification of intelligence or moral worth, we might be satisfied. But there is no such sign. The party has placed itself boldly upon the position of denying to the negro citizen any part whatever in the management of public affairs. The "visible admixture" law of Ohio, passed during the present session of the State Legislature, illustrates this tendency. We need not argue that all this is in direct antagonism with the living principles which the Democratic party once promulgated with an enthusiasm which made success certain. We do not now stop to discuss the correctness of the opposing theory in relation to the electoral franchise; it may be a manhood right; it may be a trust wielded for the benefit of the whole mass of people. We only say that the Democratic party originally attained its ascendency by advocating the former theory, and that now it has no argument whatever to support its restriction of the theory to white men. It appeals only to prejudice, and upon the prejudices of the "baser sort" it hopes to ride into power. But we will for a moment recall our statement. One gentleman of prominence among the New York Democrats has thought it important to suggest a scientific basis for the rejection of negro voters. He has with much show of learning stated that the family is the unit of society, and therefore that the family should be the source of political power. We can understand this. The notion is, in fact, somewhat old; it carries us back to Abraham and the other tribal sheiks among the Western Asiatics, and to the paterfamilias of the early Roman republic. But still the notion has a certain logical consistency. The head of the family may be in some sense looked upon as the representative of his descendants and dependents, and as, therefore, the depositary of all political power belonging to that aggregate of individuals. We can understand this conception of a social organization, but can hardly reconcile it with our modern notions of a republican government. But we have misunderstood the scientific Democrat. He gives a different term to the idea of the family. The family is the social and political unit, and therefore no persons who cannot become members of the family are clothed with any political rights. Negroes cannot become members of a white family, and therefore should not be permitted to vote. That is to say, all families must be white; all Asiatic and African connections are mere concubinage. We are afraid that, if the learned and scientific members of the Manhattan Club should carry out their theory to its easy results, they would disfranchise the Sixth Ward and many other strongholds of Democracy.

We have thus seen that of the two grand principles now set forth by the Democratic Party, one has received the unmistakable condemnation of the people, and the other is in direct hostility to its earlier and better doctrines.

Our time and space will not permit us to enlarge upon some of the practical measures of policy which were once the points of contest between the Democratic party and the Whigs. Do we expect now any clear utterance from the approaching Convention upon the subjects of internal improvements, United States banks, protective tariff, metallic currency? The people have settled the question of those improvements which aid the foreign and the inter-State commerce. Will the Democratic party raise its voice against the Pacific Railway? The National Bank system has not only taken the place of the old United States Bank against which Jackson and Benton fought with such untiring zeal, but has swallowed up the State institutions. Will the Democratic party decree its overthrow? A paper currency has driven all gold and silver out of circulation. Will the Democratic party repeat its old hard-money doctrines? It appears as though they hoped to obtain power upon the extreme opposite measure.

GRANT AND CHASE.

A CORRESPONDENT on another page accuses us of deviating from the principle which we have so freely advocated in the selection of public servants, by our expression of preference for Grant over Chase as a candidate for the Presidency. There is no doubt whatever that if the Presidency was to be the prize of a competitive examination, and was to be awarded to the best answerer of questions in logic, jurisprudence, political economy, common and statute law, taxation and revenue, General Grant's chance against Chief-Justice Chase would be very small. Those branches of knowledge with which the Chief-Justice's career as a lawyer and politician has naturally made him familiar, are those on which, if the Presidency were the reward of intellectual proficiency, candidates would naturally be examined. In other words, a lawyer and politician is, in the ordinary course of his life, in a certain sense, qualifying for the Presidency in so far as knowledge and experience qualify a man for it, and this cannot be said of a mere soldier. There is evidently in the minds of many people, and of our correspondent amongst the number, a feeling that when we have admitted this, we have admitted all that the Chief-Justice needs to have admitted to make plain his superiority to Grant. If we can place confidence in the reports of his opinions made by newspaper correspondents—and he has of late been so very outspoken, and the correspondents have on this point so generally agreed, that we feel warranted in believing them—he himself rests his claims largely on his intellectual acquirements and his experience of public affairs—matters in which Grant cannot compare with him, and in which anything like a competitive examination would make his superiority more evident still.

We of course speak of competitive examinations in connection with the Presidency merely by way of illustration. No one has ever seriously contemplated any such mode of selecting candidates for that office, because, in the first place, nobody aspires to it before he has reached the latter half of an active and conspicuous life, in which all his powers have been tried in the presence of the public by tests far more varied and searching than any examination could supply; and, in the second place, because—and this is the important point—moral qualities count for vastly more in fitting a man for such position than intellectual acquirements, and the existence or nature of these qualities in any particular case can only be got at by observation of a man's whole career. By moral qualities we do not mean what are ordinarily called "the moral sentiments"—a man's benevolence, a love of justice or of truth. We mean courage, persistence, perception, tact, knowledge of human nature, the faculty of superintendence; that whole assemblage of qualities, in short, which has in so many cases made great rulers and statesmen of men whose knowledge or experience was, in the strict sense of the words, comparatively small. Now, you cannot find out by any self-examination or particular intellectual feat—be it speech, book, bill, sermon, or report—whether a man has these qualities or not. There is no plummet by which you can sound the portion of his nature in which they lie. You have, in the case of obscure persons, to take on these points the testimony of those who have known them long. You have, in the case of well-known aspirants to high official positions, to take the judgment of the community at large, based on observation of their conduct under varied and trying circumstances. This may not be a perfect test, but it is the best possible. So that even if it were not the settled custom of the country for the higher officers of the government to be chosen by the popular vote, we should advocate it as the most effective mode of selection. In other words, a man's fitness for the Presidency is rather a question of character than of acquirements. Of the character of a public man, the public, and the public only, can be judge.

If we apply this rule to the two candidates most talked of—we will not say before the country, for the Chief-Justice has not yet been nominated, and we cannot yet believe that he will be—there is little in our humble opinion to be said for the Chief-Justice, and a great deal to be said for Grant; and in order to show that what we say now with regard to their respective merits is not said perfunctorily as part of the regular campaign work of a Republican paper, we shall take the liberty of referring such of our readers as think it worth their while to keep back numbers of the Nation to an article on General Grant appearing Dec. 9, and to two others, making a somewhat elaborate comparison between the two men, appearing Jan. 16. On both of these occasions we pointed out not only what we conceived to be Grant's fitness for the Presidency, and his great moral superiority to the Chief-Justice, but what we conceived to be the Chief-Justice's want of fitness for the Presidency, even supposing there was nobody else in the field. We may mention, too, not for the purpose of taking away from the effect of what any other journal is now saying in support of Grant, but for the purpose of vindicating our own right to refrain from bellowing and ranting at periods when others of the brethren are pleased to consider bellowing and ranting the only trustworthy indication of "soundness," that many of those journals which are now loudest in support of Grant were then foremost in decrying him, and were praying for the election of Chase as the one thing needed to restore peace and prosperity. Moreover, we took the liberty on that same occasion to commend in as strong terms as we had at our disposal that habit of reserve for which Grant is famous, although at that time many of the people were treating it as an indication either of stupidity or knavery. We now read with some bewilderment, therefore, but nevertheless with great satisfaction, glowing eulogies in the same columns on the golden gift of silence, the blessed art of holding one's tongue.

There was no reason at that time for thinking ill of Chase and well of Grant which does not now exist. We condemned the Chief-Justice for seeking the Republican nomination; we condemn still more strongly his seeking the Democratic nomination, and we considered his seeking the one, proof that he was capable of seeking the other. We confess we do not well see how any person who has carefully considered the duties and obligations of his judicial position can, after witnessing his political labors in 1866–67 in the Republican ranks, feel either shocked or surprised at his coquetting with the Democrats in 1868. His fall consisted in his coming down into the political arena at all. Once there his choice lies between tweedledum and tweedledee. He may be as learned, as honest, as upright, and as patriotic as you please; he has nevertheless committed the unpardonable sin. We are told that he is opposed to the attacks of the Radicals on the Supreme Court, and is in favor of judicial independence. We tell him, not as our opinion only, but as that of every man who knows what place the judiciary of a free state ought to hold, that he is the worst enemy the Supreme Court has ever had. By showing that a man as able, as learned as he, possessing as many claims to public confidence as he possesses, can, without shame or scruple, use the highest judicial position in the country as a stepping-stone to the Presidency, and can divide his time between hearing appeals on the loftiest of benches and discussing his own "chances" and "principles" with wire-pullers and newspaper correspondents, he has not only created the greatest scandal of the day, but given the Boutwells and the Stevenses all the excuse they need desire for wresting from the Court the last shreds of dignity or authority.

We know that the only inducement the Democrats have for even thinking of him as a candidate is the expectation that his name, linked with such a platform as he would be willing to stand on, would draw off a considerable number from the Republican ranks. We know, too, that this expectation is not altogether unfounded, and that in the Eastern States, at least, the exploits of the impeachers and the judicial disquisitions of the New York Tribune have prepared more Republicans for desertion, in case a reasonable excuse should offer itself, than many of the "earnest men" of the party imagine. But any Republican who allows his disgust with anything that has yet occurred in the party ranks to drive him into voting for Chase must certainly have singular notions of reform. Anybody who admires the declamation of a judge on the stump against trial by military commissions or in favor of "equal rights for all"—the great defence against both military commissions and all infringements of equal rights being pure, independent, and unsuspected civil courts—must have a singularly constituted mind. Grant is also abandoning a high and independent position, but not so much for the pursuit of political honors as for the acceptance of them from men who firmly believe his acceptance of them necessary for the good of the country. This at the very least must be said; whatever harm he does by it, he does to himself. He looses no bond and shakes no faith by which society is held together; he has incurred no obligation, as Mr. Chase has, to leave hope and fear behind him and make himself no man's suitor or debtor, and to act in the midst of change as the representative of the one thing which knows no change.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

THE attempt to increase the pay of the Government clerks in Washington which was made and failed last week was so clearly one of those little spurts into which the lower House occasionally breaks without either rhyme or reason, information or deliberation, when the importunity of the lobby becomes greater than some active members can bear, that it does not of itself call for much attention. But the comments of the press upon it and the arguments generally used against it suggest strongly that the public has not given the matter enough attention to enable it to say positively what the duty of Congress is. We have not seen it anywhere denied that the clerks are poorly paid, that they get less than is needed to enable men and women in their position to live with decency and with reasonable freedom from what may be called the animal cares of life. The newspapers have, as far as our observation has gone, disposed of their claims by asserting that they cannot be underpaid because thousands stand ready to take their places whenever they choose to vacate them. This is no doubt true, but if it proves anything it proves too much. It is just as good an argument for reducing their salaries as for not increasing them. If twenty per cent. were taken off the salaries instead of being added to them, there would be as many people ready to take the places as there are now, but this does not show that the clerks are now overpaid. There is hardly any office of which the emoluments are so small that nobody whatever is willing to fill it, if nothing but willingness is exacted of him as a qualification. The market price of labor is no doubt the price at which people can be got to perform it, but this is only true of cases in which the kind and quantity of labor are strictly defined. If an employer does not care what sort of men he employs, how many hours they work, or how their work is done, he will find no difficulty in securing men at almost any rate; but then to call his maximum the market rate would be absurd.

The United States is practically, as far as the Civil Service is concerned, an employer of this kind. It takes any kind of laborer and lets him work pretty much as he pleases, and can, of course, therefore always say in reply to his complaints of insufficient payment, Your discontent is unreasonable, because we can readily fill your place for the same wages. But supposing the true rule to be adopted, that the government work needs to be performed with a certain degree of efficiency, by men of a certain character and of a certain degree of capacity, and that none others will be received, it will be found that its officials are both in Washington and elsewhere greatly and disgracefully underpaid, and that to expect honesty or efficiency in return for the present salaries is preposterous.

A comparison in mere figures of the salaries paid by the United States with those paid by foreign powers would not settle the question. Living is a great deal dearer here than it is in any foreign country; it is a great deal dearer now than it was when the salaries were fixed. In other words, they have been reduced within the last seven years from thirty to forty per cent., and seven years ago they were insufficient. The servants of foreign governments are only part paid in money. They receive very large remuneration over and above their salaries in honor, in security, and in hope. Their office adds to the consideration in which they are held by society—or, in other words, gratifies one of the most constant, most powerful, and most respectable feelings of the human heart, a feeling which, as Mr. Jenckes ably showed in his speech, in May, on reform in the civil service, might be made greatly instrumental in promoting purity in our service, but which we allow to run wholly to waste. In this country a man loses rather than gains in popular estimation by accepting any but the highest positions under government. Moreover, the salaries paid by foreign governments—we are speaking, of course, of the more highly civilized nations—are in the nature of a life annuity. They give a man almost complete security as to his future and that of his family as long as he lives and behaves well. That is, they do not destroy all the risks to which a man dependent on his own exertions is exposed, but they greatly diminish their number by making the continuance of his income depend simply on his health and good conduct. There is nobody who has had the slightest experience of a life of toil who does not know what a boon this security would be to a vast number of persons of unsurpassed fidelity, honesty, industry, and punctuality, who are unfitted by temperament or intellect to take the risks of the great battle of commerce or the professions. Foreign governments by offering them security procure their services; they avoid ours except as a last resource. Finally, foreign governments, by means of promotion and superannuation pensions, pay their servants largely in hope. They not only supply them with a constant incentive to good behavior by offering a fair prospect of rising, but they supply them with a source of solid, daily comfort. They make their lives brighter and more cheerful, in doing away with the necessity under which all men, really fit to do honest service for anybody, feel of saving for the helpless period of old age.

It is, of course, difficult to estimate the value of these three things in dollars and cents. To different men they have different degrees of value; but, taking the average man, and considering what are the objects for which he toils, it is, we think, no exaggeration to set them down as equivalent to an addition of fifty per cent. to his yearly income. In the great army of "carpet-baggers," who are one year found editing a newspaper in Nebraska, the next keeping a grocery in Michigan, the next peddling patent double-action toothpicks in New York, and perhaps the next defending "the rights of man" on the stump in Georgia or Mississippi, whose home is on the railroad car, and whose furniture consists of a shawl, these things have few attractions. These gentlemen like to get their pay in money, and the government service is unfortunately largely recruited from them. But the best portion of this, as of every other, community is composed of men for whom a fixed residence, a comfortable fireside, and a tranquil old age are ends to which money is but the means, and it is from this class we should draw our public servants.

It is quite true that efficiency does not increase in the ratio of salary. In fact, one tendency of a fixed salary is to beget sloth, and there are few things more demoralizing than over-payment for any kind of work. The soporific influence of salaries ought to be combated not only by the fear of dismissal, which in practice must always have little influence, but by the prospect of promotion. Without this every service must be pervaded by indifference and languor, unless, indeed, activity is kept up by the chance of committing frauds. But it is as certain as anything of the kind can be that underpayment is the most powerful of known stimuli to peculation. There is hardly any man, no matter how strong his principles may be, who can resist its influence. M. de Launay, who was farmer-general of the Prussian revenues under Frederick II., found the salaries of the custom-house officers too small for their support, and begged the king to raise them as the only means of putting a stop to fraud. The king refused at first, said his subjects were all rogues, and alleged, as many of the newspapers do now with regard to our officials, that if his officers were paid better the revenues would be diminished, but they would not rob any the less. To which De Launay replied by an argument which was a valuable contribution to political science, but which, simple as it is when stated, few governments have acted on, and ours less than most others, in their management of their officers. "There is, sire," said he, "a most important maxim, which in matters of government is too frequently neglected. It is that men in general desire to be honest; but it is always necessary to leave them the ability of being so." The king gave way; the salaries of the officers were increased by one-half; and the result was that the revenue was increased by one-third without any new taxes.

We underpay nearly everybody in the public service; and, in fact, nearly everybody in the country, the returns of whose labor are not capable of estimation in figures, is underpaid. The managers of commercial enterprises usually conduct them in the light of experience and on principles of human nature, and therefore pay whatever is necessary to secure good honest service, and consider no salary extravagant which does this, and lawyers are generally pretty well paid, because everybody knows what the amount is which he hopes to gain and fears to lose when he employs them. But the judges, teachers, professors, ministers, and government clerks are paid at rates which, considering the interest of money and the real wealth of the country, are absurdly low. In estimating the wants of these classes, Cincinnatus or the Apostle Peter, or some other extraordinary person, seems to be often selected as the standard, and the common nineteenth-century "provider" is expected to display, as a matter of course, for twelve or fifteen hundred a year, virtues so rare that they have secured deathless fame for a few sages and heroes of antiquity.

One great reason, in our opinion, why the rewards of the higher kinds of labor are so low amongst us, is that the sentiment which decides what a man's wants ought to be is largely, more largely than in any other country, that of farmers. In every other civilized nation the city population rules the country population, and regulates everything connected with the public service. It decides what the wants of a public functionary ought to be, what his dignity or their tastes or their feelings require, and how far they should be consulted in fixing the amount of his salary. Here the agricultural classes may, for the first time in history, be said to control completely the government, not in general only, but in details. Now, a farmer's notions of the real wants of a family differ considerably from those of a city man; his notions of the value of ready money differ more widely still. He handles comparatively little ready money, or if he does, spends but little of it himself on the supply of his personal wants in the course of the year. He has no sympathy with the city man's love of society, his temptations in the way of books and amusements, his particularity about his dress and his furniture. Of that prodigious nervous activity and sensitiveness which the urban life of modern times has developed, and which seems every year to increase, he knows nothing, and will make no allowance for it; and the consequence is that, as our functionaries have to live mostly in cities, they are exposed to extraordinary trials, while their stock of virtue, owing to our mode of selecting them, is not sufficient even for ordinary ones.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, June 5, 1868.

FOR the last few days there has been a lull in political matters. After a sharpish tussle, Mr. Disraeli succeeded in getting his own way with the Scotch Reform bill, aided by the general desire to see business wound up, and by the comparative smallness of the issues at stake. A little more work still remains to be done in Parliament, in which no hitch is likely to occur, and we shall then have an appeal, either in the autumn or winter, to the new constituencies. The "leap in the dark" will be taken, and we shall learn what are the proclivities of an English democracy. Meanwhile a little wrangling goes on, chiefly with a view to electioneering. The Liberal party are rather nervous as to the possible effects of a "No Popery" cry, and are doing their best to fix upon Mr. Disraeli and his subordinates the blame of having proposed to endow the Roman Catholic priesthood. There can be no doubt that the Ministry, in fact, coquetted with the Roman Catholic party, and tried to hold out to them some hopes, but of a studiously vague nature. The Irish Secretary, Lord Mayo, compromised himself by a statement that the government policy was to be one of "levelling upwards;" that is to say, of raising the Roman Catholic clergy instead of disendowing the Protestant Church. Mr. Disraeli does his best to wriggle out of this, and to demonstrate that it meant nothing more than some vague proposal about workhouse chaplains. No one can presume to say what it did mean, except that it meant in some way a bid for support from the Roman Catholics. But whether the odium thus thrown upon the government will counterbalance the odium accruing to the opposition for their liberal policy, is a difficult problem. We shall see before long, and that is all that is to be said at present.

Meanwhile Parliament has been enjoying the short foretaste of bliss known as the Whitsuntide recess, and, favored by lovely summer weather, the short holidays have passed pleasantly to most persons. The Derby has been won and lost amidst more than usual excitement. The special excitement on the present occasion was produced by the Marquis of Hastings. This nobleman, though still young, has managed to spend a large fortune upon the turf. He has brought matters to such a pass that he was unable to pay his bets. The British public always sympathizes with a young nobleman in such a position, and was particularly excited by the fact that he owned the favorite for the Derby, and would win, in the event of success, enough money to set him upon his legs again, something, it was said, between one and two hundred thousand pounds. Unluckily, his horse turned out to be a thorough impostor, and instead of winning was last but two. The marquis is, therefore, worse off than before, and adds one more to the many victims of our glorious national sport. The sums of money at stake are so large, and have of late years increased so enormously, that the temptation to all the disreputable practices which accompany gambling is overwhelming for many young men with more money than brains. It is not surprising to hear on all hands complaints of the decay of the turf in all the qualities by which its faults were formerly redeemed. But it passes the skill of reformers to suggest any effectual remedy so long as such vast amounts are daily won and lost. The breed of horses is being damaged by the practice of running them off their legs as two-year-olds; gambling is stimulated, young men are ruined, and the whole business becomes so dirty that few people can touch it without being defiled. Whether any reformation can be effected is doubtful; but if not, we must expect to see the sport gradually lose ground in public estimation till it follows the downward path of prize-fighting and other amusements of our ancestors.

I indulged lately in a holiday of a different kind, which I think might be recommended to any one who desires to see some of the outward and visible signs of the strength of English conservatism. I refer to a trip down the Thames from Oxford to Eton. The Thames, as you are aware, is not quite so big as the Mississippi, nor even as the Rhine; but it has the merit that in a few miles it gives the very essence of English scenery. The whole landscape is on a miniature scale, with miniature hills and meadows and woods; but they have that grace which is almost peculiar to England —the grace of elaborate finish such as that of a well-kept garden. Every inch shows the expenditure of centuries of civilized labor, and is significant of wealthy comfort. Old manor-houses—some of them enclosing the remnants of extinct abbeys—picturesque churches, new villas, and stately mansions abound; trim lawns, rich in flowers, as smooth and carefully swept as drawing-room carpets, slope to the water's edge; the river encloses sleepy and well-ordered parks, or reflects the shadows of woods full of aged forest trees; even the cottages of old stained brick, and frequently covered with flowers, are at least picturesque outside. In short, it realizes the picture of an English home in Tennyson's "Palace of Art"—

> "Softer than sleep, all things in order stood,
> A haunt of ancient peace."

And at the two termini of the voyage, some seventy miles by water, are the venerable college buildings of Oxford and the "distant spires and ancient towers" of Eton, with the grand old walls of Windsor Castle looking down upon them. A boy brought up under the shadow of Windsor, in the pleasures of our greatest public school, sent afterwards to Oxford, where every street-corner is historical, and with a chance of settling down in some grand mansion on the banks of the Thames, must, one would think, be a thorough Conservative. Everything is so toned by time, so harmonious, and possibly so enervating, that change seems harsh and wanton. And yet symptoms of change may be observed. At Oxford, indeed, two of our best-known preachers were thundering from the University pulpit. The Bishop of Oxford was eloquent in his usual unctuous style, which to me, I confess, is simply repulsive; he is one of the very cleverest men in England; he is, it is said, an active and useful bishop; and he is an acknowledged leader of the High Church party; unluckily, no one outside his own party puts any faith in "Soapy Sam," to use his vulgar nickname. His ruling passion seems to be a love of applause; and he will indulge in the silliest of claptrap and the most fulsome of rhetoric to obtain it. He made himself ridiculous some years ago by denouncing Darwin after a fashion which simply showed his utter scientific ignorance, and he is always ready to put himself forward to talk any amount of reckless nonsense about any matter that in any way concerns the Church, with a special turn for appealing to ignorant popular prejudices. It is no wonder that he has a reputation for insincerity, and that in spite of his great talents, especially as an orator, he has little weight with the secular world. Mr. Liddon, the other preacher, is a man of rising reputation amongst the High-Churchmen. In appearance he is of the type of the foreign ecclesiastic, with a dark, aquiline, ascetic face. His eloquence is carefully modelled on that of French preachers; and though his manner is rather artificial, it is earnest and impressive. He has a great flow of language, and uses it to support the highest sacramental doctrines. Indeed, he is probably one of the most powerful of living English orators in the pulpit.

Such preachers might be said to represent, not inadequately, the mediæval tendencies of the old University. But, even in Oxford, they are a minority. There had been a meeting of Liberals the day before, intended to smooth the way for very radical changes. Oxford men at large, perhaps half of them being clergymen, are strongly conservative; but the teaching body, including the pick of the intellectual lights of the place, are in great part bitterly radical. The thunders of Dr. Pusey or Mr. Liddon or the Bishop of Oxford may affect a part of the students, and may rally the zealous country clergy; but the Liberal party is growing in spite of such denunciations, and, with the help of a new Parliament, will doubtless carry out many changes. Dissenters will soon be admitted, in spite of all opposition; and in time, it is to be hoped, the whole university system will be modernized without being vulgarized. The only danger is that the resistance may delay reform till revolution becomes inevitable, and then much that is desirable might be swept away. At Eton the same conflict is approaching. The walls were inscribed in many places with "No Reform," showing the conservative sympathies of the boys. Boys, indeed, are always Tories, at least in an English public school. They have the most stubborn affection for the old order of things, right or wrong. The reason, however, for the present manifestation is probably simple—namely, the simple boyish dislike to learning anything. Eton is in a certain way an excellent school. What it teaches it teaches well, especially to the best boys. But there is still a great mass of idleness to be encountered. One master spends a large part of his time in teaching the boys to row; and another is equally energetic in teaching them to play cricket; and though it may be very well that masters should take an interest in the sports, it is not so well that the sports should be encouraged at the expense of the studies. Under the present system, eminence in cricket and rowing is not merely estimated by the boys as at least equal to eminence in the school studies, but a great deal has been done by the masters to foster that singular conception of the functions of a school. Meanwhile, a new head-master of very high reputation has been lately appointed; most of his subordinates, who are drawn from distinguished students at the universities, are in favor of reform; and with the assistance of Parliament—for Parliament has to be invoked in every business, however small or great—there is a prospect of speedy improvement. For the present, old traditions flourish, and to one who passes through Eton and looks at the vigorous, hearty lads on the river and in the playing-fields, amongst the picturesque buildings, and who sympathizes a little with their keen esprit de corps, it is difficult not to wish that reform may touch them gently. Most of the old brutality practised at such schools has disappeared, and if the boys only learned a little, there would not be much to complain of. Such are one or two of the symptoms of the times to be discovered during a trip down our ancient river, if Americans will allow me to apply that name to "Father Thames." Lower down he becomes a very dirty old gentleman, though cleaner than two or three years ago, when the London sewerage made him absolutely pestilential. But in his upper course he not only possesses very high beauties of the peaceful and domestic order, but may suggest many hints to the observer of men and manners.

As I have gone aside from politics, I may mention one or two literary matters. Two or three books which have just appeared will be worth attention. We have a poem by G. Eliot called "The Spanish Gypsy." No verdict has yet been passed upon it by qualified critics, though her reputation naturally excites much interest. I think I may say that those who think "Romola" a step in advance of "Adam Bede" and the "Mill on the Floss" (amongst whom I do not reckon myself) will probably admire it. Others will think it rather a proof of cultivated ability than of pure poetical genius. A very remarkable poem called the "Earthly Paradise" has lately been published by Mr. Morris, the author of "Jason." I have not yet studied it, but it has already a great reputation. Mr. Morris is a young Oxford man who has taken to business, and sells paper and furniture of artistic designs; it seems that his occupation leaves him time for acquiring literary distinction as well. The new volume of poems by Mr. Lytton has also been much praised in the Times and elsewhere; but the general verdict is that it is at best only clever, and that he must be put in the rank of secondary and imitative poets. Another book to which we are looking forward with much interest is the continuation of Mr. Kinglake's "Crimean War." The subject is a little stale; but Mr. Kinglake's style is enough to recommend it independently of the subject. There was a rumor, too, that it had been suppressed in consequence of indiscreet revelations, which will tend to attract attention to it. If Mr. Kinglake is rather partial, at least he is admirably painstaking.

Gov. Eyre, as I anticipated, has escaped. The general feeling, on which I have not space to comment, is undoubtedly that his prosecution was becoming a persecution; and the memory of his services has eclipsed in popular estimation the recollection of his severities. The attack upon him will probably injure the popularity of Mr. Mill and Mr. Charles Buxton, until it too is forgotten.

Correspondence.

CHASE AND GRANT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Dear Sir: I have read the Nation for the last ten months and have derived more instruction from it than from any other political paper. You are the only journalist of either party who criticises the misdeeds and false reasonings of your own. You have clearly stated the mission of the Republican party, and have faithfully warned its members when they have deviated from its principles. You carry conscience into politics and are a better moral teacher than most of the religious papers. By your sure, clear statements of the wisdom of meeting our obligations for paying the war debt with honesty, you have convinced all your attentive readers that it is the best policy. It is a pity they needed to be convinced—but they did. You have shown up the sophistries of Butler in his dishonorable propositions, and you have convicted Senator Sherman of his weakness. You are foremost in the advocacy of common sense and honesty in the management of the affairs of the state.

By your advocacy of Mr. Jenckes's Civil Service Bill you have awakened public attention to the subject. I esteem your paper so highly that, after a careful reading of each number, I mail it to an intelligent friend in Mississippi who is not able to subscribe for it. It cannot be disagreeable to you to learn that your labors are appreciated by one of your subscribers.

I see that in your liberality you publish letters arraigning many of your positions, with freedom; but with great respect for you, I now arraign you of inconsistency in not applying the principles of the Civil Service Bill, which you so much commend, to the case of the highest officer of the Government. Could General Grant stand the test of an examination such as that bill requires for the highest officers? It is only very lately that you have advocated him as the fit standard-bearer of the party. Have you not yielded principle to expediency? Can it be that you believe he is the only man of the Republican party who can be elected President, and he not on account of any political principles or opinions he has expressed, nor for his experience, culture, and fitness, but because the party in Congress have committed so many blunders, mistakes, extravagances, and perversions of principle that only the successful leader of our armies can be elected? If you have sacrificed your own teachings and convictions for this expediency, you are not equal to Henry Clay when he said, "He would rather be right than be President."

You are the boldest teacher of reforms in the Republican party. You are read by the thinkers of our country. You have lately taught, in an effective article, that "mind rules;" you should not give to party what was meant for mankind, your superior knowledge and your love of truth.

You have made latterly various efforts to damage the elevated standing of Chief-Justice Chase. You have praised him for his conduct in the impeachment trial; but you seem to see an unfitness in the Chief-Justice being elevated to the Presidency. Apply the principles which you advocate in the Civil Service Bill to his case—where will you find a riper statesman, a purer patriot, a more consistent advocate of human rights? It strikes me as strangely as it does you that possibly he may get the Democratic nomination; but would not his nomination and election work a revolution in the party? and might it not, regenerated and reformed, prove a superior public guardian to the party now in power? I have known Mr. Chase for forty years, and know him to be a persistent advocate of what he deems right.

June 16, 1868.

[The above was not written with a view to publication; in fact, it was accompanied by a request that it might not be published. But in suppressing the signature, which is that of a Western general of volunteers, we have reduced it simply to an expression of opinion which we know many good Republicans hold, and on which we are glad to have an opportunity of saying something.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

By special arrangement with the author, Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt will be the American publishers of the "Annals of Rural Bengal" of W. W. Hunter, a gentleman whose work is praised as giving a better view of the relations subsisting between the British in India and the people they rule than half a dozen of the so-called "authorities" on Indian history.——Hurd & Houghton announce: "The Jesus of the Evangelist; his Historical Character Vindicated," etc., by Rev. C. A. Row, of Pembroke College, Oxford; "The Primitive Eirenicon: one Evangelical Ministry," by Rev. M. Gallagher.——J. B. Ford & Co., of Nassau Street, are about to publish, by subscription, Horace Greeley's "Recollections of a Busy Life." The book is made up of Mr. Greeley's recent contributions to the Ledger; but they are revised and enlarged, and make a good autobiography.——T. B. Peterson & Co. announce the second and third volumes of a series of T. Adolphus Trollope's novels. They are "Marietta" and "Beppo, the Conscript," which succeed "Gemma," already published. The same house announces a "Campaign Life of General Grant and the Hon. Schuyler Colfax." It is a duodecimo of four hundred pages. Another campaign life of Colfax is that by the Rev. Mr. A. Y. Moore, "who was for twelve years, as pastor and friend, in the entire confidence of Mr. Colfax."

—We are pleased to be able to announce "The Pre-Columbian Discovery of America by the Northmen. Illustrated by translations from the Icelandic Sagas." The editor is the Rev. Mr. B. F. De Costa. The introduction will give the reader the substance of all that has been said about the supposed voyages of the Phœnicians, Tyrians, and others to this continent; the settlement of Iceland and colonization of Greenland will be described; and, finally, the editor will give some account of the Northmen, their literature, nautical knowledge, mythology, etc. The main body of the work will be translated extracts from the Sagas, and these, the editor says, will comprise the earliest fragments from the Landanama (or Icelandic Doomsday Book) relating to Greenland; Eric the Red's voyages to Greenland and settlement, A.D. 983–5; Biorne Heriulfson's voyage to the coast of America, A.D. 986; Leif Ericson's voyage to Vinland (New England), A.D. 1000–1; Thorwald Ericson's voyage to South Vinland, A.D. 1002; Thorstein Ericson's attempt to seek Vinland, A.D. 1005; Thorfinn Karlsefne's settlement in Vinland, A.D. 1006–7; Freydisa's voyage and settlement in Vinland, A.D. 1012–13; together with the minor narratives, as Are Marson's sojourn in Hvitramanna-Land, A.D. 983; voyage of Biorne Asbranson, A.D. 999; Gudlief Gudlaugson's voyage, A.D. 1027; Bishop Eric's voyage to Vinland, A.D. 1121; Newfoundland rediscovered, A.D. 1285; voyage to Markland (Nova Scotia), A.D. 1347, etc. Hitherto the English-reading portion of historical students in this country have been obliged to draw their information in regard to these voyages from garbled extracts; but the object of the present work is to give the Sagas that relate to America in their integrity. This work will be published by Mr. Joel Munsell, of Albany.

—It is of some interest to persons who watch the American book market to know that Messrs. Charles Scribner & Company's publication of Lange's Commentary is selling very well indeed for so large and learned a work. And it is selling not in this country only but abroad; Messrs. T. & T. Clarke, of Edinburgh—who themselves began to publish it, but by-and-by stopped—have just sent out an order for a thousand copies of the "Genesis." We failed, we think, to mention the "Theological and Philosophical Library," which Messrs. Scribner & Co. announced a week or two ago. They intend to issue a select library of text-books, in all the main departments of theology and philosophy, especially adapted for the libraries of ministers. The editors, Doctor Philip Schaff and Doctor Henry B. Smith, have not completed their scheme in all its details, but in general it may be said that they will publish, with notes by various writers, some of them American, standard works of foreign and native authors on the different topics included in the wide field which they propose to occupy. They say:

"The editors, reserving the right of making the best selections, do not commit themselves finally to special treatises on all the topics. Among the works which it is proposed to bring out first, are: Tischendorf's 'Greek New Testament,' the last edition, revised by the author, and edited by Dr. Schaff; an 'Introduction to the Old Testament,' on the basis of Keil, Bleek, Havernick, and others; an 'Introduction to the New Testament,' on the basis of Reuss, Bleek, Guericke, Hug, and others; 'Patrology,' on the basis of Alzog, Fessler, Möhler, etc., by Prof. R. D. Hitchcock; 'Hase's Polemics,' edited by Prof. G. P. Fisher, Yale College; 'Symbolism,' on the basis of Winer, Matthes, Hoffman, Köllner, etc.; an 'Encyclopædia of Theology,' by Prof. H. B. Smith; a collection of the 'Ancient Creeds and Definitions of Faith;' 'Manual of Theological Definitions;' 'Christian Ethics,' on the basis of Schmid, Harless, Wuttke, and others; Ueberweg's 'History of Philosophy,' three volumes, supplemented from Erdmann and other writers; Ulrici's 'God and Nature,'" etc.

—In 1864, S. Low, Son & Marston published a book called "Haunted Hearts," by Miss M. S. Cummins, an American writer, well known as the author of the "Lamplighter," who is not long deceased. It had previously been arranged between the author and the publishers that the former should go to Canada and stay there during and until after the publication in England was complete. This she did, and we may add that since then many other American authors have done the same thing for the same purpose. On the 13th of June, Messrs. Sampson Low, Son & Marston found that George Routledge & Sons were selling another edition of "Haunted Hearts," and this house last-mentioned being called on for an explanation, replied that the book had been sent them by a New York correspondent; that Miss Cummins, its author, was an alien, a native of the United States, between which country and England no international copyright law exists. They declined, therefore, to stop their issue of the book, and the dispute was carried into the courts. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley granted Messrs. Low, Son & Marston an injunction. On appeal, the Lords Justices set aside the Vice-Chancellor's decision, and the final appeal was taken to the House of Lords. Before that tribunal the case has just been decided, and it is laid down as law that any American, without going to Canada or any part of the British possessions, may acquire copyright which shall be his property throughout the British Empire, by simply having his book first published on English soil. We can hardly refrain much longer from doing our duty in this matter.

—A Connecticut lady, accustomed to writing for the press, has invented three new styles of writing paper, of which one is designed for Author's Manuscript, one for Contributor's Manuscript, and one for Sermon Note Paper. The sheets of the first may be described as slips ten inches long by six inches wide, with two round holes at the top for the purpose of tying the sheets together in parts or chapters. One of the holes is to be used for the compositor's hook when he sets up the copy. The paper, which is of very good quality, is ruled on one side only, so that the author may not be led into writing on both sides of the sheet—an error which, as the country editors every little while tell their correspondents, yearly causes many hundreds of articles of the first excellence to be thrown remorselessly and instantaneously into the waste-paper basket of the sanctum. In fact, the inventor takes special pains to give instruction to authors on many points of their duty in the preparation of manuscript. The paper being put up in neat boxes, she has put inside, on the cover, fourteen rules or directions—as to capitalizing, numbering pages, paragraphing, etc.—which young writers will find of service. As for the old writers, most of them are hopeless, we fear. The second style of these papers, the Contributor's Manuscript, is an inch narrower than the Author's Manuscript, and the sheets have but one hole at the top. Some considerable space at the top is left unruled, so that the compositor's hook may not tear or deface the writing. The Sermon Note Paper has two holes at the side of the sheets, and an eyeleted cover accompanies each box. The cover and paper will lie open without rubbing down. We are told that the inventor conferred with many editors and publishers before settling on the size of the sheets, the width of the space between the ruled lines, and so on; and, so far as we can judge, she has had good advice, and done a service to the writing fraternity, to say nothing of proof-readers and printers. Writers get into fashions of their own, to be sure; manuscript-making is a matter with which habit, founded perhaps on whim, may have much to do; for instance, there are people who can hardly judge of the value of what they have written unless it is set before their eyes in a microscopic-hand-like print; again, it was only in part due to avarice, we dare say, that Pope wrote on the backs of old letters; in part it was whim; there are writers fond of all sorts of odd old scraps for scribbling; then there is the man who likes a vast expanse of smooth, fine paper, and the man who wants strips about as wide as three telegraphic strips, and the man who must have buff paper, and so on. But the majority of paper consumers, we should say, will find these new styles very much to their taste.

—An article on Harvard College in the Pall Mall Gazette has been widely copied in this country. It is, in the main, favorable; and we wish that the sole uncomplimentary remark—that the "library is sadly deficient in the literature of the last ten years"—would attract general attention to the crying want of a permanent library fund. It is certainly surprising that the friends of Harvard should have left her so ill provided in this respect. One cause we have been told, is that some of those who have the ability to give remember the library of their own college days, so hedged round with restrictions that it was of little use, and protest that they will not provide books to slumber untouched on the shelves. They have not heard of the more liberal management, under which it is open seven hours every week-day instead of the hour or two twice a week, which most college libraries consider sufficient. And they probably do not know how much researches are facilitated by the classed catalogue in course of preparation, which has been called, more epigrammatically than justly, "the best catalogue of the worst library in the country." A larger number of persons are deceived by the reputed richness of the library. "115,000 volumes" has an imposing sound. They do not reflect how large a portion of these volumes are out of date, which in science, at least, means "worthless," and in belles-lettres too often means "uninteresting." They see by the annual reports that the library is increasing at the rate of three thousand volumes a year, and suppose that it is doing as well as could be desired. But a very large part of this increase consists of donations, and a large portion of the donations are the clearings of closets and garrets, given because they are of no value to the owner. Even these it is well to have. They are better than nothing, and may possibly be at some time of use to some enquirer, but to those for whom the library is especially designed they are of no service whatever. And, moreover, even when desirable as filling up the gaps in the older literature, they leave the library still unsupplied with the books of the day, and unable to inform its habitués of the latest theories, the latest discoveries, the latest achievements. The library assumes the appearance of a second-hand bookstore, while professors have to spend a considerable portion of their salaries in purchasing the latest works in their respective departments, and students borrow of professors. Cambridge will never have a library worthy of the oldest college in America until she is furnished with means to procure, as they appear, the books which are attracting notice in the world of letters, those which are destined to become standard works, and those from which her students can learn what is going on around them. She cannot hope to train up her sons into accurate and scholarly investigators, when in almost every enquiry to which she directs their attention they are brought to a pause by the want of the best sources of information. Eight years ago she had a good foundation for a library—old and valuable books for which a new library would have to wait long and pay high—but that was all. In the works of the great thinkers and best scholars of the present day, works which are of the highest importance in the proper education of her pupils, she was miserably deficient. Every department of the university had profited more by the public liberality than that one which is a common help to them all. Then came Mr. William Gray's gift of $5,000 a year for five years, with which the library supplied some of its wants, and for a time kept abreast with the advance of science. Mr. Gray could not have wished a better proof of the wisdom of this liberality than the greatly increased use of the library which immediately ensued. But the experience of those five years showed that $5,000 is the very least sum that should be spent for books (exclusive of periodicals) where such varied demands are to be satisfied. And when the money was gone and no one emulated his generosity, the library began again to fall behindhand, and its momentary opulence only made its poverty seem greater. Were it not for the kindness of a few friends, especially of Ticknor & Fields, Gould & Lincoln, and W. V. Spencer, who give most of their publications, its state would be unendurable. After paying for "Memoirs and Transactions" of learned societies, and a list of periodicals from which they are obliged to omit the Contemporary, Fortnightly, and Saturday Reviews, the Pall Mall Gazette, Punch, Blackwood, Fraser, Macmillan, the Cornhill, all the lighter magazines, and most of those published on the Continent, and, setting aside certain restricted funds, the library council have less than $400 with which to purchase books in the wide subjects of theology, law, medicine, bibliography, philosophy, politics and social science, philology (excepting classical), the fine arts, music, the belles-lettres in every language but the English, history, geography, travels, antiquities and ethnography, zoölogy, botany, mineralogy, geology and palæontology, physics, chemistry, engineering, and the numerous useful arts and manufactures. When few books of any importance can be purchased for less than $5, and so necessary a book as the "Life of Bunsen" costs $26, it will readily be seen that the library may well be "sadly deficient in the literature of the last ten years."

—Mr. Bouton will describe in a catalogue soon to be printed three or four works of a sort not often offered to the American, nor indeed any other, book-buyer. First is Hogarth's complete works, comprising three folio volumes, containing 329 plates, together with their variations, i.e., First, Second, Third, and Fourth State, which number 91 more. For this collection, probably not matched in this country, $1,200 is expected. The second work is a copy of Spence's "Anecdotes, Observations, and Characters of Books and Men," extended from one to four volumes by the insertion of more than two hundred and forty portraits and views—all of which are in proof condition—and the originals of all the letters mentioned in Spence's appendix. Autographs of Pope, Christopher Pitt, Bobb Doddington, Hume, Joseph Warton, Robert Dodsley, Stephen Duck, and so on, are among these originals. It seems safe to say that the possession of these letters will ensure this copy from being surpassed by any hereafter made, as certainly it is superior to any other now known as having been made already. The price set upon this work is one thousand dollars. A fine Byzantine manuscript—"Evangelia Quatuor, Græce"—on vellum, declared to have been written in the latter half of the ninth century, adorned with paintings of the four Evangelists, and with capitals and headings in gold, is offered for $2,100. For $1,235 one may buy a complete set—the completest set Mr. Quaritch had ever seen—of the old English Chronicles, including, as well as those of Froissart, Monstrelet, Hollinshed, William of Malmesbury, Robert of Gloucester, and others usually put together in sets of Chronicles, Fuller's "Worthies," Roberts's "Chronicles of the Kings and Chronicle of London," and others too numerous to be mentioned here, and which we advise such of our readers as can to go and look at as specimens of fine binding, if not as possible inmates of their libraries.

KIRK'S "CHARLES THE BOLD."*

AMERICAN historiography, like American history, has its starting point in the discovery of this continent. Its first productions—be the cause rational choice, predilection, or accident—cluster around that natural base as if around a fountain-head, from which its streams are to flow through radiating channels in various directions. Irving takes us to Andalusia to witness the great departure from Palos, and after carrying us across the sea with his hero, "Christopher Columbus," and across the new continent with the "Companions of Columbus," he returns to the Hispano-Moorish province, studies and sketches the "Conquest of Granada," the Moslem stronghold, and in after-life reaches both ends of his double course in his "History of Mahomet and his Successors" and in his "Life of Washington." The downward western course is more amply developed by Sparks, Bancroft, and Palfrey, but Prescott takes us back to Spain and the times of "Ferdinand and Isabella," to descend to those of their grandson, Charles V., in his "Conquest of Mexico" and "Conquest of Peru," and finally to those of their great-grandson, "Philip the Second." Motley takes up this line, going over from Charles V. and Philip of Spain to their revolted subjects in the Low Countries, and in his "Rise of the Dutch Republic" and the "History of the United Netherlands," describes the grandest and purest struggles of Protestantism, the further grapplings of which with the power of the house of Austria he intends to sketch—if the report be true—in a history of the Thirty Years' War. Kirk, another and more intentional continuator of Prescott, goes a step further backward, ascending to an earlier period of the history of the Netherlands, which the daughter of his hero, "Charles the Bold," Mary of Burgundy—the grandmother of Charles V.—was to bring over, as her dowry, to the house of Austria.

How far Mr. Kirk has been influenced in his choice of subject by the study of the rich collection on the close of the fifteenth century which Mr. Prescott and his heirs placed at his free disposal, it would be idle curiosity to enquire. In itself, had it been the object of the author to write a comprehensive work on the life or reign, and not also on the times, of Charles the Bold, we should have to pronounce this choice a decidedly unhappy one. Neither the moral nor the intellectual nor the military qualities of that Burgundian duke were such as to render him an object of just admiration; there was nothing great in his rise or exploits; nothing to move or astound in his fall. "That he was not a man of lofty genius or versatile talents, that his conceptions transcended his ability to execute, that he was especially deficient in that faculty of adapting his policy and mode of action to the dispositions and requirements of others, and to the exigencies of the moment, "are conclusions which the author does not seek to disturb." . . . . . Granting that this new history, coming after "a mass of documents and relations have been dragged from their hiding-places, cleansed from the dust of ages, and thrust into publicity," "could not repeat the assertions that he was whirled along by the mere turbulence of his passions; that his conceptions were confused and his plans destitute of meaning or solidity; that he plunged without forethought into difficulties which he might easily have avoided; that he defied all obstacles, despised all considerations either of policy or right; and fell a victim to the insane pursuit of an empty fame;" granting all of that clearness of vision—"within a limited range"—those powers of reasoning, that consistency and soundness of his principles of action, that sense of equity and sincerity, which are claimed for him—always in palliation of bloody deeds and fatal errors—granting all this on the ground of these new discoveries, what is there, after all, that would constitute him a great man or monarch? "The virtues for which he stood conspicuous among princes—his continence, sobriety, unequalled laboriousness, rigid economy, strict impartiality, inaccessibility to sycophants and parasites, openness to every appeal, and promptness to expedite every affair," are qualities which can be found united in so small—were it not for Mr. Carlyle, we would say so contemptible—a monarch as Frederic William I., and found less closely connected "with a distempered judgment, extravagant fancies, and an inordinate egotism" (Vol. II., pp. 345–350). And whither that judgment, those fancies, and that egotism could lead, the descriptions of the sacks of Dinant, Liége, and Nesle, of the ravage of Normandy, in 1472, and similar scenes, tell us but too distinctly. When Liége was taken Charles removed all formerly imposed restraint on passion. His soldiery was to know "no restriction, no cause for secresy or fear. Rapacity, cruelty, lust—all the foul desires of the unbridled heart—were to rage with license and impunity." Blood "flowed in rivulets upon the floors" of "all, or nearly all," the "four hundred churches" of the city. "The monuments were broken, the tombs entered and despoiled. The convents were forced, the nuns violated. Neither age, sex, nor condition was respected. Where life was spared, it was in the hope of extorting ransom, or, more often, in order that death might be inflicted at greater leisure and with greater barbarity." On the following day the surviving aged persons, women, and young children were allowed to quit the town. "The remaining inhabitants were left entirely to the discretion of their captors. It was not so much a wanton carnage that ensued as a long series of cold-blooded murders. Hanging was a favorite mode of disposing of the prisoners. Some were thrown from the roofs of houses, and the mangled corpses left unburied in the streets. But, in general, they were collected in gangs, driven upon the bridge, tied together in twos or threes, and hurled into the flood beneath. It would be idle to attempt any estimate of the numbers that perished. . . . . What is certain is, that nothing less was intended and deliberately aimed at than utter extermination" (II., 598–603). On the capture of Nesle, Charles "entered the principal church without dismounting from his horse, whose hoofs plashed through a stream of blood that ran several inches deep upon the floor. As he gazed at this appalling sight, and at the corpses—already rifled and stripped—of men, women, and children," he muttered, 'Here is a fine spectacle! Truly I have good butchers with me!'" (II., 135–136). In the campaign of 1472, Charles "razed or burned, as appeared from the record kept by his provost-marshal, two thousand and seventy-two towns, villages, and castles" (II., 152). And besides these crimes, and perhaps his personal bravery, there is nothing extraordinary in the career of him whom some have called the "Napoleon of the Middle Ages." He resembled the great Corsican only in stubbornness, overbearing pride, and reckless selfishness. Not his greatness, but his fall, was his own work. His power he inherited, succeeding to his father, Philip the Good, in 1467, as Duke of Burgundy, Brabant, Limburg, and Luxemburg; Count of Flanders, Artois, Burgundy, Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Namur; Lord of Friesland, Malines, etc. (I., 439). To these possessions he added Gueldres, Alsace, and Lorraine, grasped after more, strove for independence both of France and the Empire, by turns fought and intrigued with all his neighbors, tyrannized over his subjects, was assailed by a coalition, and fell manfully fighting. He created nothing, and left but ruins behind him.

But the aim of our author is higher. In the struggles of his hero, or rather of his heroes—for Louis XI. of France almost equally divides the interest of the book with the bold Duke of Burgundy—he attempts to sketch a period; that in which the stream of European history, before making the final precipitate plunge from mediæval into modern times, grew rapid and resistless. The Catholic Church, with its hierarchy; the feudal system, with its orders of chivalry; the civic communities, with their organization of labor and of trade, their leagues and confederacies, were to go down, "not because they were radically vicious and false, because their dominion had been wrongful or usurped," but because they had done their work, had "exhausted their vitality, in stimulating men to escape into simpler and broader forms of opinion and of life." They were shattered by the irrepressible struggle for a freer play of the principles which they had themselves embodied. "They were to go down before revolutions which were not so much a sudden inburst of new and before unheard of truths, or a return to primitive usages, to earlier and purer conceptions and beliefs, as the full development and open triumph of principles which had all along been moulding the destinies of mankind, a taking possession of the inheritance that had accumulated through a long minority, the accomplishment of a design to which all that had gone before had tended and conduced." A greater era—the sixteenth century—was soon to set in, an era in which mankind would appear to have grown taller, in which the principal states of Europe would be "seen consolidated in the forms and within the limits which, for the most part, they have since retained;" and government, "resting on a new basis, having become at once authoritative and dependent—in a word, representative."

We have thus presented to our readers Mr. Kirk's own conception of this double picture, of a feudal prince struggling against destiny, and a period convulsed by an incipient process of transformation—a work of great dimensions, which he has constructed of materials no less zealously used than ample. This picture is wanting neither in grandeur of the ensemble nor in variety of figures, neither in power of delineation nor of vividness of coloring, neither in symmetry of grouping nor in minute elaboration of details. If it lacks the power to produce a great and pleasant emotion, the defect must be attributed to the total absence of attractive characters, the pettiness and grotesqueness of the central figure, the repulsiveness of many others—like Louis XI., Frederic and Sigismund of Austria, Adolphus of Gueldres, or Hagenbach—and the horror or disgust with which endless scenes of carnage necessarily inspire us. These blemishes are inherent in the subject, and the author has exerted himself to veil them—at least some of them—rather more, perhaps, than is compatible with strict fidelity to history. We have already mentioned his great fondness for his hero, Charles, in spite of his acknowledged defects. This we should be inclined to judge leniently as a natural foible common to many writers long engaged in studying and depicting characters not devoid of virtue and vigor. We would fain pardon the numberless and often tedious expositions of circumstances and causes and difficulties and motives by which the writer, reasoning with and for Charles, labors to explain, to palliate, or to exculpate his actions, sometimes with perhaps no less zeal and no more success than those historians who exhaust their powers to prove that the first Emperor of France, in his wars, was not so much an aggressor as a victim of aggression. But we must decidedly condemn that excess of whitewashing ardor which, overstepping the limits of a fair defensive, becomes passionately and vituperatively offensive, and, while claiming all possible indulgence for one universally accused and condemned, is unsparing in virulent invective against his opponents. A course like this—as pursued by our author, pro Charles and Hagenbach contra Swiss cantons and Alsatian towns—may be expedient in a forum; it is as useless as unfair in history. Louis XI., too, we believe, is too favorably treated, and altogether we too often discover unmistakable traces of Carlylean hero-worship—in a mild form, however. Carlylean talkativeness is equally discoverable here and there; and we are also inclined to believe that, had there been no such models as the Scotchman's "Frederic the Great," Mr. Kirk would never have drawn out his "Charles the Bold" to the length of seventeen hundred pages. The picture of the Burgundian prince is decidedly overladen, and that partly with details which add nothing to our knowledge of his character or of the age, and which we should consider uninteresting in the delineation of even a monarch so little remote from our times and so grand in history as Frederic, or even Napoleon.

Our author's diction, too, though logical, lucid, and pleasant in general, is not free from blemishes. It is often too florid and pictorial, not rarely turgid, and very frequently digressive, prolixly discursive and argumentative. It indulges too much in similes and generalizing remarks. Neither has it a pronounced and steady character. We are here reminded of Macaulay, there of Lamartine, elsewhere of Carlyle or Michelet, and most frequently of Prescott. Inaccurate, inelegant, and illogical expressions occur here and there. Quotations in the notes from modern French and German works are often ungrammatically executed, while parts of others from mediæval books and manuscripts seem to be but too grammatically given. A few words from Heine, quoted from memory (I., 69), are disfigured in every way. In the text, however, everything foreign, names included, is most correctly rendered. We should prefer, however, "Dauphiny" (like "Normandy," "Picardy," "Brittany," etc.) to "Dauphiné," and (Swiss) "Friburg" to "Freyburg," "Middleburg" to "Middlebourg," and "Limburg" to "Limbourg." Statements of minor facts based on too slender a foundation seem to occur more frequently than even the poetry of history would cover with its license, but indisputable mistakes, such as the mention of Philip Second's visiting the Netherlands in 1529 (I., 68), or of an intended "expulsion of the Turks from Germany" long before they had taken a foothold in that country (II., 211), seem to be either misprints or slips of the pen.

EGYPT'S PLACE IN HISTORY.*

To write his five volumes of historical, philological, and scientific criticism, with a view to determine "Egypt's place in universal history," was with Bunsen a work of fifteen years. Simply to read those volumes, so as to master their contents and pronounce an intelligent opinion upon their theories and results, is the work of as many weeks; while to make a digest of them, and present a clear and consecutive view of their argument and its evidences, would require at least as many months. This last is what Mrs. Dall has attempted in a pamphlet of 100 pages, which she offers partly as a guide to students of the original work, but chiefly as a suggestive sketch to those who can afford neither time nor money for five octavos averaging 700 pages each and costing not less than $70. To say that she has done her work fairly and well is high praise, for her task was like attempting to reduce the differential and integral calculus to the measure of a first book in arithmetic. Bunsen was an omnivorous student, devouring eagerly every form of knowledge that came within his reach, but he lacked the assimilative power of the thorough scholar. Of quick apprehension, great versatility, and prodigious industry, he yet wanted that patient discrimination which alone enables one to separate fact from conjecture, truth from theory, and to work up materials slowly and steadily upon the sure foundations of evidence. His identification of the Philosophumena, or the "Refutation of all Heresies," as a work of Hippolytus, after the Oxford press had issued it as a lost fragment of Origen, was a marvel of discernment and ingenuity, and soon received the suffrages of the learned world. But the rapidity with which he evolved from this treatise theories of religious faith, of church order and worship, of humanitary progress, of the philosophy of language, was a characteristic illustration of the essentially speculative tendencies of his mind. With a scientific spirit and ostensibly a scientific method, Bunsen nevertheless failed of the true scientific faculty either for the discriminating selection of details or the logical combination of materials. His great work on Egypt betrays this defect.

A member of his family once informed us that Baron Bunsen had in his study three distinct working-tables: one for diplomatic correspondence and public affairs, another for Egyptology, and a third for church questions and miscellaneous studies; and that he would pass from one to another of these without relaxation or loss of time. It has seemed to us in reading his "Egypt's Place in History" that in writing it he must sometimes have fancied himself engaged upon a work of diplomacy, and at others have mistaken it for the promiscuous receptacle of his third table. It is a work that always impresses us with a profound respect for the author's varied attainments, for his grasp of intellect, his conscientious labor after truth, and his devout and earnest spirit; but the more we study it, the greater is our distrust of Bunsen as an authority. He has accumulated a vast amount of materials bearing upon his subject—some only in a remote way—and has marshalled these with ingenuity, with eloquence, and often with force, in support of his theory. But where a fact is wanting he substitutes an arbitrary or fanciful conjecture, and then reasons from this as if it were an established fact, and builds up theories from conclusions compounded equally of speculation and knowledge. His work will always be indispensable to the student because of its grand array of historical and philological data; many of its suggestions and conclusions may stand the final test of criticism and discovery, and its generous enthusiasm will impart to it a perpetual freshness. Mrs. Dall is a devoted admirer of Bunsen, and accepts his every word as the utterance of an oracle. Hence her "Presentation" has also the tone of an apology, and should be taken cum grano. But one can learn from her pages what Bunsen sought to accomplish and believed himself to have accomplished, and the grounds upon which his chronological scheme is based. We admonish our readers, however, that this pamphlet is not of the nature of light literature, but will task their thinking powers like a mathematical problem. But the study of Egyptology can no longer be ignored as barren and chimerical; it is not only rewarding, but fascinating, as is any subject where the lines of mystery and of discovery continually interblend. Mrs. Dall has provided a good hand-book for beginners.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JULY.

As nicely done and as pleasant to read as anything in the July Harper's is Mr. Curtis's "chaffing" of "Thomas Tomahawk, Esquire," a critic of art in "an influential morning paper." The badinage is rather more than half contemptuous; perhaps there is a shade too much seriousness in it, but on the whole it is gay and graceful, and the satirist preserves well the tone of easy superiority to his victim. We are bound to say, however, that on the merits of the question raised we think the art-critic right, and the critic of his criticism wrong. Why, sure enough—as T. T. is supposed to enquire,—why should the critic of painting do his work in fond and genial memory of the golden days when "Giovanni was one of us," and "Tomaso" was one of us, and we all used to float, holding the while melodious converse, over the lagunes of Venice? There seems no reason why, none which in the interest of true criticism must be accepted as good. To write "for the honor of remembered Italy and sacred friendship" is not, probably, to write with the ardent desire "to see the thing as it is," nor to write very valuable criticism—valuable to us, for example, who perhaps want information as to whether Tomaso and Giovanni are to be admired, nor of great value, we suppose, to Tomaso and Giovanni themselves. The Easy Chair, it appears to us, made the mistake of putting T. T. in an impregnable position before going into the fight. Mistake, we say, for there was no need of it; he might have been left in the open field. And for our own part we should not have said that "the edge of Tomahawk's weapon is so sharp, and the gleam of the blade so bright, and the thrust so trenchant, that it is always pleasant to the spectator to watch his play." To some otherwise indifferent spectators of his mode of warfare it is a spectacle that they would describe as odious, and, to use strong words, painful and disgusting. But for the doing of certain things it is punishment enough to have done them. Besides, it is hardly our place here to say more of the matter.

The illustrated papers in Harper's are "Street Pavements;" "Among the Andes of Peru and Bolivia," by E. G. Squier; "New York in the Revolution;" "David Garrick;" "The Fashions in Guinea;" and an instalment of Mrs. Craik's love story. The Reverend Dr. Newman Hall's "Address to the American People" is good-natured and sound, but will hardly keep any very large portion of the people "awake nights" by its novelty. It is a good sample of a kind of literature to which our late war gave occasion, and which is not entirely pleasing—that kind which says to us, "Come, let us reason together," and says it in a tone which does not give us over-much credit for ability to reason coolly on our course in national emergencies. It is just precisely in these, however, if we are anywhere superior to the rest of mankind, that we are furthest ahead of creation in general.

There is no very clever article in this month's Lippincott's, but several of the articles will be read with pleasure. "A Literary Hospital" is by a physician apparently, and treats in a humorous way of the medical knowledge displayed by novelists when they go into the sick-room or the hospital. The fact is that a thoroughly good realistic novelist would call in a physician when his characters are taken down, and have them put through the regular course on payment of the regular fees. Struggling young medical students could be got to do it cheap, or retired physicians who cure by mail if the sufferer will fill in the blanks of a printed form of diagnosis. Not so much is made of the "Literary Hospital" as might have been made of it, but it was well thought of, it is well written, and the anonymous author has made a good first step in magazine writing. So, if it is his first step, has Mr. R. Wilson in "The Legend of Ball's Lake." It is a tale of Marion and his men, preceded by a good description of South Carolina swamp waters and of a fishing party of the old times. We can recommend for perusal "The Chinese in California," although it is too slight, and although the author leaves his facts, which we wanted to hear, and gives us theorizing, which is not very profitable, as to God's intentions in permitting the Chinese to come to this country and in simultaneously causing the small California boys to be born with bigger heads than the young of any other State in the Union. On the whole, however, the paper is a good one and worth reading. We say the same of almost all the other articles except the poetry and "No More Metaphysics," which latter is a sad example of what is often enough seen—namely, a man who thinks he knows a subject, who has been for years thinking so, who has written upon it with some acceptance, who would be reduced to a condition near to speechlessness if some one were to tell him that he really knows nothing about it, and yet who for some reason—the mental structure of some distant ancestor, perhaps—is quite incapable of making so much as even a beginning to think on it. We should remark before leaving Lippincott's that Miss Annie Thomas has a little story in it. So has Miss Maria L. Pool, a young writer of some ability, who is travelling in a road that will lead her into no very fine places, and who would do well to stop short and give some hard study to the story-telling trade before practising it any more.

The brokers who are never tired of talking over the fight, and who sincerely re verence Mr. Vanderbilt and think Mr. Drew (a new and revised edition of) the noblest work of God, will like Mr. Medbery's Atlantic article on "The Great Erie Imbroglio." But the Atlantic's usual readers will find it too technical, we should say, and will bring away from it no very clear idea of what it was all about, or at any rate of just how the battle was fought. "Tonelli's Marriage" is a little picture from Venice by Mr. Howells—the pathos and the mirth and the business all a little dim and dreamy, and seeming far off, as we suppose is right when the time and place is the Venice of a decade since. Mr. Henry James, Jr., writes "De Grey: A Romance." The romancer's success, as distinguished from the novel-writer's, is, doubtless, that he creates not new individuals of our species and puts them in known places, but that he creates for his characters a world with certain new conditions, or makes this everyday life strange and new by bringing into it characters differing from men and women of flesh and blood. Mr. James has been more than tolerably successful, we think, in "De Grey," though perhaps it is better to read it as hints towards a tragical story, with the priest for chief actor, than as a romance. "St. Michael's Night" will not, we presume, be as a story anything but one of the ordinary love stories. But apparently it is to be praised as having much of local truth in its pictures of Norman scenes and the character of Norman peasants and fishermen; and certainly it is very honest and well-finished writing, which might well be given as a lesson to nine out of ten of our women that write. Even better than that—we speak of the reader's pleasure, and not of the nature of the writer, as revealed by her style—the author shows that she has an eye for character, and quick, true sympathies. Read, for example, her account of the touching conversation between Jeanne and Epiphanie as they walked together to Dieppe on the day of the fête. On "Modern French Painting," as criticism of paintings, we are incompetent to give an opinion. As a rule, however, we find ourselves disinclined to take the word of a declaiming person on any subject whatever. The Frenchman is believed—in England and the British colonies—to admire the Englishman very much because, when he tells the Frenchman a lie, he commits the crime with so little gesticulation and protestation, with an air of such unconcern, of such indifference as to whether his interlocutor takes it or leaves it, that the light Gaul is very apt to be often fearfully deceived. Thus should art criticism also be written for the calculating American. Most of us cannot tell, when the talk is of painting, whether a man is telling us the sacred truth or endeavoring to hoax us, and we assure Mr. Benson that he stands an indefinitely better chance of commanding our assent if he rhapsodizes not at all, nor flings gay-colored adjectives about, nor gets ecstatic to any great degree of ecstasy; it ought to be done with a firm face and a thoroughly composed demeanor. Mr. Whipple furnishes a set of his rough-and-ready criticisms—"surface indications" of the wealth beneath—on Daniel, Drayton, Giles and Phineas Fletcher, Hall, Herbert, Donne, and some others of the minor Elizabethan or post-Elizabethan poets. We must not forget to mention the article on the Coral Islanders, which gives an amusing account of the miseries among the missionaries of two bad seamen who proposed to themselves a life of license in Manihiki, and were set to work on the roads.

For poetry in this month's Atlantic we have the "Dole of Jarl Thorkell," which sings, in cadences of sweet irregularity, Mr. Whittier's benign creed. The two other pieces are by Mr. R. S. Spofford and Mrs. H. Prescott Spofford, and they make this reviewer sigh—as much in anticipation as from present trouble. It is the appearance of verses like this in a magazine like the Atlantic, that encourages countless millions of editors and poets to write and print similar verses in quantities incalculable.

Readers of the Catholic World will be interested in an English Romanist's account of the "Condition and Prospects of Catholics in England." Four hundred and thirty-four was the number of priests in England forty years ago; now it is, in England and Scotland, 1,639, to say nothing of 67 monasteries or similar collections of men, and 227 nunneries. The magazine begins with "A Plea for Liberty of Conscience." The Roman Catholics in the United States are, so to speak, under a cloud; there is a system of domestic and social tyranny which impedes a person in his right to embrace, profess, and practise the Catholic religion. We very much doubt if there is much cause for complaints of this kind. However, if there were, it would not be wonderful. Americans generally distrust the Catholic Church; most of them believe it is never safe to trust good Roman Catholics with power over others, and, loving personal liberty, they dislike to see the strength of "the Church" increased. "An Italian Girl of Our Day" continues to be very good. This instalment of "Science and Faith" is like the others; it might be constructed from the title by any person of average reading who knew for what magazine the essay was to be prepared; there is nothing new in it. "The Legend of Glastonbury" is an amusing story, and "Glimpses of Tuscany" is not bad reading of the tourists' kind, though not exciting. The translator of Petrarch's "St. Mary Magdalen" seems to have wilfully perverted the text; some of his errors are too obvious not to have been purposely made. The other poetry is pretty—that on "Wild Flowers" very pretty for the dramatic way in which it is told.

Putnam's seems to be the best of the July magazines, and a very long way indeed ahead of what it has ever been before since its resurrection. It begins with a readable article on "Mural Paintings at Pompeii," by Mr. Bayard Taylor. One of the things that prevents one's enjoying Mr. Taylor's writing is, that one sees there need be no end to it when he has once begun. The imagination is haunted and dismayed by a fear that he will flow on for ever and ever, as he undoubtedly might. But we found in the case of this article that the fear we speak of might safely be dismissed, and it is worth reading and pleasant enough from beginning to end. "My Berkshire Home" is some realistic poetry, the best yet published in Putnam's, but full of minor faults. "Brutish" is an odd choice of an adjective in this line:

> . . . . "The flock and spotted herd
> Both daily lick my hand with brutish joy."

But the poem is full of the peace of nature. "Life in Paris" is by Mr. C. W. Elliott, who makes his article more valuable by giving at the end of it a letter from an American long resident in France, who decidedly dissents from Mr. Elliott's conclusions. Thus the reader has put before him in rather a novel way his bane and antidote. The "Journal of a Poor Musician" is, we are glad to see, to be continued. "Cotton Planting at Port Hudson," "The Fables of Bidpai," and "After Three Thousand Years" will be found agreeable reading, and readers will be interested in the exposure of the Rev. Eleazer Williams, "The Last of the Bourbons," who is pretty plainly shown to have been a mere pretender. We commend to the notice of all whom it concerns the remarks of the art editor on a recent appointment to the Chair of Fine Arts in Michigan University. It is anything but genial, and can hardly fail to do good.

The same thing is not to be said of the criticism in Hours at Home. The readers of the review of new books in that periodical, if they trust at all to the editor's sentences, must be without any knowledge of the absolute or the relative value of the books of the month. Aside from the critical notices and the large patch of dulness made by the "Chaplet of Pearls," the July number of Hours at Home is a good one. Doctor Bushnell has an eloquent paper with the title "Training for the Pulpit Manward," which sounds as much like a name given in baptism to a Puritan child of two hundred and twenty years ago as like an educated man's title for an oration. The body of the article has instances of the same fault, but it is just in thought and fit to be pondered by theological students who intend preaching. Another good article, "Christianity and Morality," is by M. Guizot. It is translated from the Revue Chrétienne, in which its author permitted it to appear before its publication in his forthcoming volume of "Meditations upon the Christian Religion." "Translations of the 'Dies Iræ'" is by Dr. Schaff, who ought to have taken a little more room and made a somewhat better finished article on a topic of which he is in some respects very well qualified to treat. Doctor J. F. Hurst sends home some anecdotes about the late King of Bavaria which are very kind to that monarch's memory, and will cause some surprise in the minds of those of us who have been thinking of him as a very bad old man of good tastes, who loved tyranny and Lola Montez.

The Galaxy for the coming month is of its usual goodness. Doctor Hammond makes an article on "The Brain and the Spinal Cord" which, doubtless, is to be accepted as authoritative, and may therefore be read with satisfaction. "T. W." will tell those who care to know about the great diamonds of the world, and he seems to have a little vein of pleasing humor. Miss Anna L. Johnson writes a story and an attempt at estimating Margaret Fuller, which are unequally disagreeable, the story being less affected, and giving fewer signs of the writer's ill-cultivated likings in literature, than the biographical sketch. A course of Dryden, say, or Boswell's Johnson, or the Duke of Wellington's Despatches would be the literary salvation of numbers of people who are now writing in the magazines and newspapers. To say a thing and have done with it; to say what one feels, no more and no less; to find out just what one thinks and put it into plain English without grimacing, is what we have more of in American literature than we used to have, but what we have too little of by far. Bad models, we imagine, are chargeable with the faults of some of the worst offenders, but innate dishonesty of character is what it looks like, and what probably it is, in too many cases. "The Church of the Future" is Methodism, if we are to believe an anonymous writer in the Galaxy's list. Whether or not he is somewhat mistaken, he gives a mass of statistics of Methodism which some people will be glad to have put before them. Miss Annie Thomas and Miss Maria L. Pool are to be found in the Galaxy as well as in Lippincott's; Mr. Eugene Benson is in it ("Eastman Johnson") as well as in the Atlantic, and so is Mr. Henry James, Jr., whose story is called "Osborne's Revenge." There are all sorts of possibilities as to how it may turn out, and the reader is kept in suspense till the end, gazing on the inscrutability of Miss Congreve, and not feeling very well paid for his time when she and her lovers turn out to be nothing in particular. A writer in the "Nebulæ" quotes from John Fletcher some lines of a hymn to Venus, which must have been, the writer thinks, consciously or unconsciously, in Mr. Emerson's mind when he wrote Brahma. It is possible; but the poem remains as much Mr. Emerson's as before. It is to be found set forth in full in the essay on the Over-Soul in Emerson's prose works. Indeed, it is merely the Indian mystic's conception of life and being; and not the Indian mystic's alone, but the conception to which, so far as we can tell, idealists of all ages and countries have been sure to come. The Elizabethan poet stringing conceits about Love, or, if you like to say so, philosophizing in the idealistic manner about love, may say what seems good to him. All the same if he had never existed, the transcendentalist, endeavoring to put into English the Brahminical view of being, would have been compelled by unescapable necessity to say just what Mr. Emerson said. Of course, we speak as to the essence of the poem; "the red slayer" and other figures might be varied an utterly inconceivable number of times. But it is precisely in the figures or properties, so to speak, that Emerson and Fletcher differ. They differ, then, where they should, and the coincidence in idea is to be spoken of as mere coincidence. It is not to be forgotten that Mr. Emerson's whole being has long been saturated with this Orientalism, and to seek in Fletcher for the source of particular manifestations of it is to look in some pitcher for the source and origin of a drop of the water of the sea.

Man: Where, Whence, and Whither? Being a Glance at Man in his Natural History Relations. By David Page, LL.D. (New York: Moorhead, Simpson & Bond. 1868.)—The answers to the first and second questions on the title-page of this work are in the main a statement of the argument in favor of accounting for the origin of man through the theory of progressive development, the argument being based upon man's zoölogical and ethical relationships, physical surroundings, and geological history. The reasoning followed is not essentially different from that usually adopted, and, as far as the statement goes, has the merit of being clearly and methodically, though we cannot say that it is always carefully, made. A theory of progressive development of some kind meets with favor at the present time from such leading naturalists as Von Baer, Owen, Huxley, Siebold, Darwin, Rutemeyer, and others, chiefly, as we believe, because it enables one to form a reasonable conception of the mode of the incoming of organic forms upon the surface of the earth. Such a theory has in its favor the support of obvious analogies, seen in the development of plants and animals as it takes place daily under our eyes, each individual always passing from homogeneous organic matter, or at least from a nucleated cell, to a more or less complex structure of tissues and organs. In addition to this, there is in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, as they now exist, on the whole, a progressive series of forms, though not without gaps and breaks, and among the extinct races other forms which make these breaks both fewer and smaller, though they do not bridge them over. Lastly, the whole history of the organic world points to an upward manifestation of life-force. Nevertheless, the progressive development of each individual organism out of a simple structure is no proof that the same is true of the race, and if the breaks in the animal series were wholly filled up, and there were as many intermediate forms between man and apes as the most zealous transmutationist might desire, although the consistency of facts and theory would thus become vastly more impressive, the actual derivation of one species from another would still remain to be proved. The mode of bringing about the transmutation, whether by "natural selection," according to Darwin, or by certain inherent qualities of the primordial forms, according to others, is a matter of secondary consideration, and about which the advocates of progressive development might widely differ.

The great and obvious difficulty in the way of the theory at present is the absence of any proof that the needed transmutations have taken place, and the opponents—foremost among whom is Agassiz, whose opinions are entitled to the highest consideration on account of the comprehensive manner in which he has studied through his busy life both extinct and existing forms—can point complacently at this negative objection. They do not, however, offer anything as a substitute for the theory they reject, unless it be, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, the view admitted by some, that all organic forms became at once, at the very beginning of their existence, the perfect beings we now see, through the coming together of inorganic atoms. This hypothesis is without a single analogy or positive observation in its favor, and at present is equally incapable of proof with the transmutation process itself.

Dr. Page's book is a special plea for transmutation, and for the most part his case is well presented; but he not unfrequently damages the cause he advocates by unwarranted assumptions, all the more damaging because they form so important a part in the foundations of his argument. The assertions that the mollusc is but "a more concentrated expression" of the radiate and articulate, and "the vertebrate a higher specialization of the mollusc," is conclusive evidence that the author is ignorant of the fact that the ablest comparative anatomists have failed to recognize any common type for these groups, a circumstance entirely opposed to the derivation of one from the other. Again, "reasoning from what we know," he says, "the Caucasian, or white man, has been preceded by the Mongol, Red Indian, and Malay; and these, in turn, were preceded by the Ethiopian or negro." As far as our knowledge of the relative antiquity of the races goes, the very reverse seems to be the case. The oldest remains of man hitherto discovered are not from Africa, but from the north of Europe, France, and California, and in their anatomical features do not even suggest the negro. Notwithstanding these and other defects, the work we are considering leaves upon the mind the feeling that the theory of progressive development is assuming day by day larger proportions and a more definite shape; but before it can be accepted as a legitimate hypothesis, it must await further research into that early condition out of which, if the hypothesis be true, man must have emerged before he became even a worker of stone or clay—when he stood on the borders of the brute creation.

Where is the City? (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1868.)—"Israel Knight, just under his majority, and fresh from a college"—which we may conjecture to have been a "business college," from the degree of subtle appreciation of the niceties of his native tongue which his style betrays, and the fine commercial air which pervades his correspondence and his "notes" on theological topics—set out to discover which among several of the sects of Christendom embodied the whole of Christian doctrine and practice. Having read the results of his investigations with some care, we find ourselves undecided whether to consider him as having conducted them in the interests of "our Roman Catholic brethren," or simply in his own interests as a maker of salable books. There is something to be said in behalf of each supposition—very little for the book itself, regarded in any other light than that in which it affects the publisher and the author. As a contribution to religious thought, or, indeed, to thought of any kind, it is absolutely worthless. After peering into various dark closets to find the sun, the ardent seeker after light who plays the part of hero reports that it is to be found in none of them—which may be a just, but is surely an insignificant conclusion. There is an elaborate show of fairness about his researches, which appearance is partly owing to the fact that he is to be described as a thinker of the "ardent and sensitive" stamp, prone to look at the illuminated side of things; to weep in Spiritualist circles when his deceased relatives appear over his left shoulder; to "free his mind" in Methodist love-feasts; and to be frequently in imminent danger of being converted to different sets of opinions. Nothing saves him but a great natural facility for blowing hot and cold in one breath. Except the Spiritualists, it is only among the Protestant sects that he looks, and he fixes his attention on the most orthodox division of each of them—what he calls "the right wing"—in order that his dissent from them shall be seen to proceed not from a consideration of their perversions, but from something unsatisfactory in their premises. According to Mr. Parton, the Catholics are just now very busy in the work of converting us all to the true fold—in the light of which fact this little book, which assumes to hold on to the fundamental principles of Christianity on one side, while carrying on a suggestive process of elimination among the sects on the other, wears a somewhat dubious and Jesuitical air. We ourselves, however, incline to the book-making theory as a sufficiently plausible one to account for its production. There is a want of acuteness in its investigations and of perceptible direction in its conclusions which is better adapted to interest without seriously dissatisfying the members of the different religious bodies of which it treats than to make it an efficient agent in the work of proselytism. As its thought is superficial, and its style by no means good, various considerations as to the shortness of human life decide us not to recommend it for perusal.
